"I have often wondered," says Bishop Watson, "what could be the reason that men, not destitute of talents, should be desirous of undermining the authority of revealed religion, and studious in exposing, with a malignant and illiberal exultation, every little difficulty attending the Scriptures, to popular animadversion and contempt. I am not willing to attribute this strange propensity to what Plato attributed the atheism of his time—to profligacy of manners—to affectation of singularity—to gross ignorance, assuming the semblance of deep research and superior sagacity;—I had rather refer it to an impropriety of judgment, respecting the manners, and mental acquirements, of human kind in the first ages of the world. Most unbelievers argue as if they thought that man, in remote and rude antiquity, in the very birth and infancy of our species, had the same distinct conceptions of one eternal, invisible, incorporeal, infinitely wise, powerful, and good God, which they themselves have now. This I look upon as a great mistake, and a pregnant source of infidelity. Human kind, by long experience—by the institutions of civil society—by the cultivation of arts and sciences—by, as I believe, divine instruction actually given to some, and traditionally communicated to all; is in a far more distinguished situation, as to the powers of the mind, than it was in the childhood of the world.

"The history of man is the history of the providence of God; who, willing the supreme felicity of all his creatures, has adapted his government to the capacity of those, who in different ages were the subjects of it. The history of any one nation throughout all ages, and that of all nations in the same age, are but separate parts of one great plan, which God is carrying on for the moral melioration of mankind. But who can comprehend the whole of this immense design? The shortness of life, the weakness of our faculties, the inadequacy of our means of information, conspire to make it impossible for us, worms of the earth! insects of an hour! completely to understand any one of its parts. No man, who well weighs the subject, ought to be surprised, that in the histories of ancient times many things should occur foreign to our manners, the propriety and necessity of which we cannot clearly apprehend.

"It appears incredible to many, that God Almighty should have had colloquial intercourse with our first parents; that he should have contracted a kind of friendship for the patriarchs, and entered into covenants with them; that he should have suspended the laws of nature in Egypt; should have been so apparently partial, as to become the God and governor of one particular nation; and should have so far demeaned himself, as to give to that people a burthensome ritual of worship, statutes, and ordinances, many of which seem to be beneath the dignity of his attention, unimportant and impolitic. I have conversed with many Deists, and have always found that the strangeness of these things was the only reason for their disbelief of them: nothing similar has happened in their time; they will not, therefore, admit that these events have really taken place at any time. As well might a child, when arrived at the state of manhood, contend that he had neither ever stood in need of, or experienced the fostering care of a mother's kindness, the wearisome attention of his nurse, or the instruction and discipline of his schoolmaster.

"The Supreme Being selected one family from an idolatrous world; nursed it up by various acts of his providence, into a great nation; communicated to that nation a knowledge of his holiness, justice, mercy, power, and wisdom; disseminated them at various times through every part of the earth, that they might be a 'leaven to leaven the whole lump,' that they might assure all other nations of the existence of one Supreme God, the creator and preserver of the world, the only proper object of adoration.

"With what reason can we expect, that what was done to one nation, not out of any partiality to them, but for the general good, should be done to all? that the mode of instruction, which was suited to the infancy of the world, should be extended to the maturity of its manhood, or to the imbecility of its old age? I own to you, that when I consider how nearly man, in a savage state, approaches to the brute creation as to intellectual excellence; and when I contemplate his miserable attainments, as to the knowledge of God, in a civilized state, when he has no divine instruction on the subject, or when that instruction has been forgotten (for all men have known something of God from tradition), I cannot but admire the wisdom and goodnesss of the Supreme Being, in having let himself down to our apprehensions; in having given to mankind, in the earliest ages, sensible and extraordinary proofs of his existence and attributes; in having made the Jewish and Christian dispensations, mediums to convey to all men, through all ages, that knowledge concerning himself, which he had vouchsafed to give immediately to the first.

"I own it is strange, very strange, that he should have made an immediate manifestation of himself in the first ages of the world; but what is there that is not strange? It is strange that you and I are here,—that there is water, and earth, and air, and fire,—that there is a sun, and moon, and stars,—that there is generation, corruption, reproduction. I can account ultimately for none of these things, without recurring to Him who made every thing. I also am his workmanship, and look up to him with hope of preservation through all eternity; I adore him for his word as well as for his work: his work I cannot comprehend, but his word hath assured me of all that I am concerned to know, that He hath prepared everlasting happiness for those who love and obey him."

PROVIDENCE ENGAGED FOR CHRISTIANS.

"All things work together for good, to them that love God."—Rom. viii, 28.

To love my God is bliss below,
To see his face is heav'n above.
O blessed thought! I there shall know
That truth of truths, that God is love!

Yes, I shall see that love sublime
Watch'd o'er each earthly scene I knew;
And every woe that chequer'd time,
As proofs of love I there shall view.

O teach me now thy word to trust,
To see thy ways in heaven's own light,
And feel, although a child of dust,
That I am precious in thy sight.

Then shall my joyful lips proclaim
The wonders of a Saviour's love:
My rising soul shall catch the flame
That glows throughout the hosts above.

But stay, my soul, thou canst not here
Soar up with seraph's burning wing:
O let me gain their glorious sphere,
And I as loud as they will sing!

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XIX.

On exciting Fear.

Dear Madam,

In my last Letter I made a few observations upon the nature of fear, and the impropriety of its being excited in the mind of your child in reference to any being. Some of the objects were adverted to, such as thieves, murderers, child-stealers, animals, and insects. The remaining objects remain to be alluded to.

The water is an object, respecting which fear is often excited by the nurses. In order to preserve a young child from being drowned, the nurse tells him about certain horrible and dangerous creatures, who, if he goes too near the water, will seize him by the pinafore, drag him in, and devour him. This is her theory of death by drowning. Hereby, however, that venerable personage has perverted the imagination of her innocent pupil, and has rendered him the subject of a timorous dread in reference to water. Be it your enlightened task to show him, that we live by breathing the fluid called air, but that we could not live in the fluid called water, because we could not breathe in it. I will suppose, however, that, agreeably to a former Letter, you have taken care that swimming should be an accomplishment early acquired, and that the management of a boat should follow as soon afterwards as possible. Happy the parents who reside on the sea-coast, where their children, while almost yet infants, learn to sport with the spray and to laugh at the rolling billows; and at an early period to ply the adventurous and easy arm, and rise and fall with the restless flood, and with a bosom to which fear is a stranger, enjoy the sublime emotions of the experienced swimmer! Compared with the coward boy bred in an inland county, unused to this exercise, and cautioned whenever he stirs abroad against going near water, and who is afraid even of a ditch of more than ordinary dimensions, such children seem to me to have acquired a new faculty, a new mechanical force, by which they avail themselves of health, of enjoyment, of mental exhilaration, and even of mental grandeur, which to him must be unknown. Let your son learn to swim very early, and you will save him and yourself much anxiety arising from this source.

Darkness is another object by which fear is often excited in the mind of children. This is to be traced to the same source: the child is threatened to be put into the dark hole, into a dark room, or darkness is peopled with a host of imaginary beings.

A child ought to be taught to know no difference, and to dread no inconvenience from the darkness, except that he cannot find things so well, and must use a little more caution in going about the house, the fields, the public roads, &c. lest he should injure himself by contact with different objects. Owing to improper treatment in childhood, the late Dr. Priestley, who certainly as a philosopher deserved that celebrity of which he was not worthy as a theologian, confesses, in one of his later letters, that he had never remembered to have felt "quite at ease in the dark." No force of reasoning in after-life can conquer or eradicate an early impression. Unhappy impressions! which, to serve some transitory and insignificant use of making a child obedient, prevent perfect tranquillity for much of the rest of his time on earth. If a child is not taught to dread darkness, he will never have the idea; and if he never has the idea till after twelve years old, I think he will be secure from it for ever.

The ideas of danger usually associated with darkness are those of being surprised by thieves and murderers, who the child may have been led to imagine likely to conceal themselves in his bed-room, under the bed, amid the folds of the curtains, and even up the chimney. I believe every observer of children has seen or heard of children the wretched slaves of such terrors. They have arisen from the cruel habits of the nurse, who has intimidated her helpless charge by telling him of "The Old Man," who will have him if he is not good, and a variety of similar disastrous methods of conducting education. But the chief cause of the dread of darkness in the mind of a child arises from the representations often made to him respecting fairies, genii, witches, ghosts, and evil spirits. The darkness becomes literally peopled with such terrors in his imagination; and many an unhappy infant has lain awake half the night, with a beating heart, unable even to look out of bed, for fear of seeing a ghost standing "all in white" at the end of his bed, or in the act of "drawing his curtains." Hence, the impression of the existence of invisible beings, which is perhaps almost instinctive, and of the possibility of the appearance of dying friends, which cannot be disproved, but which I really believe to be supported by some invincible facts, becomes the torment of a child before reason has gained ascendancy, nor does it cease to afflict him even when it has.

The poet Burns is an instance of this nature. I quote the following passage from his Life, written by himself. Although the passage is by him used in a different sense, it is equally applicable to my present purpose. "In my infant and boyish days too, I owed much to an old woman who resided in the family, remarkable for her ignorance, credulity, and superstition. She had I suppose the largest collection in the country of tales and songs concerning devils, ghosts, fairies, brownies, witches, warlocks, kelpies, elf-candles, dead-lights, wraiths, apparitions, cantraips, giants, enchanted bowers, dragons, and other trumpery. This cultivated the latent seeds of poetry; but had so strong an effect upon my imagination, that to this hour, in my nocturnal rambles, I sometimes keep a sharp look-out in suspicious places; and though nobody can be more sceptical than I am in such matters, yet it often takes an effort of philosophy to shake off these idle terrors." There have been and still are many persons in the world suffering from the same causes. You will, I am sure, agree with me, that the less they influence your offspring the better. Yourself will never exhibit fear of this kind. You will labour to keep his mind free from its tormenting influence. He shall be able to move about in darkness with the same tranquillity as in the light — to dread no evil which man can do to him, because he shall be conscious of not having injured any one — and certainly not to dread any fabulous being. Neither will you ever tell him stories in order to disprove the reality of such things: these will do mischief. You will teach him to endeavour to remove a coming evil by every allowable means within his power, and then, if inevitable, to submit to it as the will of God. You will teach him not even to fear death, because it is an inevitable evil, the will of God, and the entrance to a new stage of being. Foreboding will be always a forbidden employment in your code, it being, in the language of Johnson, "a nobler employment of the understanding to obviate the evils which actually befal us, than to anticipate those which may." I have heard a story of Nelson when young (I know not whether it be authentic or not), who in one of his earliest voyages, which was to the arctic regions, having been absent till an undue hour upon the ice, was reproved by his captain, who added, that he wondered "fear did not drive him home." Nelson is reported to have said, "I do not know what fear is."

May your child be as ignorant of it, in reference to every object, real or supposed.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

Clericus.

THE PRESERVATION OF THE JEWS.

> "Fear not thou, O my servant Jacob—I will save thee from afar off—I will make a full end of all the nations, but I will not make a full end of thee."—Jeremiah xlvi, 27, 28.

The preservation of the Jews through so many ages, and the total destruction of their enemies, are wonderful events, and are made still more wonderful by being signified beforehand by the spirit of prophecy, as we find particularly in the passage before us. The preservation of the Jews is really one of the most signal acts of divine Providence. They are dispersed among all nations, and yet they are not confounded with any. The drops of rain which fall, nay, great rivers which flow into the ocean, are soon mingled and lost in that great body of waters: and the Jews, in like manner, it might have been expected, would have been mingled and lost in the common mass of mankind; but, on the contrary, they flow into all parts of the world, mix with all nations, and yet keep separate from all. They still live as a distinct people, and yet they nowhere live according to their own laws, nowhere elect their own magistrates, nowhere enjoy the full exercise of their own religion. Their solemn feasts and sacrifices are limited to a certain place: and that has now been for many ages in the hands of strangers and aliens, who will not suffer them to come thither. No people have continued so long unmixed as they have done; not only of those who have sent forth colonies, but even of those who have remained in their own country. The northern nations have come in swarms into the southern parts of Europe: but where are they now? The Gauls went forth in great bodies: but what traces of them are now remaining anywhere. In France, who can separate the race of ancient Gauls from other people who have settled there? In Spain, who can distinguish between the first possessors, the Spaniards, and the Goths and Moors who conquered and kept possession of the country? In England, who can pretend to say with certainty which families are derived from the ancient Britons, and which from the Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans? The most ancient and honourable pedigrees can be traced only to a certain period, beyond which, there is nothing but conjecture, obscurity, and ignorance. But the Jews can go up higher than any other nation, and can deduce their pedigree from the beginning of the world. They may not know the particular tribe and family, but they know certainly that they all sprung from Abraham. And yet the contempt with which they are treated, and the hardships they have undergone, should, one would think, have made them desirous to forget and renounce their original; but they profess to glory in it: and after so many wars, massacres, and persecutions, they still subsist, they still are very numerous. What but a supernatural power could have preserved them in such a wonderful manner? Nor is the providence of God less remarkable in the destruction of their enemies, than in their preservation. For, from the beginning, who have been the great enemies and oppressors of the Jewish nation? The Egyptians, the Syrians, the Babylonians, the Syro-Macedonians—especially Antiochus Epiphanes—and the Romans. And where are now these great monarchies? Have they not vanished as a dream? The Egyptians, Assyrians, and Babylonians, were overthrown and subdued by the Persians; and the Persians were the restorers of the Jews, as well as the destroyers of their enemies. The Syro Macedonians were swallowed up by the Romans, and the Roman empire was broken into pieces by the northern nations; while the Jews are subsisting as a distinct people up to this day. What a wonder of providence is it, that the vanquished should so many ages survive the victors, and the former be spread all over the world, while the latter are no more. Nay, not only nations have been punished for their cruelties to the Jews, but single persons likewise. The first-born of Pharaoh was destroyed, and Pharaoh himself, with his host, drowned in the Red Sea. Most of those who oppressed Israel in the days of the Judges, came to an untimely end: Nebuchadnezzar was stricken with madness—Antiochus Epiphanes and Herod died in great agonies, Flaccus, governor of Egypt, was banished and slain—Caligula was murdered in the flower of his age.

But where are now, since they have absolutely rejected the gospel, and been no longer the peculiar people of God—where are now such visible manifestations of a divine interposition in their favour? The Jews would do well to consider this point; for, rightly considered, it may by divine grace be an effectual means of opening their eyes, and of turning them to Christ our Saviour.

But though the above two verses in their primary and more extensive sense, undoubtedly relate to the continued preservation of the Jews in general, as a people distinct from all others, yet, in a secondary point of view, they may have respect to God's constant and peculiar care of his spiritual seed, styled Jacob and Israel, being the small remnant in the church of Christ, whereof Jeremiah, Baruch, &c. then in Egypt, were a part; which favoured remnant (though while here they are in a state of captivity and tribulation among their enemies, the ungodly men of this world, with Satan at their head) have a comfortable and gracious promise given them, that their faithful God and Saviour will never forsake his elect, but will gather them to himself out of all kingdoms on the earth, and keep every individual of them to the end of time, by the almighty power of his grace, through faith unto eternal salvation.

ILLUSTRATION OF ACTS VII, 59.

"AND THEY STONED STEPHEN."

A cryer went before him who was to die, proclaiming his name, his crime, and who were the witnesses against him. When they were come within two or three yards of the place of execution, they stripped the criminal naked, except a small covering for decency about his middle. The place of execution from which they threw down the malefactor was above twice the height of a man, upon which he was made to ascend, with his hands bound. When he had ascended, the witnesses laid their hands upon him, and then stripped off their upper garment, that they might be fitter for going through the execution. (Thus the witnesses who stoned Stephen committed their upper garments into the hands of "a young man, named Saul.") From that high place one of the witnesses threw down the criminal, and dashed his loins against a great stone, which was laid there for that purpose. If that did not kill him, then the other witness threw from the same height a great stone upon his heart as he lay on his back and was stunned with his fall. If that dispatched him not, then all the people fell upon him with stones till he died.

"The love of Christ was a self-denying love. It did not cost him nothing. He gave his life, his death, his time; he was hungry, weary, and spent whole nights in watchfulness: how much do we think of giving up a meal or sleep. But his was a self-denying love."

"The Bee that wanders, and sips from every flower, disposes what she has gathered into her cells."—SENECA.

ORIGINAL LETTER OF THE REV. ROBERT HALL, to the Rev. William Button, on his Resignation of the Pastoral Office at Dean Street, Southwark.

My Dear Brother, October 7, 1815.

I am pretty certain I did give you information respecting, and am surprised the letter should have miscarried. I am sorry you should have felt any perplexity about it.

But to hear of your labouring under such anguish of mind in consequence of the treatment of your people, gives me much more concern. I had previously heard of your resignation of the pastoral office, and supposed it to have been an entirely voluntary act on your part. Not a breath to the contrary had transpired to me till last night, through the medium of Mr. James of Bristol, in a letter to his wife, now upon a visit to us at Leicester. I now find the step you took was at the suggestion of part of the people. Their conduct towards you is certainly extremely unnatural and ungrateful; especially when we consider that you were the former of the congregation, and have continued in the relation you stand in to them, so long*. But let not this unkind usage, my dear brother, affect you too much. It is but a part of the church, I find, and the smaller part, which have betrayed this insensibility to your merit and to your services. There are not a few who still cherish towards you the sentiments of esteem, affection, and gratitude you are entitled to. I hope, my dear Sir, you will not fall into a state of depression on account of this fresh instance of the ingratitude and unsteadiness of mankind. You are not the less esteemed and beloved by your real friends. The wise and good will not think worse of you on account of what has occurred; you will have a larger share, if not in their esteem, in their sympathy, and in their prayers, than ever. Permit me also to remind my highly revered friend, that he has experienced nothing but what some of the greatest and best of men have experienced in an equal degree. Witness the illustrious Edwards, who was repelled with every mark of scorn and contumely, and cast off by a congregation in which he had been most eminently useful, of which he had long been the pride and ornament. Witness a still greater, St. Paul, who, after he had been instrumental in the salvation of the Galatians, came to be regarded as their enemy. What unspeakable indignity did our Saviour meet with, what base ingratitude both from enemies and friends, amidst the most unparalleled displays of benevolence! It may be well for us to meditate upon such things, lest we be weary and faint in our minds. You have just reason, my dear Sir, to be thankful that the Lord has preserved you holy and ornamental through such a series of years, and that you have been enabled to serve God, so long and so faithfully, in your day and generation. You have also, I have no doubt, many souls for your hire.

One of the objects of my writing at present is, to request you will take an early opportunity of paying us a visit at Leicester. We shall esteem ourselves greatly favoured by your company as long as you find it convenient; and it will be the endeavour of Mrs. Hall, not less than myself, to make you as happy as lies in our power. We shall be extremely happy to see Mrs. B. with you. I am, dear Sir,

Your affectionate Brother,

ROBERT HALL.

P. S. Mrs. James desires to be most affectionately remembered to you and Mrs. Button.

Calamities, God's extraordinary means of reforming sinners, may penetrate that heart, which the common occurrences of life could not reach, or affect: because though God's hand may be legible in the latter, yet it is only so to an attentive observer: but violent afflictions will rouse the soul, just as a hurricane does the body, from the most profound repose.

Seed's Serm., vol. i, p. 200.

Riches oft beget in us a fondness for the present scene of things, and a deadness of affection towards God and heavenly things. But afflictions set the soul free, and leave it disencumbered in the pursuit of heaven. Convinced by melancholy proof of the insufficiency of worldly things, we take sanctuary in the fulness of the Divine sufficiency. Finding ourselves disconsolate in a barren and dry land, where no water is, we desire those rivers of pleasure, which flow at God's right hand for evermore.

Seed's Serm., vol. ii, p. 33.

What I understand in Scripture, is excellent; and I do not question but what I do not understand, is so too.—St. Austin.

Dangerous Consequences of the Sins of our Youth.—How just reason have we oft, with Job [ch. xiii, 26], to suspect, that in the strokes that fall on us in riper years, God is making us to possess the iniquities of our youth? How much reason have we, with holy Augustin [Conf. lib. i], to confess and mourn over the sins of childhood, and trace original corruption in its first out-breakings, even up to infancy. I here observe, what an exact register, CONSCIENCE, God's deputy, keeps; how early it begins to mark, how accurate it is, even when it seems to take no notice, and to what length it will go in justifying God's severity against sinners at the last day; how distinctly and clearly it will read it out, and how far up it will fetch its accounts of those evils which we mind nothing of, when God shall open its eyes to read what is written, and discern those prints, which, as Job says, God sets upon the heels of our feet, and give it a commission to tell us of them, when the "books shall be opened, and the dead, small and great, shall be judged out of them." Rev. xx, 12.

Life of Halyburton, p. 16.

Death of a Christian.—A Christian that walks with God here, when he leaves the world (to use the words of a dying saint) changes his room, but not his company. God was always with him on earth, and he shall be ever with God in heaven.—Dr. Bates, p. 392.

PSALM LXXXVII, 7.

"All my springs are in Thee."

As streams, that from their fountains part,
Soon parch'd and dry must be,
So, Lord, will this poor helpless heart,
Unless supplied by Thee.

But, like a river, peace shall flow,
And bright each pathway shine,
Whilst I my Father's presence know,
And call the Saviour mine.

"THE PRINCE OF PEACE."—ISAIAH IX, 6.

Who merits this more glorious name
Than e'er was gain'd by deeds of fame?
His victories more than Cyrus won,
Philip, or Philip's warlike son?
The Cæsars in their proudest hour,
Or Alfred in his height of power?

Spain's mightiest monarch we can bring[*];
And Sweden's mad, but bravest king[†];
Peter of Russia, he whose sway
Brought that rude country forth to day;
Henry of France, of just renown;
And he[‡] who wore an emperor's crown.

The Prince of Peace! but how can we Show forth his power and dignity?
Or contemplate the glorious plan
Which sent Him forth both God and Man,
And has affix'd to that bright name
Titles which God alone can claim?

The government on Him shall rest,
Wonderful Counsellor, and best:
Wondrous Himself—his wondrous love,
The highest heights it soars above!
His dying and his rising power!
His Gospel in its brightest hour!

He is a Prince by rightful claim,
Jehovah was his ancient name.
No monarch e'er so great and brave,
But He that power and wisdom gave.
King of all earthly kings is He;
His realm extends o'er land and sea.

Uniting all those names in one,
Which were of old bestow'd on men:
David, a Prophet and a Prince;
There have been Priests and Prophets since:
But all united were in Him,
Prophet and Priest, as well as King.

Lord of all spirits He shall reign:
Unperishable shall remain
His laws, which were ordain'd before
Time on his flight began to soar;
And indestructible his power,
It shall not know a closing hour.

He was a Prince, in that He bore
The guilt of sin we all deplore.
He conquer'd when he died, and rose
And triumph'd o'er his people's foes.
He reigns in power and glory now,
And heavenly hosts before him bow.

The Prince of Peace to Gentile lands,
Pre-eminently Jesus stands;
And will his own again restore
To all their ancient rights, and more.
Th' expected day we know is near,
And Judah's King shall soon appear.

Then shall remotest nations know
The Prince of Peace, who will bestow
Freedom from all the woes entail'd,
Since Adam in obedience fail'd;
For He, that second Adam, paid
The heavy debt which sinners made.

Oh! for that bright, that glorious hour,
When He shall come in pomp and power;
Whether in person, while the sky
Shall ring with hallelujahs high;
Or by His Spirit, to maintain
Within the heart Messiah's reign.

An awful, and more distant day,
When Heaven and Earth shall pass away,
Involv'd in one consuming fire,
His word declares, and we desire:
His saints shall rise, and on him call,
Who is their Prince, their All in All!

MEMORIALS OF THE LATE REV. T. STEVENSON,

Minister of Gate Street Chapel, London. 12mo. pp. 83.

These "Memorials" present a singularly interesting portraiture of the evangelical ministry of the late Mr Stevenson. The "Address" delivered at his interment, by the Rev. Caleb Morris, of London, and the "Funeral Sermon," by the Rev. James Sherman, of Reading, are worthy of the piety, talents, and reputation of those esteemed ministers of Christ. But the Appendix of Papers and Letters of the deceased servant of God, especially the Correspondence between him and his Bible Class and the Young People of his congregation, are most edifying. We think it an admirable book for Sunday School and Village Libraries.

"THE GOOD SAMARITAN."

Allegorical and fanciful interpretations of particular passages of the word of God, have done incalculable injury to the cause of scriptural knowledge. And those who have been accustomed to neglect the obvious meaning of the Scriptures, in searching diligently for their "spiritual" signification, have seldom been remarkable for a clear and comprehensive understanding of the plan of salvation, and for their steady walking in the ways of God.

The parable of the "Good Samaritan" has been a favourite subject for spiritualizing. The interpretation may be fraught with no particular injury: but it cannot be commended; as, however ingenious, it is not correct. Calvin, one of the Reformers, in his Commentary on this parable, observes—

"Neither is there any sufficient evidence for another allegorical application, which has however been found so generally agreeable, that it has been almost universally received, even with a revereuce due only to a revelation from heaven. Certain persons have entertained the fancy, that, by this Samaritan, Christ is represented, because he is our deliverer. They have represented the application of oil and wine, as signifying the healing work of Christ, by repentance and the promises of his grace. They have also invented a third secret; namely, that Christ does not restore converted souls to spiritual health all at once; but that he commits them to the care of the Church, as the benevolent Samaritan to the host of the inn, that they may be properly attended to, and in due time restored to health. All this, I confess, is very pretty: but it is our duty to maintain a greater reverence for the Scriptures than that we should take leave thus to disguise their true and natural sense."

MARTYRDOM OF LATIMER AND RIDLEY, AT OXFORD.

BRIEF NOTICES OF THE MARTYRS, LATIMER AND RIDLEY.

Fully to compute the amount of obligation, under which we have been laid by the British Martyrs, is impossible. To them we are indebted, under God, for the restoration of the Gospel in its purity, and for the translation and publication of the Holy Scriptures. The venerable names of Hamilton, Tindal, Wishart, Rogers, Hooper, Latimer, Ridley, Cranmer, Bradford, Philpot, and Saunders, ought to be dear to every Briton, and their characters, writings, and principles, ought to be familiarly known to the present and future generations of Christians. We cannot but rejoice in the publication of the writings of the British Reformers and Martyrs, by the Religious Tract Society; and we take this opportunity of recommending them to our readers.

Latimer and Ridley took a principal share in the Reformation in England; and our young friends especially will be interested in an account of their labours and martyrdom.

1. Dr. Hugh Latimer, was born A. D. 1480, and educated at the university of Cambridge. At the commencement of the Reformation by Luther, Latimer was a determined enemy to the truth of the gospel: but Bilney, who was afterwards a martyr for Christ, hearing his violent oration against Melancthon, declared to him the ground of his own scriptural belief. Fox observes, "Latimer was, through the good Spirit of God, so touched, that he forsook his former studying of the school doctors, and other such fopperies, and became an earnest student of true divinity: so that, whereas before he was an enemy and almost a persecutor of Christ, he was now a zealous seeker after him." Latimer's zeal exposed him to the power of Cardinal Wolsey; by whom, however, he was licensed to preach.

Henry VIII, quarrelling with the pope, favoured the Reformation, and appointed Latimer, in 1535, to be bishop of Worcester: but in 1539, Gardiner and the popish bishops obtained the passing of the Six Acts, which restored some of the chief errors of popery, and Latimer resigned his bishopric. Gardiner would not allow him to retire to private life; but contrived to have him imprisoned in the Tower of London, during the six remaining years of Henry's reign. On the accession of Edward, Latimer was released from prison, and pressed to resume his episcopal dignity, which he refused; choosing rather to exercise his ministry as an itinerant, preaching round the country as a Home Missionary.

Fox describes these labours of Latimer thus: "As the diligence of this man of God never ceased, all the time of King Edward, to profit the church, both publicly and privately; so among other doings in him to be noted, this is not lightly to be overpassed, but worthy to be observed, that God not only gave unto him his Spirit, plenteously and comfortably to preach his word unto his church, but also by the same Spirit he did evidently foreshow and prophesy of all those kinds of plagues which afterwards ensued. And as touching himself, he ever affirmed that the preaching of the gospel would cost him his life; to which he cheerfully prepared himself; and felt persuaded that Winchester (Bishop Gardiner) was kept in the Tower for that purpose, as the event too truly proved."

Queen Mary succeeding Edward, Latimer was imprisoned in the Tower: passing through Smithfield, he said, "that place had long groaned for him;" and during his confinement, he said to the Lieutenant of the Tower, that, "unless they allowed him a fire, he should deceive them; for they purposed to burn him, but he should be starved with cold."

Cranmer, Ridley, and Bradford were confined in the same apartment with Latimer, on account of the number of prisoners for religion. They were removed to Oxford, to dispute with the popish doctors on these three questions:—

"1. Whether the natural body of Christ was really present in the sacrament?

"2. Whether any other substance did remain, but the body and blood of Christ?

"3. Whether in the Mass there was a propitiatory sacrifice for the sins of the dead and living?"

These were affirmed by the papists, but denied by the reformers: for which, after much mockery and insult, they were condemned. They were kept in prison for more than a year and a half; and a new papal commission was granted to examine and condemn them. On the morning of Oct. 16, 1555, Latimer and Ridley were led to the place prepared for their execution, in the front of Baliol College at Oxford. Every thing being ready, a fagot was brought and laid at Ridley's feet. Latimer then turning, addressed his fellow-sufferer in these memorable words: "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man; WE SHALL THIS DAY LIGHT SUCH A CANDLE, BY GOD'S GRACE, IN ENGLAND, AS I TRUST SHALL NEVER BE PUT OUT."

2. DR. NICHOLAS RIDLEY, was born about A.D. 1500, and educated at Cambridge; but he studied some years at the University of Paris and Louvain. After his return in 1529, he applied himself to the study of the Scriptures. In 1537, Cranmer appointed him one of his chaplains, on account of his learning. In 1547, he was made bishop of Rochester, and in 1550, translated to the see of London. On the accession of Mary, Ridley was soon committed to the Tower, as already noticed, and executed with his venerable friend Latimer. At the stake, he kissed the aged confessor, saying, "Be of good heart, brother, for God will either assuage the fury of the flame, or else strengthen us to abide it." Being fastened, he lifted up his hands towards heaven, and prayed, "O heavenly Father, I give Thee most hearty thanks that thou hast called me to be a professor of Thee unto death. I beseech Thee, Lord God, have mercy upon the realm of England, and deliver her from all her enemies."

PRINCIPLES FOR WHICH THE BRITISH MARTYRS DIED.

A thousand profitable reflections will naturally arise in the pious mind, on perusing the account of the martyrdom of Latimer and Ridley. We leave these to our readers, and entreat them to consider especially the glorious principles of Protestantism, for which the British Martyrs died. These were the grand essentials of the gospel of Christ, in which the Reformers throughout Europe were substantially agreed, and not the externals, or mere ceremonials of religion. Those glorious doctrines of the Christian faith, have been since held by the renowned advocates of later times: Hall and Baxter, Rutherford and Usher, Doddridge and Romaine, Whitfield and Edwards, Wesley and Dwight; and they will be regarded as sacred and divine, even to the latest generations.

The Principles for which the British Martyrs died, were essentially the following:

1. The sole and exclusive authority of the Holy Scriptures, and the right of the people to read them for matters of faith and worship, in opposition to the assumed authority of the pope or councils, by whom the people were forbidden to read the word of God; and that every doctrine and custom which would not bear examination by the inspired word of God, deserved utter rejection.

2. The full and perfect atonement of the Son of God incarnate, once offered on the cross, sufficient for the sins of the whole human race, commemorated in the ordinance of the Lord's Supper; in opposition to the pretended sacrifice for the sins of the living and the dead in the popish mass.

3. The propriety and necessity of all the public services of religion, especially of preaching and prayer, being conducted in the language of the people for their edification and salvation; in opposition to the use of the Latin language in the forms and observances of the mass, and of all the public worship, as imposed by the Romish church.

4. That intelligent faith in the perfect atonement and righteousness of Christ, is what the gospel requires of all men, as the means of salvation; in opposition to the doctrine of any works of merit in the ancient saints, or of confessions and purgatory, with the various penances and duties prescribed by the priests.

5. That true faith is inseparably connected with good works, as the necessary fruits of holiness; in opposition to the superstitious services enjoined by the Romish church.

6. That Jesus Christ alone is our all-sufficient Mediator with God; in opposition to the numerous mediators recommended by the Roman Catholic church, in the persons of the Virgin Mary, some of the angels, and many of the departed saints.

These imperishable principles are summarily given by Bishop Burnet, in the third volume of his "History of the Reformation," and which we shall here give, with the reason of their publication after the mockery and condemnation of Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley, at Oxford.

"The prisoners in London, hearing they intended to insult over them, as they had done over those at Oxford, set out a paper, to which the late bishops of Exeter, St. David's, and Gloucester, with Taylor, Philpot, Bradford, Crome, Saunders, Rogers, and Lawrence, set their hands on the 8th of May.

"The substance of it was; that they, being prisoners neither as rebels, traitors, nor transgressors of any law, but merely for their conscience to God and his truth, hearing it was intended to carry them to Cambridge to dispute, declared they would not dispute, but in writing, except it were before the queen and her council, or before either of the Houses of Parliament, and that for these reasons:

"1. It was clear, that the determinations of the universities were already made: they were their open enemies, and had already condemned their cause before they heard it, which was contrary both to the word of God, and the determination they had made in King Edward's time.

"2. They saw the prelates and clergy were seeking neither to find out the truth, nor to do them good, otherwise they would have heard them, when they might have declared their consciences without hazard; but that they sought only their destruction, and their own glory.

3. They saw that those who were to be the judges of these disputes were their inveterate enemies: and from what passed in the convocation-house last year, and lately at Oxford, they saw how they must expect to be used.

"4. They had been kept long prisoners, some nine or ten months, without books or papers, or convenient places of study.

"5. They knew they should not be heard to speak their minds fully, but should be stopped as their judges pleased.

"6. They could not have the nomination of their notaries, who would be so chosen, that they would write and publish what their enemies had a mind to. Therefore, they would not engage in public disputes, except by writing: but they would give a summary of their faith, for which they would be ready to offer up their lives to the halter, or the fire, as God should appoint.

"They declared, that they believed the Scriptures to be the true word of God, and the judge of all controversies in the matters of religion: and that the church is to be obeyed, as long as she follows this word. That they believed the Apostles' Creed, and those creeds set out by the councils of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, and by the first and fourth councils of Toledo; and the symbols of Athanasius, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Damasius. That they believed justification by faith; which faith was not only an opinion, but a certain persuasion wrought by the Holy Ghost, which did illuminate the mind, and suppled the heart to submit itself unfeignedly to God. That they acknowledged an inherent righteousness; yet justification, and the pardon of sins, they believed came only by Christ's righteousness imputed to them. They thought the worship of God ought to be in a tongue understood by the people; that Christ only, and not the saints, was to be prayed to; that immediately after death, the souls pass either to the state of the blessed, or of the damned, without any purgatory between; that baptism and the Lord's supper are the sacraments of Christ, which ought to be administered according to his institution: and therefore they condemned the denying of the chalice, transubstantiation, the adoration of the sacrifice of the mass; and asserted the lawfulness of marriage to every rank of men. These things they declared they were ready to defend, as they often had before offered: and concluded, charging all people to enter into no rebellion against the queen, but to obey her in all points, except where her commands were contrary to the law of God."

THE MARTYR'S CREST.

'Tis a lovelier crest than the blood-stain'd blade,
Or the hand stretch'd out to slay;
Than the oak-twined wreath, or the laurel braid,
Or the bird or beast of prey:
It was proved by deeds more lofty far
Than the shields of victory and war.
'Twas nobly done, to fear not kings,
To dare their feeble ire;
To smile at all terrestrial things,
The rack, the scourge, the fire!
Now to a cold, damp dungeon driven,
Then wrapt in thought on things above,
Gazing upon a Saviour's love,
Pass through the flames to heaven!
Say, aged warrior, when thy breath
Was struggling with the gasp of death,
When every tortur'd nerve was rending,
And death with life in bitter strife
And agony contending,—
Wert thou not borne in soul away
Far from the weak, consuming clay?
And o'er thy calm, unruffled soul,
Did not celestial visions roll?
The martyr's stake is strewn with flowers,
And earthly and infernal powers
May try their little force in vain,
To plant a thorn or cause a pain!

'Tis true we are not call'd, like thee,
To dungeon cells and martyry;
But yet the spirit is not dead
Through which the saints of Jesus bled;
For though 'tis bound with many a chain,
It would resist to blood again.

THE BIRMINGHAM APPRENTICE.

Sunday School and other Engagements.

Already it has been observed, that William, in 1802, assisted as a Teacher in the Methodist Sunday-school. When released from his apprenticeship in 1810, and having united with a Christian society, he immediately engaged again in the work in which he had been initiated. Into this service, to promote the best interests of the rising generation, he entered with his accustomed ardour, and found in this employment the rich reward of his labour. Among his associates in the good work of instruction, he found several matured Christians, from whom he gained much spiritual edification, and frequent helps, encouraging him in the divine life. Instances of usefulness of various kinds appeared in the course of the Sabbath school duties, and several of the scholars died in the faith, giving manifest evidence of their having "received the grace of God in truth."

Interested in the progress of religion in the world, especially from having heard Dr. Buchanan deliver his sermon relating to the East, as before mentioned, William took in the Evangelical Magazine for 1811. By the communications in that periodical, he became more deeply affected with the degraded condition of the Pagan world; and his mind was roused to contrivance in support of the cause of missions, by means of two papers in the Evangelical Magazine for April, 1812, "The Claims of the Heathen World," and "The Humble Prayer of the Perishing Heathen, an Address to Young People."

From the former of these papers, the following passages produced a deep impression: "When we compare the real state of the Heathen with that of many other objects of benevolent attention, I think we shall conclude that none can deserve our regard so much as they. I would not have the poor and the ignorant at home neglected; I would not wish one effort less to be used in their behalf: and certainly charity begins at home; but it must not end there. Charity has long been exercised at home, with great and good effects; and it is still extending more and more throughout the British empire;—but we are not to confine our regard to our own island. Our country is full of churches, and chapels, and meeting-houses, in which, under a pleasing variety of forms, adapted to the various views and classes of mankind, religious instruction is daily communicated. Our land abounds with Bibles, and the poor are taught to read them. Compare the state of Heathen countries with that of ours. There, for hundreds and thousands of miles, is no Christian church, no Christian minister, no Christian school, no Christian parents to instruct the rising race; but all is gross darkness, abominable idolatry, horrid vice; there, men live and die without God, without Christ, without hope. And is it possible for us calmly to behold this horrid scene, and see men, age after age, passing into eternity, without wishing, praying, and endeavouring to evangelize them?"

"If persons disposed to do good saw the matter as I do, they would be desirous of affording far more efficient aid. The Directors of the Missionary Society should themselves set the example, and enlarge their subscriptions. The greater part of the subscribers might with ease at least double their subscriptions, or give five guineas per year instead of one. Every subscriber, probably, could prevail on one or two of his friends to subscribe, who have not yet done it. Ministers of the gospel, in town and country, might in most cases make an annual collection, and thus procure 5000*l.* a year. Auxiliary Societies might be formed in most congregations, where small sums, of a penny a week, would produce a great amount. The children and young people might be desired to contribute a portion of their pocket money for the same purpose; and while these efforts would raise a vast sum, great good would be effected at home; for every shilling so bestowed would excite a sentiment of gratitude to God for the inestimable blessings of his gospel enjoyed by the donor."

From the latter paper, "An Address to Young People," the mind of William was led to determine on making an appeal to his fellow-labourers in the Sunday school; and, with their permission, to all the children. "Highly favoured youths, be it known unto you, that more than six hundred millions of your fellow-creatures know nothing of the blessed God, who made you and them; and have never heard the delightful story of that dear Redeemer, who came down to bleed and die for us, which has so often drawn tears from your eyes. Many of them, therefore, are worshipping great blocks of wood or stone, cut into horrid forms, with gaping bloody mouths. Others have nothing but the name of God written in great letters, which they worship, by burning before it pieces of paper. Millions are praying to a dead man; myriads to a living one. Some adore the stars, and others the beasts. Many offer up their children to a river, which they worship as a god, by putting the poor little creatures into baskets, and throwing them into the water to be devoured by crocodiles. Not a few burn widows alive, with the corpses of their departed husbands. Some bring their poor aged sick parents to the banks of the river at low water, and leave them there, that when the tide rises it may wash them away; but others even eat them, and choose that time of the year when limes and salt are cheap, because they use these to season the flesh of their parents and make it palatable.—O! could you behold some of these horrid scenes, surely you would exclaim,

> Lord, I ascribe it to thy grace,
>   And not to chance as others do,
> That I was born of Christian race,
>   And not a Heathen or a Jew."

William proposed to his fellow-teachers, the making of an appeal to the children of their Sunday schools on behalf of missions to the Heathen, to which they readily agreed, and at the close of the afternoon exercises, William read that "Address," giving them other information concerning pagan idolatry, cruelty, and impurity. Trade in many branches being good, and the children having much spending money, a collection was made, and a Sunday school Missionary Society was thus formed; the first, it is believed, in Birmingham, if not in the kingdom; so that when the Rev. Rowland Hill, and the Rev. T. Jackson, came in the autumn, as a Missionary deputation to that town, besides the collection in the chapel, the first half year's contributions were paid, amounting to 17*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* the Society having been extended to the congregation. This led to the formation of the noble Missionary Society for the counties of Warwick, Worcester, and Stafford, in July 1814, by a deputation consisting of the Rev. Messrs. Waugh, Townsend, Burder, and Bogue, and William had the honour and gratification of being one of its Committee.

Missionary charity increased Christian charity at home: and union in the glorious work of evangelizing the Heathen, promoted union at home; and thus a determination was formed to establish a "Sunday School Union" in Birmingham. This work was resolved and done. "Ministers and friends of different denominations," says the printed "Account of the Formation of the Birmingham Sunday School Union," "met in King Street Meeting House, on the 25th of January last (1815), to consider the practicability of forming an Union, similar to those established in London, Bath, Bristol, Nottingham, Sheffield, &c., having for its object the excitement and encouragement of the Managers and Teachers of the different schools already formed, and, as far as possible, to give effect to any plan that may be approved of, to extend the usefulness of Sunday schools in this town and neighbourhood: when it was unanimously resolved, That notice should be given at the different places of worship, that a public meeting would be held in Cannon Street Meeting-house, on Monday the 13th of February, at seven o'clock in the evening, for the purpose of forming the Union."

The Meeting was held, and the Union seemed to be formed with the united hearts of a very large assembly of friends to Sunday schools. The Rev. Mr. James's speech on the occasion was most animating: and a few passages from it will be worthy of record here, as they had considerable influence on the mind of William.

"I hope," said that friend of Sunday schools, "I shall not be thought tedious, if I enumerate a few of those benefits which have already been found to spring from Sunday School Unions, and which it may be expected will result from ours.

"First. By confidential intercourse, our methods of instruction will be improved. Secondly, By means of frequent meetings of the friends and teachers, the great object of the system will be kept more clearly and constantly in view. Thirdly, The same means will tend at once to purify and stimulate our zeal. Fourthly, Another most important benefit which will result from this Union, is the establishment of new schools in those parts of the town and neighbourhood, where they are most needed." "Let us form a Union of our Sunday schools; nor let it ever be said that the Birmingham Christians, the first to associate in support of the Birmingham Foreign Bible Society, were the last to unite in aid of that system, without whose preparatory exertions, even that glorious and gigantic Institution must be arrested in its career, and sit down unemployed, because a deep, wide chasm of ignorance obstructs its progress."

"Noah and his family dreading the approaching deluge, had taken God's appointed refuge. They believed the threatening promise. By faith they entered in, and were safely conducted till they reached the top of Ararat. What an apt emblem of a sinner coming to Christ! The Lord shuts him up in Christ, and he is safe."

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XX.

On Self-Education.

Dear Madam,—Having offered you some observations on the principal topics comprised under the moral branch of education, I shall presume, before proceeding to the consideration of the intellectual, to submit some remarks upon the topic prefixed to this Letter. You will, I doubt not, acknowledge its importance. You know that your lessons and precepts will be worse than useless, if not sanctioned and illustrated by your own conduct. You are also aware, that in order to add the benefit of example to the rules which you inculcate, you need to approve things which are excellent from principle, decidedly and cordially, and to exhibit the influence of such sentiments consistently. I doubt not you will allow with me, that one transport of passion, one proud expression, one defect in your own punctuality, will materially retard the process of education, and tend considerably to relax the force of those principles, which you have endeavoured to implant in the mind of your child. You will also allow, that should such deviations from the conduct which you recommend occur frequently, your child may listen to your lessons on good conduct, as a duty, as an employment, as an amusement, but that the practical influence of your recommendations is past all hope. Oh! never may you endure the hopeless anguish and the confusion to which that parent must be doomed, who is conscious that her child is remembering the contrast between her instructions and her own conduct! You will however agree with me, that through the surprise of sudden temptation, the devices and assaults of the enemy of our souls, or constitutional temperament, some event in your own behaviour may very speedily occur, which may reduce you to this lamentable dilemma: and conscious of the weakness of our nature, and dreading the possibility of such consequences, you will, I doubt not, accept the observations which I may offer with a view to prevent such a calamity.

The first thing which a parent ought to guard against, is the inculcation of principles and practice, which she has not first fully considered, and which she does not entirely approve. It is very possible to adopt sentiments in religion and morals, and even to give them a superficial approbation; but if these sentiments have not first habitually and thoroughly influenced ourselves, we shall soon act inconsistently with our avowed principles. It is possible to act for a short time from imitation of others, or from the impulse of newly-acquired ideas; but soon or late, all human beings act according to their real character. Nothing is more dangerous, and fruitless, than to attempt to act upon views and sentiments which are not in this highest sense our own.

The advice of Bishop Burnet to the penitent courtier is inestimable. "I warned him," says the prelate, "not to undertake a holy and religious life, unless fully and heartily able to approve and desire it; for otherwise he would feel the restraint so intolerable, as speedily to return to his former courses." The same may be said to every mother who reads treatises of education. The formation of principles is slow and progressive. She who only begins to acquire right habits and principles, relative to education, after she has become a mother, has begun too late; a truth which reflects supreme importance upon the early education of every female, in every station of society.

2. The next evil to be guarded against, is the prevailing inconsistency of human nature, which consists in understanding what is right, but in possessing neither the courage nor resolution to practise it. The source of this inconsistency is our native indolence. The generality of parents know what is right, to a far greater extent than they practise. But the mental effort requisite to the perpetual selection of our conduct, the self-denial requisite in order to pursue the best measures, amid the solicitations of weariness, ultimately in many instances cause them to discontinue the effort. Then they abandon their procedure to the direction of their native propensities, or sink down into adoption of the common practice, and not unfrequently derive a miserable anodyne from the reflection, that, after all, the best systems of education often fail to secure the desired results; that the character of a child depends more upon natural tendencies, upon destiny, or upon certain uncontrollable causes, than is generally imagined; and support themselves by the remembrance of cases in which the best systems were pursued to no purpose, or of other instances in which no system at all was pursued, and yet the child "turned out" a pattern of excellence, and a prodigy of acquirements. Miserable palliatives of human indolence, are these and all similar reflections!

Yet where is the parent who is not in danger of ultimately adopting them, with whatever motives and views she may commence the education of her offspring. How many have been hindered who once ran well, and have perhaps looked back with a smile of scorn, or of pity, upon those utopian notions, as in their mental degradation they may deem them, which they once entertained; and then they make certain sage reflections upon the folly of attempting to be wiser than our forefathers, upon the vast probability that their maxims are the result of the trial of all systems, and that the attempt to improve is equally culpable as an act of delusion or of presumption.

> "So hearts that once beat high for praise,
> Now feel that pulse no more."

How shall such a frequent yet lamentable termination of the maternal career be avoided? To me the only means appear that the mother herself should have been in her time a properly educated child, and subsequently an earnest suppliant before the footstool of God, that He by his Spirit would grant to her perpetually those dispositions which may enable her to approve and steadily to pursue the dictates of an enlightened understanding, and the suggestions of a sanctified prudence. To this you will feel perpetually urged by your sense of the difficulty and responsibility of the charge of educating a child.

I have often thought, that the responsibility of certain offices, might well induce the considerate almost to wish they had never sustained them. Of this kind are the monarch, the general of an army, the minister of the gospel, and the parent. But the heaviest weight of responsibility devolves upon the last-named office. The responsibility of the monarch is comparatively supportable, because it is diffused upon the different orders of which the constitution is composed: that of the military commander, because he acts frequently as the agent of counsels in which he had no part: that of the minister of religion, because the generality of his hearers see him only, and see him in his best circumstances, namely, while occupied in his public engagements: but the parent is the immediate, and sole origin of the character of the child. The influence of the parent is perpetual, from morning till night, from the dawn of life till the character is complete: it has a greater effect upon his present and future happiness, than any other cause whatever. How awful then to think, that when the parent is laid low in the grave, the child must either be walking in the way of happiness, or toiling in the path of misery, as the effect of the parent's influence! and still more awful to reflect, that the future everlasting condition of your offspring greatly depends upon yourself! I will not pursue this agonizing topic further than to request that you will in every instance act towards your child with a view to your own reflections in after-life, and your emotions in the last interview with him at the final inquest before the Judge of quick and dead.—I am, dear Madam, &c. CLERICUS.

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. III.—THE OMNIPRESENCE OF GOD.

One cause of the increase of crime, and all that carelessness which men in the present day manifest about the rectitude of their conduct in the sight of God, arises either from ignorance, or a misapprehension of that attribute of the Deity, which is to form the subject of the present article. My view of it is simply this: that God, in all the perfections of his nature, is always, night and day, present in every corner of the universe; so that wherever any thing is, God is there also; and consequently, that he is always beside us, reading our thoughts and scrutinizing our actions. Now I cannot but think, if this definition be true, that there must be a great mistake somewhere. Is it credible, that creatures formed of dust, and depending every moment of their existence on the mercy of their Creator, would dare to tempt that mercy, to insult that Creator, and disobey all his commandments in his very presence? Can we, consistently with the principle of self-preservation which is lodged in every breast, conceive it to be possible, that men, otherwise careful and prudent, would knowingly do every thing likely to bring them to eternal misery, if they knew and believed that He, who has the power to cast them soul and body into hell, was looking at them, and watching their every movement? I must confess I do not think it possible. Yet let it be borne in mind, that whether men believe or disbelieve this doctrine, it is indeed the truth: and if there be one of us who is living a life, which he would be afraid to live were God before him in all the splendours of his infinite majesty, let him carefully peruse these pages, wherein I hope to prove that in very truth this is the case.

The subject thus opened for discussion requires that I should, first, prove the omnipresence of God; and I think it will be well if I then proceed to state the effects which the doctrine thus proved ought to have upon the bad and good.

1. I appeal to the Bible, that great standard of truth, which to this day is accepted as the word of God; though some wise men after the flesh have vainly attempted to prove that it is not so. Let us look, then, at Psalm cxxxix, 7—12: "If I climb up into heaven, thou art there," &c. It is clear that the object which David had in view, when writing this Psalm, was to establish the truth of the omnipresence of God. He therefore supposes the possibility of his ascending into the regions of infinite space, and soaring far above the limits of human perception; and yet he asserts that he should not have passed the boundaries of the Almighty's kingdom; or of descending into the lowest of all depths, or of extending his search on every side to the utmost verge of possibility; and still his conclusion is, that the arm of the Lord would be there to guide him, and that he should there find manifestations of the presence and power of God. I might quote many more passages; but every attentive reader must have observed, that this truth is inseparably interwoven with the whole of the Bible.

2. The interesting facts, which those who make the insect world their study are perpetually bringing before us, prove beyond the possibility of doubt, that no place is too small for the Almighty to manifest his power therein. Microscopes have shown us, that a drop of water contains thousands of inhabitants, all perfect in their structure, capable of motion, and doubtless of enjoying the life which God has given them. To produce such amazing specimens of ingenuity, must not their Author be everywhere? and to preserve them alive, must he not be always present? On what other system can we account for their existence? Larger animals seem in some degree to be dependent on man, and to look to him for daily support and sustenance; but these minute beings are placed beyond the reach of man, and thrown altogether on the protection and assistance of an Omnipresent Being; and therefore I conclude that their existence and happiness prove that the Almighty is ever present.

3. And pursuing the same train of argument, I would seriously inquire, what it is that supports life in the human species? That they themselves have nothing to do in its preservation, may be inferred from their ignorance and carelessness. By far the largest portion of mankind know nothing at all about the structure of their bodies, and the many and various mechanical contrivances which contribute to their health and safety. It has been said, that if it were possible for a man to see the internal motions of the various muscles and nerves and joints which are produced by the action of walking, he would be struck with so great fear and astonishment, that he would not dare to advance another step. Surely such a fact as this is of itself enough to prove that man is not the supporter of his own life, and consequently that he owes his preservation to God. And since the whole creation teems with life, and every portion of the universe bears the impress of Divine protection, let us not be deterred from confessing, with the apostle, that "in Him we live and move and have our being." And since the withdrawal of his protection for one moment would make the whole population of this earth lifeless corpses, and shroud the universe in a pall of gloomy darkness, let us confess that our great Preserver is ever present, of which even the breath with which we make the confession is a proof.

4. But I would further insist, that all the instances which I have quoted in illustrating those attributes of the Deity which have already passed under consideration, are of themselves sufficient proof of the omnipresence of God. How could Noah have been seen among so many thousands of rebels, had not the Almighty observed with unceasing watchfulness the doings of his people? What secured righteous Lot, and withheld the torrent of the Divine indignation from bursting forth till he was in safety, but the decree of that wondrous Being who was watching his footsteps? How could the Israelites have received the wanted succour just when all hope seemed withered and gone, had not their Protector, the keeper of Israel, been unremitting in his care of them? In truth, to confess that God is the moral governor of the universe, is to confess that he is omnipresent; for how else could he administer justice and judgment among all the sons of men, whose dwelling-places are so numerous, and whose sojournings are over the wide expanse of earth and its remotest regions? We find men willing to confess, that when a heinous crime, such as that of blood-guiltiness, is perpetrated, God is a witness of it. Now let me ask, if this does not prove that he is always present? The still hour of midnight, or the loneliness of the forest, or the tracklessness of the desert, is no security for the murderer from the eye of God. How then is it possible that such a Being can be less able to perceive us when we are in the same situations, though in the performance of different actions? God does not come from heaven for the purpose of seeing crimes committed; but as he is always in every corner of the universe, it follows of necessity that he must see them: and since we confess that every one will hereafter be judged according to his deeds, it would be absurd to deny that He who is to be the Judge is a spectator of all actions, for how else could he be acquainted with them?

SECOND ORIGINAL LETTER OF THE REV. ROBERT HALL TO THE REV. WILLIAM BUTTON.

My dear Brother, Leicester, 9th Feb. 1814.

I ought sooner to have replied to your last Letter, but a variety of engagements, as you rightly conjecture, together with the difficulty of making up my mind, prevented me. * * * * * * * * * * * * I am truly concerned to hear of Mrs. Button's affliction. I hope it will not be unto death, but to the glorifying of God. Her loss (which it is my earnest prayer the Lord may prevent) would be most severely felt by you and the whole family.

This, my dear brother, is a state of trial, and it is appointed for us through much tribulation to pass into the kingdom. O that our afflictions may be sanctified, and prepare us effectually for that world where the inhabitants shall no more say, "I am sick."

Our house is a house of mourning: last Saturday, my dear boy, aged one year and four months, died, after an illness of a few hours; at least we had not the least apprehension of danger, till a very few hours before he expired. It took place in the stillness of the night: it was a most solemn night: it reminds me of that night, "much to be remembered," in which the first-born of Egypt were slain. Mrs. Hall is almost inconsolable; and the wound is most deeply felt by each of us. He was a most lovely and engaging child. My poor wife is in other respects indisposed, and I have often painful foreboding that her continuance on earth will be but short. Let me beg an interest in your prayers that these complicated trials may be sanctified to all the parties concerned.

I have heard nothing from Mr. * * * * * respecting the Sermons. I conjecture he has dropped the idea, which gives me no manner of concern. Indeed I am not in a state of mind at present to take much interest in any sublunary concerns. I thank you for Mr. Kinghorn's pamphlet, which I shall read with attention: but shall not promise to review in the * * *. I think very meanly of that publication, nor do I suppose a review of any book in that, can be of any benefit to an author. Be this as it may, there are plenty of persons ready to review among the regular correspondents, of which I am not one; and have besides an extreme aversion to reviewing.

I was extremely concerned to hear of the death of my dear and honoured friend, Mr. Palmer[*]. May the good-will of Him that dwelt in the bush rest upon you and yours. I desire to be most affectionately remembered to Mrs. B. and your whole family, and remain,

Your affectionate Brother,

R. HALL.

Of the Gift of Tongues.—The confusion of tongues was the casting off of the Heathen. Gen. xi. For when they had lost that language in which alone God was spoken of and preached, they lost the knowledge of God and religion utterly, and fell to worship the creature instead of the Creator. Rom. i.

Two thousand two hundred and three years had now passed, since that sad and fatal curse upon the world, the confusion of languages; and millions of souls had it plunged in error, idolatry, and confusion: and now the Lord, in the fulness of time, is providing, by the gift of tongues at Sion, to repair the knowledge of himself among those nations that had lost that jewel by the confusion of tongues at Babel.

The manner of exhibiting this gift was in tongues of fire, that the giving of the Holy Ghost at the initiating of the Christian church, might answer and parallel the giving of the Law at the initiating of the Jewish; and so it did, both in time and manner; that being given at Pentecost, and in appearing of fire; and so likewise this, as was said before.—Lightfoot, vol. i, p. 751.

Jewish hypocritical Prayers reproved by our Saviour, Matt vi, 5, "Because they love to stand praying in the synagogues and corners of the streets."—This Sermon upon the Mount, is much in reproof of the Jews' Talmudical traditions, by which they made the word of God of none effect. This verse reproveth one of their tenets, for their highway oraisons; for which they have this tradition in their Talmud. Rabbi Josi saith, "On a time I was walking by the way, and I went into one of the deserts of Jerusalem to pray: then came Eliah, of blessed memory, and watched me at the gate, and stayed for me till I had ended my prayer. He saith unto me, Peace be unto thee, Rabbi. I said unto him, Peace be upon thee, Rabbi and Master. Then said he unto me, My son, why wentest thou into this desert? I said unto him, To pray. He said to me, Thou mightest have prayed in the way. Then said I, I was afraid, lest passengers should interrupt me. He said unto me, Thou shouldest have said a short prayer. At that time I learned of him three things: I learned that we should not go into the desert; and I learned that we should pray by the way; and learned that he that prayed by the way must pray a short prayer."

Thus far their Talmud maketh them these letters-patent for hypocrisy; fathering this bastard upon blessed Elias, who was not a highway prayer, or one that practised his own devotions in public; for he was John Baptist's type for retiredness.—Ibid. p. 1024.

Did Religion bestow heaven without any terms or conditions indifferently upon all; if the crown of life was hereditary, and free to good and bad, and not settled by covenant upon the elect of God only, such as "live soberly and righteously and godly in this present world;" I believe there would be no such thing as an Infidel among us.—Bentley on Atheism, p. 15.

"Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted." Matt. v, 4. They are the words of Him who was himself a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; and who was also acquainted with happiness too; with the joys of religion, with the refreshments of angels, with the antepasts of glory, and with the peace of God which now passes all understanding, and shall hereafter satisfy all desire. He had tasted of both cups, the cup of trembling, and the cup of salvation. He had tried both the miseries of human nature and the glories of the Divine; and so, well knew what proportion the consolations of God have to the infelicities of man; and how little the sufferings of this present time are, in comparison of the glory that shall be revealed to them that with meekness bear them, and with fruitfulness improve under them.—Norris's Serm., vol. i, p. 26.

'Tis the most usurping and daring piece of impudence in the world for an ill man to laugh or be merry. What has he to do with mirth, who has the wrath of God abiding on him, and hell open to receive him?—Ibid. p. 30

FRIENDSHIP, LOVE, AND TRUTH.

When Friendship, Love, and Truth abound
Among a band of brothers,
The cup of joy goes gaily round,
Each shares the bliss of others.
Sweet roses grace the thorny way
Along this vale of sorrow;
The flowers that shed their leaves to-day
Shall bloom again to-morrow.
How grand in age, how fair in youth,
Are holy Friendship, Love, and Truth!

On halcyon wings our moments pass,
Life's cruel cares beguiling;
Old Time lays down his scythe and glass,
In gay good-humour smiling;
With ermine beard and forelock grey
His reverend front adorning,
He looks like Winter turn'd to May,
Night soften'd into morning.
How grand in age, how fair in youth,
Are holy Friendship, Love, and Truth!

From these delightful fountains flow
Ambrosial rills of pleasure:
Can man desire, can Heaven bestow,
A more resplendent treasure?
Adorn'd with gems so richly bright,
We'll form a constellation,
Where every star, with modest light,
Shall gild his proper station.
How grand in age, how fair in youth,
Are holy Friendship, Love, and Truth!

FAITH IN A STORM AT SEA.

"God is our hope and strength, a very present help in trouble."
Psalm xlvi, 1.

With her canvass split, the bark was driv'n
By the fury of the storm;
By the lightning flashing the mast was riv'n,
And Death threaten'd in hideous form.

But the chief was brave, and the crew were stout,
And of fear none utter'd a word;
For with manly trust, and with hearts devout,
They pray'd to the living Lord.

The bark rode safe; for the winds were laid,
And the waters had ceas'd their strife.
To the man whose mind on the Lord is stay'd,
'T will be thus in the storms of life.

INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIANITY ON NEGROES.

The Rev. Mr. Düring, in a letter from Sierra Leone to the Committee of the Church Missionary Society, says, "Most of those with whom I live, I have seen brought from the holds of slave ships. I have seen them rise, from the chains of the slave dealer, to become industrious men and women, faithful subjects, pious Christians, affectionate husbands and wives, tender fathers and mothers, and peaceable neighbours. Considering these things, I have always thought myself among the happiest of men, in serving in this way our Lord Jesus Christ, whose blood cleanses even the soul of an Ethiopian from all sin; and in being connected with our Society, which is evidently instrumental, in the Lord's hand, of much good to distant nations, especially to the afflicted sons of Africa."—Church Missionary Report.

EVANGELICAL SYNOPSIS.

The Holy Bible, with Notes Explanatory and Practical: for the use of Families. Intended to assist the Understanding in the perusal of the Sacred Volume, and to furnish a body of Evangelical Truth founded on its contents. Selected from the Writings of esteemed Biblical Critics of various Denominations, and interspersed with original remarks. By Ingram Cobbin, A. M. London. In Weekly Numbers, and Monthly Parts.

Commentaries upon the Holy Scriptures have recently been greatly multiplied. In this we cannot but sincerely rejoice: it exhibits one striking and delightful "sign of the times," that "the knowledge of the Lord" increases, as it is destined to "fill the earth as the waters cover the sea." Many of the Commentaries recently published, on the whole and on parts of the Bible, possess that merit which entitles them to the confidence of the Christian public. That which is being published by the Religious Tract Society will be an incalculable blessing to the British Empire and to the world: but we think in many respects this of Mr. Cobbin's is preferable for families and the poor. We give it our cordial recommendation, on account of the soundness of its doctrinal exposition—the intelligence which is communicated by its notes—and the piety which breathes in its reflections. We purpose again referring to this valuable work, and in the mean time entreat the Editor to take special care to secure accuracy in the printing.

GREEK PRESCRIPTION FOR THE SOUL,

Taken from the description of Mount Athos, and translated from the Greek into English.

A certain brother went to a physician, and asked him, whether he knew of any medicine by which sin could be cured? The physician answered, "Yes, brother: know and hear, that one of miraculous power may be found. Go, and take the root of spiritual poverty and the flowers of humility, the leaves of patience and the branches of prayer; mix them together, and pound them in the mortar of obedience. Add to them a spoonful of holy thoughts: afterwards put them in the saucepan of conscience, and water them with the drops of flowing tears. Then kindle under it the fire of divine love; and when it has boiled sufficiently, pour it out into the dish of discretion, and mix it up with thanksgiving. Then sup it up with the spoon of compunction, and wipe thy mouth with the towel of confession. Thus shalt thou wipe away and evacuate the multitude of thy sins."—Palæogr. Græc. p. 507.

How different this prescription from those given by the inspired servants of Christ! Here is not one word of the blood of atonement, which alone cleanseth from all sin.

THIRST QUENCHED AT A HIGH PRICE.

Lysimachus, for extreme thirst, offered his kingdom to the Getæ, to quench it. His exclamation, when he had drank, is wonderfully striking: "Ah! wretched me; who, for such a momentary gratification, have lost so great a kingdom!" How applicable this to the case of him, who, for the momentary pleasures of sin, parts with the kingdom of heaven!—Bp. Horne.

TEMPLE OF THE SUN, AT NINEVEH.

NINEVEH.

Nineveh, the ancient capital of Assyria, has been made famous in the records of history, both sacred and profane. Every believer in the promises of the Gospel, will feel profound awe and pious satisfaction, while contemplating "the goodness and severity of God," in his dispensations towards that vast, populous, and guilty city.

We present our readers with a representation of the "Temple of the Sun," once so celebrated for its splendour and magnificence in idolatrous Nineveh.

Nineveh was founded by Ashur, the son of Shem, and grandson of Noah, Gen. x, 11. Precisely to fix the date of its foundation is impossible: but it could not be long after, if not before, the building of Babel. It was situated upon the eastern bank of the river Tigris, opposite the present Mosul, about 280 miles N. from Babylon, and 400 N. E. from Damascus, in latitude 36° 20′ N. longitude 43° 10′ E. In the time of the prophet Jonah, whose divine mission thither is believed to have been in the reign of Jeroboam II (2 Kings xiv, 23) king of Israel, and of Pul, father of Sardanapalus, king of Assyria, Nineveh was a very great city, of three days journey in circuit (Jonah iii, 3). Strabo says, that Nineveh was much larger than Babylon, whose circuit he estimated at 385 furlongs, about 48 miles. Diodorus Siculus states, that Nineveh was an oblong parallelogram, extending 150 furlongs in length, 90 in breadth, and 60 miles in compass; and that it was surrounded with a prodigious wall 100 feet high, and so very broad that three chariots abreast might drive on it. It was defended with 1500 towers, 200 feet in height.

At the time of Jonah's mission, Nineveh was so populous, that it was reputed to contain more than 120,000 persons who could not distinguish their right hand from their left (Jonah iv, 11), which is generally explained of young children; and as they are reckoned one-fifth of the inhabitants, it is computed that the population of that city amounted then to 600,000 people.

A succession of warlike princes had established the greatness of Nineveh on the ruins of the neighbouring states; and the greater part of Asia had submitted to the Assyrian power. By this growing prosperity, the rulers and the people became dreadfully corrupted: rapacity, cruelty, murder, and oppression, marked the progress of their conquests. Shalmaneser and his armies exterminated the kingdom of Israel (B. C. 721 years; 2 Kings xvii), and Sennacherib determined the same concerning Judah, under Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii, xix); but under the walls of Jerusalem, the angel of the Lord blasted in death, during one night, the Assyrian besieging army of 185,000 men, B. C. 710 years.

Nineveh was spared for a season, on account of the humiliation of the king and the people after the preaching of Jonah, about the year B. C. 862. But having been reprieved under Sennacherib, they had become so intolerably advanced in wickedness, impurity, and blood, that "the LORD, who is slow to anger," sent his servant Nahum, B. C. 713, to pronounce "woe to the bloody city."

God avenged the cruelties and iniquities of this city as he foretold; and it will be proper to transcribe some of the denunciations of the divine messengers: "The burthen of Nineveh. God is jealous, and the LORD revengeth; the LORD will take vengeance on his adversaries, he reserveth wrath for his enemies. For while they be folden together as thorns, and while they are drunken as drunkards, they shall be devoured as stubble fully dry. The gates of the rivers shall be opened, and the palace shall be dissolved. Take ye the spoil of silver, take the spoil of gold: for there is none end of the store and glory out of all their pleasant furniture. Behold, thy people in the midst of thee are women; the gates of thy land shall be set wide open unto thine enemies: the fire shall devour thy bars. There is no healing of thy bruise; thy wound is grievous: all that hear the bruit of thee shall clap the hands over thee; for upon whom hath not thy wickedness passed continually?" Nahum i, 1, 2, 8, 10; ii, 6, 9; iii, 13—19. "He will stretch out his hand against the north, and destroy Assyria; and will make Nineveh a desolation, and dry like a wilderness. And flocks shall lie down in the midst of her, all the beasts of the nations: both the cormorant and the bittern shall lodge in the upper lintels of it: their voice shall sing in the windows; desolation shall be in the thresholds; for he shall uncover the cedar-work. This is the rejoicing city, that said in her heart, I am, and there is none beside me: how is she become a desolation, a place for beasts to lie down in. Every one that passeth by her shall hiss, and wag his head." Zeph. ii, 13—15.

Zephaniah flourished but three years before his predictions and those of Nahum were in a great degree accomplished upon Nineveh; and we cannot refrain from urging our readers to peruse with attention the awful denunciations of the inspired prophet Nahum. Dr. Adam Clarke remarks, upon chapter iii, 2, 3, "The threatenings are continued in a strain of invective, astonishing for its richness, variety, and energy. One may hear and see the whip crack, the horses prancing, the wheels rumbling, the chariots bounding after the galloping steeds, the reflection of drawn and highly-polished swords, and the hurled spears like flashes of lightning dazzling the eyes, the slain lying in heaps, and horses and chariots stumbling over them."

A Greek historian, in describing the manner of the destruction of Nineveh, relates that there was an ancient prophecy received from their forefathers, that Nineveh should not be taken till the river first became an enemy to the city: and in the third year of the siege, the Tigris being swollen with long-continued rains, overflowed the lower part of the city and broke down twenty furlongs of the wall, thus opening an entrance for the enemy. The king then thinking that the oracle was fulfilled, the river having manifestly become an enemy to the city, in his desperation, lest he should fall into the enemy's hands, heaped an immense funeral pyre in the palace; and having collected all his gold and silver, and royal vestments, together with his concubines and eunuchs, placed himself with them in a little apartment built in the midst of the pyre, and burnt them with himself and the palace together. When the death of the king was announced by certain deserters, the enemy entered at the breach the waters had made, and took the city.

Nineveh was thus taken and utterly ruined by Assuerus, or Cyaxares, king of Media, and Nabuchodnosor, or Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, about B.C. 606. Diodorus Siculus, with others, ascribes the taking of it to Arbaces the Mede and Belesis the Babylonian; and says, that they dispersed the citizens in the villages, levelled the city with the ground, transferred the gold and silver, of which there were many talents, to Ecbatana, the motropolis of the Medes; and thus subverted the empire of the Assyrians. The materials of this mighty city were carried away to build Mosul and other places.

Lucian, a native of a city on the banks of the Euphrates, in that vicinity, testified that Nineveh had utterly perished, and that no vestige of it was remaining, neither could any one tell where it was situated. The Persians, subsequently to A. D. 230, built another city on or near the supposed site of ancient Nineveh; but this was destroyed by the Saracens A. D. 632. So completely have the predictions of Nahum been fulfilled, that the very site of Nineveh was long unknown to the moderns; but it has lately been visited by several intelligent travellers. They describe it as a vast extended waste, interspersed but here and there with heaps of rubbish. The principal mounds, which are few in number, are in many places overgrown with grass, and resemble the mounds left by the intrenchments and fortifications of ancient Roman camps. The appearance of other mounds and ruins less marked, extend for ten miles, and seem to be the wreck of former buildings. There is not one monument of royalty, nor one token of splendour: the places are not known where they stood. There are not even bricks, stones, or other materials of buildings, discernible in the largest mounds. The place is, as foreshown by the inspired prophet, a desolation — an utter ruin—empty, void, and waste! The very ruins have perished; and it is reduced to even less than the wreck of its former grandeur. It shows not the least sign of the greatness of its kings, nobles, or merchants: but even the absence of those, amid the heaps of their rubbish, proclaim most powerfully the vengeance of the Almighty against the wicked, and the infallible truth of the word of God!

BIBLE ANECDOTES.

MR. BAKER, the Missionary Printer, at Madagascar, in a letter to the Committee of the Bible Society, having particularized the extensive circulation of the Scriptures in that island, observes, "Many facts might be named, illustrating the sincere affection of the natives to the word of God. I will specify two:—

"I went one day into an ostler's house, who was a poor man, and dwelt in a house very much inferior to his master's horse stables. I found neither chair nor table, nor any other furniture or property, except the earthen-pot for cooking rice, and the native plates. But I observed a strong wooden box, with a lock; and on inquiring what was in it, the ostler opened it, and showed me his Testament; thus preserved to keep it from the rats, and from being stolen by any unprincipled scholar: and this I afterwards found to be a very common case. The natives value it as their highest treasure."

"When the natives went to the wars, to the distance of perhaps 500 miles, in 1830, and subsequently, not less than fifty "Believers," as they were scornfully termed, carried their Testaments; and, by means of them, were enabled to keep up prayer and other meetings, by which many were brought to a knowledge of the truth; and many hundreds (perhaps thousands) were brought to a general knowledge of Christianity."

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. III.—THE OMNIPRESENCE OF GOD.

5. BUT another and most forcible proof of the truth of these remarks, may be derived from the fact, that God always hears prayer. On reading the Bible, we cannot but be struck with the numerous and earnest exhortations which it contains, for men to seek God's favour and protection by asking for it, and the instances there recorded, in which such applications have been successful, put it beyond the possibility of a doubt that God is at all times present everywhere, to hear the supplications of his people. Scripture assures us, that "the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears open to their prayers." When Hagar had gone forth destitute and lonely, to wander over the wilderness of Beersheba, she did but lift up her voice, in concert with that of her helpless child, and an angel was sent from heaven to administer consolation. When Jacob had laid himself down to rest beside the wall of Bethel, and had been permitted to see a vision of angels, the thoughts which struck him on awaking, were those which all of us would do well to keep perpetually in mind, "Surely the LORD is in this place, and I knew it not! How dreadful is this place! This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." When Jonah was in a state of most desperate misery, a great fish having swallowed him up, he betook himself to prayer, and the declaration which he makes of its efficacy is this, "When my soul fainted within me, I remembered the LORD, and my prayer came in unto thee, even to thy holy temple:" and our blessed Lord himself has summed up all by his testimony, "I know that thou hearest me always." Every one will confess, that prayer, if real, need not be heard by those who are around us, and that even the desire of the heart will find its way to the mercy seat? But how? The eye of man, which can see worlds, whose position is millions of miles distant, cannot catch even a faint glimpse of the heaven which is beyond them. Who then will be bold enough to say, that his voice, however loud its tones, and clear its articulation, is capable of penetrating the regions of infinite space, and being heard in the temple of God? No man would say this. Are we not then entitled to argue, that since there is no place in the earth from which a prayer will not reach the throne of God, so there is no place in the earth where the Almighty is not ever present.

From these simple statements, I think it must be clear to every candid inquirer, that the omnipresence of God is a doctrine founded in truth, and supported by incontestible evidence: and surely such a conclusion as this, cannot fail to become a matter of infinite importance to all those who are living under the Divine scrutiny. Let us reflect for a moment on what it is that is proved. An Almighty Being, who possesses every attribute worthy of such a Being in an infinite degree, is always with us; so that wherever we go, God is our companion—whatever we do, God is our witness—whatever we say, he overhears it. Surely there can be no doubt that a truth so immensely important as this, ought to have a great effect on every human being: and since the whole of mankind may be divided into two classes, the good and the bad, I will confine my remarks to them.

And first, to the righteous this is a doctrine of infinite consolation. True it is, that enough of infirmity and weakness attaches to every human being, to make them tremble at the scrutiny of an all-seeing God. But having taken shelter under the wings of divine mercy in Jesus Christ, there is to them now no condemnation. It is not perfection which God expects from his servants, for he knows they are compassed about with infirmities: and he who is striving, by the assistance of the Spirit, to keep sin from reigning in his mortal body, need not fear the presence of his all-merciful Father. The Christian is of course desirous of forgiveness for all his sins. How then can he be sorrowful at the presence of Him, who not only can perceive them all, but who is also ready and willing to forgive them. When the Psalmist was reflecting on the weakness of human nature, it called forth from him the impassioned exclamation, "Who can tell how oft he offendeth?" And then, instead of sinking down in a state of despondency, he looks to an ever-present God, who he was convinced knew him better than he knew himself, and says, "O cleanse thou me from my secret faults."

But further, it cannot be denied that Christianity in one point of view is a solitary religion. The duties which it enjoins are of a nature so personal and private, that the heart of each individual must know its own bitterness, nor can a stranger intermeddle with its joy. This is, I think, true even in the case of those who have had the superior advantage of religious parents and friends, for all the assistance which can be rendered to a rational being, is to direct him to the throne of grace, but the approaches to that throne, and the supplications offered there, must be performed alone. And therefore, much of comfort must necessarily spring from the reflection, that all our supplications are heard; that in our hard conflicts with natural depravity and acquired bad habits, we have a merciful and ever-present Witness, who knows how to appreciate intentions, and is never backward in supplying all needful strength. And surely these considerations apply with double force to those whose lot is cast in the midst of persecution, who find no friends of sentiments congenial with their own — no acquaintance able and willing to accompany them in their journey to the heavenly city. What would the condition of such pilgrims be, did they not feel that they have a Friend beside them, whose watchfulness and carefulness is always equal, and whose distinguishing characteristic is gentleness of so great a degree, that a bruised reed will not be broken, nor smoking flax quenched by him. These remarks might be extended to almost any length, for the subject is most copious. Let it however afford that consolation, which it is so well calculated to administer, to every one who is really striving to please God.

But if the righteous have cause to rejoice, the sinner has no less cause to tremble at these things. Where can words be found of force sufficient to express the awful fact, that all the misdoings of a long life of iniquity, have been read and known by the Judge of all the earth! Pause then, sinner, for a while, and hear the words of everlasting truth. Whatever your condition may be, God knows you. Every thought of your heart, every impure desire, every wicked imagination, are clearly seen by Him, and the day swiftly approaches, when He will execute judgment on all the inhabitants of the earth. Think not to escape his scrutiny; for go where you will he follows you, his eye is always on you; and never, never will you be able to elude his search. Dreadful are the accounts given us in holy writ, of what will be the doings of the sinner when the last trump shall echo through the regions of this earth, pronouncing the awful, the final proclamation—God is come! Then, though all the mountains of the material world were piled upon each other, and all the edifices of human structure added to increase the height of the mighty mass, yet they would afford you no security; and though hid underneath them in solitary and gloomy darkness, yet would each stain on your character be as plain in the sight of God, as if written in letters of fire on the clear azure of the firmament. Who then is bold enough to risk the dreadful consequences of incurring the displeasure of so terrible a Being? Especially when there is every reason to induce men to gain his favour, which is granted to all who seek it through the Saviour's blood.

In short, nothing can reconcile us to the presence of God but holiness. When the love of Him is shed abroad in our hearts, the consideration that He is near us will be most delightful: and thus we shall pass through this transitory life under the persuasion, that He who is now watching our steps in the midst of temptation, will, when we see him as he is, lead our triumphant songs in those blissful mansions, where all sorrow shall cease, and all wants be satisfied.

INFANT SCHOOLS IN AFRICA.

There is no community upon earth in which the Infant-school system is not of the highest importance; but, in our attempts to raise savage and barbarous tribes, it is a discovery of inconceivable value. When properly managed, it has in it a power which will raise up the first generation brought up under its influence above the third or fourth generation of those educated under different systems. At the Infant-schools, the children of the barbarous tribes start with the advantages of those of civilized men; and, instead of being retarded in their progress by the ignorance and imbecility of a people only rising above the savage state, they rise up to cultivate and humanize their parents, and become the elements of a society that will soon be able to supply their own wants, advocate their own rights, and diffuse the blessings of civilization among the tribes in the interior of Africa; and I have reason to believe that our labours may be attended with surprising success. Some of the great difficulties of introducing education among barbarous nations are, the indifference of the parents to instruction, and the aversion of the children to its restraints. By the Infant-school system these difficulties are completely removed. There is something in it so novel, so striking, and so amusing to a barbarous people, and so interesting to their children, that, generally speaking, in establishing such schools among them, we should find no difficulty in securing the approbation of the one, and the attendance of the other. On my late journey over Caffreland, I had several opportunities of having my mind confirmed in this opinion. Resting one day, while our oxen were feeding, I remarked a number of children around our waggon, humming a tune, to which they were beating time. Their appearance instantly suggested to me the idea of an Infant-school. I communicated my idea to Mr. Read, who had acquired some knowledge of the system. We instantly arranged them, to the number of perhaps fifty, to make the experiment. In the midst of Caffreland, among some of the most beautiful scenery in the world, I observed the readiness and enthusiasm with which the children entered into the spirit of the system, and heard them pronounce the English words which they had never before heard, with all the propriety that might have been expected in an English school, and saw the eagerness with which the parents partook of the delight of their children. I could scarcely believe my own eyes and ears; and could not help reflecting, what a mighty influence these schools might have in raising that interesting people, had we only the necessary agents and apparatus.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXI.

On Intellectual Education during the first Seven Years, and on learning to read.

Dear Madam,

In one or two preceding Letters, I have pointed out what I think ought to be the nature of education during the first seven years.

Those observations are comprehended under the promotion of the two things which seemed so desirable to the ancients; namely, "a sound mind in a sound body."

It appears to me that no book, nor even a letter, ought to be seen by your child before his seventh birthday; but that from the dawn of life to that period, continued attention should be paid to the object of expanding and strengthening the intellectual faculties, cultivating the moral affections, and in establishing and in securing vigour of body.

The intellectual culture alluded to, ought to be conducted by exercising his attention, understanding, memory, &c.; by questioning him as to the names of the properties of external objects, in order that a habit may be established of an accurate perception of the impressions made upon his senses.

In a former letter I adverted to the fact, that all the ideas, even those which are the most abstract, which your child will ever possess, are derived from mental operations upon the impressions he receives through the senses. If therefore you thoroughly teach him the use of these in reference to the external world, if you teach him the names of all the qualities of things around him; above all, if you establish the habit of his perceiving them minutely and accurately; you will have furnished him, by the time he is seven years old, with an ample stock of sensations, and knowledge of their names, upon which an abstract education may afterwards be most beneficially conducted.

Yet I can readily anticipate that some parents might object, that this advice is a great deviation from the general custom; and further, that it is impossible, under the usual circumstances of society, to defer the knowledge of letters so long. In the first place, the general custom of society may be in certain instances ineligible. The recommendation of any rule, is not its prior establishment, but its own inherent utility. In the next place, supposing, which I have done throughout, that you are the one only preceptress of your child during the first few years of his life, you can certainly determine what objects shall or shall not be presented to your child. But even were compliance with this advice so difficult, it would still be the duty of the adviser to propose the best regulations, and which ought to be adopted as nearly as possible. In a former Letter I gave the high authority of the master of ancient philosophy, the tutor of Alexander the Great, for my advice; but that which will perhaps equally recommend it, is another fact, that several persons, and some of them instructresses of youth, have frequently told me, that they have found, that when learning to read was wholly delayed till six or seven years of age, the child not only learnt more quickly, but even read much better than those children who began earlier.

The other object of attention, namely, the cultivation of the moral instincts, and of health, will, I have no doubt, be accomplished more readily and more perfectly in union with this advice relative to the intellect; whereas, with the usual union of all three, I believe one or other of them must suffer; and perhaps to this fact may be owing much of the imperfection of mental of moral or intellectual character observable in society. Intellectual attainments can most readily be grafted upon a previous solid and ample foundation formed of the preceding materials.

As soon after the seventh birth-day as may be convenient, let your child, whom I delight to picture to myself as healthy, well acquainted with the names and qualities of external objects, be taught to read in the following manner.

So arrange your avocations as that you may have a whole day to yourselves. Select for the purpose an alphabet, consisting of Roman letters of a moderate size, not on counters, for these, being liable to a change of position, may confuse him; but in a regular book, such as he will hereafter be used to. Teach him first the capital letters, and you will find that he will learn them all in one lesson of about six hours. The next day teach him the little letters in the same mode.

In a low, calm tone of voice, name slowly each letter: pause at every one: let him mark its form: point to it with a pencil or quill. The slower and the more deliberately you teach him, the quicker he will learn. The more times you go over the alphabet, the sooner you will tire him, blunt his perceptions, disgust him, and retard the acquisition.

But now I cannot avoid recommending to you a system of teaching the alphabet, which has recently become adopted in some few instances, which differs somewhat from the one usually adopted.

The cause of the alteration is this: that each of the consonants in the alphabet, and even in some degree the vowels also, are different as they are separately pronounced from the use which is made of them when conjoined with the vowels into a word. Suppose we take the word horn. Imagine what must be the difficulty upon the mind of your child, when he subsequently joins the letters together into the word, to find himself taught to say, haitch, o, arr, en. The difficulty is this, that instead of having to pronounce them more quickly, in order to form the word, in the following manner, aitchoarren, he has further to learn to use only the initial sound of each of these letters, rejecting the intermediate letters, and to conjoin these into the word. Thus, the aspirate which is the initial sound of the haitch is all that is wanted, the o is simple, the rough sound is all he wants with the arr, and the partly dental and partly nasal sound of the en. Hence the desideratum is, so to teach the alphabet as to teach simply the sounds. I will venture to give a specimen of the alphabet, which should thus be taught. Let the

A, be pronounced nearly as usual, only shorter, as in bad.
B, not as if spelt bee, but let the sound of the B only be taught, which will somewhat resemble the word ubb, suppressing the u as much as possible.
C, as a mere hiss.
D, as if written udd, suppressing the u as much as possible.
E, short as possible.
F, the mere effing sound which we make when about to pronounce the word flute.
G, as if written ug (g soft), suppressing the u as much as possible.
H, as a mere rough breathing.
I, as usual, only short as possible.
K, as if written ukk, suppressing the sound of the u as much as possible.
L, as if written ull, suppressing the sound as much as possible.
M, as if written em, only suppress the e as much as possible.
N, so as to this letter.
O, as usual, only short.
P, as if written up, only suppressing the u as much as possible.
Q, as if written uk, only suppressing u as much as possible.
R, a mere rumble with the end of the tongue.
S, a mere hiss.
T, as if written ut, suppressing the u, so as to give only, if I may so speak, the t sound.
U, nearly as usual, only very short.
V, as if written uv, and pronounced as one word, suppressing the u as much as possible.
W, as if written oo.
X, as if written ecs, only suppressing the sound of the e as much as possible.
Y, as if written ie, as one word, and as shortly as possible.
Z, simply as a hiss, in which the d is equally prominent with the s.

Now then imagine your child having been taught in this mode to spell the word horn. Thus, a mere aspirate or breathing, o, a mere rumble, and the en, avoiding the vowel as much as possible. He will then not have to get rid in his memory of the useless lumber appended to the breathing as aitch, and to the letters r and n, but will join the sounds together, and then pronounce the word. The labour, the difficulty, will be less and shorter. This system has been tried with much success. It will be evident upon inspection, that the letters of the alphabet, as they are usually pronounced, derive that pronunciation from the spelling of them, which learned men have agreed to assign to each of them as representing the power of the letters.

This spelling has proceeded upon the supposition, that you cannot sound a consonant without a vowel, which is true, but certainly you may so shorten the vowel as to give almost the mere sound of the consonant, and the sound is all that is wanted. Sounds joined together make words; but the old system of words joined together making words, increases the labour of learning to read, with no imaginable advantage. — I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

CLERICUS.

THE SCORNER SILENCED.

SOME time ago, a minister of the gospel went to preach at a place called Harmony, in the western settlements of the United States; when a physician, a professed infidel, called on his associates to accompany him while he attacked the Methodists. They went; and he commenced the sport by asking the minister, "Do you follow preaching to save souls?" "Yes," was the reply. He then pursued his interrogatories. "Did you ever see a soul?" "No." "Did you ever hear a soul?" "No." "Did you ever taste a soul?" "No." "Did you ever smell a soul?" "No." "Did you ever feel a soul?" "Yes, thank God," replied the minister. "Well," rejoined the physician, in a tone of triumph, "there are four of the five senses against one, that there is no soul." The minister immediately retorted, by asking his antagonist, "Are you a doctor of medicine?" "Yes," answered the infidel. "Then you profess to ease pain. Did you ever see a pain?" "No." "Did you ever hear a pain?" "No." "Did you ever taste a pain?" "No." "Did you ever smell a pain?" "No." "Did you ever feel a pain?" "Yes." "Then," said the minister, "there are also four senses against one to prove that there is no pain: and yet, Sir, you know that there is pain, and I know that there is a soul." The doctor appeared confounded, and walked off.—"Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit."

SCRIPTURE GAZETTEER.

Alexandria, a celebrated city in Egypt, built by Alexander the Great. It was once the most flourishing city in the whole world. The happy situation of it between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, and upon the river Nile, drew hither the commerce of the East and West, and it soon became the capital of Egypt, and the regal seat of the Ptolemies, whilst Egypt maintained the state of a kingdom. It was adorned with many stately buildings, of which the most memorable was the temple of Serapis; and for sumptuous workmanship and magnificence of the fabric, inferior to none but the Roman capitol. Here was also a noble library, erected by Ptolemy Philadelphus, who had stored it with near 700,000 volumes. These were unfortunately consumed in the wars of Julius Cæsar and Pompey. There are many remains even now of its ancient grandeur. Dr. Shaw observes, that "considering the great devastations which have attended the Saracen conquests in other parts, it is somewhat extraordinary, that the greatest part of its ancient walls, together with their respective turrets, have continued entire down to this time. In the same condition, likewise, are the cisterns, which the overflowing of the Nile annually supplied with water. These were of a great depth, having their walls round, supported by several stages of arches, upon which, likewise, the greatest part of the city itself was erected. The grandeur and sumptuousness of the ancient Alexandria, may be further estimated from two rows of beautiful granite pillars (several whereof were standing in 1721), which may be supposed to have constituted the street that is described by Strabo, and reaching from the Areopolitic part of the city to the gates of Canopus." Alexandria is called at present Scanderia, and is a place of some trade, and has two ports; the new one, where the vessels of Europe resort to; and the old one, where those from Turkey are admitted.

Antioch (the speed of a chariot), the capital of Syria, built by Seleucus Nicanor, and called Antioch in honour of his father Antiochus. The city of Antioch was in form almost square; it had a great number of gates, and part of it upon the north side was raised upon a high mountain. It was adorned with galleries and fine fountains, and was celebrated throughout the world for the elegance of its buildings, the learning and politeness of its inhabitants, the fertility of its soil, and the richness of its trade. The Emperor Vespasian, Titus, and others, granted very great privileges to it. It was ordinarily the residence of the Prefect or Governor of the eastern provinces, and casually honoured with the residence of several of the Roman Emperors, especially of Verus and Valens, who spent here the greater part of their time; and in such reputation has this city been had in the earlier times of Christianity, that its bishop has been honoured with the title of Patriarch. But, like all human things, it has since undergone various revolutions, having been almost totally demolished by two successive earthquakes, one whereof happened in the fourth, the other in the fifth century. In 548 it was taken and burnt by the Persians, and all the inhabitants massacred. Four years after this, Justinian rebuilt it in a more beautiful and regular manner than it was before. The Persians however took it a second time, in 574, and destroyed its walls. In 588 it suffered again by an earthquake, whereby upwards of 60,000 persons perished. It was once more rebuilt, but taken by the Saracens in 637. Nicephorus Phocas retook it in 966, but afterwards it was taken by the Saracens. The Christians at last in the Crusade took it in 1098, but it was taken and demolished by the Saracens in 1268; and nothing now remains of this once celebrated and superb city (which will be ever memorable for being the place where the disciples of Jesus were first called Christians, as well as for being the birth-place of the Evangelist St. Luke), but a heap of ruins and desolation. Its situation was (according to Dr. Wells) on both sides of the river Orontes, about twelve miles distant from the Mediterranean Sea. There is likewise ancient Antioch, mentioned in Acts xiii, 14, situated in Pisidia, a small province or country lying north of Pamphylia.

Antipatris (for the father), a town of Palestine, anciently called Caphar-Saba, but named Antipatris by Herod the Great, in honour of his father Antipater. It was situated in a pleasant valley, near the mountains, in the way from Jerusalem to Cæsarea. Josephus places it about the distance of seventeen miles from Joppa. Acts xxiii, 22—35.

ABOLITION OF NEGRO WEST INDIA SLAVERY.

Righteousness, Reason, and Religion are prevailing, and the cause of the oppressed Negro has been adopted seriously and determinately by his Majesty's government. The following is taken from the Patriot Newspaper—"The intended plan of Ministers is rumoured to be, 1. The immediate abolition of slavery in the colonies. 2. The compensation to the slave-owner, at a fixed rate per head, for every slave. 3. The raising of a loan for such compensation, to be paid off in thirty years. 4. The manumitted slave to be compelled by the magistrates to work five days out of the seven, except when in crop, when they would work for six days. 5. Two days' amount of wages to be deducted, and paid into the compensation fund, it being considered the remaining three or four days, as the case may be, as to in crop or not, would be sufficient for the support of the slave."

We cannot doubt but perfect liberty will be secured to the slave to attend the ministry of the Missionaries, and that those self-denying servants of Jesus Christ will enjoy full protection and security in the prosecution of their glorious work of evangelizing the Negroes.

ENMITY TO THE GOSPEL IN THE WEST INDIA PLANTERS,

One of the Wesleyan Missionaries, writes under the date of Dec. 15 last, "More effectually to neutralize the good effects of Missionary teaching among the Negroes, the most strenuous efforts are made by the planters and others, to revive the heathenish sports and amusements formerly so prevalent among them, now happily almost obsolete, and great preparations are making in many of the parishes to restore them in all their force at the approaching Christmas."

The Missionaries at present mourn, while their enemies rejoice over their impious successes. Lately the member of the parish of St. Ann rose in the House of Assembly and said, "He was happy to inform the House, that a great improvement had taken place in the morals and manners of the Negroes in the parish he had the honour to represent, since the sectarians had been expelled therefrom. Before, they were always melancholy, and nothing but singing, and prayer, and religion, would do for them; but now, he was happy to say, they were returning to their old plays, dances, and other amusements, and were picking up all their old songs." Irreligious men know not the things of God, and therefore laugh at that which is the chief dignity of man.

WISE MAXIMS FOR SERVANTS,

PROPER FOR HANGING UP IN KITCHENS, &c.

To the Faithful, Honest, and Industrious.

I. A good character is valuable to every one, but especially to servants, for it is their bread; and without it they cannot be admitted into a creditable family; and happy it is that the best of characters is in every one's power to deserve.

II. Engage yourself cautiously, but stay long in your place; for long service shows worth, as quitting a good place through passion is a folly, which is always repented of too late.

III. Never undertake any place you are not qualified for; for pretending to what you do not understand, exposes yourself, and, what is still worse, deceives those whom you serve.

IV. Preserve your fidelity; for a faithful servant is a jewel, for whom no encouragement can be too great.

V. Adhere to the truth; for falsehood is detestable; and he that tells one lie, must tell twenty more to conceal it.

VI. Be strictly honest; for it is shameful to be thought unworthy of trust.

VII. Be modest in your behaviour; it becomes your station, and is pleasing to your superiors.

VIII. Avoid pert answers; for civil language is cheap, and impertinence provoking.

IX. Be clean in your business; for slovens and sluts are disreputable servants.

X. Never tell the affairs of the family you belong to; for that is a sort of treachery, and often makes mischief; but keep their secrets, and have none of your own.

XI. Live friendly with your fellow-servants; for the contrary destroys the peace of the house.

XII. Above all things avoid drunkenness; for it is an inlet to vice, the ruin of your character, and the destruction of your constitution.

XIII. Prefer a peaceable life with moderate gains, to great advantages with irregularity.

XIV. Save your money; for that will be a friend to you in old age. Be not expensive in dress, nor marry too soon.

XV. Be careful of your master's property; for wastefulness is a sin.

XVI. Never swear; for that is a crime without excuse, as there is no pleasure in it.

XVII. Be always ready to assist a fellow-servant; for good-nature gains the love of every one.

XVIII. Never stay when sent on a message; for waiting long is painful to a master, and a quick return shows diligence.

XIX. Rise early; for it is difficult to recover lost time.

XX. The servant that often changes his place, works only to be poor; for the rolling stone gathers no moss.

XXI. Be not fond of increasing your acquaintance; for visiting leads you out of your business, robs your master of your time, and often puts you to an expense you cannot afford: and, above all things, take care with whom you are acquainted; for persons are generally the better or the worse for the company they keep.

XXII. When out of place, be cautious where you lodge; for living in a disreputable house puts you upon a footing with those that keep it, however innocent you are yourself.

XXIII. Never go out on your own business without the knowledge of the family, lest in your absence you should be wanted; for leave is light, and returning punctually at the time you promise, shows obedience, and is a proof of sobriety.

XXIV. If you are dissatisfied in your place, mention your objections modestly to your master or mistress, and give a fair warning, and do not neglect your business, nor behave ill in order to provoke them to turn you away; for this will be a blemish in your character, which you must always have from the last place you served.

Death-Bed Testimonies.

COLLECTED BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM BUTTON.

No. IV.

REV. JAMES HERVEY,

Rector of Weston Favell, Northamptonshire. Died Dec. 25, 1758.

> "He clos'd his eyes, and saw his God."—WATTS.

THE last and great trial of his faith was more precious than that of gold which perisheth. Its preciousness never appeared more than in the hour of death; for then he evidently saw by faith and apprehended the salvation of God, and could rejoice in a clear view of his interest in it. When Dr. Stonehouse saw him for the last time, namely, on Christmas day, about two hours before he expired, Mr. Hervey pressed home upon him his everlasting concerns, in the most affectionate manner, telling him that here is no abiding place; and begging of him, amidst the multiplicity of his business, to attend to the one thing needful. The Doctor, seeing the great difficulty and pain with which he spoke (for he was almost suffocated with phlegm and frequent vomiting), and finding by his pulse, that the pangs of death were coming on, desired that he would spare himself. "No (said he), Doctor, no. You tell me I have but a few moments to live; oh! let me spend them in adoring our great Redeemer. Though my flesh and my heart fail me, yet God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever." He then expatiated in the most striking manner upon those words of St. Paul, 1 Cor. iii, 22, 23. "All things are yours, life and death, for ye are Christ's." "Here, said he, is the treasure of a Christian. Death is reckoned among this inventory; and a noble treasure it is. How thankful am I for death, as it is the passage through which I pass to the Lord and Giver of eternal life, and as it frees me from all this misery you now see me endure, and which I am willing to endure, as long as God thinks fit: for I know he will by and by, in his own good time, dismiss me from the body. These light afflictions are but for a moment, and then comes an eternal weight of glory. Oh! welcome, welcome, Death. Thou mayest well be reckoned among the treasures of the Christian! To live is Christ, but to die is gain."

After which, as the Doctor was taking his final leave of him, Mr. Hervey expressed great gratitude for his visits, though it had been long out of the power of medicine to cure him. He then paused a little, and with great serenity and sweetness in his countenance, though the pangs of death were then upon him, repeated these triumphant words, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy most holy and comfortable word, for mine eyes have seen thy precious salvation. Here, Doctor, is my cordial. What are all cordials to the dying, compared to the salvation of Christ? This, this supports me." He found this supporting him in his last moments, and declared it by saying twice or thrice, "PRECIOUS SALVATION!" and then, leaning his head against the side of the easy chair, in which he sat, he shut his eyes, and fell asleep."

Funeral Sermon preached by the Rev. W. Romaine, Jan. 4, 1759, from Luke ii, 29, 30. "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."

THE GENIUS OF DEATH.

What is death? 'Tis to be free
From earthly love, or hope, or fear;
To join the great Equality—
All alike are humbled there.
The mighty grave wraps lord and slave,
Nor pride nor poverty dares come
Within that refuge-house—the Tomb.

Spirit, with the drooping wing
And the ever-weeping eye,
Thou of all earth's kings art king,
Empires at thy footstool lie.
Beneath thee strew'd, their multitude
Sink like waves upon the shore:
Storms shall never rouse them more.

What 's the grandeur of the earth
To the grandeur round thy throne!
Riches, glory, beauty, birth,
To thy kingdom all have gone!
Before thee stand the wondrous band,
Bards, heroes, sages, side by side,
Who darken'd nations when they died.

Earth has hosts, but thou canst show
Many a million for her one:
Through thy gates the mortal flow
Has for countless years roll'd on.
Back from the tomb no step has come;
There fix'd, till the last thunder's sound
Shall bid thy prisoners be unbound!

AN AMERCAN INDIAN'S LETTER FOR A BIBLE.

Many of our readers will recollect the interest excited about two years ago, by the sermons and addresses at public meetings, delivered by the Rev. Peter Jones, the Indian Chief, who was then on a visit to our country. On his return to Canada he applied himself diligently to the work of evangelizing his ignorant countrymen, and translating the Scriptures. Part of the word of God having been translated into the Chippeway tongue, "the hearts of the people," he says, in a letter to the Bible Society's Committee, "rejoice at the idea of possessing the words of our Saviour in their own language. In order to show you how they value the good book, and their anxiety to receive it, I herewith send you a translation of an Indian Letter, which I received the other day from one of the Lake Sineve Indians, written in the Chippeway tongue: it is as follows;—

"My beloved brother, Peter Jones;—I, Thomas Shilling, speak to you. I wish to tell you I have no book. I want one of the good talking books you brought out with you last summer. Our Chief holds the one you left here, fast in his hands, and will not let it go. I shall borrow it of him, and I will give him money for the use of it. He cannot read. He does not know so much as A B C; and we who can read have no good book to read!"

Peter Jones observes, "The chief alluded to is Mahyahwahsenoo, otherwise Yellowhead, a very pious and intelligent man; and I expect the reason he holds the book I left with him so tight in his hands, is, that those who can read may come and read it at his own house and in his own ears, and thus understand the will of God concerning him and his people!"

Trade in Men.—It is stated, that above 600,000 Negroes have been stolen from Africa, and transported to Brazil and Cuba alone, since the peace of Paris. A third more, probably, have been stolen, and died!

WHY IS THE TWENTY-FIFTH OF MARCH CALLED LADY DAY?

Most of our readers know that it is so called in honour of the "Our Lady," the Virgin Mary. On this day is celebrated the angel's message respecting our Blessed Saviour. Luke i, 28.

The eastern churches celebrate this festival at a different season from those of the west. The Syrians call it Bascarah, i. e. search, inquiry; and mark it in the Calendar for the first of December. The Armenians hold it on the fifth of January: thus anticipating the time, to prevent its falling in Lent: but the Greeks make no scruple of celebrating the festival even in Lent. The earliest mention of the observation of this festival is in the seventh century, when ceremonies had exceedingly multiplied in the churches. At the council of Trullo, in that century, there was a canon made, forbidding the celebration of festivals in Lent, except the Lord's day, and the feast of the Annunciation.

Lady Day at Rome.

In the Romish church, on this feast, the Pope performs a ceremony of marrying or cloistering a certain number of maidens, who are presented to him in the church, clothed in white serge, and muffled up from head to foot. An officer stands by, with purses containing notes of 50 crowns for those who make choice of marriage, and notes of 100 for those who choose the veil!

A FRIEND IN ADVERSITY.

The following remark, from the Rev. G. Whitfield's Journal of his First Voyage to Georgia, serves to show the habitual disposition of that excellent man to turn the most common occurrences of life to purposes of improvement.

"Monday, March 20, 1738. To-day Colonel C. came to dine with us; and in the midst of our meal we were entertained with a most agreeable sight. It was a shark, about the length of a man, which followed our ship, attended with five smaller fishes, called pilot-fish, much like our mackarel, but larger. These, I am told, always keep the shark company; and, what is most surprising, though the shark is so ravenous a creature, yet, let it be ever so hungry, it will not touch one of them. Nor are they less faithful to him: for, as I am informed, if the shark is hooked, very often these little creatures will cleave close to his fins, and are often taken up with him.—Go to the pilot-fish, thou that forsakest a friend in adversity, consider his ways, and be ashamed."

KING'S COLLEGE CHAPEL.

nagnificent building owes its origin to Henry VI, gned from A. D. 1422 to 1461.

extreme length of the Chapel is 316 feet, the 84 feet; the height from the ground to the of the battlements 90 feet, to the top of the es somewhat more than 101, and to the summit orner towers 146 feet 6 inches. The space in- by the walls, is 291 feet in length, 78 feet in and 45 feet 6 inches in breadth."

far this sumptuous fabric was raised during the Henry VI is not accurately known; but it is e that it was not carried so high as the roof. year 1460 an entire stop was put to the work; ard IV confiscated the duchy of Lancaster, as ll the other revenues of the college, re-granting, , a sufficient sum for the maintenance of the and scholars, but nothing towards the comple- the building. After an interruption of sixteen he work was resumed through the interest of d, warden of Winchester College, and provost 's. In the four years following, 1296*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.* II. was expended on the chapel. From the 14th of June 1483 till the 22d of March in the ensuing year, the business was again at a stand; but Richard III at that time appointed Thomas Cliff overseer of the works, who continued so till December; but nothing material appears to have been done, the expenses in nine months amounting only to 746*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* of which sum, Richard is supposed to have given 700*l.*

From this period the work was suspended till May 1508, when it was recommenced by Henry VII. The next year the king died, but left directions to complete the chapel, and invested his executors with sufficient authority to defray all necessary expenses. The building from this period advanced with rapidity, and the shell of the chapel was finished July 29, 1515.

"About the middle of the chapel is a wooden screen supporting the organ-gallery, very curiously carved. This was erected in the year 1534, when the beauteous Anna Boleyn was queen to Henry the Eighth. The west side is ornamented with several lovers' knots, and a panel near the wall, on the right, displays the arms of the ill-fated Anna, impaled with those of the king. On another panel is a piece of sculpture, in very bold relief, which represents the Almighty hurling the rebel angels from heaven. Over the screen is a stately and fine-toned organ, erected in 1803.

"This screen separates the ante-chapel from the choir.

The walls on the inside of the former are ornamented with carved stone of excellent workmanship, representing the arms of the houses of York and Lancaster, with numerous crowns, roses, portcullises, and fleurs de lis. In the centre of one of the roses at the west end is a small figure of the Virgin Mary. The view from the screen at the entrance of the choir has much grandeur. On each side are two rows of stalls of carved wood; on the panels, at the back part of the upper rows, are the arms of all the kings of England, from Henry the Fifth to James the First; the arms of the universities of Cambridge and Oxford; and of the colleges King's and Eton. These arms are carved with considerable skill, and the supporters are in fine bas-relief. Behind the Provost's stall, on the right of the entrance, is St. George and the Dragon, exceedingly well executed. The choir is paved with marble from the bottom of the stalls.

"The east end of the chapel, which had remained unfinished till about fifty years since, is now completed in a style of symmetry nearly corresponding with the general magnificence of the building. Under the direction of the late James Essex, F. S. A. a grand altar-piece was erected, which has since been embellished with a fine painting of the descent from the cross, presented to the society by the present Earl of Carlisle, who was educated at this college. The painting was purchased by his lordship, when travelling on the continent, as the work of Daniel de Volterra; but some connoisseurs have adjudged it to be the performance of Raphael.

The elegant roof of this fabric is composed of Gothic arches, springing from the buttresses, filled up with beautiful groins; and in the centre, between the groins, are suspended twelve massive stones, of at least a ton weight each; the under surface of which is carved into a rose and portcullis, alternately. The disposition of the materials of this roof, and the ingenuity displayed in its construction, may be justly classed with the most happy efforts of architectural skill. About ten feet above the stone roof, is another of wood, covered with lead.

"An additional cause of the celebrity of this superb edifice may be found in the exquisite beauty of its painted windows, which are also in the Gothic form, and each of them nearly fifty feet high. The subjects are expressive of the most interesting scriptural events, particularly the life, death, and memorable actions of our Saviour, with corresponding incidents from the Old Testament, and are one hundred in number. The side windows are separated by munnions into five lights; these are subdivided into upper and lower compartments by a transom. In the central light of each divison is depicted an angel and a saint, exhibiting scrolls and labels, descriptive of the events represented in the other lights, which are occupied by four subjects in each window, two lights containing a subject. In the arrangement of the subjects, the delineations in the upper divisions are in general selected from the Old Testament, and the paintings immediately underneath, from corresponding circumstances in the New Testament. Thus, in the upper compartments of one window is the Queen of Sheba offering presents to King Solomon, and Abraham performing the ceremony of circumcision: in the divisions beneath, the wise men's offerings, and the circumcision of Christ.

"The east and west windows differ from all the other: the glass of the latter is not painted; the former is embellished with paintings of almost inconceivable beauty. The upper and lower division of this window are each separated by buttresses into three compartments, and these are again subdivided by munnions into three lights, each compartment containing a subject. These six subjects are all taken from the New Testament, and represent the crucifixion, and the most material events immediately connected with it.

"On each side of this elegant building are nine small chapels (20 feet by 10), that were probably erected as chantries, and four of them are known to have been so appropriated. These chapels are built between the buttresses, and, for the most part, communicate with each other. Several of them, on the south side, contain the College Library, which is well furnished with valuable and scarce books, particularly a choice MS of the book of Psalms, upon parchment, four spans in length and three in breadth, which is said to have been taken from the Spaniards at the siege of Cadiz, in 1691. In the year 1804 the celebrated Jacob Bryant, Esq. formerly a fellow of this college, left by will his valuable library to this collection.

"The second chapel from the west on this side was consecrated to religious uses by Provost Hacombleyn, by whom it was ornamented more than any of the others, and afterwards, by his own desire, made his burial place. In the window is a portrait on glass of Henry the Sixth, tolerably well executed; and in the centre of the chapel a large table monument of marble, on the top of which is a flaming urn; and on the east and west side, cherubs supporting the family arms. On the north side is a Latin inscription to the memory of John Churchill, son of the great Duke of Marlborough. This accomplished youth was a student of this college, where he died on the 20th of February, 1702, only five weeks beyond the completion of his sixteenth year.

"In August 1801, a plain white marble tablet, with a suitable inscription, was erected against the east wall of this chapel, to the memory of the celebrated Dr. Glynn, who was buried in the vault near the north door of the great chapel. He died February 6, 1800, aged 81, and bequeathed to the college very large sums towards the erection of new buildings."

HEAVEN ANTICIPATED.

"The throne of God and the Lamb shall be in it."—Rev. xxii. 3.

Blest thought! there is a world above!
A scene of light, a world of love!
And Christian pilgrims on their way,
By faith that glorious land survey.

Blest hope! when death withdraws its vail,
This land of light and love to hail;
To spring from earth, and earth's distress,
To heaven's unbounded blessedness.

No sickness there shall e'er invade,
Nor sorrow cast one passing shade;
But life o'er death be conqueror made,
And glow in youth which ne'er shall fade.

There God himself shall be the light,
And endless glory bless the sight;
For there our Saviour God is seen;
Without a cloud or veil between.

Then, Christian traveller, on thy way,
By faith this glorious land survey;
Keep thy blest end, thy home in view,
To cheer thee all thy journey through,

Though darkness o'er thy path prevail,
Though cares oft cloud, and storms assail,
Press on! thou soon shalt reach that shore,
Where storms and woe are known no more.

The Cause of Flattery.—The cause of flattery is the pleasure men take in hearing their own praise.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXII.

On learning to read.

Dear Madam,

I WILL now imagine your child to have acquired a knowledge of those sounds, by the combination of which the words of his native language are formed; and also of those arbitrary characters by which the inhabitants of this country have agreed that they shall be represented. Of course the acquisition is most valuable. It will be the means of his access to all the authors of every department who have written in his native language. The next thing however for him to do, is to acquire that facility of recognizing those arbitrary characters, and associating with them their sounds, and of combining them, and pronouncing them in a combined form, which we denominate reading.

This, however, can only be done by practice. But what means will you adopt for this purpose? The usual resort is to the spelling-book. I must however confess, that I am not acquainted with any spelling-book, which is adapted as well as in my view it might be for this purpose. The qualities of a spelling-book ought to be as follow. That it be printed upon good paper, without pictures of any kind, in plain bold letters: that the size of the book be portable; nor need it be of one-tenth part of the size of spelling-books in general. In a word, there should be as little as possible in its external appearance to deceive, puzzle, or deter.

These, however, are comparatively its inferior qualities. Those which are more important are, that it be divided into successive lessons, one lesson on each page. The pages not to be numbered, because I would have the infant see nothing on the paper which he is not to understand from the time he first sees the book. None of the lessons ought to contain any words of Scripture, or any reference to any religious topics: beware how you ever associate toil, in the mind of your infant, with that inestimable subject. The lessons ought to contain no ideas except those with which he is already familiar, nor any mode of presenting those ideas to his mind, except such as is perfectly natural. When two words are joined together, they ought to make sense, and such sense as the child can understand. Accordingly, such a lesson in reading as the words "I do," would be ineligible, because they contain an abstract idea instead of a sensible idea; which, however familiar to you, is not so to your child. He will be perplexed, and discouraged, which is a calamity ever to be watched against as the greatest of evils. Such a lesson as "the bird," is ineligible, because the idea of a bird would never present itself to the mind with the definite article. Your child never would think of the words, unless in their connection in a sentence. He has no idea of the artificial disposition of words for the sake of a mere lesson in reading.

The lessons next after the alphabet should be the names of the most familiar sensible ideas, placed under each other like a column of spelling, without the article. They should also be those names, in preference to others, which are formed of sounds but little altered by their combination from the sounds which they have when separately pronounced. Thus, man

The word dog would be ineligible, because the sound of the g is different in combination from the sound which it has when separately pronounced. The principle to be acted on throughout is, that the introduction to reading should be as little troublesome as possible, merely a simple transition from the sounds of the alphabet in the separate to the combined form, and these consisting only of sounds which constitute the names of the most familiar objects. Neither ought the lessons for a long while to come to include a word, which, though the name of a substantive, is used in the sense of the adjective. For instance, "a horn handle" would be an ineligible lesson for a long time to come, because the word horn is best known to your child as a substantive: the use of substantives joined to substantives to express a quality respecting them, is a new, and not a natural mode of perception to your infant. Neither ought your child to commit any thing to memory out of a book for a long time to come. Learning columns of spelling is needless labour. Let the eye be properly exercised, and the memory will follow. Each lesson ought to occupy a day. Like the alphabet, they should be taught in the fewest possible times of going over them. Every repetition of a lesson tends to blunt the perceptions of your infant.

The spelling-book should consist of a few lessons in each class of advancement. For instance, four or five lessons of words of one syllable, selected under the regulations already mentioned: then four or five, of words of one and of two syllables: then four or five, of words of one, two, and three syllables, and so onward.

Conducted in this manner, learning to read will be a delightful and speedy accomplishment. Respecting this, as many other branches of education, the error consists in imagining that it cannot be accomplished under a certain degree of time and a certain degree of labour.

I candidly allow, however, that although there may be numerous spelling-books, containing all these and all other desirable qualities, yet, perhaps from ignorance, I do not know where they may be found.

The generality of spelling books appear to me to be instruments of torture and of intellectual perversion. Look into the most familiar, and see how completely adapted they are to perplex, discourage, and retard the intellect of a child. First, there is the likeness of the writer, as large as the page itself, at which the child gazes with blank astonishment. Then the alphabet, perhaps in Roman, and German text, and Italian. Then a series of lessons upon the combination of the letters, as, ab eb ib ob ub, ac ec ic oc uc, ad ed id od ud; allow me to add one more, ag eg ig og ug! Unhappy infant! that is doomed to be driven through this dreary page. In the succeeding lessons, however, the prospect is scarcely amended. The lessons are taken out of the Scriptures, generally out of the Psalms, and a terrible pilgrimage is before the child, through the antiquated elliptical language of King James's translators of the Bible.

Imagine an infant reading the following lesson, which actually occurs in a spelling-book used in schools. "Oh my soul, thou hast said unto the Lord, my goods are nothing unto Thee." I can understand the sublime meaning really latent under this comparatively obscure translation, but imagine an infant employed in reading it. His mind perceives nothing: his eye is all; and his memory benumbed, because awakened by no associations, slowly furnishes him, amid sighs and tears perhaps, with the sounds for each of the letters and words. Such a lesson has the effect on the intellect, which the torpedo inflicts upon the human hand.

When, too, the child is sufficiently advanced to read some of the lessons which follow, what may be the estimated effect of his perusing the following idiom: "A fox being sharp set by hunger!" These are not mere oversights: spelling-books generally are as ill adapted almost throughout as they could possibly have been.

I have previously objected to pictures in a spelling-book. If pictures were always well selected, they might be useful as a mode of instruction, but they need to be chosen as studiously as a book. Suppose, for instance, on one page is the picture of an elephant; on the next, or on one soon after, is one of a wren, of nearly the same size. Accordingly a false impression is communicated, that a wren and an elephant are of equal size. I think that the best sort of pictures for children are those which represent things correctly, and are generally representations of things which they have already seen. Upon this system, a child ought not to see a picture of a tiger till he has seen the creature alive.

What can any child make of those pictures in spelling-books, in which there are twenty-six figures in different costumes, the initial letters of which correspond to the letters of the alphabet, as Armenian, Bohemian, &c.?

I equally object to all fables. It is in vain to say that no child is deceived when he reads or hears of a lion, or a mouse, or a cock, or a wolf and a lamb, talking and moralizing. This is more than can be proved. The child may for months be under the impression, that there may be animals so gifted in some of the forests and countries of the world. Besides, why teach any thing which needs to be unlearned? Why so needlessly communicate impressions which you must remove? How needless, when the universe is replenished with so many interesting realities, in the contemplation and description of which, ample employment and amusement may be derived. What ill taste, to prefer the degrading task of teaching a fable, before the sublime employment of the intellect upon pure truth, upon the perception of the qualities of external nature the source of our perceptions, the works of God, the manifestation of the Divine attributes! Contrast yourself in the two situations,—of explaining to your child the web of the spider, so curiously reticulated, which he has affixed between two shrubs in your garden, the spider himself situate apparently in repose in the centre, the quality of the web to entangle a fly, the speed with which he darts upon it, how he rolls a line of web around it to prevent its fluttering, the poisonous bite by which it is instantly dispatched from suffering; objects so curious, so replete with demonstrations of the intelligence of the Creator;—contrast with this, being occupied in hearing or teaching the fable,

> "Come up into my chamber, said the spider to the fly;
> 'Tis the prettiest little chamber that ever you did spy."

In the former case, you are teaching your child a variety of the external world, a phenomenon which the Creator has obtruded on our view, and which is ever replete with a moral and a spiritual lesson; and in the other case you are teaching a falsity.

Why ever let your child know the fatal secret, that the qualities of external things can be misrepresented? Why wilfully and needlessly administer to him the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil?

When I look into books for children, and see the useless difficulties so perversely adopted, the strange impediments thrown into the way of the infant mind, the lessons in lying with which they abound, the monstrous falsities and fictions more degrading than ever deluded the savages of New Holland, and think that these are put forth as the instruments of the intellectual culture of immortal beings, I have often surmised, that the father of lies had exerted his most cruel and successful artifices over the minds of the writers, in order to involve the minds of children in perversion and obliquity, and to excite in the dawn of its existence the distaste of intellectual pursuits, and to foment the ill-temper and the indolence, and even the duplicity, which often characterize the infant while learning to read by such means.

The composition of first books for children would be a dignified undertaking for the most exalted intellect. They alone are equal to the task, whose minds are free from ill habits, cleansed from false perceptions, delivered from the influence of custom, and who know the modes whereby the human mind understands and acts, and who believe that pure truth, in every instance, is the only fit occupation of an immortal mind, from the dawn to the close of life.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.
CLERICUS.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

THE Rev. Mr. Johnson, in a letter dated Sierra Leone, June 18, 1822, depicts the horrors of the trade in human blood in the following terms.

"The day before yesterday, a slave schooner, with four hundred unhappy fellow-creatures on board, was upset off Cape Sierra Leone. Only seven men were saved: they had got into a boat, and were picked up by the Myrmidon. Nineteen sailors and two officers of this vessel were on board to bring her into Sierra Leone, who have all perished with the rest. A tornado came on suddenly, and turned the vessel over.

"Oh! my dear brother, how many poor creatures fall a sacrifice to the inhuman traffic in human blood! I have been filled with horror ever since. Numbers were landed from another vessel yesterday, in the most deplorable condition.

"The hospital at Leicester is overflowing. Some are but just alive; and others are walking about with a deathlike look, and will to all appearance fall also a sacrifice. One poor creature in the girls' school died just now, and five or six more will soon follow. My heart is full!

"What do the good people of England know about the real state of Africa? They can have no idea of its misery, unless they are eye-witnesses, as we are. Oh! when shall an end be put to this trade? O Lord, have mercy, have mercy upon afflicted Africa!"—Church Missionary Report.

DELIGHTFUL PROSPECTS AT MADAGASCAR.

Thirteen thousand copies of different books, or parts, of the Bible have been printed in the language of the natives of Madagascar. "At present," says Mr. Baker, "all the scholars who have been in the schools previous to August, 1832, have been dismissed, on proof being given of their knowledge of reading and writing: they, with others previously dismissed, amount to ten or fifteen thousand, and were all anxious to possess themselves of any thing printed: as they are liable to be again taken into the schools, if they forget their learning; and many of them are sincerely anxious to obtain a knowledge of divine truth. About 6000 new scholars have been put into the school; and very many voluntary learners learn to read in their own houses, and at the prayer-meetings of the native believers."

ON PRESENTING A SISTER WITH A BIBLE.

Sister, accept this sacred pledge of love,
And from it learn to raise your hopes above.
Seek its bright counsels as the heav'nly guide
To Him, who bore our sins and for us died:
To Him who rose, and sits in heav'n above,
To plead for us with condescending love.
Let its sweet pages show that day by day
Its counsels you regard to guide your way.

PALM SUNDAY.

March 31. This day is called in the Romish Missals, or Prayer Books, Dominica in ramis Palmarum. The Lord's day with branches of Palms. It receives its denomination from the circumstance of Palm branches distributed in Popish times, in commemoration of our Lord riding into Jerusalem. Our readers will be interested in reading the following account of the absurdities of Popery, with which the people at Rome are deluded, instead of being instructed in the doctrines of salvation from the Scriptures: it is given by an intelligent traveller, who was present on the occasion in 1817. "About half-past nine in the morning, the pope entered the Sistine Chapel, attired in a robe of scarlet and gold, which he wore over his ordinary dress, and took his throne. The cardinals, who were at first dressed in under-robes of a violet-colour (the mourning for cardinals), with their rich antique lace, scarlet trains, and mantles of ermine, suddenly put off these accoutrements, and arrayed themselves in the most splendid vestments, which had the appearance of being made of carved gold. The tedious ceremony of each separately kissing the pope's hand, and making their three little bows, being gone through, and some little chaunting and fidgetting about the altar being got over, two palm branches, of seven or eight feet in length, were brought to the pope, who, after raising over them a cloud of incense, bestowed his benediction upon them: then a great number of smaller palms were brought, and a cardinal, who acted as the pope's aid-de-camp on this occasion, presented one of these to every cardinal as he ascended the steps of the throne, who again kissed the pope's hand and the palm, and retired. Then came the archbishops, who kissed both the pope's hand and toe, followed by the inferior orders of clergy, in regular gradations, who only kissed the toe, as they carried off their palms.

"The higher dignitaries being at last provided with palms, the deacons, canons, choristers, cardinals, train-bearers, &c., had each to receive branches of olive, to which, as well as to the palms, a small cross was suspended. At last, all were ready to act their parts, and the procession began to move: it began with the lowest in clerical rank, who moved off two by two, rising gradually in dignity, till they came to prelates, bishops, archbishops, and cardinals, and terminated by the pope, borne in his chair of state (sedia gestatoria) on men's shoulders, with a crimson canopy over his head. By far the most striking figures in the procession were the bishops and patriarchs of the Armenian church. One of them wore a white crown, and another a crimson crown glittering with jewels. The mitres of the bishops were also set with precious stones; and their splendid dresses, and long wavy beards of silver whiteness, gave them a most venerable and imposing appearance.

"The procession issued forth into the Sala Borgia (the hall behind the Sistine Chapel), and marched round it, forming nearly a circle; for by the time the pope had gone out, the leaders of the procession had nearly come back again; but they found the gates of the chapel closed against them, and, on admittance being demanded, a voice was heard from within, in deep recitative, seemingly inquiring into their business, or claims for entrance there. This was answered by the choristers from the procession in the hall; and after a chaunted parley of a few minutes, the gates were again opened, and the pope, cardinals, and priests, returned to their seats. Then the Passion was chaunted; and then a most tiresome long service commenced, in which the usual genuflections, and tinkling of little bells, and dressings, and undressings, and walking up and coming down the steps of the altar, and bustling about, went on; and which at last terminated in the cardinals all embracing and kissing each other, which is considered the kiss of peace."

"The palms are artificial, plaited of straw, or the leaves of dried reeds, so as to resemble the real branches of the palm-tree, when their leaves are plaited, which are used in this manner for this ceremony, in the Catholic colonies of tropical climates. These artificial palms, however, are topped with some of the real leaves of the palm-tree, brought from the shores of the Gulf of Genoa."—Rome in the Nineteenth Century, vol. iii, pp. 130—132.

MAUNDY THURSDAY,

April 4, is called by the Catholics dies mandati, or the day of the command, referring to our Saviour washing his disciples' feet. The ceremonies observed on this day at Rome, are described by the traveller above referred to.

"There are thirteen instead of twelve; the one being the representative of the angel that once came to the table of twelve that St. Gregory was serving. The twelve were old priests, but the one who performed the part of the angel was very young. They were all dressed in loose white gowns, and white caps on their heads, and clean woollen stockings, and were seated in a row along the wall, under a canopy. When the pope entered and took his seat at the top of the room, the whole company of them knelt in their places, turning towards him; and on his hand being extended in benediction, they all rose again and re-seated themselves.

"The splendid garments of the pope were then taken off; and clad in a white linen robe which he had on under the others, and wearing the bishop's mitre instead of the tiara, he approached the pilgrims, took from an attendant cardinal a silver bucket of water, knelt before the first of them, immersed one foot in the water, put water over it with his hand, and touched it with a square fringed cloth; kissed the leg, and gave the cloth, and a sort of white flower, or feather, to the man; then went on to the next. The whole ceremony was over, I think, in less than two minutes, so rapidly was this act of humility gone through. From thence the pope returned to his throne, put on his robes of white and silver again, and proceded to the Sala di Tavola: the thirteen priests were seated in a row at the table, which was spread with a variety of dishes, and adorned with a profusion of flowers. The pope gave the blessing, and, walking along the side of the table opposite to them, handed each of them bread, then plates, and, lastly, cups of wine. They regularly all rose up to receive what he presented; and the pope having gone through the forms of service, and given them his parting benediction, left them to finish their dinner in peace. They carry away what they cannot eat, and receive a small present in money besides."—Rome in the Nineteenth Century, vol. iii, p. 139.

GOOD FRIDAY.

April 5. As this is regarded by the Romish church, and by the church of England, as the day on which our blessed Saviour gave himself a propitiation for the sins of the world, ceremonies are observed corresponding with the character of each communion. Our readers are all acquainted with the service of the Church of England. The Dissenters, as there is no precept or example in the Scriptures, relating to a religious observance of this day, do not all regard it with any particular service. But, we believe, in most of their places of worship, sermons are delivered on the glorious atonement of Christ.

We believe all our readers will be interested in the following account of the ceremonies of the Romish church, as given by the traveller before referred to.

"The upper part of the church is arranged like a theatre, with painted trees, and pasteboard rocks and thickets, representing Mount Calvary. A little way down, two Roman centurions, large as life, dressed in military uniforms, and mounted on pasteboard horses, flourish their pasteboard swords. Higher up on the mount, on three crucifixes, are nailed the figures of Christ and the two thieves; so correctly imitating life, or rather death, as to be taken for wax-work. Catholics say, Christ spoke seven times upon the cross, and at every saying a dagger entered the heart of the Virgin, who is therefore painted with seven daggers sticking in her breast, and adored as 'Nostra Signora de' sette dolori'—Our Lady of the seven sorrows. The service of the Tre Ore is therefore divided into seven acts, between each of which there is a hymn. In every act, one of the seven set dissertations, upon the 'sette parole' of Christ, is read—or begun to be read—by a priest, who goes on until his lecture is interrupted by the preacher, who breaks in upon it at whatever part he pleases with a sermon (as they call it), or rather a tirade, of his own, which seems to be extempore, but which is previously learnt by rote. These dissertations drawing to a close, and the three hours having nearly expired, 'Ecco il momento' cried the priest, and every body sank prostrate on the ground in tears; and sobs, and groans, and cries, and one loud burst of agony filled the church—'Ecco il momento! Già spira Gesú Christo! — Già muore il nostro Redentore! — Già finisce di vivere il nostro Padre!'—(The moment is come! Now Jesus Christ expires! Now our Redeemer dies! Now our Father ceases to live!)

"At length the preacher cried, 'Here they come—the holy men—to bear the body of our Redeemer to the sepulchre;' and from the side of the scene issued forth a band of friars, clad in black, with white scarves tied across them, and, gradually climbing Mount Calvary by a winding path among the rocks and bushes, reached the foot of the cross unmolested by the paper centurions. But when they began to unnail the body, it is utterly impossible to describe the shrieks, and cries, and clamours of grief, that burst from the people. At the unloosening of every nail, they were renewed with fresh vehemence, and the sobs and tears of the men were almost as copious as those of the women. Five prayers, separately addressed to the five wounds of Christ—first, the wound in the left foot, then that of the right foot, and so of the two hands, and, lastly, of the side—were next repeated. They were nearly the same, and all began, 'Vi adoro, piaga Santissima'—(I adore you, most holy wound.) The body of Christ being laid on a bier, decked with artificial flowers, and covered with a transparent veil, was brought down Mount Calvary by the holy men—as the preacher called them—who deposited it on the front of the stage, where all the people thronged to kiss the toe through the veil, and weep over it. The congregation consisted of all ranks, from the prince to the beggar, but there was a preponderance of the higher classes."

Lady Morgan describes the Illuminated Cross of St. Peter's, and the adoration of the pope and the cardinals, as forming the attractions on the evening of Good Friday. She says:—

"On this occasion, thousands of all ranks and countries pour into the church, where no tickets of admission are required; yet the mighty temple, made for the universe, still seems half empty. Many of the dim aisles afford an asylum for retiring piety; and the vastness of the whole, contemplated through a well-managed obscurity, seems to extend beyond its usual limits, and to be lost in immeasurable distance. The hundred lamps, which, in their bright brazen sockets, burn day and night round the sepulchre of St. Peter, are this day extinguished. A cross of flame suspended from the cupola, before the baldachin of the high altar, alone lights the immediate space over which it hangs, and leaves all else in the majesty of darkness, here and there faintly dispersed by a twinkling lamp. That illuminated spot seemed like a magic circle. It is hermetically closed by three files of armed men, and the beams shed from the cross fall only on spears and bayonets. This place is kept clear for the pontiffs, princes, and cardinals, who now appear, accompanied by a guard, to clear a passage through the gathering multitude. The troops that await them open their files, and close again upon their charge. The Pope falls prostrate before the Cross, on cushions of down and velvet. The princes and princesses, with their attendant courtiers, take their station on his right; on his left kneel the cardinals.

"During this singular prostration the most profound silence reigned. The Pope seemed unfeignedly absorbed in holy abstraction; and as the light fell upon his venerable head and faded face, and tinged his flowing robes, there was something mystic and ideal in his appearance; and to a faith which fancy had warmed, or fanaticism deranged, his translation from a mortal coil at that moment might have appeared possible. In the centre of the church crowded the beau monde of London, Paris, Vienna, and St. Petersburgh, laughing and chattering, through all the philological varieties which might be supposed to make a conversazione in the tower of Babel. There, too, Roman beauties, who disdained the flaunting rites of noonday ceremonial, moved in their long black veils; and there, in true sincerity of heart and faith, knelt within view of that cross, to which alone her eyes are directed, one alike 'the world forgetting, by the world forgot.' Whole families of the middle classes were seated on the steps of altars, or at the feet of monuments, gazing on the varied spectacle; and there bands of peasantry, breathing aves, were seen walking about, and added much to the effect of the scene, whose grotesque groupings they aptly filled up.

"As night thickens, and St. Peter's thins, the slow return of the varied multitude, and above all of the pilgrim bands and confraternities, afford a picturesque and curious addition to the Good Friday sights. These pilgrims are wretched ragged creatures, led on by some Roman lady of condition, who gives out the penitential psalm as she moves along, and is answered by her followers. As their dark bands sweep along the banks of the Tiber, and their red torches flash on the walls of the castle of St. Angelo, they raise the deep-toned, and, when softened by distance, occasionally melodious psalmody, that with exquisite skill they suffer to die away along those waters, over which Pagan priests have raised their Io Pæans, or chaunted the funeral obsequies for the death of Adonis."—Italy, vol. ii, p. 300.

DR. SPENCER'S DYING COMMANDS.

Some days before his death, he gave order that nothing (not so much as a thread) of black should be in his coffin: "For," said he, "I have been a sorrowful man these many years, lamenting the deplorable state of Christ's church militant here on earth; but now, being upon the point of retiring into the church triumphant in heaven, I will not have the least mark of sorrow left upon me; but my body shall be wrapped up all over in white, for a testimony that I die in expectation of a better and more glorious state to come."

MY SCRAP BOOK.

LEAF VI.

"The Bee that wanders, and sips from every flower, disposes what she has gathered into her cells."—Seneca.

Third Original Letter from the Rev. Robt. Hall to the Rev. William Button.

My dear Brother, Leicester, 24th May 1814.

I have just printed my Address to Mr. Eustace Carey, delivered at his designation at Northampton. It consists of about fifty pages, printed by Mr. Combe in precisely type and form as my sermons. The price must be two shillings, as I am informed. I hope it will not be thought inordinate. * * * * * * * * * * I' have spared no pains in making it as perfect as I could; but I fear to little purpose * * * * * * * *.

Mrs. H. was brought to bed of a son[*] yesterday morning, and is, through mercy, as well as can be expected. Let me beg an interest in your prayers, that she may be raised up again. My other dear lovely boy I think you know I lost: it was a great stroke to us both; especially to his poor mother, of whom he was the darling. I hope dear Mrs. Button is recovered, and will be long spared to you. * * * * * * * *. What wonders have we lately seen. The events which have taken place appear enchantment, or a dream. * * * * * *. I hope to print some sermon or sermons before long; but every thing I do in that way costs me immense labour.—I am, my dear Sir, your affectionate Brother,

R. Hall.

[*] He was named Robert. Some months after the decease of his lamented father he went abroad, and a few weeks since, his amiable mother received the afflicting intelligence, that he died in Batavia; but the particulars of the distressing event have not yet arrived.

ARCHBISHOP LEIGHTON.

It was a question asked of the brethren, both in the classical and provincial meetings of ministers, twice in the year, "If they preached the duties of the times?" (1648.) And when it was found that Leighton did not; he was quarrelled with for this omission; but he said, "If all the brethren have preached to the Times, may not one poor brother be suffered to preach on Eternity?"

Leighton came up to London at the end of the year 1673, to resign his archbishopric; his resignation was accepted. He retired to a private house in Sussex, where he lived in a most heavenly manner, and with a shining conversation.

When Lord Perth came to London to be made Lord Chancellor of Scotland, Dr. Burnet (bishop of Salisbury) had a very earnest message from him, desiring by his means to see Leighton. Burnet, who wrote so earnestly to him that he came to London, was amazed to see him, at above seventy years of age, look so fresh and well. His hair was still black, and all his motions lively. He had the same quickness of thought and strength of memory; but above all, the same heat and life of devotion he had ever seen in him. When Burnet took notice to him, how well he looked, he said, "He was very near his end, for all that; and his work and journey were now almost done." The next day he was taken with an oppression, and, as it seemed, with cold and with stitches, which was indeed a pleurisy. The next day, he sunk so, that both speech and sense went away of a sudden; and he continued panting about twelve hours; and then died without pangs or convulsions, in 1684.

There were two remarkable circumstances in his death. He used often to say, that if he were to choose a place to die in, it should be an inn; it looking like a pilgrim going home, to whom this world was all an inn, and who was weary of the noise and confusion in it. He added, that the officious tenderness and care of friends, was an entanglement to a dying man; and that the unconcerned attendance of those that could be procured in such a place, would give less disturbance. He obtained what he desired; for he died at the Bell Inn, in Warwick Lane.

Another circumstance was, that while he was Bishop in Scotland, he took what his tenants were pleased to pay him: so that there was a great arrear due, which was raised slowly by one whom he left in trust with his affairs there; and the last payment he could expect from thence, was returned up to him about six weeks before his death: so that his provision and journey failed both at once.—Life, prefixed to his Select Works.

And some fell among Thorns, Mark iv, 7.—The third is thorny ground. This relates to the cares and pleasures, and all the interests of this life. All these together are the thorns; and these grow in hearts that do more deeply receive the seed, and send it forth, and spring up more hopefully than either of the other two, and yet choke it. Oh! the pity.

Many are thus almost at heaven, so much desire of renovation, and some endeavours after it, and yet the thorns prevail. Miserable thorns! The base things of a perishing life drawing away the strength of affections, sucking the sap of the soul. Our other seed and harvest, our corn and hay, our shops and ships, our tradings and bargains, our suits and pretensions for places and employments of gain or credit, husband, and wife, and children, and house, and train, our feastings and entertainments, and other pleasures of sense, our civilities and compliments; and a world of those in all the world, are these thorns, and they overspread all. The lust of the eye, the lust of the flesh, and the pride of life.

And for how long is all the advantage and delight of these? Alas! that so poor things should prejudice us of the rich and blessed increase of this divine seed.

PIOUS WIT OF A YOUNG WOMAN.

A Practical Illustration of Matt. x, 16, "Be ye wise as serpents, and harmless as doves."

In the short but inglorious reign of James II, when Popery was making rapid strides to power, the king had his agents and emissaries in every part of the kingdom, to harass, vex, and weary the Protestants into a compliance with the measures he was endeavouring to bring about; and where persuasion and threats had no effect, sometimes force and violence were had recourse to. One of his agents, with a party of soldiers (rather ruffians, I should say) went out on a Sabbath morning "to hunt down the Protestants;" as they termed it. They met a young woman, a servant-maid, running along the road, early in the morning, without either shoes or stockings on. The captain of this band asked her where she was going so early in the morning; and what was the urgency of the business that made her run so fast. She told him, that she had learned that her elder brother was dead; and she was going to receive her share of the riches he had bequeathed to her, as well as to her other brothers and sisters; and she was afraid she should be too late. The commander was so well pleased with her answer, that he gave her a half-crown to buy a pair of shoes, and also wished her success. But if he had known the real business she was going upon, which was to a sacrament, he would most probably have prevented her from going that day to the place where she hoped to receive durable riches.

MY DYING SISTER.

"Mother, has noontide pass'd away,
And is it twilight dim?
Methought I heard my sister say
Her matin pray'r and hymn,
Tell me, oh! mother, is it day,
Or is it twilight dim?

"Ah! now I know it is not night,
I hear the joyous bee,
The lark is warbling to the light
His song of life and glee;
Mother, the shade is in my sight,
The darkness dwells with me.

"Ah! well do I remember now,
What bitter tears you've shed,
What hours, with ashy cheek and brow,
Upheld my aching head,
And pray'd and watch'd as none but thou
Could'st watch this weary bed.

"I see thee thro' a mist of tears,
Thy words are chok'd by sighs;
My father looks like one in years,
Since last he help'd me rise;
And our sweet home so chang'd appears,
It glads not these weak eyes.

"But thou, dear mother, oft hast said
There is a far-off land
All blest, where tears are never shed,
Can this be its fair strand?
It seems a clime of doubt and dread,
Rul'd with an icy hand.

"Alone I cross the dreary sea;
But when thou leav'st the shore,
Mine, mine the holy task shall be,
To guide thee safely o'er;
To pay back through eternity
Thy love's unbounded store." MARY.

THE BUDDHIST TEMPLE IMPORTED FROM INDIA.

THIS "Miniature of Buddhism" will afford a high gratification to its Christian visitors at Exeter Hall; while it will serve as an occasion of calling forth their sympathy towards the multitudinous tribes of India who are sitting in darkness and in the shadow of death, ignorant of the only true and living God, and of his Son our blessed Redeemer.

The Temple itself is twenty-four feet long: it was consecrated about five years ago, and "whilst in its native country, was visited by their Excellencies the Commander-in-chief in India; the Governor of Ceylon; and the late Dr. Turner, Bishop of Calcutta, with their families and friends, and the principal civil and military officers of that island; who considered its removal to England highly desirable, to afford the British public an opportunity which would otherwise be unattainable without a voyage across the ocean."

Before visiting the "Buddhist Temple," we beg to request our friends to refer to No. 14 of the Christian's Penny Magazine" for an account of GUADAMA, as then they will be better prepared to inspect this interesting exhibition. The temple contains, besides numerous idols, representations of Guadama, Vishnu, &c. &c., a colossal figure of Buddha, eighteen feet in length, carved in wood, in a recumbent posture, indicating his eternal repose, surrounded by images of his attendant spirits.

We would respectfully suggest to the proprietors of this truly interesting exhibition, the policy of announcing, that young persons and working people will be admitted at half price.

THE SCRAP BOOK,

Containing a Variety of Articles in Prose and Verse, chiefly Original, by the Author of "Emma and Sophia De Lissau," &c. &c. 32mo. silk. Seely. London, pp. 116.

This is one of a class of beautiful literary works suitable for presents to young persons. The Author of "Emma De Lissau," a Christian of the Hebrew nation, is well known to the public by her interesting works; and we are sure that the SCRAP BOOK will procure for her a still higher degree of respect, with those who have "received the grace of God in truth."

"THE CHRISTIAN LADY'S FRIEND,"

And Family Repository, Edited by the Author of "Emma de Lissau." Vol. I, for 1832. 8vo. cloth, pp. 572.

The volume before us includes the first year's numbers of this truly "Christian Lady's Friend." We think it well deserves the patronage of those for whom it is designed; and we understand it receives the cordial approbation and literary contributions of some of the most distinguished ladies of the British churches. Among its patrons, is included that ornament to her sex and preceptress of the world, Mrs. Hannah More. That production which is approved by a person, so competent to form an estimate of a work of this kind, must be worthy of recommendation to Christian Ladies.

ON REPROVING SIN.

FEW things are more difficult than to administer reproof properly: but while the professed servants of God sometimes need reproof, the avowed servants of Satan need it much more frequently, and on different grounds. One day, a person being in the room of a poor aged Christian woman, and lamenting a want of firmness to reprove the abandoned when travelling, and as an excuse having recourse to an hackneyed passage, "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine," she seriously and hastily replied, "Oh, Sir! keen and just reproofs are no pearls: were you to talk to a wicked coachman respecting the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost, and the pleasures of communion with God, you would cast pearls before swine; but not in reproving sin."

JUDGMENT OF GOD UPON PRIDE.

SIMON TOURNAY affords a memorable and affecting proof of the truth of that scripture, "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools." In 1201, after he had outgone all Oxford for learning, and became so eminent at Paris as to be made chief doctor of the Sorbonne, he grew so puffed with pride as to hold Aristotle superior to Moses and Christ, and yet but equal to himself! In his latter days, however, he grew such an idiot as not to know one letter in a book, or one thing he had ever done.

ARCHITECTURAL REMAINS AT LUXOR.

UXOR, THE "POPULOUS NO" OF EGYPT.

readers will refer to what is mentioned by the ined prophets concerning the ruin of Egypt, and to 36 of the "Christian's Penny Magazine," the er to understand this article. See Jer. xlvi, 25;
Ezek. xxx, 15; "The multitude of No." Nahum
3, "Populous No."

No," was called "No Ammon, or Hammon," from
, the son of Noah, whose son Mizraim was the founder of the kingdom of Egypt. Its name signified "The mansion, or palace of Ammon." Herodotus says the "Egyptians called Jupiter by the name of Ammon;" and this city, the same as the celebrated Thebes, the Greeks called Diopolis, "The city of Jupiter," and "Jupiter Ammon," the "Mansion of Jupiter," as a famous temple was erected at Thebes in honour of that imaginary divinity.

Thebes was built, according to the mythology of some, by Osiris, a great deity of the Egyptians, son of Jupiter and Niobe: but according to others it was erected by Busiris, a king of Egypt, a son of Neptune, who, with great cruelty, sacrificed all foreigners to Jupiter.

Thebes, or "Populous No," was eighty furlongs or ten miles in length, at the commencement of the Christian era: but this was little in comparison of its ancient magnitude, before it was ruined by Cambyses, when it was said to have been no less than four hundred and twenty furlongs, or fifty-two miles and a half in length. In its glory, Thebes is said to have been able to send out at once two hundred chariots, and ten thousand fighting men from each of its hundred gates! According to the epitaph of Rhampses, 700,000 soldiers dwelt in Thebes, so prodigious was the number of inhabitants in this "POPULOUS NO."

Homer has celebrated the greatness of this magnificent city:—

> " Not all proud Thebes' unrivall'd walls contain
> The world's great empress on th' Egyptian plain,
> That spreads her conquests o'er a thousand states,
> And pours her heroes through an hundred gates;
> Two hundred horsemen and two hundred cars,
> From each wide portal issuing to the wars."
> POPE'S HOMER.

Diodorus says, "we have heard that several successive kings were ambitious to improve the city with presents of gold and silver, with ivory and a multitude of colossal statues; and that there was not any city under the sun so embellished with columns of one entire stone. The buildings have remained to modern times; but the gold and silver, and all the costly ivory and precious stones, were pillaged by the Persians, when Cambyses set fire to the temples of Egypt. So immense, they report, were the riches of Egypt at this period, that from the rubbish, after plundering and burning, were taken more than three hundred talents of gold, and of silver two thousand three hundred."

We are not able accurately to trace the progressive steps of the destruction of the idolatrous and wicked Thebes, as predicted by the inspired prophets, Jeremiah xlvi, and Ezekiel xxx. But it was pillaged by the Assyrians and Babylonians, then by the Persians, and afterwards by the all-conquering Romans. Ptolemy Lathyrus, an Egyptian king, besieged Thebes for three years, after having defeated the rebellious troops in the field; and having taken the city, in the year 81 before the Christian era, according to Prideaux, destroyed its greatness. Dr. Prideaux says, "Lathyrns, on his taking the place, handled it so severely for this rebellion, that, from being the greatest and wealthiest city in Egypt, he reduced it to so low a condition, that it never after any more made a figure."

The ruins of ancient Thebes are of so immense an extent as to convince the spectator that fame has not magnified its size: for its monuments rest on two chains of contiguous mountains, while its tombs occupy the valleys towards the west, far on into the desert. A large temple on the eastern side is more than two leagues and a half distant from Medinet-Abu, where the most western temple is situated. The Arab village of Karnac is built on a small part of the site of a single temple.

Denon describes the remains of this temple thus: "Of the hundred columns of the portico alone, the smallest are seven feet and a half in diameter, and the largest twelve. The space occupied by the circumvallation of the temple contains lakes and mountains. In short, to be enabled to form a competent idea of so much magnificence, the reader ought to fancy what is before him to be a dream, as he who views the objects themselves rubs his eyes to know whether he is awake. The avenue leading from Karnac to Luxor, a space nearly half a league in extent, contains a constant succession of sphinxes and other chimerical figures to the right and left, together with fragments of stone walls, of small columns, and of statues."

Luxor is also built on the site of the ruins of a temple, not so large as that of Karnac, but in a better state of preservation, the masses not having as yet fallen through time, and by the pressure of their own weight. The most colossal parts consist of fourteen columns of nearly eleven feet in diameter, and of two statues in granite at the outer gate, buried up to the middle of the arms, and having in front of them the two largest and best-preserved obelisks known. The French, when in Egypt, deemed their means insufficient, not to hew out, but merely to transport these two monuments, which are not more than a fragment of one of the numerous edifices of the astonishing city of Thebes.

Denon, in speaking of the gate of the temple, which is now become the entrance to the village of Luxor, remarks, "Nothing can be more grand, and at the same time more simple, than the small number of objects of which this entrance is composed. No city whatever makes so proud a display at its approach as this wretched village, the population of which consists of two or three thousand souls, who have taken up their abode on the roofs and beneath the galleries of this temple, which has, nevertheless, the air of being uninhabited."

On visiting the palace of Luxor, the first objects which attract attention, are two obelisks of a single block; they are placed in the front of a mole at the distance of about fourteen paces. Between them and the mole are two colossal statues of black granite, about three paces from the mole, and eight from the obelisks; so that, in the space of eleven paces, these enormous objects are brought together, each of which, in an insulated position, would astonish the beholder by its grandeur. The taste of the Egyptians led them to form masses of those objects, which we employ our utmost attention to keep in detached situations. Their architects may also be reproached for the want of symmetry which appears in the disposition of these monuments. Neither the obelisks, nor the colossal figures, are in a line with each other, or with the gate.

These defects in the whole, are, however, forgotten on observing the execution of the parts: there is no work of art existing, which can bear a comparison with these obelisks. The Barbarians who destroyed the monuments of Upper Egypt, appear in some measure to have respected these; and though they endeavoured to cut one of them at the base in order to overturn it, they seem, even in this act of violation, to have avoided doing any injury to the figures which enrich it. These figures are disposed in three columns; those in the middle are cut to the depth of two inches; the larger figures in the right and left columns, are about an inch deep, and the small ones about nine lines: the ground of these is in its rude state, which gives them a different colour from the middle column, where it is polished with as much care as a precious stone. The obelisks terminate in a small pyramid, whose supports describe a curve. Their size is unequal, and they rest upon a base which is about fifteen feet beneath the surface. The two colossal figures placed behind them, which are of black granite, are thirty-eight feet in height, and in a sitting posture, with their hands resting on their thighs: the extremities of these statues are of indifferent workmanship, but some of the parts are admirable examples of sculpture.

To the left, on leaving the mole, is a colonnade, now blended with Turkish habitations. The two wings of the building, which were behind the mole, are entirely dilapitated. They led to a second colonnade, which still subsists, and is formed of two rows of the lotus columns: its total height is fifty-six feet, its diameter nine, the space between the capitals thirteen, and the intercolumniation fifteen feet.

At fifteen paces to the right and left of the grand colonnade, begin two other rows of columns, whose capitals imitate the sprout of the truncated lotus. the diameter of the columns is five feet, their height thirty, and the intercolumniation eight. This colonnade intersects, at right angles, that of the lotus columns: in the middle is an interval which served as an avenue to the palace, whose gate appears in front. It has been walled up by the Christians, who formed a niche in it, which contains their altar. They have clothed it with plaster, and adorned it with the pictures of their saints in fresco. The portico served as their church, and the avenue as the grand nave. This gate led to an apartment forty feet square, whose ceiling is supported by four columns. At the extremity of the palace, without mentioning the other apartments which compose it, there is a sanctuary, surrounded by an interval of six feet, which may be supposed to have been the chapel of the palace. The pictures that embellish it are very highly finished.

The general plan of this edifice affords every reason to conjecture that it was composed of about sixty buildings.

To give a minute description of the colossal ruins of ancient Thebes, as they exist at Luxor and Karnac, would require a volume; and we know no means of tarry-at-home travellers receiving adequate gratification, but by surveying some of the smaller antiquities of Egypt exhibited in the British Museum. Prodigious as some of those antiquities are, they will yet convey but an imperfect idea of the enormous masses which the Egyptians erected, forming palaces where the grossest impurities were practised, and temples whose pavements were dyed with the blood of human sacrifices; on account of which, the prophets denounced the Divine vengeance; and, as a lesson to wicked nations, Almighty God executed his righteous indignation upon the nation and their glory!

CAUSES OF DISEASE.

Daily observation demonstrates that the human structure, even in its most perfect formation, is liable to lesions of organization, and derangement of function, producing that state of the system, in which its usual actions or perceptions are either interrupted or attended with pain: this state is called disease. Every animal carries within itself the germ of its own destruction, or, in other words, it is formed for a limited existence. Many diseases, therefore, arise spontaneously, or without any assignable external cause; but many more are produced by causes, over which we have some control; and perhaps the chief source of the physical ills to which we are liable, is the deviation we make from the simplicity of nature. The injurious influence that domestication has upon the health of the lower animals, is very strikingly apparent; and in proportion as their subjugation is more complete, and their manner of life differs more widely from that which is natural to them, so are their diseases more numerous and severe. The diseases of our more valuable domestic animals, are sufficiently numerous and important to employ a particular class of men, and the horse alone has professional assistance appropriated to him. Men of education and talent have devoted themselves to the investigation of the diseases of this noble and useful creature. The poor little canary birds, confined in their wiry prisons, are very liable to disease, more especially inflammation of the bowels, asthma, epilepsy, and soreness of the bill. No animal deviates so far from the simplicity of nature in its habits, as man: none is placed under the influence of so many circumstances calculated to act injuriously upon the frame. His morbid affections are hence abundant and diversified, as may be seen by referring to the different nosological arrangements: those long catalogues of diseases afford strong evidence, that man has not carefully followed that way of life which has been marked out for him by nature. The crowded state of the inhabitants of large cities, the injurious effect of an atmosphere loaded with impurities, sedentary occupations, various unwholesome avocations, intemperance in food, stimulating drinks, high-seasoned and indigestible viands, and these taken hastily in the short intervals allowed by the hurry and turmoil of business, the constant inordinate activity of the great cerebral circulation, kept up by the double impulse of luxurious habits, and high mental exertions, the violent passions by which we are agitated and enervated, the various disappointments and vexations to which all are liable, reacting upon and disturbing the whole frame, the delicacy and sensibility to external influences caused by heated rooms, too warm clothing, and other indulgences,—are all contrary to the voice of nature, and they produce those morbid conditions of the system which a more simple and uniform mode of living would prevent. Our associates of the animal kingdom do not escape the influence of such causes; the mountain shepherd and his dog are equally hardy, and form an instructive contrast between a delicate lady and her lap-dog — the extreme point of degeneracy and imbecility of which each race is susceptible. In the early ages of society, man enjoyed long life, his manner of living was simple, his food, habitation, and pursuits, were all calculated to fortify the body, and no anxious cares disturbed his mind. — Curtis's Essay on the Deaf and Dumb.

WATCH AND PRAY.

O watch and pray; thou canst not tell
How near thine hour may be;
Thou canst not know, how soon the bell
May toll its notes for thee.
Death's thousand snares beset thy way,
Frail child of dust, O watch and pray.

Fond youth, as yet untouch'd by care,
Does thy strong pulse beat high?
Do hopes gay visions bright and fair
Dilate before thine eye?
Know, these must change, must pass away,
Fond joyous youth, O watch and pray.

Thou aged man, life's wintry storm,
Hath shorn thy vernal bloom:
With trembling step, and bending form,
Thou'rt tott'ring to the tomb.
And can vain hope lead thee astray?
Watch, weary pilgrim, watch and pray.

Ambition, stop thy panting breath;
Pride, sink thy lifted eye;
Behold the yawning gates of death
Before thee open lie.
O hear this counsel, and obey,
Pride and ambition; watch and pray.

O watch and pray; the paths we tread
Lead onward to the grave.
Go to the tombs, and ask the dead,
Ye on life's stormy wave:
They shall exhort ye: even they,
From their dark chambers:—watch and pray.

EASTER.

April 7. The word Easter occurs once in the Scriptures, Acts xii, 4, where it means Passover, referring not to the fact or the time of the resurrection of Christ, but to the national Hebrew festival of that name. Easter is a term applied in English to the season in which the resurrection of our blessed Saviour is commemorated: but this word has been adopted from the Saxon goddess Eostre, whose idolatrous and impure festival was held in April.

The Greeks call this festival Pasga, and the Latins Pascha, from the Hebrew word which signifies a passage or passover.

There is no precept or example in the Scriptures for the religious observance of this season; yet from a very early period the day of the Redeemer's glorious resurrection has been religiously observed by Christians. But one of the most unhappy controversies which ever existed among the professed followers of Christ, arose in the second century concerning the proper time of keeping this festival. The Asiatic churches kept their feast upon the very same day on which the Jews observed their Passover, and others on the first Sunday after the first full moon in the new year.

Mr. Milner, in his valuable "Church History," remarks: "The controversy respecting the proper time of the observation of Easter, which had been amicably adjusted between Polycarp of Smyrna and Anicetus of Rome, who had agreed to differ, was unhappily revived towards the close of this (the second) century. Synods were held concerning it; and a uniformity was attempted in vain throughout the church. Victor of Rome, with much arrogance and temerity, as if he had felt the very soul of the future papacy formed in himself, inveighed against the Asiatic churches, and pronounced them excommunicated persons. Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, rebuked the uncharitable spirit of Victor, reminded him of the union between Polycarp and his predecessor Anicetus, notwithstanding their difference of sentiment and practice in this point, and pressed the strong obligation of Christians to love and unity, though they might differ in small matters."

This controversy was determined in the council of Nice, called by order of Constantine the Great, A.D. 325, when it was ordained, that the commemoration of this blessed event should be kept on one and the same day, which should always be Sunday, in all Christian churches in the world. It ought however to be observed, that neither the council of Nice, nor any other council, has the least authority to make decrees or ecclesiastical laws for all Christians. The Holy Scriptures alone are the only authority in directing the faith, the practice, and the religious ordinances of believers on the Lord Jesus Christ.

But though the Christian churches, in the early ages after the apostles, differed as to the time, yet they all agreed in showing particular respect to this festival. On this day prisoners and slaves were liberated, and a generous provision was made for the poor. The eve, or vigil, of this festival was celebrated in some places with more than ordinary pomp, which continued till midnight; as it was a tradition of the church that our Saviour rose a little after midnight, but in the East, the vigil lasted till cock-crowing.

The manner in which Easter is celebrated in Roman Catholic countries is truly shocking, and one of the principal causes of hardening the Jews in their infidelity and hatred of the name of Jesus of Nazareth. But it is also worth while to consider how this ever-memorable event is commemorated in enlightened Protestant Britain. Let each one of our readers inquire, whether he is prepared in the true spirit of grateful devotion? "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time." 1 Pet. i, 3—5.

MEDITATION ON THE FULNESS OF SALVATION.

The following reflections were written in consequence of hearing a long dry sermon on the merit of good works, and Christ being willing at last to make up any short-coming on the sinner's part.

Serva Christi.

There is no such thing in the Bible as part of salvation, separable from an interest in all the blessings of the covenant of grace. He that breaks one command is guilty of all! How then can poor sinners, dead in trespasses and sins, work out a righteousness of their own? "There is none that doeth good, no, not one." (Psalm xiv, 3). In the sight of Jehovah all are dead in Adam; believers are justified only in Jesus, and they shall inherit everlasting life, as is most clearly expressed in the fifth chapter to the Romans. It is a free, full, and perfect salvation that Jesus purchased for his people on Calvary. Christ, the beloved of the Father, said, "If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed" (John viii, 36). "There is no putting forth of the finger" (Isaiah lviii, 9): there is no doing all we can to get to heaven by our works and merits, and so, if we come short in the measure of purity and holiness requisite for the celestial regions, Christ stepping forward and making up the deficiency! No: He came on no such mean errand from His glory to dwell among condemned transgressors. He came to accomplish the honours of the perfect law of God, "He came to seek and to save that which was lost" (Luke xix, 10). A beautiful illustration of this is Zaccheus meeting Emmanuel (Luke xix), with his roll of good works and diadem of merits. Zaccheus was little of stature; and being impelled by curiosity, and by the imparted grace of the good Spirit, he ascended the sycamore tree: Jesus then called him by name, and said, he would abide that day at his house, which displeased some of his self-righteous followers so much, that they murmured that he should be the guest of a sinner. But Jesus declared that he was a son of Abraham according to the promise, "For Abraham believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness." (Gen. xv, 6.) In this righteousness Zaccheus was a son of Abraham; not for "giving half of his goods to the poor, or restoring four-fold if he had taken any thing from any man by wrong accusation:" no, these were no pleas with the great Law-fulfiller and blessed Redeemer. His glory He will not give to another (Isa. xlii, 8; xlviii, 11). He is Lord of all, "his work is perfect," and "of his fulness have all believers received, and grace for grace" (John i, 16): one grace to help another, so as to live "to the promise of the glory of his grace, wherein He hath made us accepted" (Eph. i, 6), and presents us blameless before the throne of His Father and our Father, the Eternal God.

Virtue required in Nobility.—Nobility is a splendid gem, and adds an ornament to him who wears it; but if it be not set in the purest gold of moral goodness, it only serves to make more apparent the vices of its possessor.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXIII.

General Principles of Intellectual Education.

Dear Madam,

May I offer you this Letter as incidental to the general course, as being very strongly though collaterally only connected with it. I shall endeavour to state what appear to me to be the principal rules which ought to be kept in view in the intellectual education of your child, not merely from the period at which he learns to read, but from the very first dawn of his intellect, and in reference to every subject in which he may be instructed.

The first rule is, that the degree of maturity which his faculties have attained ought perpetually to be kept in view, in regard to the information which is administered to him. That maturity is to be estimated, not so much by the strength of the faculty in question, but by the degree of information which he has acquired by that faculty. The accession of knowledge to the mind of an infant must resemble the addition of links to a chain; of whatever length it may be, the succeeding link must be fastened on to and make part of the preceding. So must any new idea communicated to a pupil of any age, if he is to be expected to retain it. That is, there must be some of the new ideas of the same nature with those of which he is already possessed, and the accession must consist of the gradual extension of them into others which are different.

Secondly, Every new subject which is taught him ought to be exhibited to his mind from its very first principles, and these should be represented in the simplest and most intelligible form, and comprehensively. The teacher should also be careful, that out of the plenitude of his own information, he may not convey defective apprehensions. Every teacher is in danger of taking for granted that the pupil is acquainted with some things, in consequence of their being obvious to himself. This ought to be dreaded the more as the teacher is himself expert and experienced. To this cause may perhaps be ascribed the frequent obscurity of books on the elements of any science, and which render the assistance of a tutor indispensable. In arranging the principles of a new science, the instructor, whether orally or by writing, ought to take for granted the absolute ignorance of the pupil. This may sometimes be thrown away; but neither the pupil nor the instructor will have much cause to regret: it is an error on the right side. In the case of oral instruction, the pupil ought to be instructed to demur the instant he does not understand. He should be cautiously warned never to seem to comprehend when he does not, through a shame of owning his want of comprehension, or out of a baneful affectation of seeming to have a very rapid comprehension. On the other hand, the instructor should never feel or affect notions of impatience with those who comprehend slowly. The instant he has lost his patience, he throws away the capability of being useful. It should also be considered, that a comparatively slow perception is usually found united with tenacious retention.

Thirdly, A yet more important rule should be, that nothing should be taught a child, except in such terms and in such modes as he can understand. The instant he ceases to comprehend, he ceases to learn. From that moment the time of both parties is thrown away. They may go on indeed, but the fabric must be taken down and rebuilt at no distant period. The utmost pains should be taken to meet the apprehension of a child. His eye, the tone of his voice, should be perpetually regarded, to see whether he really does comprehend. On the part of the instructor, all means should be adopted for this desirable purpose. Your language ought ever to be as simple and as precise as a demonstration in Euclid. All the pains you can adopt to be perspicuous, simple, intelligible, and unequivocal, will be amply repaid. Such pains will reward even yourself, by the increased clearness of your own perceptions. Your own perceptions of the topic in question, and those of your child, ought to be like the rivulet which flows from a spring, in which you can most clearly see every grain of sand, every pebble, that lies at the bottom.

In this consists the great utility of grammar, logic, &c. to train the mind to the habit of taking clear perceptions, and of communicating them to others. For the want of this habit, what an obscurity there is attendant on the professed instruction and the professed knowledge of multitudes! It originates in the habit, on the part of the instructor, of not forming precise and accurate perceptions himself. Whatever we can perceive clearly and comprehensively, we can express in like manner. Take care of the perceptions, and then leave the language in which you convey them to take care of itself. The expression of ideas is to the perception, what the hands of a clock are to the procedure of the inward works. Indeed, the more we keep our mental view on the perception, the more correct and even elegant will be our expressions. The instant we become conscious that we are speaking or writing, our style ceases to be fluent and happy.

Whenever then you find that you are not most clearly perceiving the object which you are describing, or teaching, scrupulously pause till you can recover your perceptions. If you cannot do so, tell your child so at once. The first opportunity, get complete information, tell him when you have done so, and then communicate it.

The want of these principles and this procedure, from instructors of every order, has done infinite mischief in every department of knowledge. Would that it had always been followed, even in the pulpit! Who can tell how much the inefficiency of the ministry is to be attributed to this cause? He who does not clearly understand, can never clearly teach. Be he an instructor of whatever rank, he may fill his time up, and communicate the accustomed dose of weariness to his auditors, but no more.

Let your entire intellectual procedure to your infant resemble that beautiful comparison of real knowledge in the Scriptures, namely, light. Let your own mind be full of light, and the addition to your infant's ideas be ever that of light to light.

It should also be kept in mind, that the instant dark and dubious ideas are attempted to be communicated, his mind will become uncertain, will be discouraged, and gain a settled idea of the difficulty of obtaining knowledge, an impression fatal to acquisition. He will be reduced to the liability of seeking satisfaction in the pleasures of the senses, which he will soon experience are certain in their sensations. He then totters on the verge of degradation. In every new department there will always be ideas which will require contemplation till the mind perceives them; till, if I may so speak, the eye of the mind accommodates itself to the perception of them. But if they be really presented in a perceptible form, the mind will infallibly, and without much difficulty, apprehend them. The greatest difficulty attending upon the learning of most sciences is derived, not so much from the nature of those sciences themselves, as from the improper modes in which they are taught.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

Clericus.

SCRIPTURE GAZETTEER.

Appii-Forum, a place about fifty miles distance from Rome, where St. Paul was met by some devout Christians in his journey to that city. This place is supposed to have received its name from the same Appius, who gave name to the Appian Way. Acts xviii, 14.

Apollonia (perdition, or destruction), a city of Macedonia, through which, and Amphipolis, St. Paul passed in his way to Thessalonica. Acts xvii, 1.

Arabia (evening, or a desert place, or mixtures), a large country of Asia, extending from the river Euphrates to Egypt, and so lying to the east and south of the Holy Land. This country took its name from its inhabitants, being a mingled people, composed of Ishmaelites, Midianites, and Amalekites, the word Arat denoting in the Hebrew language, to mix or mingle, and the derivation Oreb or Arabim, a mixed multitude. This country has been from early times distinguished into three parts. Arabia Felix, or the happy, to the south, so styled from its rich products, and famous for the queen of Sheba, who came to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and whose kingdom was situated in this fertile country: Arabia Petræa, either so called from its capital Petra, built on a rock, or from the rockiness of the whole division, being full of mountains, among which is Mount Sinai (or Horeb), so famous in sacred scripture. Not far from which, south or south-west, within the bounds of Arabia Petræa, was situated the land of Midian, whither Moses fled out of Egypt, and which was doubtless so called from Midian, a son of Abraham by Keturah. As Arabia Petræa lies to the north of Arabia Felix, so still more north, or rather north-east, lies the third division, Arabia Deserta, so called from its barren deserts, and large uncultivated plains. We cannot indeed in either of these divisions (as Dr. Shaw observes) be entertained with pastures clothed with flocks, or with valleys standing thick with corn, or with brooks of waters, or fountains, or depths that spring out of the valleys or hills. Here is no place of seed, or of figs, or of vines and pomegranates. But the whole is an evil place, a lonesome, desolate wilderness; no otherwise diversified than by plains covered with sand, and by mountains made up of naked rocks and precipices. Neither is this country ever, unless sometimes at the Equinoxes, refreshed with rain; but the few hardy vegetables which it produces, are stunted by a perpetual drought; and the nourishment which the dews contribute to them in the night, is sufficiently impaired by the power of the sun in the day. The intenseness of the cold and heat at these respective seasons, very emphatically accounts for the provision of Providence in spreading out for the Israelites "a cloud to be a covering by day, and fire (like a harmless sun) to give forth light and heat in the night season." Psalm cv, 39. There is the same uniform course of weather throughout the whole year, the sky being usually clear, and winds blowing briskly in the day, and ceasing in the night. Of these the south winds are the gentlest, though those in other directions are the most frequent, which by blowing over a vast tract of these deserts, and skimming away the sandy surface along with them, leave exposed several putrid trunks and branches of trees; make continual encroachments upon the sea, and occasion no less alterations on the surface of the continent. For to these violent winds may be attributed the many billows or mountains of sand, which are everywhere to be met with. No places in the whole world perhaps abound less with living creatures than these deserts, and indeed where has nature made less provission for their sustenance? The quails must have been fed as well as brought by a miracle, if they had continued with the Israelites; and might they not, without the like miracle, have died of thirst in the wilderness? We cannot therefore sufficiently admire the great care and wisdom of God, in providing the camel for the traffic and commerce of these and such-like desolate countries. For, if these serviceable creatures were not able to subsist several days without water, or if they required a quantity of nourishment in proportion to their bulk, the travelling in those countries would be either cumbersome and expensive, or altogether impracticable.

Aram (highness, or magnificence), the fifth son of Shem, was the father of the Syrians, who from him were called Arameans or Aramites. There are many countries distinguished by this name in Scripture. Aram Naharim, or Syria of the two rivers; i. e. Mesopotamia; Aram of Damascus, Aram of Soba, Aram of Bethrohob, Aram of Maachah, because the cities of Damascus, Soba, Bethrohob, and Maachah, were in Syria, or at least because Syria contained the cantons of Damascus, Soba, &c. Homer calls those Arameans, which the Greeks and more modern times call Syrians; (see Iliad II, ver. 783, &c). The prophet Amos (ix, 7), seems to say, that the first Arameans (Assyrians), dwelt in the country of Ker, in Iberia; and that God brought them from thence, as he did the Hebrews from Egypt; but when this transmigration happened no one knows. It must be very ancient, since Moses always calls the Syrians, and people of Mesopotamia, Aramites. The name Syri, or Syria, is derived from Tyre, or Tor, a place which Homer never mentions, it being perhaps not then grown famous, even if it was built.

Ararat (the curse of trembling), a famous mountain in Armenia, on which Noah's ark is said to have rested after the deluge, Gen. viii, 4. It is affirmed, but without any good proof, that some remains of Noah's ark are still to be seen upon the top of this mountain. John Struis, in his voyages, assures us, that he went up to the highest part of it; and that a hermit who abode there, declared to him, that some broken pieces of the ark were still to be seen there; and at the same time presented him with a cross made out of the wood, belonging to this famous vessel. But M. de Tournefort, who was upon the spot, assures us, that there was nothing of the kind to be seen there; that the top of Mount Ararat is inaccessible, both by reason of its great height, and of the snow which perpetually covers it. This mountain is situated twelve leagues east of Erivan, in a vast plain, having no other mountain near it on either side. Josephus says (Ant. lib. x, c. 2), that the remains of Noah's ark were still to be seen in his time, in the canton of Adiabene, called Cœron, a country remarkable for producing great plenty of cinnamon.

That part of the mountain of Ararat, whereon the ark rested, is called by many of the Eastern nations, Ardag, or Parmah-dagh, the finger mountain, because it stands upright by itself like a finger, when held up. It is so high, as to be seen at the distance of ten days' journey, according to the stages of the caravan. The city of Tauris is near this mount. Tavernier says, that there are many monasteries upon mount Ararat; that the Armenians call it the resoussar, because the ark stopped there. It is, as it were, taken off from the other mountains of Armenia, which make a long chain, and from the middle to the top of it, is often covered with snow for three or four months in the year.—Calmet's Dictionary.

Aroad, Arphad, or Arpad (the light of redemption), and the Aradus of the Greeks and Romans, is a rocky island, not above a mile in compass, and about twenty furlongs from the continent. It is not improbably thought to be so named from one of the sons of Canaan, since we find him reckoned among the descendants of Canaan, the Aroadite. It seemed to the eye (says Mr. Maundrel) to be not above three or four furlongs long, and was wholly filled up with tall buildings like castles. The ancient inhabitants of this island were famous for navigation, and had a command upon the continent as far as Gabala; and it was anciently surrounded with a strong wall, consisting of stones of an immense site; which so exactly tallied and corresponded with each other, as in many other instances of the ancient building, that the architect might very justly estimate the weight and symmetry alone of its materials, without cramps and mortar, to have been sufficient to withstand the violence of the sea, and the engines of an enemy. During the time of its prosperity both art and nature seem to have conspired in making it a place of such strength and consequence, as sufficiently to justify the boast, "Where is the king of Arphad?" which Sennacherib made in the conquest of it, 2 Kings xix, 13. The Turks at present call this island Rom wadde.

CHARACTER OF THE ARABS,

ILLUSTRATING GEN. XVI, 12.

The Arabians have always been commended by the ancients for their fidelity, and they are still scrupulously exact to their word. They have however their vices and defects: they are naturally addicted to war, bloodshed, and cruelty, and so malicious, as scarcely ever to forget an injury. Their frequent robberies committed on traders and travellers, have rendered the name of an Arab almost infamous in Europe: so faithful has been the prophecy, "their hands shall be against every man, and every man's against them." Amongst themselves, however, they are most honest and true to the rites of hospitality: towards those whom they receive into their camp every thing is open: enter but once into the tent of an Arab, and by the pressure of his hand he ensures you protection, at the hazard even of his life: he is ever true to his bread and his salt; once eat with him, and a knot of friendship is tied which cannot easily be loosened. Hospitality was ever habitual to them: at this day, the greatest reproach to an Arab tribe is, "that none of their men have the heart to give." Nor does this feeling of liberality extend to those only of high birth, the poor and wandering Bedouin is often known to practise a degree of charity far beyond his means, from a sense of duty alone. The love of country discoverable in the wildest tenant of the most barren rock, is not felt by the wandering Arab; he roves from district to district, from pasture to pasture, without any local attachment, and his sole delight is his irregular, predatory life. Many of the elder chiefs plan new expeditions with as much glee, as if they were but just beginning life, instead of tottering on the brink of death. But notwithstanding all his savageness, there are sometimes noble thoughts seen to cross over his powerful mind, and then again to leave him choked up with weeds of too strong a growth to be rooted out.

Their fondness for the traditional history of their ancestors is proverbial. Professed story-tellers are the appendages to a man of rank: his friends will assemble before his tent, to listen night after night to a continued history, for sometimes sixty nights together; it is a great exercise of genius, and a peculiar gift held in high estimation among them. They have a quickness and clearness of delivery, with a perfect command of words, surprising to an European ear. Their descriptions are highly poetical, their extempore songs are also full of fire, and possess many beautiful and happy similes. Arabic songs go to the heart, and greatly excite the passions. Certain of their tribes are highly celebrated for this gift of extempore speaking and singing, and it is often possessed to an astonishing degree, by men unable either to read or write. Many of these children of the desert possess intelligence and feeling which belong not to the savage, accompanied by an heroic courage, and a thorough contempt of every mode of gaining a livelihood, except by the sword and gun. They value themselves chiefly on their expertness in arms, horsemanship, and hospitality: irritable and fiery, their common conversation appears to be one continued strife; they are however brave, eloquent, and deeply sensible of shame.—Denham and Clapperton's Africa.

PROGRESS OF THE SCIENCES.

The first savages collected in the forests a few nourishing fruits, a few salutary roots, and thus supplied their most immediate wants. The first shepherds observed that the stars moved in a regular course, and made use of them to guide their journeys across the plains of the desert. Such was the origin of the mathematical and physical sciences. Once convinced that it could combat nature by the means which she herself afforded, genius reposed no more, it watched her without relaxation, it incessantly made new conquests over her, all of them distinguished by some improvement in the situation of our race. From that time a succession of conducting minds, faithful depositories of the attainments already made, constantly occupied in connecting them, in vivifying them by means of each other, have conducted us, in less than forty ages, from the first essays of rude observers, to the profound calculations of Newton and La Place, to the learned classifications of Linnæus and Jussieu. This precious inheritance, perpetually increasing, brought from Chaldea into Egypt, from Egypt into Greece, concealed during ages of disaster and of darkness, recovered in more fortunate times, unequally spread among the nations of Europe, has everywhere been followed by wealth and power; the nations which have reaped it are become the mistresses of the world; such as have neglected it, are fallen into weakness and obscurity.—Curtis's Lectures on the Physiology of the Ear.

ON THE DEATH OF A CHRISTIAN MINISTER.

Whilst o'er his lov'd remains his kindred weep,
And sorrowing friends Death's solemn vigils keep,
To chase the gloom let memory wake, and cast
A beam to cheer the present from the past.
In life's pursuits 'twas his blest path to shine,
A chosen servant of his Lord divine:
A messenger of peace, to him 'twas given
To prove the care, and point the way to heaven.
Throughout his course with glowing zeal to trace
And publish wide a Saviour's wond'rous grace.
His journey thus amidst life's chequer'd way,
Honoured and blest has gently past away,
And long shall those who best his worth could tell,
Feel the sad silence of death's long farewell.
Be this his meed, and this his record high,
To live was to be lov'd, and great his gain to die.
Calm sleep his dust, to earth's cold breast resign'd,
Death's dark dominion cannot chain the mind;
Ah! thought sublime, his soul has burst its clod,
And stands exultant near the throne of God.

SCRIPTURAL KNOWLEDGE IN CEYLON.

This large and populous island, (nearly as large as Ireland) has long been a scene of the labours of Methodist Missionaries. Their operations have been crowned with considerable success, and the Spirit of grace appears to have been poured forth richly both upon the Missionaries and their hearers. The Rev. Benjamin Clough, on his recent returning to Ceylon, says, in a letter to the Committee of the Bible Society,—

"I am very glad to find the Committee are so well disposed to encourage the completion of the version of the Old Testament in Ceylon, or Indo-Portugese; and that being a task which I have proposed to myself, should it please God to spare my life, I will see it done free of all expense to the Committee. I have been much gratified, ever since my arrival in England, at receiving, from various sources in Ceylon, the most unequivocal testimonies in favour of the New Testament which I had completed before I left, and of the great anxiety of the people, for whom it was designed, to possess it. They are, in fact, a people whose situation is very affecting: they form what is called the Bergher Population, and, in all its grades, are very numerous all over the country: there must be, I think, from 15,000 and upwards in Colombo alone. Great numbers of them are renouncing the errors of popery; and the change has been effected solely by reading the New Testament.

"I was greatly pleased to hear of your munificent liberality, in the grant of a fresh supply of printing paper; and I do hope God will continue most abundantly to replenish your stores. The Bible in Ceylon is, I am satisfied, working a great change in the views and feelings of the heathen. Formerly, the priests and others felt but little at its circulation: this must have arisen, I suppose, from an ignorance of its character: but since the people got a more extensive supply of its sacred contents in their own familiar style of language, and the effects of their reading it became apparent to the priests—and since, also, the priests have themselves ascertained its uncompromising character, namely, that it allows of no religion but what is revealed in itself—they have taken the alarm, and have endeavoured in various ways to thwart its circulation, and oppose us in our labours in giving the people the word of God. But the matter has gone too far, and this they now see; for in our schools alone, in the southern districts of Ceylon, we have, by the blessing of God, raised up in the midst of the population, not less than 30,000 Native Christian Readers, who do read, and will read, in spite of all the opposition of the heathen!"

THE CHRISTIAN NOT ALONE.

Although depress'd by sin and woe,
A wandering exile here below,
My Heavenly Father hears each groan,
And tells me I am not alone.

Though left by every earthly friend
On whom I thought I could depend,
And though to all the world unknown,
I still can say I'm not alone.

What though my kindred round me die,
And every earthly comfort fly,
I'll take my seat near Mercy's throne,
And say that I am not alone.

When passing Jordan's stormy sea
My Lord will bear me company;
His worthless child He'll ne'er disown,
Nor tell me I am left alone.

SINGULAR DELIVERANCE FROM HIGHWAYMEN.

A very singular providence occurred to Mr. Cecil on his going from London to Lewes, to serve his churches. Instead of his leaving town early in the morning, the farrier, who shod his horse, detained him till noon, in consequence of which he did not arrive at East Grinstead Common till after it was dark. On this common he met a man who appeared to be intoxicated, and ready to fall from his horse at every step. Mr. Cecil called to him, and warned him of his danger; which the man disregarding, with his usual benevolence he rode up to him, in order to prevent his falling, when the man immediately seized the reins of Mr. Cecil's horse, who perceiving he was in bad hands, endeavoured to break away, on which the man threatened to knock him down if he repeated the attempt. Three other men on horseback immediately rode up, placing Mr. Cecil in the midst of them. On perceiving his danger, it struck him—"Here is an occasion of faith!" and that gracious declaration also occurred to him—"Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee." He secretly lifted up his heart to God, entreating that deliverance which He alone could effect. One of the men, who seemed to be captain of the gang, asked him who he was, and whither he was going. Mr. Cecil here recurred to a principle to which his mind was habituated, that "Nothing needs a lie." He therefore told them very frankly his name, and whither he was going. The leader said, "Sir, I know you, and have heard you preach at Lewes. Let the gentleman's horse go: we wish you good night."—Cecil's Remains.

TAME FISHES.

A farmer of Aberdeen brought home a young seal, and fed it for three days with bread and milk. His wife disliking its presence, it was taken out of the town, by the man and some friends, and thrown into the sea; but it returned to them notwithstanding every effort to repel it. The tallest of them then walked into the sea as far as he safely could, and threw it into the waves while they hid themselves behind a rock; but the animal again advanced to land, and found them out in their hiding place, and remained with them, till the farmer took it back once more to his house.—Bingley, p. 100.

In Otaheite eels are great favourites, and are tamed and fed until they attain an enormous size. These pets are kept in large holes two or three feet deep, partially filled with water. On the sides of these pits they generally remained, except when called by the person who fed them. I have been several times with the young chief, when he has sat down by the side of the hole; and by giving a shrill sort of whistle has brought out an enormous eel, which has moved about the surface of the water, and eaten with confidence out of his master's hands.—Ellis's Polynesian Researches.

A pike in a pond at Ely became so tame, as to follow the waving of a pocket handkerchief.

A Mental Victory.—Human nature has not a sharper spur than the desire of revenge; therefore, to forget it, is one of the most generous actions of the mind.

HINDOO TEMPLE AND PAGODA AT GYA, IN THE NORTH OF INDIA.

THE TEMPLE OF VISHNOO, AT GYA.

DIA becomes every year more interesting to the ople of Great Britain, on account of its immense ex- nt—its prodigious wealth—and its political import- ce in relation to the other great empires of Asia. e renewal of the "Company's Charter," with im- ovements in the British policy towards that country, d the opening of a more direct communication with at distant region, through Egypt, by the Red Sea, or rough Syria, by the river Euphrates, will render it ll more interesting. But the millions of its wretched pulation—their abject superstition—their abominable olatries—and their consequent moral degradation, iefly affect the heart of the Christian Philanthropist ery new arrangement in favour of India, it is hoped ll be attended with increasing facilities for the effu- m of the light of the knowledge of the glory of God Jesus Christ. We rejoice to be assured that such the benevolent disposition of the British Govern- ent.

The Temple of Vishnoo at Gya, in the province of har, in the north of India, is one of the most celebrated by the Bramins, who derive their support from its wicked delusions. Gya is visited annually by thousands of pilgrims, who resort thither in the superstitious hope of procuring the salvation of their deceased relations, by their own meritorious mortifications, and by their devotions paid to the idols in the sacred temple. This building is a modern edifice; but the adjoining pagoda is comparatively ancient. This gorgeous edifice, with its numerous spiral ornaments, is said to be covered with solid gold. Priestcraft has celebrated its sanctity, by declaring that, under the centre of the dome, is a print of the foot of the god Vishnoo. This impression is at the bottom of a cavity, about twelve or fifteen inches below the surface, and it is pretended to have been made by the stepping of this deity on the granite stone, when passing from hill to hill. Ignorant superstition has so honoured this particular part of the floor, that it has been cased with silver, at an expense of about 30,000 rupees, or 3,250*l*.

Officers of the Government, both Hindoos and Mohammedans, are stationed here, to collect the taxes paid by the pilgrims, and to serve as a police, in defence of those who visit the temple. Some of the priests are supported by salaries paid out of these taxes, while others live on the offerings, which their avarice extorts from the devotees. The Rev. Thomas Morris, one of the Missionaries of the Church Missionary Society, having passed three months at Gya, had an opportunity of witnessing the superstitions of the wretched pilgrims. He says, "I saw many poor creatures who had travelled a thousand miles at least; and who, in their journey, endured privations of every kind."

The British government, with a view to diminish the number of pilgrims resorting to this and other like sacred places, laid a tax upon each: but instead of diminishing, this policy has promoted an increase of their numbers, the practice being thus publicly sanctioned. An intelligent writer observes, "At Gya, the British Government have an agent who levies this tax on each pilgrim according to the magnitude of the ceremonies he has to perform; for visiting one place $2\frac{1}{8}$ rupees, two places $3\frac{3}{4}$, thirty-eight places $4\frac{3}{16}$, forty-five places $14\frac{1}{8}$ rupees. In this, as in all systems of superstition, the duty to government and other necessary expenses form but a small part of what the poor devotee is compelled to pay; the priests always fleece off all his ready money, and not unfrequently extort promissory notes, which their agents compel him to honour when he returns home. Formerly it was customary for the priest to keep the thumbs of the votary tied together, till he promised to give such a sum as was considered proportionate to his circumstances; but this the British have abolished, and no one can be forced now to give the priest more than he chooses. The pilgrims to this sacred shrine have been gradually increasing; in 1801 the number amounted to 22,732; in 1811 to 31,114; the amount of the collections in 1814-15, was 229,805 sicca rupees, or 23,379*l.*!

Mr. Ward, in his "History of the Hindoos," gives an account of the proceedings of those who visit Gya, and other places of the same description:—

"When a person resolves to visit any of these places, he fixes on an auspicious day; and, two days preceding the commencement of his journey, has his head shaved; the next day he fasts; the following day he performs the shraddhu of the three preceding generations of his family on both sides, and then leaves his house. If a person acts according to the Shaster (sacred book), he observes the following rules: Till he returns to his own house, he eats rice which has not been wet in cleansing, and that only once a day—he abstains from anointing his body with oil, and from eating fish—if he rides in a palanquin, or in a boat, he loses half the benefits of his pilgrimage—if he walks on foot, he obtains the full advantage of it. The last day of his journey he fasts."

The ceremonies of the Temple are thus described by Mr. Ward:—

"On his arrival at the sacred spot, the pilgrim has his whole body shaved; after which, he performs the shraddhu (offering). It is necessary that he stay seven days, at least, at the holy place: he may continue as much longer as he pleases. Every day during his stay he bathes, pays his devotions to the images, sits before them and repeats their names, and worships them, presenting such offerings as he can afford. In bathing, he makes kooshu-grass images for his relations, and bathes them. When he is about to return, he obtains some of the offerings which have been presented to the idol or idols, and brings them home to give to his friends and neighbours: these consist of sweetmeats, flowers, toolusee leaves, the ashes of cow-dung, &c. After celebrating the shraddhu, he entertains the Bramins, and presents them with oil, fish, and all those things from which he has abstained. Having done this, he returns to his former course of living. Besides the benefits arising to his relations, the reward promised to the pilgrim is, that he shall ascend to the heaven of that god who presides at the holy place which he has visited."

Having performed the prescribed ceremonies, and pillaged of their money by the crafty and rapacious priests, the miserable dupes set out on their return home, without the means perhaps of purchasing a morsel of rice: so that from want of food, the fatigue of a long journey, and exposure to bad weather, many thousands perish annually on the road, leaving the guilt of their blood, in a great measure, upon the heads of their sacerdotal deceivers! Nor are the members of the British Government altogether guiltless in supporting such a system of imposture, impurity, and blood! We rejoice that Christians in England are making appeals to the Government to leave the accursed system to its own resources; that the priests may receive no salary for their abominable impositions; and that the people may be instructed in the doctrines of life everlasting, by the faithful servants of Christ.

THE POPULATION OF INDIA.

The following estimate of the extent and population of the territories now included in British India, has just been published by Parliament.

	Square Miles.	Population.
Presidency of Bengal	220,312	69,710,071
Districts, the population of which is doubtful	85,700	—
Madras	$141,923\frac{1}{2}$......	13,508,535
Bombay	$59,438\frac{1}{4}$......	6,251,546
Districts, the population of which is doubtful....	5,550	—
	$512,923\frac{3}{4}$......	89,470,152

The population of the doubtful districts, situated on the Nerbudda in Berar and Concan, is probably not large; so that the whole will not much exceed ninety millions. The territory of the allied or protected, that is the subject states, is estimated at 614,610 square miles; their population, however, is not supposed nearly equal to that of the territories under the immediate government of the Company. Mr. Hamilton, in the second edition of his Gazetteer, estimates it as follows:—

	Population.
The Nizam	10,000,000
The Nagpoor Rajah	3,000,000
The King of Oude..........	3,000,000
The Guickwar	2,000,000
The Satara Rajah	1,500,000
The Mysore Rajah..	3,000,000
Travancore and Cochin	1,000,000
Kotah, Boondee, and Bopaul	1,500,000
Rajpoot and other petty States	15,000,000
	40,000,000

The same gentleman makes the following conjecture as to the states that still remain independent.

	Population.
Sindia	4,000,000
Lahore, Rajah Runjeet Singh ....,.	3,000,000
Sinde	1,000,000
Nepaul	2,000,000
Cashmere, and other districts belonging to the King of Cabul	1,000,000
	11,000,000

This would give for the whole of India a population of upwards of one hundred and forty millions.

THOUGHTS ON THE SACRED HISTORY OF THE CREATION.

(Abridged from Dr. Sharon Turner's valuable work.)

THE Sacred History of the World is built on the grand truth expressed in the first verse of the Pentateuch:—"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." This is the foundation of all religion, whether popular or philosophical. The intellectual world possesses an invaluable treasure in this simple but emphatic information. It is invaluable, because it is a fact which could certainly only be known to us from revelation, as no human eye could have witnessed the event; and because the greatest men of antiquity were in doubt and darkness, and in opposition to each other on this subject, as we should still be if the book of Genesis had not descended to us.

Instead of deriving the world from God, it was more common among the classical nations to derive their gods from the world. Several pagan nations, even in our own times, thus account for their existence: few have thought the Deity to be the Creator of the earth or of the heavens; and the mind had become so confused on the point, that it was more generally supposed that they were either eternally what they were then seen to be, or that they had been created by a fortuitous concourse of self-moving atoms. Such ideas were highly patronized in ancient times; and until Christianity diffused the knowledge and authenticity of the Mosaic records as to the origin of things, nothing was positively known or rationally believed about it. The more we investigate the conflicting and chimerical opinions of mankind on this great topic, the more we shall appreciate the first chapter of Genesis. On no subject of its thought has the human mind been more fantastic, than in its suppositions on the origin of the gods whom it chose to worship, and of the material world in which it was residing. Revelation has banished these, by giving us the desirable certainty.

The process of creation in the primitive construction of our earth, has not been detailed by the Hebrew legislator. He mentions no more of its massive composition than this short sentence: "The earth was without form and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." The earth was "without form;" it had therefore to be put into form; its material substance had been created, but not arranged into any specific formation: it was also "void," that is, empty, vacant of all that now adorns its surface, or that was afterwards made within it: it had to receive and be replenished with all those additional and organized things and beings, or more specific metals and minerals, which were intended to be within and upon it. As "darkness was upon the face of the deep," there was in its primeval state a deeper abyss, a vast obscure concavity; and as "the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters," its surface must have been covered with the sea. Thus the first state of our earth which is noticed to us after the general creation, is that of a dark mass unformed and void, and an abyss within, and whose surface was moving waters, but on which the Divine Spirit was operating. The effects of this operation are not stated: but we may presume them to have been the production of those arrangements which constitute its present structure, its great masses of rock and strata, its geological system and construction.

At this point of time, when its specific composition was taking place, the Divine command was issued for the appearance of light. The introduction of this grand agent of the creative process is mentioned with that sublimity of diction which arises from the conciseness of dignity—"And God said, Light be: and light was." It came instantaneously, pouring on and pervading the terrestrial mass; and the operations of this beautiful element, whose penetrating, universal, and marvellous agencies are yet so little understood, fulfilled its Author's wishes: "God saw the light, that it was good."

From light we cannot separate the recollection and companionship of heat: they are now found to be so generally co-existing, that they are thought to be modifications of the same element. Fire is luminous heat, or heat in the state of light: the sun's light has the effect of both heat and light. All flame from all combustible bodies, our domestic fires, volcanic light, the electrical lightning, all these exhibit both light and heat. The Hebrew word used by Moses expresses both light and fire. The interior of the earth, as far as it is yet known, exhibits everywhere the agency of light and heat, either in their combined operations of fire, or in other modifications. Submarine volcanoes are still occasionally bursting up as indications of the fiery agencies yet acting beneath our surface. Thus the Mosaic record expresses the true principles of our geological formations. They have proceeded from the action of the water or the fiery element, or are the alternate effects of each. We learn from the book of Genesis, that these were active agents at the very commencement of creation. Water began its operations as the Spirit of the Creator directed: light descended immediately afterwards, and with its attendants, heat and fire, exerted its powerful agencies. Thus the great scientific truth, after many contending systems have been overthrown, that both the watery and fiery elements were actively concerned in the geological construction of our earth, is indicated by the Mosaic narration, instead of being inconsistent with it.

The next act of the Deity was to make a boundary or division between the visible presence or action of light and that darkness which arises from its disappearance—calling the one day, and its absence night. Their succession was made to constitute that portion of time which we designate by a natural day: "the evening and the morning were the first day." Our earthly day is that space of time in which our globe turns once completely round. This section of time does not depend upon the sun, nor arise from it: being only a rotation of the earth, it could occur as well without a solar orb as with one. The annual circuit, or a year, which is the completed orbit of the earth round this luminary, could not take place without a sun; but a day requires the existence and revolving motion of the earth alone. This is mentioned by Moses as beginning before the sun was made the centre of our astronomical system: and as this fact denotes the diurnal movement to be distinct from and independent of the sun, it is another instance of the correctness of the Mosaic account. The first rotation of the earth round its own axis made the interval of the first day; and each subsequent revolution constituted the several days that succeeded: nor can rational conjecture assign any reason for this daily movement, except the commanding will and exerted power of the Divine Creator. Nor is it a mere revolution alone which makes our day; but it is a revolution with that particular, specifically assigned, and limited yet marvellous velocity, with which it has ever been performed. To occupy that portion of time which composes our day, it must move precisely and with constant, undeviating exactness, at the rate of about one thousand miles an hour, or above sixteen miles every minute—a stupendous celerity for a massy globe nearly eight thousand miles in diameter! A greater velocity would make our day so much the shorter; a slower progress would as much prolong it: but this revolving progress has been continued for nearly six thousand years with a precision which has never varied and although it is desirable to refer all phenomena to natural causes whenever they can be discerned, yet for the performance and limitation of this amazing rotation no other origin can be alleged than the Divine choice and ordination. The two largest of the other planets roll round their axes in about half the time that our earth takes; and so might we have done; but for purposes unrevealed to us, but most probably in special adaptation to the nature, formation, and benefit of all the beings that have been created on it, and to the fittest action and succession of light and heat, it revolves as it does. And one of the most satisfactory evidences to our admiring reason, that our earthly system is not a medley combination of accidents, but the composition and arrangement of an intelligent Creator, arises from that universal adaptation of all its parts and movements to each other, and to the agencies and welfare of the whole, which become the more manifest to our enlightened judgment, the more they are studied and understood.

EXTRAORDINARY DEVELOPMENT OF MIND IN INSECTS.

It is in the habits of those insects which live in societies that we perceive the most remarkable demonstrations of even intelligent intellect; for what other term can we justly apply to that faculty within them, which leads or enables them to form political communities, with established governments, sovereignties, social ranks, and appropriated occupations; and also producing regulations, or exacted habits of conduct, resembling those enforced by human laws and policies? What seemed poetry in Virgil, as to the bees, has been found to be only a part of the truth as to their associations. The diminutive ants are still more extraordinary. The wasps display kindred mind and habits. It is not possible to read of the wars of the ants or of the bees, to find them assemble in armies, make evolutions, and fight pitched battles, and to deny them a similarity of mind with those of their superiors[], who have soldiers, tactics, and wars. That ants have slaves, and make expeditions to reduce them to servitude[†]; that they should keep smaller insects, the aphides, in order that they may milk them, or extract from their bodies a saccharine fluid for their own nourishment, as we take the milk from cows[‡]; and that they should keep assemblages of them as their separate and private property[§]: such actions and habits are too like our own, not to be considered those of the reasoning mind, not very dissimilar to that which we possess. All species of the ants, petty as they are in size and appearance, perform actions, possess and preserve institutions, and display faculties and capacities, which seem on the whole not to be inferior to those of any of the animal orders; indeed superior perhaps to what is known of any. One kind of these are peculiarly useful to mankind in consuming animal and dead matter, which in warmer climates would become a pestilential putridity[].—Sharon Turner's History of the World.

[*] On the wars of the bees and wasps, see Insect Miscellany, p. 322—531.

[†] "They will sometimes travel one hundred and fifty paces to attack a Negro colony." Ib. 83. The slaves are well used; being so entirely dependent as these masters are upon their slaves for every necessary comfort and enjoyment of life, can scarcely be supposed to treat them with rigour or unkindness. So far from this, it is evident, from the preceding account, that they rather look up to them, and are in some degree under their control.

[‡] Kirby, p. 97. It is on this process that Linnæus, who has also noted it, says, "The ant ascends the tree, that it may milk its cows, the aphides, not kill them." Syst. Nat. 292, 3, Inst. Linn.

[§] Ants make a property of these cows, for which they contend with great earnestness. Kirby, p. 89. "The greatest cow keeper of all the ants is the yellow ant of gold, F. flava. This species, which is not fond of roaming from home, usually collects in its nest a large herd of a kind of aphis, that derives its nutriment from grass and other plants. These it transports from the neighbouring roots, and thus, without going out, it has always a copious supply of food: these creatures share its care, equally with its own offspring."—Kirby, 39.

[*] The termites, or white ants, are peculiarly active and serviceable in this respect. Nor is there any set of insects whose economy is more perfect; they exist together in kingdoms, and build cities, which are extremely populous. Mr. Smeathman has described the bellicosus species in the Philosophical Transactions, from his observation of them in Africa. They build a cone rounded at the top, four feet high, and of great extent. The walls are of clay, and so strong as to bear the weight of the heaviest animals. These contain vast departments. That in the centre, is for the queen and her attendants, who are scarcely fewer than a hundred thousand. They exist in the classes or forms of labourers and soldiers. When their cities are broken open, the soldiers march out with impetuosity, and attack every thing that comes in their way. Wherever they strike, they draw blood, and frequently beat off the bare-legged Negroes. As soon as an assailant is withdrawn, the labourers issue forth in prodigious numbers to bury them.—Phil. Trans. vol. lxxi, p. 139.

DR. BARROW ON THE PROPER USE OF RICHES.

Many persons glory in being rich, and their chief happiness appears to consist in contemplating the increase of their property above the wealth of their neighbours. Dr. Barrow's observations on this species of insanity are worthy of consideration.

"If we contemplate our wealth itself, we may therein descry great motives to bounty. Thus to employ our riches, is really the best use they are capable of; not only the most innocent, most worthy, most plausible; but the most safe, most pleasant, most advantageous, and consequently in all respects most prudent way of disposing of them. To keep them close, without using or enjoying them at all, is a most sottish extravagance or a strange kind of madness: a man thence affecting to be rich, quite impoverisheth himself, dispossesseth himself of all, and alienateth from himself his estate: his gold is no more his than when it was in the Indies, or lay hid in the mines; his corn is no more his than if it stood growing in Arabia or China; he is no more owner of his lands than he is master of Jerusalem or Grand Cairo: for what difference is there, whether distance of place or baseness of mind sever these things from him?—whether his own heart or another man's hand detain them from his use?—whether he hath them not at all, or hath them to no purpose?—whether one is a beggar out of necessity, or by choice?—is pressed to want, or a volunteer thereto? Such a one may fancy himself rich, and others, as wise as himself, may repute him so; but so distracted persons to themselves and to one another do seem great princes, and style themselves such: with as much reason almost he might pretend to be wise and good.

"Riches are (chremata, in the Greek) things whose nature consists in usefulness; abstract that, they become nothing, things of no consideration or value; he that hath them is no more concerned in them than he that hath them not. It is the heart, and skill to use affluence of things wisely and nobly, which makes it wealth, and constitutes him rich that hath it; otherwise the chests may be crammed, and the barns stuffed full, while the man is miserably poor and beggarly: 'tis in this sense true which the wise man says, 'There is that maketh himself rich, yet hath nothing.'"

NEGRO SLAVERY IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

AMERICA has worthily engaged the contemplation of intelligent and pious persons, especially during the last ten years, on account of the progress of knowledge and scriptural religion among its population. Reports of the prosperity of the United States, have induced multitudes from most parts of Europe to hasten to their shores, that they might share in the promised blessings of that amazing country. Many have succeeded in their emigrating speculations: while others have been plunged into the deepest distress, probably, in most instances, from their own imprudence. No Christian in Britain can feel uninterested in a country, whose Bible Society establishment can print 800,000 copies of the Bible in a year, which is at the rate of about five Bibles per minute! And this we are informed is done at the American Bible Society's printing offices in New York! May this glorious work continue to advance and prosper, to the perfect regeneration of the whole population of the United States!

Notwithstanding our admiration of much that exists in America, especially in the middle and in the northern states, we are shocked at the continuance of Negro slavery in the southern states; and we believe that it is, as a friend in Philadelphia says, in a letter a few months ago, "Negro Slavery is a curse in our country!"

James Stuart, Esq. in a book recently published, entitled, "Three Years in North America," says, "The following extract of a letter from a gentleman of Charleston, to a friend of his at New York, published in the New York newspapers while I was there, contains even a more shocking account of the public sales of slaves here:—'Curiosity sometimes leads me to the auction sales of Negroes. A few days since I attended one which exhibited the beauties of slavery in all their sickening deformity. The bodies of these wretched beings were placed upright on a table, their physical proportions examined, their defects and beauties noted. 'A prime lot, here they go!' There I saw the father looking with sullen contempt on the crowd, and expressing an indignation in his countenance that he dare not speak; and the mother, pressing her infant closer to her bosom with an involuntary grasp, and exclaiming, in wild and simple earnestness, while the tears chased down her cheeks in quick succession, 'I can't leff my children! I won't leff my children!' But on the hammer went, reckless alike whether it united or sundered for ever. On another stand I saw a man apparently as white as myself exposed for sale,—I turned away from the humiliating spectacle.

'At another time I saw the concluding scene of this infernal drama. It was on the wharf. A slave ship for New Orleans was lying in the stream, and the poor Negroes, handcuffed and pinioned, were hurried off in boats, eight at a time. Here I witnessed the last farewell,—the heart-rending separation of every earthly tie. The mute and agonizing embrace of the husband and wife, and the convulsive grasp of the mother and the child, who were alike torn asunder for ever! It was a living death,—they never see or hear of each other more! Tears flowed fast, and mine with the rest.'"

Charleston has long been celebrated for the severity of its laws against the blacks, and the mildness of its punishments towards the whites for maltreating them. Until the late law, there were about seventy-one crimes for which slaves were capitally punished, and for which the highest punishment for whites was imprisonment in the penitentiary!

In Georgia, "In case any slave or free person of colour teach any other slave or free person of colour to read or write, either written or printed characters, the free person of colour or slave is punished by fine or whipping; and a white person so offending is punished with a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, and imprisonment in the common gaol. Any slave or free person of colour, or any other person, circulating papers, or bringing into this State, or aiding in any manner in bringing into the State, papers exciting to insurrection, conspiracy, or resistance, any of the slaves or free persons of colour, against their owners or the citizens, is to be punished with death."

"Cutting off the ears, and the pillory, are punishments for slaves sanctioned by the legislature of Georgia; but the universal punishment is whipping. The infliction of this punishment, to the extent of twenty lashes on the bare back, is deemed, in a great variety of cases, of insufficient moment to claim the intervention even of a single magistrate. Any white person, a drunken patrol, an absconding felon, or a vagabond mendicant, is supposed to possess discretion enough to interpret the laws, and to weild the cow-skin or cart-whip for their infraction; and should death ensue by accident, while the slave is thus receiving moderate correction, the Constitution of Georgia kindly denominates the offence justifiable homicide!"

While sitting in the portico at Halifax (N. Carolina) where they stopped to change horses, Mr. Stuart was accosted by a gentleman, who inquired of him what was the number of slaves for sale at the court-house that day; as in England a person would ask the price of corn, or of the stocks, Mr. Stuart says:—"I explained his mistake to him, and I then asked him some questions with respect to the slave market here. He said, the price generally given for a young man, was 375 dollars, though for the best hands, 400 dollars were sometimes given; that 250 dollars was the price given for a fine young woman, until after she had her first child; after which she became more valuable, as she was then more to be depended on for increasing the stock. He never, he said, separated husband and wife, but some people did separate them, as well as children, and then they had a crying scene; that was all!"

Anecdotes, with which we cannot defile our pages, are given by Mr. Stuart, in illustration of the state of morals induced by slavery in both the whites and blacks. In one conversation at which he was present, "it turned out, that the planter was frequently waited upon at table by his own children, and had actually sent some of them to the public market to be sold as slaves!"

MENTAL CONFLICTS NECESSARY TO SPIRITUAL IMPROVEMENT.

I have heard him mention with much feeling many deep and secret conflicts of mind while at College: added to which, he had to meet many insults which profligate men offer to piety. Under these impressions he was one day walking in the physic gardens, where he observed a very fine pomegranate tree cut almost through the stem. On asking the gardener the reason of this, "Sir," said he, "this tree used to shoot so strong, that it bore nothing but leaves. I was obliged therefore to cut it in this manner; and when it is almost cut through, it will bear plenty of fruit."—The gardener's explanation conveyed a striking illustration to Mr. Cecil's mind, and he went back to his rooms comforted and instructed by this image.—Cecil's Remains.

CATHOLIC CHRISTIAN COMMUNION IN AMERICA.

Dr. Symmons, of Jesus college, Oxford, in his eloquent "Life of Milton," written nearly thirty years ago, rising superior to his peculiar prejudices, speaks of religion in America in the following remarkable words: "From Hudson's Bay, with the small interruption of Canada, to the Missisaipi, this immense continent beholds the religion of Jesus, unconnected with the patronage of government, subsisting in independent yet friendly communities, breathing that universal charity which constitutes its vital spirit, and offering, with its distinct yet blending tones, one grand combination of harmony to the ear of its Heavenly Father." P. 415.

This testimony is remarkably illustrated by a passage in a new and interesting work, published this year at Edinburgh, entitled, "Three Years in North America," in two volumes, by James Stuart, Esq., from which we give the following extract: "During my residence in the United States subsequent to this period, I was frequently witness to the good understanding which generally, though doubtless not universally, prevails among clergymen professing different opinions on church forms and doctrinal points in this country; and I occasionally observed notices in the newspapers to the same purpose. The two following I have preserved. 'The cornerstone of a new Baptist church was laid at Savannah in Georgia, and the ceremonial services were performed by the clergymen of the Methodist, German, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Episcopal, and Baptist churches. — The sacrament of the Lord's supper was administered in the Rev. Mr. Post's church (Presbyterian church at Washington), and, as usual, all members of other churches in regular standing were invited to unite with the members of that church, in testifying their faith in, and love to, their Lord and Saviour. The invited guests assembled around the table; and it so happened, that Mr. Grundy, a senator from Tenessee, and two Cherokee Indians, were seated side by side.' "

RELIGIOUS STATISTICS OF AMERICA.

"From statistical accounts published in 1829 we learn, that the congregations in the United States amounted to about 15,000, of which there were,

Presbyterians	2,253
Congregationalists (in union with the foregoing)	960
Baptists, mostly Calvinists	3,723
Methodists, about	2,500
Episcopalians	598
Quakers	1,000
Lutheran and Reformed	1,350
Roman Catholics	1,000
Other denominations	1,240

"Recent information makes the number considerably more, of almost every denomination. The New York Baptist Repository states, there are 'not less than 308 associations, 6,129 churches, 4,080 ministers, and 408,846 actual members, of the Baptists in the United States!

"From these tables we learn the astonishing increase of the professors of religion in America; a subject worthy of our most serious consideration in Great Britain. It is ascertained, that during the last thirteen years, in the state of New York alone, the congregations have been more than doubled: in 1819 they being 716, but in 1832 they were 1,470!

"In a letter from a valued friend, a member of Dr. Cox's church in New York, dated from that city, April 12, 1832, the writer says: 'You wish to know the population of New York city, &c. The last census (1830) made it 220,000: the whole number of churches is 120; viz. Presbyterian, 24; Episcopalian, 23; Methodist, 17; Baptist, 14; Dutch Reformed, 14; Roman Catholic, 5; Friends, 4; Jews, 3; Lutheran, 2; Independent, 2; Universalist, 2; Unitarian, 2; Moravian, 1; Mariners, 1; Miscellaneous, 3: there are also several others of different denominations building and contemplated. The number of clergymen of different denominations are as follows (in the whole state): Presbyterians and Congregationalists, 460; Episcopalians, 143; Baptists, 310; Reformed Dutch, 98; Methodists, 357; Lutherans, 13; other denominations, 89: in all, 1,470.' The foregoing is from a statement published within a few days. It is stated also from another publication, that there are twenty Catholic priests in the state of New York; and that the number of persons over whom they exercise spiritual care averages from 130,000 to 150,000, mostly Irish emigrants."

information on the subject of its title.

"SILENCE IN HEAVEN."

"There was silence in heaven for the space of half an hour." — When the seventh seal was broken, angels were overpowered in presence of their God, and perhaps absorbed with the glories of the scene, having a presentiment of the terrific tempest which followed. Have we ever meditated on the solemnity, the dignity, the awfulness of silence? Have we ever, during the solemn stillness of night robed in her raven mantle, and as it were shrouding beneath its ample fold all the things of this world, — have we then reverted to that awful antedate to time, when all was silent, all destitution, save the deep Spirit of Infinity, "the Great First Cause," which hovers everywhere, yet is nowhere to be found! If we have indulged in the awful and interesting retrospect, why not look prospectively, to the dread day of judgment, when the silence spoken of in Revelation may be realized, — when all the nations and people of the earth shall stand in silent awe before the tribunal of God, — when in the midst of this solemn stillness the recording angel will unfold the awful book in which are recorded the registries, the gloomy catalogue of human guilt. At that dread period, when congregated millions await their final destinies, suspense and breathless anxiety will prevail! Hallelujahs will cease! There will be "silence in heaven for the space of half an hour!"

Death-Bed Testimonies.

COLLECTED BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM BUTTON.

No. V.

THE REV. GEORGE WHITFIELD,

Died suddenly of a fit of the asthma, at Newbury Port in America, at six o'clock of the Lord's day morning, Sep. 30th, 1770.

Funeral Sermon preached the same day in the afternoon by Mr. Jonathan Parsons, minister of the Presbyterian church there, from Phil. i, 21, "For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain."

Funeral Sermon preached in England, at the Tabernacle near Moorfields, Nov. 18th, 1770, by Mr. John Wesley, from Num. xxxiii, 10, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

Mr. Parsons. I shall turn my discourse to the very melancholy and affecting occasion, the sudden and surprising death of the Rev. George Whitfield, who died by a fit of the asthma at six o'clock this morning in my chamber. In him I believe we have the whole of the text exemplified; he could say with the apostle, "For me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." Christ became a principle of spiritual life in his soul whilst he was an under-graduate at the University in Oxford; and if I mistake not, when he was about sixteen years old. Before his conversion, he was a Pharisee of the Pharisees, as strict as ever Paul was before God met him on his way to Damascus, according to his own declaration in his last sermon, which I heard him preach at Exeter, yesterday.

Through a variety of labours and trials, our worthy friend and extensively useful servant of Christ, Mr. Whitfield, passed, both in England and America: but the Lord was his sun to guide and animate him, and his shield to defend and help him unto the end. Neither did he count his life dear, so that he might finish his course with joy, and the ministry that he had received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God. The last sermon that he preached, though under the disadvantage of a stage in the open air, was delivered with such clearness, pathos, and eloquence, as to please and surprise the surrounding thousands; and as he had been confirmed by the grace of God many years before, and had been waiting and hoping for his last change, he then declared, that he hoped it was the last time he should ever preach. Doubtless he had such clear views of the blessedness of open vision, and the complete fruition of God in Christ, that he felt the pleasures of heaven in his raptured soul, which made his countenance shine like the unclouded sun.

Mr. Wesley. A particular account of the last scene of Mr. Whitfield's life is thus given by a gentleman of Boston. After being about a month with us in Boston, and its vicinity, and preaching every day, he went to Old York, preached on Thursday, Sept. 27, there; proceeded to Portsmouth, and preached there on Friday. On Saturday morning he set out for Boston; but before he came to Newbury, where he had engaged to preach the next morning, he was importuned to preach by the way. The house not being large enough to contain the people, he preached in an open field. But having been infirm for several weeks, this so exhausted his strength, that when he came to Newbury, he could not get out of the ferry-boat without the help of two men. In the evening, however, he recovered his spirits, and appeared with his usual cheerfulness. He went to his chamber at nine, his fixed time, which no company could divert him from, and slept better than he had done for some weeks before. He rose at four in the morning, Sept. 30th, and went into his closet; and his companion observed he was unusually long in private. He left his closet, returned to his companion, threw himself on the bed, and lay about ten minutes. Then he fell upon his knees, and prayed most fervently to God, "That if it was consistent with His will, he might that day finish his Master's work." He then desired his man to call Mr. Parsons, the clergyman at whose house he was: but in a minute, before Mr. Parsons could reach him, he died without a sigh or groan.

REFLECTIONS ON DIVERSIFIED SPIRITUAL OPERATIONS.

The different manner in which the various animals must have come to Noah for admission to his ark, may also afford us an instructive lesson. While the antelope and the eagle, instigated by their newly-acquired instinct, hastened rapidly to their new habitation, the snail and the sloth may be supposed to have made their removal thither a very tedious journey. Yet all who were drawn at length came and were saved. So, some among those whom the Spirit of God awakens to a concern about salvation, impelled by fear, or won by love, concur at once in the Gospel proposal, and fly without delay to the cross and are saved. While others, from a variety of natural character, or obstacles interposed, by circumstances of education, station in life, or relative connection, are more tardy in their spiritual motions, and are long before they arrive where only peace and safety can be found. "The sloth," says Goldsmith, "never leaves the tree in which it lives, and on which it feeds, while any thing remains that can serve it for food. When destitute of provisions above, it crawls slowly from branch to branch, in hopes of finding something still left, till it is obliged to encounter all the dangers that attend it below. Though it is formed by nature for climbing a tree with great pain and difficulty, yet it is utterly unable to descend. It is therefore obliged to drop from the branches to the ground; and as it is incapable of exerting itself to break the violence of its descent, it drops like a shapeless heavy mass, and feels no small shock in the fall. Then after remaining some time torpid, it prepares for a journey to some neighbouring tree: but this, of all migrations, is the most tedious, dangerous, and painful: it often takes a week in crawling to a tree not fifty yards distant: it moves with imperceptible slowness, and often baits by the way. All motions seem to torture it; and in every step it takes, it sets forth a most plaintive and melancholy cry." How lively a description of the manner in which some converts move from the Tree of Death, the world, when it fails to afford them comfort any longer, to the Tree of Life, Jesus Christ; of the shock which they receive by the conviction of their lost condition; and of the tardiness, pain, and difficulty with which, through the impediments of nature, they approach Him! Let us observe, that, as God suspended the flood till all were safely housed in the ark who were travelling towards it, however slow their progress—so all who are drawn to Christ will be brought to Him before the last trumpet sounds, and "the door is shut." The feeblest and the weakest believer is as much the object of Divine care, as the strongest of them that fly to Him for succour.—Biddulph's Theology of the early Patriarchs.

Experience gained.—Nothing instructs a man better than his own misfortunes; if he surmounts one, it will arm him against a thousand dangers.

THE GENIUS OF LIFE.

What is Life? 'Tis to exist
As man when first created breath'd;
While he in Eden stood the test,
Ere Sin and Death were yet conceiv'd.
When he was tried, to God he died:
Then pride and poverty had birth,
Then desolation fill'd the earth.

Spirit of the living God!
Thou alone canst change the heart;
Faith in the Redeemer's blood
Bestow, and we shall share a part
In better things than earthly kings
In their pomp and power have known,
When they fill'd the proudest throne.

Thou, who o'er chaotic night
Mov'd, and chas'd the gloom away;
Who spoke at first, and there was light;
Thou must in this latter day
Renew the mind, restore the blind,
The dead in sin Thou must awake:
Spirit! Thy sceptre Thou must take,

And wield it over this dead earth;
As Thou hast promis'd in Thy word,
From west to east, from south to north,
Proclaim that Jesus is the Lord.
The Jew shall kneel, the Greek shall feel,
The nations flock around His throne,
And Sin and Death no more be known.

EASTERN ILLUSTRATION OF I KINGS XVIII, 44.

"Behold, there ariseth a little cloud out of the sea; like a man's hand."

The Turks are supplied with water by large reservoirs in the mountains in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, originally constructed by the Greek emperors. The embankments of these reservoirs are planted with trees, to make them more firm and secure; and persons are prohibited under the severest penalties from taking water therefrom, or digging up any of the trees.

The summer of the year 1822 was remarkably dry, and the water in the reservoirs became low and muddy, and the Turks took the alarm. Judge of the consternation of a whole city, suddenly deprived of an element essential not only for domestic, but religious uses, and having no other possible mode of obtaining it. Prayers were offered up in the mosques, and the sky was anxiously watched. The immutability of things in the east, and the illustrations they give to the writings of former times, is not the least pleasure a person experiences in these countries. The approach of rain is always indicated here, as it was in Syria, by the appearance of a small dark dense cloud hanging over the sea. A dervish stands on the top of the Giant's mountain, and when he sees a cloud he announces its approach, like Elijah from the top of Mount Carmel. I one day followed to the same place, and saw the dervish on the watch, and "I looked towards the sea, and beheld a little cloud rising out of the sea, like a man's hand, and gat me down that the rain stopped me not." In effect, it immediately followed, and the Turks were relieved from a very serious cause of anxiety.—Rev. R. Walsh.

Usefulness of Studies. — Studies are useful only as they tend to some practical purpose in life, and consolation in death. They should tend to the expansion and the government of our own minds, to the benefit and pleasure of our fellow-creatures, and entirely to the glory of God. S. M. H.

"THE GREAT RIVER, THE RIVER EUPHRATES."

Gen. xv, 18.

Commercial and political interests render it desirable to establish an overland route to India. On these accounts various surveys have recently been made of the Red Sea, the river Nile, and the "great river, the river Euphrates." Captain Chesney, of the royal artillery, has recently submitted to the Government "Reports of the Navigation of the Euphrates." The Eclectic Review for March says, "The feasibility of opening the Euphrates for steam navigation, which this gentleman (Captain C.) has satisfactorily established, is a circumstance replete with interest, independently of its importance in connection with an overland communication with India. This venerable river, so long lost to civilization, and scarcely better known to Europeans than the Niger itself, is found to be free from impediments to steam navigation throughout the year up to El Ous, a distance of nine hundred miles; and for nine months of the year is without any serious obstruction as high up as Bir (or Beer), only twenty hours N. E. of Aleppo."

"BECAUSE I LOVE THE CAUSE OF CHRIST."

Sitting with the Committee, at a meeting of the Home Missionary Society a few weeks ago, an extract of a will was read, of a person who died in Gloucestershire, May 7, 1831. The wording of this passage was so beautiful, and the sentiments it contained so correspondent with the principles of a professor of the gospel of Christ, that I was induced to transcribe part of it for the Christian's Penny Magazine. It may induce others to "go and do likewise," of which they will have cause to rejoice through eternal ages.—Tamza.

"Because I love the cause of Christ, I wish not to die without promoting it: I therefore give and bequeath Fifty Pounds to the Treasurer of the London Missionary Society, for the benefit of that Institution; and also the same sum to the Home Missionary Society, for the benefit of that Institution."

ON CHARACTER, AND GENTLENESS.

"We seek in vain for any basis of confidence, where there is no manly firmness, no strength of resolution, no decision of character, no steady uniformity of conduct. A quaint but ingenious author compares such men to osiers, which are unfit to become either pillars in the state or pillars in the church.

"True gentleness is founded on solid principle. It does not resemble the ivy, creeping round a rotten trunk, or a heap of mouldering ruins; but the vine, spreading its beautiful tendrils and ripening clusters along the wall of a stately and substantial mansion. So far is the candid and decided Christian from confounding truth and error, that he carefully sifts and separates them; and after receiving cordially the grand doctrines of the Gospel, he maintains them to the last, whatever abuse and persecution he may incur. This steadfastness, joined with a mild and pleasing condescension, constitutes the strength and beauty of the believer's character. The Christian has a great Master in heaven to serve, and he dares not offend Him by truckling to the wayward humours and low passions of men."

GREENWICH ROYAL HOSPITAL.

Greenwich Hospital, the celebrated asylum of British seamen, the ornament and glory of the empire, is believed to be the most magnificent and splendid fabric in Great Britain. Napoleon Buonaparte is said to have proposed making it his palace, in the event of his succeeding in his projected invasion of England. Happily for the aged mariner, Divine Providence defeated his project of ambition, and this noble pile is still dedicated to benevolence.

Originally, this building was a royal palace, erected by Humphry, Duke of Gloucester; enlarged by Henry VII, and completed by Henry VIII. Greenwich Palace was generally occupied by the latter monarch, as his town residence; and this was the birth-place of our famous Queens, Mary and Elizabeth. After this period, Greenwich Palace became greatly neglected; but Charles II pulled it down, and began another, the first wing of which, that nearest to London, was magnificently finished during his life, at an expense of about 35,000*l.* under the direction of Sir Christopher Wren.

William III and his pious queen Mary took a most lively interest in the British sailors, and they granted Greenwich Palace, with nine acres of land, for a hospital, as an asylum for those aged and infirm seamen, who might be disabled and unfit for service. King William, on the death of his excellent queen, Dec. 28, 1694, determined on extending this new establishment; and having appointed, Oct. 25, 1695, a number of commissioners, for directing the building and endowing the intended hospital, granted a large sum out of his civil list for that purpose. His royal successors were considerable benefactors to this noble work Parliament at length granted annual sums towards finishing this glory of Great Britain, and it was completed in the reign of George II.

Greenwich Hospital consists of four grand divisions corresponding with each other, and though separated, they form one entire plan, leaving a spacious square in the centre. The front to the Thames consists of two ranges of stone buildings, having a terrace along the river of about one thousand feet in length. Those ranges which face the area are built in a more elegant style, having beautiful domes at their ends, which are one hundred and twenty feet high, supported on coupled columns.

Greenwich Hospital Chapel.

Under one of these domes is the Hospital Chapel for the seamen, and which will accommodate about 1,200 with sittings, besides the officers and servants of the establishment in a commodious gallery: but the tasteful and sumptuous ornaments and decorations, render it perhaps the most elegant place of worship in the kingdom. The religious regard paid to the seamen may be estimated by our observing, that Divine service is performed in the Hospital Chapel every day, except Saturday, so far as relates to reading the Common Prayer: and on Sunday, Prayers are read twice, with a sermon in the morning. Besides which, Prayers are read every Sunday, at the Infirmary Chapel, between the hours of service at the Hospital Chapel. The officiating clergymen are

The Rev. Samuel Cole, D. D. First Chaplain.
The Rev. D. Lloyd, Second Chaplain.

Religious liberty is happily enjoyed by these honoured men: and those who choose may claim their privileges as Dissenters. By an esteemed officer in the establishment we are informed, that all, who do not declare themselves bona fide Dissenters, are considered members of the Church of England; and that about two hundred and fifty profess the Roman Catholic faith, and are led out by a boatswain of their own persuasion, to their Romish Chapel in Greenwich, while about fifty Dissenters are allowed tickets to repair to their respective places of worship. We remember having met with, a short time ago, a cheerful, active old veteran of the latter class, above ninety years of age, whose conversation indicated all the evidence of intelligent and scriptural piety. He was a member of the church under the pastoral care of the Rev. H. B. Jeula.

It deserves also to be stated, that the most respectful permission to Dissenting ministers, to visit any of their flock in seasons of sickness in the Hospital, is granted by the governors and officers of this noble Institution.

Greenwich Hospital contains 2,710 seamen, besides the officers, consisting of a Governor, Lieutenant Governor, four Captains, and eight Lieutenants.

Sir R. G. Keates is Governor.
Sir Jahleel Brenton is Lieutenant Governor.
First Captain, William Edge.
Second Captain, Robert Larken.
Third Captain, Thomas Huskisson.
Fourth Captain, Daniel Woodriffe.

The Medical department consists of

A Physician, Sir William Beatty, with one assistant.
A Surgeon, Sir Rich. Dobson, with three assistants.
A Dispenser, and three assistants.

The average deaths amongst the seamen is about five per week, and they bury on Tuesdays and Fridays.

"Each of the mariners has a weekly allowance of 7 loaves, weighing each 16oz.; 3lbs. of beef, 2lbs. of mutton; a pint of pease; 1¼lb. of cheese; 2oz. of butter; 14 quarts of beer; and 1*s.* a week tobacco money: the tobacco money of the boatswains is 2*s.* 6*d.* and that of the other officers in proportion to their rank; besides which, each common pensioner receives, once in two years, a suit of blue clothes, a hat, 3 pairs of stockings, 2 pairs of shoes, 5 neck-cloths, 3 shirts, and 2 night caps."

The revenues of this establishment are very considerable. Besides private benefactions, to the amount of nearly 60,000*l.* the British parliament, in 1732, settled upon it the rents and profits of the vast estates, which were forfeited by the attainder of James late Earl of Derwentwater, and Charles Ratcliff. The value of the Earl's estates were then estimated at 6000*l.* per annum, but the property of the Hospital is now immensely great. In addition to which, every seaman, both in the royal navy and in the merchant service, pays sixpence per month towards the support of Greenwich Hospital.

By an act of George II, it was provided, that all seamen in the merchants' service, who shall happen to be maimed in fighting in defence of any ships belonging to British subjects, or in taking any ship from the enemy, shall be deemed eligible for admission into Greenwich Hospital, and shall receive the same benefit from it as if he had been in the immediate service of his Majesty.

It will be manifest to any observer of these favoured men, that many of them are as happy as it is possible to make them, under the excellent regulations which are established in the Institution: at the same time, having no employment, many of them are seen rambling about in Greenwich Park, Blackheath, and their vicinities, as if they were truly wretched. Some few of them are indeed studious and intellectual men; and for their amusement and edification, a valuable Library has recently been established, furnished with a useful collection of books and newspapers. There is also a valuable Medical Library.

GREENWICH PAINTED HALL.

Under the other dome is the famous Painted Hall. This magnificent apartment "was originally employed as the refectory for the pensioners and their officers; but when the increase of the Hospital's revenues led to a proportionate augmentation of the number of its inmates, the space was found inadequate to their accommodation. More convenient dining-halls were provided elsewhere; and this beautiful building, not surpassed by any in this kingdom, was left unoccupied during almost a century. At length it was proposed, in the year 1823, to appropriate this noble suite of apartments to the formation of a Gallery of Paintings, and other objects of art illustrative of the patriotic services of the Royal Navy of England. Its justly-celebrated ceiling, and other ornamental paintings on its walls, executed by Sir James Thornhill, in 1708 and subsequent years, gave to the whole a character peculiarly appropriate for such a destination. The plan, having received the sanction of the Commissioners and Governors of the Hospital, was at once honoured with the cordial patronage of his late Majesty King George the Fourth, who, with that promptitude of liberality which ever distinguished him, gave immediate directions that the extensive and valuable series of portraits of the celebrated "Flag-Men" of the reigns of King Charles the Second and King William the Third, in the galleries of Windsor Castle and Hampton Court, should be transferred to Greenwich Hospital as the first contribution to the intended collection of Naval Pictures. His late Majesty was graciously pleased to add soon after to this munificent donation, several other paintings from his private collection at Carlton House.

"The generous example of our deceased Sovereign was promptly followed by many noble and other liberal benefactors to the Naval Gallery, whose names are recorded in this Catalogue of Donations*; and thus in a few years the walls were adorned with the portraits of our celebrated naval commanders, and representations of their actions.

"The Upper Hall, originally allotted to the table of the officers, being on all sides decorated with allegorical paintings, has been recently made the repository of some articles of interest presented by his present Majesty, viz.

"Several Models of Ships: the Coat worn by Sir Horatio Nelson at the battle of the Nile: and the Astrolabe of Sir Francis Drake, a curious instrument of antique fashion, used for nautical observations."

THE PICTURES, one hundred and twenty-five in number, have all been gratuitously presented to the Hospital, without any charge upon its revenue; and it is "computed that nearly fifty thousand persons now annually visit this splendid edifice." The charge for admission is only three pence, and the profits are appropriated to the support of the Hospital and Schools.

* See the Catalogue, published April 3, 1833.

Should any of our readers be induced to visit this noble place, we entreat them not to choose Monday or Tuesday in Easter or Whitsun week, as then a class of persons crowd that vicinity in such multitudes, as make the moral part of the inhabitants dread the name of Greenwich.

Greenwich Hospital deserves further notice, on account of its excellent Schools for the support and education of the children of British seamen. In that for training boys for intelligent and scientific mariners, there are 800; and in that for the educating of girls there are at present 200. All things considered, there is not an establishment in the whole world to be compared with Greenwich Hospital; and this "glory of Great Britain," we rejoice to know, originated in the personal piety, the scriptural, Protestant Christianity, of King William and Queen Mary!

FUNERAL OF THE LATE REV. JOHN THEODORE BARKER.

This beloved minister of the gospel terminated his pilgrimage, April 3, 1833, aged seventy-three years. He had been the upright and faithful pastor of the church assembling at High Street Meeting, Deptford, during the extended period of forty-nine years; and, by the grace of God, uniformly adorned the doctrine which he had preached with considerable success.

His funeral excited a considerable sensation in the town, and the greatest respect was paid to his memory by a large concourse attending. To meet the wishes of many of the poorer members of his flock, six of whom, at their particular request, carried the corpse to the grave, a walking procession was determined on. Fourteen ministers attended, to testify their respect for their late friend, one of them remarking concerning him, "He was a living epistle of brotherly love, known and read of all men." The Rev. Messrs. Chapman and Jeula, of Greenwich, in their robes, preceded the corpse; and the Rev. Messrs Freeman, Belcher, Boddington, James, Timpson, and Rose, were the pall-bearers.

The chapel was crowded, and multitudes were unable to gain admittance. The Rev. Mr. Chapman (instead of Dr. Collyer, who was prevented being present by indisposition) offered prayer; after which the congregation sung Dr. Watts's hymn, "Why do we mourn departing friends?" and Mr. Chapman then read 1 Thess. iv, 13 to 18; and 1 Cor. xv, 12 to 58; and delivered an address to the mourning assembly, bearing testimony to the excellence of the principles and character of his departed friend, and urging every one present to seek an increasing acquaintance with those glorious doctrines of Christ, by which believers triumph on earth, and enter the kingdom of heaven. Another hymn, "Guide me, O thou great Jehovah," having been sung, the Rev. Mr. Freeman offered up a most solemn and instructive prayer. The corpse being conveyed to the vault under the chapel, the Rev. Mr. Jeula delivered a short and suitable address at the grave, and concluded with prayer. Many, it is believed, will long remember these edifying services, and every one say in truth, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!"

On the following Lord's day afternoon, the Rev. Dr. Collyer preached the funeral sermon for his late beloved friend and fellow-labourer, to the mourning church and congregation. The Rev. H. B. Jeula commenced the service with reading and prayer, and the Rev. W. Chapman concluded. The hymns were given out by the Rev. Mr. Pullen, who we understand will succeed Mr. Barker in the pastoral office. We earnestly pray that he may be furnished with a double portion of the Holy Spirit!

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXIV.

On learning to write.

Dear Madam,

Your son having, as I will presume, learned to read, he must also now learn to write. Both these attainments, if deferred till the proper period, and pursued by proper means, might be accomplished in six months. They might at least be attained as far as it respects the elementary knowledge of these arts, further improvement being left to experience. With regard to learning to write, the system which obtains at present seems capable of improvement. Upon the principle that every difficulty should be obviated in the acquisition of learning as far as possible, and that the infant should be conducted by gentle and successive transitions to perfection in any of the arts or sciences which may be taught him, I think that pen and paper and ink ought not to be the instruments adopted at the very commencement of the undertaking of learning to write. Writing is nothing more than drawing. Learning to write is learning to draw. The letters adopted in writing are the copy, and the expeditious and perfect imitation of these is the attainment proposed. What are the proximate means for this purpose? I own that I think, with the Lancasterian system of education, that the fore-finger is the natural pen of the infant, and that the best method of learning to draw the letter at first, is with the finger upon sand.

The first advance upon this should be, by repeating the same process with a slate pencil upon a slate, then with a lead pencil upon paper. By these successive advancements to the art of writing with a pen, a tolerable facility in imitating the letters will be acquired, unimpeded by the difficult task of learning to hold the pen, the danger of blotting the paper, and the miserable imitations of the copy, which render learning to write upon the common method a task of tears and anxiety to many a child. I believe that the task is of this mournful nature generally. Boys in a school, who have little dread of their daily tasks, look forward to the days of the week, or those hours of the day, when the writing-master comes, with peculiar perturbation, owing to the formidable and difficult nature of the employment. Boys too will bear witness, that in schools generally there is a more awful gloom over them on those occasions; there is generally more corporeal punishment, more chiding, and reproaches from the master. The chief causes of these unhappy circumstances are, that the boys have made mistakes, blotted their books, or written their copies badly. But surely a little reflection will show, that these are excusable faults, since they may be referred to the mode of instruction adopted, rather than to any negligence on the part of the children. A boy learning to write upon the usual method has to attend to the following things all at one time: that his copy-book be laid straight, that the complex position required from his body be correct, that he holds his pen properly, that he should keep a perpetual regard to the copy, strive to imitate it as well as he can, and yet keep his copy-book free from blots. On the other hand, an infant who learns to write on the method before adverted to, has but one thing at a time to attend to. His own finger is an instrument that is a part of himself, flexible in any direction at his own command. The sand he cannot blot: should it be unsmooth, one stroke of the stick, or one pressure of the board, renders it correct in an instant. He has only to look at the letter to be copied, and to do his best to imitate it. The same may be said when he writes next with a slate pencil. There is no fear of blotting: the position in which he must hold the pencil, is an introduction to the true position of holding the pen. When he comes to write upon paper, he will have acquired such a degree of self-command, as may render the additional acquisition not burthensome. When he comes to write on paper too, he need not go through the preliminary progressions of straight strokes, pot-hooks, round o, &c. but he will be prepared to write letters and words at once. The system of writing upon lines should be adopted only when he comes to write upon paper. With regard to excellence in penmanship, as it is called, it has long appeared to me, that it is often pursued when the attainment is hopeless; and that when gained, except to those who are to be draughtsmen, teachers of writing, &c. the attainment is not worth the pains usually bestowed upon it. If your son has a natural inclination to penmanship, delights in it, and resorts to it, and makes evidently great progress, then it might not be improper to indulge him in his having lessons from good masters, with a view to superior excellence. On the other hand, if he evidently does not care about it, does not give proofs of natural ability for it after a certain time, I hold that all attempts to communicate the attainment in high perfection will be in vain. Yet how often have I seen father and mother grieving that their son was not a good writer, that there was no prospect of his ever becoming so, and that others of his schoolfellows wrote much better. The poor lad, in the mean time, who may perhaps possess an intellect too expanded or exalted to admit the patience needful for the acquirement of such a mechanical perfection, feels degraded, discouraged, undervalues himself, becomes cowardized, unfriendly, callous, and deceitful! Why will not the parent be satisfied, after proper trials, that writing is not his forte? Why not endeavour to discover the latent talent which he assuredly possesses for something else? Why browbeat the poor child for something for which he is not responsible? A sensible parent would not be grieved at such a circumstance. Yet how many a parent of the old school deemed fine writing indispensable to his complacency in his son! and how many a boy has been tormented and spoiled, in intellect and temper, because the down-strokes, the up-strokes, and the turns of his letters, and above all the grace, elegance, and size of his capitals, were all outdone by some envied schoolfellow! The one lad had what the painters call an eye, the other had not, and that is the whole secret. Except in the case before supposed, of an inclination and of the ability of success being early developed, the parent should be satisfied if his son attains a good legible hand-writing. All beyond is useful to those who are to earn their living by fine writing, and to them alone.

If your son forms his letters perfectly and distinctly, this is enough. Unless, in consequence of inclination and ability early displayed, you intend him for a designer of ornamental writing, it appears to me that the plain English hand is all that he need learn. Accordingly, under such circumstances, all learning of German text, engrossing, flourishing, &c. &c. is a useless waste of time. Should he ever need such things, he will at any time learn any of them in two months. Besides, they will tend to spoil his hand-writing. The great rule of utility is the rule of learning to write. Let then your son obtain a facility of writing the most usual forms of the letters, legibly and swiftly, and all the rest may be safely left to his natural inclination, or to the requirement of circumstances. He has learned to communicate his ideas by writing, and to read the ideas of others when communicated to him in this form, and this is enough.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

Clericus.

THOUGHTS ON THE SACRED HISTORY OF THE CREATION.

The next product of the creative energy, which the Divine wisdom was exerting, was the formation of that aërial expanse which we call the atmosphere, and the elevation of a large portion of the watery element into the state of clouds and vapours to float in the upper regions. This operation divided the waters into two portions, as well as two states: the state of water in the seas is as dissimilar to its state in clouds, as if they were unrelated substances. Vapour and water would not be imagined to be the same thing, if we did not know their relationship to each other: but the quantity of each may not greatly differ, for it is hardly possible to conceive the enormous amount of this fluid which is always suspended or moving in the airy regions above us. The quantity of water which falls in rain and dew in England and Wales only, has been calculated in one year at 115,000,000,000 of tons. From the seas, rivers, lakes, and rivulets, it is ever ascending by evaporation into the atmosphere, to change again, and fall down in dews, fogs, and rain. Here again another proof occurs that our creation has been the product of an intelligent Mind, carefully adapting his agencies to the phenomena they were to cause; for unless the ascending vapours had been duly balanced with the descending rain, and unless the fitted means were constantly in action to occasion a constant evaporation of sufficient amount to rise into the skies, and other effective causes as unceasingly operating to make the elevated vapour descend in the needed showers, the vegetable and animal world would want that essential element, without which they could not subsist. Let us suppose for a moment that this evaporation was to cease, and let us contemplate the consequences. No more rain or dew could fall: the springs would cease to flow: the rivers would be dried up: the whole water in the globe would be accumulated in the ocean: the earth would become dry and parched: vegetables, being deprived of moisture, could no longer grow: the cattle and beasts of every kind would lack their usual food: man himself would perish: the earth would become a dull, sterile mass, without one living creature to wander through its frightful deserts! We may add, that as the whole water of the globe accumulated in the ocean, it would soon flow over the land, and cover it with a universal inundation. It is evaporation which now prevents the catastrophe of another deluge.

The next process of the forming globe was the removal of the waters that were flowing over its general surface into those united masses which we denominate seas. "Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear," was the command, and the consequence was that the watery element assembled on one portion of the earth into seas, while the rest of the earth became habitable ground. No detail is given of the movements by which this mighty result was effected. Vast ranges of mountains and rocks are now seen standing in various regions as high above the common ground as the depths of the ocean seem to be below it. The surface of the earth arises in some parts into high table land, but the general level of both land and sea is now nearly the same. The ocean is therefore obviously occupying cavities equal to its bulk of fluid; and the supposition seems to be not unreasonable, that in order to form these hollow spaces, the mountain masses were raised up. The mean depth of the Atlantic ocean is computed at three miles, and that of the Pacific four miles. The state and phenomena therefore of our stupendous mountains favour the idea, but the Mosaic record has given us no information on the subject; and therefore on this point philosophy has neither guide nor restriction in its theories or researches.

The fourth rotation of our globe was accompanied by the formation and arrangement of our planetary system. At this period of our creation, Moses places the formation of the sun and moon, and expresses the Divine order that they should regulate the illumination of our world, and divide our day into the two natural distinctions of visible light and succeeding darkness, and become the cause of our seasons, and govern our computations of time.

Our system of animated and vegetable nature could not subsist without the sun: we could not have our seasons, our daylight, or our years without him: he has therefore been made expressly for us, as also for our sister stars, to whom he is apparently as indispensable. The stars with which we are connected are the six planets, known as Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, and Uranus, and those four smaller ones discovered within the present century, and called the telescopic planets, because they are not discernible without the aid of a very powerful astronomical instrument. Of the creation of the rest, with which at present we have no relations, no account is transmitted to us. They are indeed the most splendid mysteries of nature. They are known to us only as radiant points, for no telescope can enlarge them; and yet their number seems to exceed all our powers of fully exploring. It is remarkable that they are undergoing changes for which we cannot account, but which display mighty causes in active operation. Sometimes their alterations are gradual, and observable by human care, though not explainable by the acutest minds of science. Sometimes they indicate an actual destruction. It is one of the wonders of creation, that any bodies at such an immense distance from us should be perceptible by human sight; but it has clearly been part of our Maker's plan, that they should so far be objects of our consciousness as to expand our ideas of the vastness of the universe, and of the extent and operations of his omnipotence. The immeasurable expansion of the heavenly regions, illustrated by the splendid spheres which mark the amazing extent, is, in the strictest meaning of the term, manifest infinity; for there is nothing which denotes that what reaches our sight in them is at the last limits of existing nature. These lofty mansions of being also indicate to us that they have the same Creator as ourselves, and are but so many magnificent scenes of his sovereignty and care. Their very appearance exhibits such an analogy of nature with the radiant bodies of our system, that reason cannot but refer all the stellar orbs to one common Author. The identity of light, which emanates alike from all, precludes all rational doubt on this interesting question. That our light was His creation, we learn from His scriptures: this fact will therefore justify us in referring it in other orbs to the same origin; and nothing in the universe shows any marks of any other creative power. One of the grandest circumstances to which the contemplation of the heavenly bodies attaches the attention, is the surprising distances at which they are placed, and the stupendous amount of space which they occupy by their circuits. Our Earth is above 90,000,000 of miles from the Sun: Saturn is above 800,000,000 of miles further off. The fact is sublime, and vast beyond the power of our words to express, or of our ideas to conceive: thought lapses into nothingness whenever it attempts to do so. It is indeed a marvellous mystery: it compels us to call creation an infinite immensity: it aggrandizes the Creator into a sublimity that would render it the most presumptuous folly for us to imagine that He could think of or care for us, if He had not expressly revealed to us his condescending regard, and his invitation and command that we should attach ourselves to Him. But this awful greatness makes that revelation the more inestimable to us; for without such a charter, and such personal authority for our affectionate adoration and grateful duty, what could our reason suggest to us, while it contemplated a Majesty so tremendous, but a tremulous dread and silent despair? The idea is overwhelming, that a human being has the power, and can exercise it, of looking through millions of millions of miles of extended space! and that so amazing an expanse is pervious to the eye!—but miraculousness is the true character of created nature.

SONNET TO THE STARS.

Ye stars of midnight! orbs of unknown mould!
Centres of systems! mansions of the blest!
That gild our darkness with your rays of gold,
And shine unmov'd in your eternal rest:
Or are ye worlds where woe and want abound,
Where vice and folly stalk in wild career?
Where war spreads carnage o'er the fruitful ground,
And blights the harvest of the bounteous year?
Oh, mysteries of heav'n! your glittering beams
Deride philosophy;—man strives in vain,
Through the most happy of his waking dreams,
T' unlock the secrets of your vast domain.
To HIM alone your mysteries stand confest,
Who spread you forth with His supreme behest!

THE SINFULNESS OF COLONIAL SLAVERY.

THE Rev. Robert Halley, one of the Tutors of Highbury college, has just published a "Lecture delivered at the Monthly Meeting of Congregational Ministers and Churches, in the Meeting-house of Dr. Pye Smith, Hackney, on Feb. 7, 1833." For this admirable pamphlet the public are much indebted to Mr. Halley and to the associated ministers, and we wish it were read by every individual in the kingdom, as the means of strengthening the determination to seek the annihilation of that accursed system. The reverend Lecturer says: "To confine ourselves to the West Indies,—it has been shown in the Anti-Slavery Reporter, and never, as far as I know, contradicted, that on the ordinary law of increase, compared with the actual decrease, there has been, since the abolition of the Slave Trade, a waste of life to the amount of 740,000 human beings. I have sometimes endeavoured to obtain data from which to compute the number of Africans originally transported to these western islands. It must have been much more than 7,000,000. I wish I could find reason to believe that estimate approached near the truth. There are now some 700,000, the scanty and miserable relics. Neither war when raging in Europe,—nor the plague in Constantinople,—nor the mournful cholera in India, its birth-place,—nor any other crime of man, or curse of God, has effected so general a destruction as British avarice has wrought in the West Indies. Are the charities of Englishmen frozen? Are their hearts, if they have any, encased in steel and adamant? Delay a little longer—amuse yourselves with preparatory measures and gradual emancipation—and a less tardy liberator will have laid their bodies in the last rest of the weary, and transferred their souls to the avenging millions beneath the altar!"

BRITISH ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

No. VI.—Christianity from the arrival of the Saxons in England in A.D. 449, to the mission of St. Austin, A.D. 556.

Doubtless Christianity was in a measure promoted in Britain, by means of the schools established under the influence of the French bishop Germanus. But whether religion were advanced by the alteration of the forms of public worship, in conformity with the rites and ceremonies of Gaul, we have no evidence. On the contrary, Bede testifies that corruption in life and manners increased among the Britons.

The Saxons, with martial fierceness, maintained themselves in Britain, where they had been invited only as auxiliaries. And not satisfied with seizing the lands, these merciless idolaters trampled upon the forms of Christianity, and persecuted its professors: Gildas and Bede also bear this testimony concerning them. The latter was a Saxon; yet he says, "By the hands of the Saxons a fire was kindled in Britain, that served to execute the vengeance of God upon the wicked Britons, as he had formerly burnt Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. The island was so ravaged by the conquerors, or rather by the hand of God making use of them as instruments, that there seemed to be a continued flame from sea to sea, which burnt up the cities, and covered the surface of the whole. Public buildings fell in one common ruin. The priests were murdered on the altars; the bishop with his flock perished by fire and sword without distinction; no one daring to give an honourable burial to their scattered bodies."

Exposed to the murderous sword of the Saxons, those who escaped, fled to the more remote parts of the country. We have not had even the names of the British pastors preserved, except those of Theon and Thadiock, dignified with the title of archbishops of Loudon and York; and these were obliged to flee for refuge into Wales. Our records of British Christianity in this period, therefore, relate only to a few pastors in Wales, Scotland, and the sister isle.

Dubricius is mentioned as a devoted pastor at Llandaff, and afterwards of Caerleon, of which in following ages he was honoured with the title of archbishop, as that city was the metropolis of Wales. Two schools are said to have been established by this zealous minister, one at Hensland, and the other at Mockrost; in which himself laboured as the schoolmaster.

Bangor also, near to Chester, had a noted school, which at length became famous for its monastery, and for the great number of its monks.

Monachism is no part of Christianity: but this ecclesiastical system originated in Egypt, in the third century, from "Paul the Hermit." This man was driven into the desert by the baseness of his covetous sister, who, with her husband, threatened to inform against him as a Christian, and thus obtained possession of his estates in the time of the Decian persecution. He remained in his solitude for ninety years, and died at the age of one hundred and thirteen, having acquired the greatest reputation for piety, and engaging many to follow his example.

Anthony, at the close of the fourth century, is regarded as the father of Monachism: as he formed the solitaries into a regular society, and prescribed rules for the direction of their conduct. His disciples St. Pachomius and Hilarion promoted similar fraternities in Palestine and Syria; and Aones or Eugenius, aided by Gaddanas and Azyzas in the same age, established them in the east of Europe, through many parts of which they spread, generally superseding scriptural religion by various forms of superstition. Monachism being famous in all the east, was soon introduced into Britain, and accounts the most extravagant are told concerning the "Monastery of Bangor." Two thousand one hundred monks are said to have constituted this fraternity, divided into seven courses, each consisting of three hundred.

Much exaggeration doubtless marks these traditions; but still there is abundant reason to believe that there existed at Bangor a flourishing community of Christian professors. Sloth and luxury, to a proverb, distinguished the monks of the middle ages, ignorant and superstitious, when nobles and kings, by mistaken charity, loaded them with wealth. But this could not have been the case with the Welsh monks of the fifth century: they seem to have supported themselves in a frugal manner by the labour of their own hands, while a certain number of them, in a regular rotation, were performing the appointed offices of religion.

Dubricius, already mentioned, held a synod at Brevi, in Cardiganshire, and condemned the Pelagian errors. Several other Christian pastors of this period, are commended as devoted to their work.

David, the successor of Dubricius, was son of a British prince, and famed for his pious austerity. He held a synod at Vittoria; in which the orthodox decisions of Brevi were ratified. David is honoured with the title of Saint, and from him Menevia is now called St. David's. Various miracles are attributed to St. David, who died in 529, aged 146 years.

Cardoc died in 570, leaving a great fame as the abbot of Lancarvan, and as having expended his whole income in the support of 300 priests.

Kentigern, son of a Scottish princess, was abbot of Glasgow. His abstinence from animal food, and other austerities, are highly commended. He is said to have travelled into Wales on a mission to found a religious society; which having done, he returned to his monastery and died in 560.

Asaph was a favourite of Kentigern, by whom he was appointed to preside over the monastery in Wales. He wrote the life of his patron, and died in 590, leaving his name to the Welsh city of St. Asaph.

Gildas of Badon, or Bath, surnamed the Wise, was a monk of Bangor. He wrote a work concerning "The Destruction of Britain;" and from him chiefly we learn the condition of the Britons in his time, as he is the only British author of the sixth century. He was born in Wales, in 511; it is thought he was educated in Ireland, and became a zealous preacher of Jesus Christ in Britain. He is believed to have died about the year 570.

Sampson is the name of two ecclesiastics of note. Sampson the Elder is said to have come from Armorica in France, to be made archbishop of York. Sampson the Younger, of royal extraction, is said to have been made an archbishop, and sent from Armorica into England in search of an archiepiscopal see: but unable to establish himself among the Saxons, he returned home, and became archbishop of Dol. Several memoirs, carried by him from England, but now lost, are said to have contained some valuable records of the British churches.

Patern, the son of a nobleman in Armorica, after twenty years study in Ireland, came as a minister of peace among the Welsh princes. He settled at Cardigan, but died in his native country, venerated for his exemplary holiness of life.

Petroc of Cornwall was famed for his piety; and from him the town of Padstow, or Petroc-stow, is named. He is said to have died at Bodmin.

St. Patrick, the Apostle of Ireland, deserves to be mentioned here, as he was born in 373, at Kirk-Patrick in Scotland, and became the most famous of all the ecclesiastics of the British Isles in his day. His British name, given at his baptism, was Suceath, meaning Valiant in war. By some pirates he was taken prisoner, and carried into Ireland, where he was purchased by a person named Milicho, in whose service he continued six years, and acquired the Irish language. At length he escaped, and after about two years, he formed a design of converting the Irish. Having spent thirty-five years in preparatory studies on the continent, he was consecrated bishop of Ireland by Pope Celestine, who gave him the name of Patricius, expressive of his illustrious descent. He arrived in Ireland in 441, and his first convert was Sinell, the eighth in descent from Cormac, the renowned king of Leinster. He proceeded to Dublin, and into Ulster, where a remarkable barn was fitted up for a church, which afterwards became the famous Abbey of Saul. After seven years he returned to Britain, which he is said to have delivered from the heresy of Pelagius; and, with several persons engaged as his assistants, in thirteen years he completed the work of converting all the people of Ireland. Having visited Rome, to give an account of his success, he returned and spent the remainder of his days between the monasteries of Armagh and Saul, enforcing the doctrines he had preached. After having established several schools, Patrick died, March 17, 493, aged one hundred and twenty years.

Numerous miracles are attributed to St. Patrick, and different accounts are given of his life and ministry. It is to be noted, that besides St. Patrick called the "Great," the "Apostle of Ireland," there were two others of this name mentioned, Patrick the elder, who died in 449, and Patrick the younger, nephew of the Saint, and who survived his uncle several years.

What was the degree of scriptural knowledge possessed by these distinguished ecclesiastics—how far they preached the pure doctrines of the gospel—and in what degree the people who enjoyed their ministry were truly evangelized—we have but scanty means of ascertaining. While truth requires us to remark, that all the accounts which we possess, relating to these times, abound with the most ridiculous fables,—notices of the most superstitious and puerile rites and ceremonies,—and extravagant stories of miracles, with but very little reference to the blessed word of God.

Archbishop Usher states, that about the time of St. Patrick, Ireland had three hundred and sixty-five churches, with as many bishops, some of whose revenues were so small, that they had no more than the pasture of two milk beasts. With bishops to the several churches, we may hope that there was much pastoral piety, and many of the people blessed with much of the simplicity and purity of the gospel of Christ. Besides, the influence of Christianity, imperfectly as it was then generally understood and professed, and mingled with many silly rites, was infinitely more benevolent and the means of happiness among the people than the barbarism of pagan idolatry: yet the historic records of those times evince the aspiring ambition of the ecclesiastics, indicative of the advancing progress of Antichristian Popery.

SUNDAY GARDENING.

This mode of violating the holy law of Almighty God, prevails to a lamentable extent in the vicinities of London and of the large towns in the country. Possibly some may prosecute their labours in the garden, on the Lord's day morning, unconscious of any particular criminality: but such persons cannot have considered the terms of the Divine law, in relation to the sacred day. "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy: six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work: but the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man servant, nor thy maid servant, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger that is within thy gates: for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it."

Should any object, as some have done, that this is a command to the Hebrews, and not obligatory on us: they should be reminded, that that error arises from a forgetfulness of the sanctification of the Sabbath at the creation, and its ordination for the benefit of all mankind.

We are persuaded that Sunday gardening is as innocent as any other mode of violating the commands of God: but if we only admit the certainty of our being judged at the righteous tribunal of God, and rewarded or punished according to our works, dangerous and dreadful will this custom appear! We are unwilling to throw obstacles in the way of our industrious mechanics enjoying themselves, or breathing the fresh air: but we are confident, that the health, the happiness, and the advantages of our poorer neighbours, would be promoted in a far greater degree by early rising, cleanliness, and attendance at the house of God.

Observation for many years has convinced us, that those who are accustomed to spend their time on a Sunday morning in gardening, are among those who are most disposed to injure their health, and their families, by pernicious habits in the afternoon and evening. We have known many, who, after labouring all the Sunday morning in gardening, have passed the remainder of the sacred day at home in their ordinary week day attire, drinking, and indulging in conversation unworthy of a rational being; and having thus spent the day of God, in a manner that will not bear reflection, they have retired to bed in a state of worse than beastly intoxication, their health impaired, their children encouraged in ungodliness by the example of their parents, and the most effectual preparation made for a numerous train of miseries in this life, and for the inconceivable torments of eternity!

How will the Negro slaves in Jamaica rise up in the day of judgment against British profaners of the Sabbath! They are obliged to cultivate their provision-grounds on that holy day, as the principal means of their subsistence; or, having gathered the fruits of their garden, to carry them many miles to market on the Sabbath, to procure by this means some of the necessaries of life! Should any of those who are accustomed to the unhallowed work of Sunday gardening read this paper, we beseech them to consider how they will justify themselves at the judgment seat of Christ; and henceforth seek the cultivation of their minds in the fear of God, reading his holy word, and seeking his salvation by the only Redeemer of sinners. We are confident that our industrious mechanics will find the advantage of the counsel we are giving, not only in their peace of conscience, but in their present health and comfort. Instead of being accessory to the damnation of their children, recommending ungodliness by their pernicious example, they will be the means of training them for honour, happiness, and heaven. "For bodily exercise profiteth little: but godliness is profitable to all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." 1 Tim. iv, 8.

King George the First is said to have observed respecting a sermon which was excellent in doctrine but overcharged with figurative language, that "the tropes and metaphors of the speaker were like the brilliant wild flowers in a field of corn, very pretty, but which did very much hurt the corn."

HEAVEN AND EARTH.

Behold yon bright array
Before the sapphire throne;
There young nor old, nor rich nor poor,
There bond nor free, are known.

At once they strike their lyres;
At once break off; — and all,
With trembling joy and silent love,
In adoration fall.

Whate'er their lot below,
As fellow-heirs of bliss,
In heav'n their services are one:
Let earth be heav'n in this!

As brethren, so may we
Worship with one accord:
In stillness wait, in prayer bow down,
Stand up and bless the Lord.

As pilgrims on our way,
God's earthly courts we fill;
And travel on from strength to strength,
Abreast to Zion's hill.

There may our spirits meet,
When faith is chang'd to sight,
Where the Lord God himself shall be
The temple, life, and light.

Where on the sea of glass
The ransom'd nations sing,
And to the Lamb upon the throne
Eternal glory bring.

MONTGOMERY.

Death of the Rev. Rowland Hill, M.A.

WITH mingled feelings of grief and joy, we announce the decease of the venerable Rowland Hill. This event took place at his house, Surrey Chapel, London, on Thursday evening, April 11, 1833. As we purpose taking further notice of the character and labours of this eminent servant of Christ, we can only remark here, that a few days before he entered into immediate "communion with the church of God" in heaven, he stated to the writer of this his intention to publish a new edition of "Dr. Mason's Catholic Communion of the Church of God" on earth. That work contains a fine illustration of his amiable spirit. This eminent example of Christian faith and benevolence, would have completed his eighty-ninth year had he lived till next August.

IS NOT RELIGION THE PARENT OF MELANCHOLY?

"IT is common," says Dr. Cox, in his Female Scripture Biography, "to represent religion as incompatible with true enjoyment, and to describe those who are under its influence as gloomy fanatics, dragging out a miserable existence, the dupes of prejudice and the slaves of melancholy. If a perpetual sense of the Divine presence, a well-founded confidence of pardoned sin, free access to the throne of mercy, abundant communications of spiritual good, and lively anticipations of a felicity beyond the grave, commensurate with the capacities of an immortal spirit and with the everlasting ages of eternity; if these produce wretchedness, then, and in no other case, is religion a source of misery."

THE SAILORS' AND SOLDIERS' CHRISTIAN FRIEND, AND POCKET COMPANION.

Dedicated, with permission, to Admiral Lord Gambier and to General Lord Viscount Lorton. By Thomas Timpson, author of "A Companion to the Bible," &c. &c. 32mo. cloth, pp. 288. London, Book Society, 19, Paternoster Row.

WE are glad to see this admirable little work brought out under such distinguished patronage; and cordially recommend it to those for whose use it is especially designed, as eminently calculated for the promotion of their everlasting welfare. Many of our brave defenders by sea and land have become seriously alive to the importance of religion, and their number, there is good reason to hope, is constantly and rapidly increasing. Such will here find a directory well suited to their wants and circumstances, from its brevity, its clearness, and the affectionate tone which pervades the whole treatise. The following analysis will exhibit the author's plan.

Chap I. Affectionate Address to Sailors and Soldiers. II. The Evidences of Christianity. III. Heads of Christian Doctrine. IV. A Directory to Prayer. V. A Directory to the Lord's Supper. VI. A Directory to the Bible. VII. Anecdotes of Sailors. VIII. Anecdotes of Soldiers. IX. Select Personal Hymns. X. Select Social Hymns.

From the Preface we learn that the work "was undertaken, after much inquiry and deliberation, partly at the request of several devoted friends of sailors and soldiers, by whom the author was assured that no such volume existed; partly from a conviction that such a Manual was much needed; and partly from his having witnessed the habits of sailors and soldiers in the ports of London, Deptford, Greenwich, Woolwich, Gravesend, Chatham, Sheerness, Portsmouth, and Liverpool, and several military barracks and stations."

Those who have friends in the Army or Navy will find this volume a present as suitable as it is cheap. It is written in a concise yet perspicuous style, and the anecdotes are well adapted to gain the attention and gratify the taste of the naval and military reader. But though written more expressly for these classes, the work may be perused with advantage by all who need elementary Christian instruction. We trust the worthy author will see the blessing of God resting upon his labours, by a very large circulation of this useful and much-needed little volume.

PLAN OF THE CITY OF BABYLON.

BABYLON.

bylon, the metropolis of Chaldea, is considered the st ancient of all the great cities of antiquity. Every der of the Bible may learn from its inspired pages origin and glory, and its idolatries and wickedness, which account it was doomed of God to utter ruin. t its present circumstances of desolation are testified modern travellers, whose writings form the most rvellous commentary upon the threatened and re-ded judgments of God.

Babylon was founded by the first descendants of ah (Gen. x, 10; xi), soon after the Deluge, and en-ged by Nimrod, his great grandson, about 2,000 ars before the advent of Christ. Many additions re made to it by the famous queen Semiramis, and was greatly strengthened and beautified by several ceeding sovereigns; but it was the celebrated Ne-chadnezzar, and his daughter Nitocris, who perfected s wonderful city, by raising it to the highest possible ch of magnificence, splendour, and glory. Not a tle of its riches was derived from the wealth of the nple of Solomon at Jerusalem. 2 Kings xxiv, 10—16; n. ii, iii, iv.

Babylon was situated in the midst of a vast plain, ich was watered by the "great river Euphrates." e river flowing from north to south, divided the city to two parts, which were surrounded by a wall; and the whole, forming a complete square, was 480 furlongs, or 60 miles in circuit. This magnificent city had 50 grand streets 15 miles long, 25 streets from side to side, traversing the whole area from gate to gate, and intersecting each other; the whole was divided into 625 squares. Each side of the river had the convenience of a strong quay, and a high wall of the same dimensions with the wall around the city. The entrances to the city were by one hundred gates of prodigious size, made of solid brass; and the two parts of the city were connected by a prodigious stone bridge. To prevent inconvenience from the swelling of the river, two canals were cut above the city, by which the superabundant waters were carried off into the Tigris. Besides which, prodigious embankments were formed, effectually to confine the stream within its channel, and as a security against inundation. The materials for these stupendous works were taken principally from the western side of the city, and the excavations formed an immense lake, the depth of which was 35 feet, and its circumference 45 miles.

At the ends of the bridge were two magnificent palaces, which had a subterraneous communication with each other, by means of a vault or tunnel under the bed of the river. The old palace, on the east side, was about 30 furlongs in compass, surrounded by three separate walls, one within another. The new palace, on the opposite side, was about four times as large as the other, and it is computed to have been 64 furlongs, or 8 miles in circumference. Within this palace were the celebrated artificial gardens; consisting of large terraces covered with large flat stones, raised one above another, till they equalled the walls of the city. They were designed to represent a woody country, having large trees planted on them, in soil of sufficient depth for them to grow 50 feet high. On the highest level was a reservoir, with a machine by which water was drawn from the river to water the whole. This novel and astonishing contrivance was perfected by the "great monarch," for the purpose of gratifying his queen AMYITIS, that she might behold something in Babylon resembling the hills and woodlands of her native country, MEDIA.

Near to the old palace stood the temple of Belus or Jupiter, forming a square of nearly three miles in compass. In the centre of the temple was an immense tower 600 feet in height! This enormous pile of building consisted of 8 towers, each 75 feet high, and which were ascended by stairs winding round the outside. On this temple of Belus, or, as some say, on its summit, was a golden image, 40 feet in height, and computed to be worth 3,500,000*l.* sterling. There were besides such numbers of other valuable statues and sacred utensils, that the whole of the treasure contained within this single edifice, has been estimated at 42,000,000*l.* sterling! These examples will be sufficient to intimate the prodigious wealth and the overgrown power of the Babylonian empire; and they were, doubtless, among the mightiest works of mortals.

Babylon was called—THE GLORY OF KINGDOMS—THE GOLDEN CITY—THE LADY OF KINGDOMS—and THE PRAISE OF THE WHOLE EARTH: but its pride, idolatry, and abominable wickednesses, provoked the righteous indignation of the Almighty, and they have been punished in the heavy calamities of its people, and the utter desolation of its splendid buildings, agreeably to the inspired predictions of the holy prophets. We shall transcribe a few of these predictions, and give a brief history of their fulfilment.

"And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation: neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their fold there. But wild beasts of the desert shall lie there; and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there. And the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces: and her time is near to come, and her days shall not be prolonged." Isa. xiii, 19—22.

"For I will rise up against them, saith the LORD of Hosts, and cut off from Babylon the name, and remnant, and son, and nephew, saith the LORD. I will also make it a possession for the bittern, and pools of water: and I will sweep it with the besom of destruction, saith the LORD of hosts." Isa. xiv, 22, 23.

"Thus saith the LORD to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden, to subdue nations before him; and I will loose the loins of kings, to open before him the two-leaved gates; and the gates shall not be shut; I will go before thee, and make the crooked places straight: I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron: and I will give thee the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places, that thou mayest know that I, the LORD, which call thee by thy name, am the God of Israel." Isa. xlv, 1—3.

"Declare ye among the nations, and publish, and set up a standard; publish, and conceal not; say, Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Merodach is broken in pieces; her idols are confounded, her images are broken in pieces. For out of the north there cometh up a nation against her, which shall make her land desolate, and none shall dwell therein; they shall remove, they shall depart, both man and beast.—Because of the wrath of the LORD it shall not be inhabited, but it shall be wholly desolate: every one that goeth by Babylon shall be astonished, and hiss at all her plagues. Put yourselves in array against Babylon round about: all ye that bend the bow, shoot at her, spare no arrows; for she hath sinned against the LORD. Shout against her round about: she hath given her hand: her foundations are fallen, her walls are thrown down: for it is the vengeance of the LORD: take vengeance upon her; as she hath done, do unto her. Cut off the sower from Babylon, and him that handleth the sickle in the time of harvest: for fear of the oppressing sword they shall turn every one to his people, and they shall flee every one to his own land.—I have laid a snare for thee, and thou art also taken, O Babylon, and thou wast not aware: thou art found, and also caught, because thou hast striven against the LORD. The LORD hath opened his armoury, and hath brought forth the weapons of his indignation: for this is the work of the Lord GOD of hosts in the land of the Chaldeans. Come against her from the utmost border, open her storehouses: cast her up as heaps, and destroy her utterly: let nothing of her be left." Jer. l, 2, 3, 13—16, 24—26.

"One post shall run to meet another, and one messenger to meet another, to shew the king of Babylon that his city is taken at one end, and that the passages are stopped, and the reeds they have burned with fire, and the men of war are affrighted. For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel: The daughter of Babylon is like a threshingfloor, it is time to thresh her: yet a little while, and the time of her harvest shall come. Nebuchadrezzar the king of Babylon hath devoured me, he hath crushed me, he hath made me an empty vessel, he hath swallowed me up like a dragon, he hath filled his belly with my delicates, he hath cast me out. The violence done to me and to my flesh be upon Babylon, shall the inhabitant of Zion say; and my blood upon the inhabitants of Chaldea, shall Jerusalem say. Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will plead thy cause, and take vengeance for thee; and I will dry up her sea, and make her springs dry. And Babylon shall become heaps, a dwelling-place for dragons, an astonishment, and an hissing, without an inhabitant." Jer. li, 31—37.

The two eminent heathen historians, Herodotus and Xenophon, have given a particular detail of the particulars of the siege of Babylon. In exact accordance with the inspired predictions of Isaiah and Jeremiah, they say, that Cyrus, with a large army of Medes and Persians, besieged Babylon; that the Babylonians, conceiving their walls impregnable, could not be provoked to engage in a general battle: that Cyrus contrived a snare for the Babylonians, by turning the course of the river Euphrates through the great lake; that the waters having been thus drawn off, the soldiers marched through the channel of the river; that, from the negligence of the soldiers on guard, some of the gates leading from the river to the city were left open; that the troops of Cyrus entering by this means, took Babylon during the night of an idolatrous festival (See Daniel v); that its princes, nobles, and captains, being drunk with their feasting, as described by the prophet Daniel, were suddenly slaughtered; and this glorious city, never before conquered by a foreign enemy, was thus taken without the knowledge of the king, until the posts and messengers ran with the information, which he had scarcely time to receive, before he was numbered with the multitudes of the slain!

Babylon soon began to decline from its glory: its lofty walls were reduced to only a quarter of their original height; and from an imperial, it was reduced to a tributary city. Xerxes, a successor of Cyrus on the Persian throne, after his ignominious retreat from Greece, seized the sacred treasures, plundered the temples, and destroyed the images of precious metal. Alexander the Great attempted to restore Babylon to its former glory; and designed to make it the metropolis of a universal empire. The conqueror employed 10,000 men to repair the embankments of the Euphrates and the temple of Belus; but this mighty project soon perished with the death of Alexander!

CHRISTIANITY PROMOTED BY BRITISH COMMERCE.

Christianity in the East has been promoted greatly by the adoption of a more liberal policy towards India. Difficulties, in some particulars, may arise in relation to the system of Free Trade. Into the political part of the question we cannot enter; indeed we do not consider it our province: but we cannot contemplate the Renewal of the East India Company's Charter, without a lively anxiety on account of the interests of Christianity.

Mr. Poynder, some time ago, in a speech at the India House, charged the Company with having, in seventeen years, drawn a MILLION STERLING from the four principal idol temples of JUGGERNAUT, ALLAHABAD, GYA, and TRIPETTY. That gentleman declared, that were it not for the sanction thus afforded by the Company, and the excellent order in which the temples are kept, the priests and Bramins receiving salaries from the Government, there would be a rapid decline in the whole system of abominations. Arguments, we know, are used in defence of the Company's procedure; but we think them groundless and visionary; and we cannot hesitate to express our decided conviction, that the best policy for the Directors would be to keep themselves pure from every transaction of this kind, throwing the idol temples into the hands of their blind votaries, and leaving the system of imposture, impurity, and blood, to its own resources, and to perish under the illumination of the Christian scriptures.

Christian knowledge has wonderfully advanced already in India, by the establishment of schools, the circulation of religious tracts, the publication of the word of God, and the preaching of the Gospel by the various Missionaries. Provision for more effectual encouragement of those devoted servants of God, we have no doubt, will be made, by the new arrangements of our government for India; and while British Trade shall be extended through that immense district of our globe, British knowledge and religion shall receive the command and blessing of God, to enlighten, regenerate, and save myriads of its teeming population.

NOTICES OF BRITISH TRADE TO INDIA.

Many of our readers are aware, that before 1814 the East India Company monopolized all the trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope; and that their monopoly operated exceedingly to embarrass the labours of the Missionaries. Since that period private individuals have been allowed to carry on trade to India under certain restrictions; and this permission of the Charter of 1813 has been attended with corresponding benefits in the extension of commerce and the advancement of the cause of Christ.

The following Table exhibits the amount of Exports and Imports by the Company and by Private Traders since the new arrangements. China is excepted, and the value is taken from the prices at the East India Company's sales.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXV.

On Arithmetic.

Dear Madam,

Arithmetic, the science of number, stands next upon the list of intellectual accomplishments. The slightest inspection however of the subject will show, that in the acquisition of this science the parent may be of inestimable use to the child, in smoothing the way to its acquisition. For this purpose you must avoid as much as possible all use of the nomenclature or the technical terms of modern arithmetic. It is evident that the terms used in any art ought to suggest to the mind of the pupil the nature of the ideas of which they are the symbols. Yet how seldom is this the case in arithmetic! To say nothing of addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division, which though Latin terms are scarcely perhaps capable of being changed for Saxon words for the better, what shall be said of such terms as the rule of three? Was ever jargon so unintelligible! Why not call it by its true name, the science of proportion? Still more, what shall be said to such terms as practice? What connection is there between the name and the thing signified by it? The same may be said of alligation, and even of the terms in use as to the very principles, such as numeration, units, tens, &c. Now the happy task of the mother should be, to initiate her son in the four first rules at least, by avoiding technical terms as much as possible, and by gradual and successive lessons.

Arithmetic may begin with addition, rather than with numeration as it is called; it being reasonable that a child should have some idea how numbers are produced before he attempts to read them. While learning to write he has learned the characters 1, 2, 3, 4. Let him then be taught addition by some such method as the following. Here are two apples in one hand, and three in the other: placing them all together upon the table, how many apples are there?

Let him be exercised well in mental arithmetic, by always associating some sensible idea with the number. Let the ideas of the four first rules be familiarized to him before he is taught to express the arbitrary characters which are associated with those ideas. The other system is just what it would be to require a child to learn to think, speak, and write, at one and the same time. Then when fully familiar, let him be taught to write the lessons which he has performed on the mental process. Thus let him write down upon the slate — 2 apples,

Then ask him to write down the number made by the addition, thus — 5 apples.

Proceed slowly, and step by step. Make sure he possesses the perceptions, before he proceeds to write the external signs of those perceptions. Let every arithmetical process be conducted with regard to sensible ideas, and not, for some time to come, upon mere abstract ideas of number, such as 2, 3. The mind of a child always at first says 2 what?—3 what? The child's mind has no conception of abstract ideas. And arithmetic should be superadded to his conceptions of sensible ideas; and then, when the distinctions of their numbers is acquired, the reference to the abstract ideas may be parted with, when the distinctions of mere number will remain. An intelligent mother may make her son master of clear perceptions of the qualities of numbers by this method; and when he goes to school, if he should fall into the hands of an intelligent instructor, his progress will be rapid and delightful: whereas the progress is slow and wretched of a boy who simply learns by heart, or pores with a lack-lustre eye and brow shaded with premature anxiety over numeration, &c. &c. without attempting to comprehend what it means, and probably while labouring under the secret impression that he is not expected to comprehend it. Thus arithmetic is often a mere mental drill. The understanding however becomes stupefied under the process. Arithmetic never can be learnt, till the child's mind comprehends most clearly every part of the process. Upon the general system, the mechanical part of the process is imprinted on the memory, and many years afterwards the understanding awakes to the intelligent perception of its nature. Yet what should hinder the commencement of this intelligent perception from the first attention to the subject? A mother — the best instructor of her children — an intelligent mother, may secure this; and when once she has communicated this habit to the mind of her pupil, it will be required perpetually for an intelligent comprehension of what is told him, and can never retrograde into the benumbed and blind condition of the child who "goes through," as the phrase is, one rule after another, just as the mill-horse goes the round of his employment. When he comes to the tables, as they are called yet, what child ever yet associated the idea with the name, when he comes to apothecaries weight! avoirdupois weight! that these are the rules in weighing drugs and less valuable things? Let him be taken to a chemist's shop, and shown the pound weight he uses, and then be shown the pound weight the miller uses in weighing flour. Let him be told that the druggist weighs his drugs by his weight, and the miller, &c. by his weight, because it has been the custom for a long time in this country. Let cloth measure be similarly explained to him, and all the tables. Let him never have a word in arithmetic presented to his mind without being shown or having explained to him the sensible idea to which that word corresponds.

How needful all this explanation is, may be instanced in the definition of a stone weight.

8 pounds a stone of butcher's meat.
14 pounds a stone of horseman's weight.

What multitudes of boys have repeated this like automatons! Let your child be made to understand, that 8 pounds is called a stone of the flesh of animals: that the same name, stone, is applied to the weight of fourteen pounds of any thing else, and is also called horseman's weight, because the jockeys who ride the horses in races are weighed by it. Explain to him also the name of foot, as taken from the length of the foot of that king of England who was reigning when that distinction in measure was first introduced into use; that the yard was the length of his arm, &c.: almost any good system of arithmetic contains such explanations. Do not make him commit them to memory; teach him by conversation. In a word, you can thoroughly initiate him into the principles of arithmetic, and you can, above all things, make him understand all that you teach him.

Thus will his knowledge be delightful to him, a real ornament to his mind, and really available by him to those various practical purposes in the affairs of mankind, from which alone its importance is derived.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

Clericus.

THOUGHTS ON THE SACRED HISTORY OF THE CREATION.

The Deity now proceeded to a new order and principle of creation, that which is associated more immediately to himself. This was, to arrange some of the material elements of nature into definite and interesting forms, with a curious internal mechanism, within which a living principle was to abide, producing those impressive phenomena, which life only can perform. It is this living principle which brings all that possess it into a far nearer relation to their Maker than inert and inorganic matter, for in its lowest form it has a certain degree of assimilation to its Creator, whose essential quality is eternal, unoriginated, and ever-during life. All vitality appears to be some communication of this grand characteristic in himself to those things which possess it, and by which they become living beings. Their forms are his special invention and construction, and their principle of life is also his special and communicated gift.

The creation of vegetables was the formation of living organized beings, with spontaneous internal powers, but without thinking mind, or any sensitivity discernible by us; and yet endowed with a principle of life, that has many striking analogies with that which all animals possess, and which we ourselves enjoy. Plants are distinguished for their multiplicity and variety, for that exuberance of imagination and taste which they display, and for that sense of elegance and beauty which their Maker must have had, to have so formed and diversified them. They are entirely the creation of his choice, the inventions of his rich and beautiful fancy.

The vegetable kingdom expands everywhere before us an immense portraiture of the Divine mind, in its contriving skill, profuse imagination, conceiving genius, and exquisite taste, as well as its interesting qualities of the most gracious benignity and the most benevolent munificence. The various flowers we behold, awaken these sentiments within us, and compel our reason to make these perceptions and this inference. They are the annual heralds and ever-returning pledges to us of his continuing beneficence, of his desire to please and benefit us, and therefore of his parental and intellectual amiabilities. The thunder, the pestilence, and the tempest, awe and humble us into dismaying recollections of his tremendous omnipotence and possible visitations, and of our total inability to resist or avert them; but the beauty and benefactions of his vegetable creations, the flowers and fruits more especially, remind and assure us of his unforgetting care, his condescending sympathy, his paternal affection, and of the same benignity still actuating his mind, which must have influenced it to design and execute such lovely productions, displaying the minutest thought, most elaborate composition, and so much personal kindness.

The creation of vegetables is placed by Moses subsequent to the production of light and of the atmosphere, immediately after the waters had receded from the land, and just before the creation and arrangement of the solar system. This exactly answers the demands of our present knowledge. Instead of requiring the sun's light to germinate, seeds and plants, in order to do so, must be sown and placed in darkness before they can vegetate. A small heat and moisture first caused their living principle to begin its operations, but they cannot flower and fruit until they receive the solar beams. This exact placing of the vegetable formation and first germination, is another test of the authenticity of the Hebrew narrative, which random fiction could not have stood.

The command for the rise of the vegetable kingdom, presents them to us in the three natural divisions of grasses, herbs, and trees. "And God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth: and it was so." This command extended to ordain their appearing with their reproductive powers for the formation of their seeds and fruits, in order to provide for their perpetuation on earth in an unfailing succession, without any new creation. The invisible miracle is left to be inferred by the human sagacity, from the wonderful phenomena that are continually occurring to our eye-sight, which no human or known natural agency can account for. It is thus that He makes His eternal power and Godhead the deduction of our reason, as well as a communicated truth from his personal revelation.

Let us review some of the main features that were selected to mark and constitute the system for that peculiar order of living things which the vegetable world displays. All vegetables, in every region and of every sort, from the most minute to the most towering, have these properties in common with animals and the human race. Organization, an interior power of progressive growth, a principle of life, with many phenomena that resemble irritability and susceptibility, and a self-reproductive and multiplying faculty. In all these qualities they are distinguished from inorganic and earthy matter, in these they resemble all animated nature, and our prouder selves. We may dislike such a relationship, but to this extent our bodily frame and functions establish a natural kinship between us. We decline and die as they do; and they sicken, fade, die, and decay, like every human being: there is also another analogy, their substance nourishes us, and ours not unfrequently becomes a part of theirs. All living nature is linked together by actual connection, if not by perceivable sympathies. Life and organization are inseparable companions. To form a correct idea of what an organized being is, we may observe, that in human mechanism we have an imitation of vegetable and animal organization, which enables us more fully to understand it, and to perceive how it has originated. Neither watches, cotton mills, or steam engines grow; they must be made by human hands, under the direction of a designing thought and will; and this mode of their fabrication discovers to us how all similar things, whose forming agents we have not seen at work, to wit, natural organizations, must have been made. All mechanisms, from the pair of tongs or the snuffers, to the windmill, the ship, and manufacturing machines, consist of pieces taken out of their natural state, and put into a peculiar arrangement in due relation to each other, so that from this specific combination, the action of the completed thing may produce the effect intended by its planning, adjusting, and commanding master. Such are the mechanisms of man, and such the mechanisms of his Creator. The plant, the animal, and the human being, are in their bodily structure, material machines. Consisting of parts put together into designed and adapted arrangements, and which by their artificial and special construction, possess and exert powers which thence arise, and produce the phenomena they were intended to effect. Nothing but human workmanship will account for human mechanism. No metal in the mine could by any chance move itself into the wheels and springs which constitute a watch or an organ, and begin marking time or playing a melody. So nothing but Divine agency and intelligence will explain how the inert particles of things became combined originally into vegetable or animal organizations, because all other agencies are known to be utterly incompetent to such effects. In neither human or divine mechanisms do the parts of which they consist, tend in themselves to be what they are, or to do what they do. Iron has no tendency to be a hammer or a chain, nor brass to be in a clock or cannon, in a telescope, or in a pianoforte. So none of the particles that constitute plants have any natural tendency to be a carnation, an apple, or an acorn.

Such are organizations in general, and plants are that peculiar species which display to us the Divine ideas in this class of natural being; and which form the largest compartment in the immense panorama of the surface of our terrestrial fabric.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE REV. ROWLAND HILL.

In our last Number we announced the decease of the Rev. Rowland Hill. We have now the gratification of informing our Readers of the solemn, impressive, and truly edifying manner in which the mortal remains of this devoted servant of Christ were committed to the tomb, under the pulpit in Surrey Chapel, on Friday, April 19. None were admitted except by tickets; yet the chapel was crowded to excess. Multitudes of persons of high respectability, and many Committees of religious societies, declined applying for tickets, under the conviction that it would be in vain to seek admission.

The corpse having been brought into the chapel, the Rev. Thomas Jackson, of Stockwell, read part of the Burial Service of the Church of England; then the coffin being placed before the pulpit, the Rev. W. B. Collyer, D.D. LL.D. read Psalms xxxix and xc, and part of the fifteenth chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians. The body having been lowered into the grave, the remaining part of the Burial Service was read by the Rev. T. Jackson.

A hymn having then been sung, the Rev. Geo. Clayton, M.A. offered a most appropriate and affecting prayer. Then the beautiful hymn, beginning "Jesus, thy blood and righteousness," having been sung, the Rev. William Jay, of Bath, preached a most impressive Sermon on Zech. xi, 2. It will be sufficient here to remark, that Mr. Jay's discourse was worthy of the lamented occasion; but only part of it was delivered, and the whole was announced as intended to be given to the Public. This extraordinary service was closed with prayer, by the Rev. George Collison.

Lord Hill, Commander in Chief of the Army, and others of the family, honoured the memory of their venerable relative by attending his funeral, as they had revered the character of that eminent minister of Christ while living. And we are confident that the respect thus shown to the public and private worth of their lamented uncle, must have produced a deep impression upon the minds of his Lordship and his relatives. Sincerely do we pray, that they may cherish the same divine principles which animated and supported their deceased relative; and enjoying the same consolations, anticipate the same immortal glory.

We purpose giving a biographical sketch of our venerable Friend and cordial Patron in our next Number.

SACRIFICE OF BRITISH SOLDIERS IN THE WEST INDIES.

We have frequently made inquiry concerning the health of our soldiers, stationed in the West Indies for the protection of Negro Slavery. Statements the most affecting have been made to us in reply, from those acquainted with the subject, especially from a lieutenant-colonel, and such as would deeply distress every considerate and feeling heart. The Editor of the Patriot Newspaper makes the following observations on this appalling state of things. "British India, with a population of 90,000,000, on an area of 1,128,000 square miles, is kept quiet by the presence of 17,000, in addition to the native force. In Jamaica, 'on account of existing circumstances,' it has been found requisite to increase the number of troops. Horrible indeed is the necessity which requires the presence of a larger force in the West Indies, to waste away and perish beneath the pestilential influence of the climate, than suffices to maintain our supremacy over a population nearly ninety times as numerous as the whole of the British West India islands contain, white, brown, and black, bond and free! Such is the cost of slavery, in treasure and in blood! When, a few years ago, returns were ordered to be laid before Parliament, of the state of our army in the West Indies, they were withheld, on the plea urged by the then Secretary at War, Sir Henry Hardinge, and acquiesced in by the House, that the details of the returns would be too horrible to meet the public eye. Out of three regiments, consisting of 2,700 men, sent to one of the islands, it was admitted that one-third had perished in a single season! Were slavery abolished, the whole defence of these colonies might be safely entrusted to a naval force and the local militia, and at least a million sterling be saved to the country!"

THE METROPOLIS,

COMPARED WITH THE PRINCIPAL TOWNS.

Importance of London, estimated by amount of Population, compared with the other large Towns of Great Britain: from the Census of 1831.

City of London......	122,799	Glasgow	202,426
Ditto, Westminster	202,891	Edinburgh	162,156
Bor. of Southwark .	134,117	Manchester	187,022

		Knaresborough	62,063
		Norwich	61,116
		Aberdeen	58,019
			1,431,864

By this statement it appears, that the Metropolis contains a population exceeding the Twelve largest Towns of England and Scotland. In a former Number of the Christian's Penny Magazine it was estimated, that there were Four Hundred Places of Worship of all denominations. Supposing each were weekly to contain within its walls fifteen hundred suppliants at the throne of grace, although that would be greatly exceeding the average, still it will be seen that not even one half could be accommodated! Yet how many of our chapels and churches do we find half empty! What an awful consideration, that in a population of nearly a million and a half, not one-third may reasonably be calculated upon as attending the service of God! Every real Christian will lament this great neglect of public worship, and exert himself in the sphere in which he moves to increase the number of the servants of God, and pray to the Almighty to prosper the endeavours of themselves and others to effect that great object.

SUPPLYING THE WORLD WITH BIBLES.

Compared with the cost of a Bible before the invention of printing, that wonderful art has been the means of diffusing the knowledge of the Scriptures to an amazing extent, and with surprising cheapness. But the disadvantage to the country, and to the world, by the charges of those who enjoy the exclusive monopoly of printing English Bibles, in the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, is truly serious, according to the statement of Mr. John Child, the celebrated printer of Bungay. In his evidence before a "Select Committee" of the House of Commons on the "King's Printers' Patents," recently published, that intelligent gentleman stated—"The Minion Testament, which sells wholesale at 1*s*. ought to be sold for 6½, or 7*d*.; the Brevier Testament, which sells for 10*d*. ought to be sold for 7*d*. or 7½; the Small Pica Bible, which sells for 7*s*. 3*d*. ought to be sold for 4*s*. 3*d*. or 4*s*. 6*d*.; the same, a fine edition, which sells for 16*s*. ought to be sold for 10*s*. or 11*s*; the Minion Bible, which sells for 4*s*. 5*d*. ought to be sold for 3*s*. or 3*s*. 3*d*. The Bible Society have paid upwards of half a million sterling more than they ought to have paid, of which sum the Norwich Branch Society alone have paid above 5000l. !"

Surely this statement deserves the most scrutinizing examination; and while the demand for the Word of God is increasing throughout the world, the Bible Society should not rest satisfied with the excessive charges of the proprietors of the King's Printers' monopoly. Certainly the period is arrived, when every possible effort should be made to supply the whole world with Bibles, perfect as to their accuracy, the most beautiful in typography, and at the very lowest price, that "the earth may be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

ENMITY TO PRAYER, ILLUSTRATED AND REPROVED.

Dr Hawker, in speaking of the aversion which has been sometimes shown in the features of the waiter of an inn, on adverting to family worship, mentions a striking instance of the same feeling which came under his own notice. "In the family of one, who is now a peer of the realm, well do I remember, where the most sovereign contempt was shown by the valet of the house to family worship. Not satisfied with constantly absenting himself upon those occasions, when prayer was observed in the house, he proceeded to show a yet more decided hatred to the service, and made a point to insult the whole of the family while at their devotions. For this purpose, he contrived to place himself in the adjoining room to the one in which they had assembled; and by noise in whistling, singing, and throwing about the furniture, as his corrupt humour dictated to him, in order to turn, if he could, the whole into ridicule. But without being supposed to know this conduct of his was designed, his master sent for him, and took occasion to inquire, how it was he never attended family prayer? 'Prayer,' said he, and with the most impudent brow of scorn and derision, 'I never did live in a praying family, and never will.' 'True, my friend,' said the Doctor, in answer to what he had heard, for he was present, 'you have for once spoken the truth; you never have known what prayer is, it is plain from what you have said, nor the blessedness of it, and living and dying in this state you never will: for in hell there are no prayers, and to that family you are hastening.'" Williams's Memoir of Dr. Hawker.

REMARKABLE INSTINCT OF THE ORANG OUTANG.

The Orang Outang of Borneo, is not so large as that mentioned in Abel's Voyage to China. Of Mr. Grant's the following circumstances have been noticed:—He was grave, and seemed pensive and melancholy, but he was curious, and attentive to remark what passed. His actions were prompt. He would arrange very well his little concerns. He drank milk willingly with a little tea, and ate bananas with pleasure. He learnt to hob and nob with a glass of wine; he was mild and rather kind, but a strange voice sometimes frightened him. His greatest passion was curiosity to examine all things: he touched them and turned them about, smelt them, and tried them with his teeth. Sometimes he played with some objects, and sometimes was angry with them, and tore or broke them. He learnt to dance. There was no occasion to threaten him, like other apes, with a stick; but he showed a great superiority of intellect over these. We could not avoid seeing a greater capacity for instruction in him, than in baboons or apes. When a dog came near him, he seemed surprised and alarmed, but showed no hostility or malignity, as monkeys do. When some Hindoos of Bengal came in sight, his gravity changed to fantastic and playful motions. After a woman had given him cold water instead of tea several times, he showed great vexation at it, and to know what it was, put his finger in. Observing this, she gave him hot water, which scalded him; after this he always put in a spoon or piece of wood first, and then touched the spoon. This action seemed very like human reflection.

Monkeys usually show some surprise at seeing themselves in a looking glass, but this Orang Outang surveyed himself in it with curiosity, and tried to ascertain its hardness by biting it, as he would other things. He was called Maharajah, and listened when he was called.

A Moral from the Monkeys.—The Monkeys in Exeter Change were confined in a line of narrow cages, each of which had a pan in the centre of its front for food. But when they were all supplied, scarcely any ate out of its own pan, but thrust its arm through the bars, to rob its right or left-hand neighbour, though its own pan was exposed to similar depredations. LONGEVITY OF FISHES.

Two ways of determining the age of fishes have been devised. One by numbering the concentric circles on the scales, the other, by those in a transverse section in the back-bone. On examining a fish's scale by a microscope, it is found to consist of circles, one of which is added every year. The same addition occurs to the back-bone. By this method Buffon found a carp to have lived 100 years. Gessner had one as old; and Alberto asserts, that another was double that period in the royal pond at Marli. Some particular fish were alive in the middle of the eighteenth century, which were traditionally recorded to have been placed there in the reign of Francis I, in the sixteenth century. A pike was found to be ninety years old; and Gessner states, that in 1497 one was taken in Swabia, that had a brazen ring with the date of 1230: but it is desirable to have such facts confirmed by modern experience. Buffon thought that whales have lived a thousand years.—Sharon Turner's History of the World.

CHRIST AN ALL-SUFFICIENT OFFERING FOR SIN.

With blood, but not his own, the awful sign
At once of sin's desert and guilt's remission,
The Jew besought the clemency divine,
The hope of mercy blending with contrition.
Sin must have death: its holy requisition
The law may not relax: the opening tomb
Expects its prey; mere respite, life's condition;
Nor can the body shun its penal doom.
Yet there is mercy; wherefore else delay
To punish? Why the victim and the rite?
But can the type and symbol take away
The guilt, and for a broken law requite?
The Cross unfolds the mystery! Jesus died!
The sinner lives; the law is satisfied!

With blood, but not his own, the Jew drew near
The mercy-seat, and Heav'n receiv'd his prayer;
Yet still his hope was dimm'd by doubt and fear;—
"If Thou should'st mark transgression, who might dare
To stand before Thee?" Mercy loves to spare
And pardon; but stern Justice has a voice,
And cries, Our God is holy, nor can bear
Uncleanness in the people of his choice.
But now One Offering, ne'er to be renew'd,
Hath made our peace for ever. This now gives
Free access to the throne of heav'nly grace,—
No more base fear and dark disquietude.
He who was slain, the accepted Victim, lives,
And intercedes before the Father's face!

THE CONSOLATION OF CHRIST.

When my mind faints beneath her tasks of care,
And my sick heart feels heavy, cold, and broken,
When life seems nought but unreserv'd despair,
Heav'n sends my soul one re-assuring token;
There rises o'er my griefs a vision rare,
A dearer self, more worthy of delight.
I think of Thee, who didst worse sorrows bear
So long, so well; with meekness, and the night
Of ceaseless agony which none could share,
Nor friends alleviate, till Truth and Time
Had seen Thee victor, patient yet sublime.
I could not, even in a dungeon, be Utterly dark, while I remember'd Thee!

AFRICAN ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

Justice is not unfrequently administered at Badagry, a large town in the interior, by means of a wooden three-cornered cap, which is placed on the head of the culprit at his examination. This fantastic work of mechanism, no doubt by internal springs, may be made to move and shake without any visible agent, as any other figure in our puppet-shows. It is believed the native priests alone are in the secret. When this cap is observed to shake whilst on the head of a suspected person, he is condemned without further evidence being required; but should it remain motionless, his innocence is apparent, and he is forthwith acquitted.

A respectable man was tried by this ordeal a short time since: the fatal cap was no sooner put on his head than it was observed to move slightly, and then become more violently agitated. The criminal felt its motion, and was terrified to such a degree that he fell down in a swoon. On recovering, he confessed his guilt, and implored forgiveness, which was granted him on account of his sorrow and contrition.—Landers' Journal.

HISTORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE ACCOUNT OF BRITISH INDIA,

From the most Remote Period to the Present Time, &c. With a Map and twenty-six Engravings. 3 vols. 12mo. Cloth, pp. 416, 460, 476.

"The British Empire in India," becomes every day more interesting to the people of England. We anticipate a vast extension of our commerce to that populous region of the earth, and to the unnumbered myriads that people the countries beyond it; and with the increase of British commerce, the promulgation of the gospel of Christ, and the prevalence of our pure and divine religion. Independently, therefore, of the consideration of British politics and government in India, our readers will feel a deep interest in these volumes, which contain a vast mass of various information concerning that interesting country. We have pleasure in recommending them to our readers, as peculiarly adapted for the family library. Without making extracts for the present, we shall content ourselves with transcribing the names of the talented authors, whose reputation will inspire universal confidence. Hugh Murray, Esq. IMPROMPTU ON WASTE.

Oh! waste not thou the smallest thing
Created by Divinity!
For grains of sand the mountains make,
And atomies infinity.

Waste thou not then the smallest time;
'Tis imbecile infirmity:
For well thou know'st, if aught thou know'st,
That seconds form eternity.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

LONDON IN THE MONTH OF MAY.

ON! famous through every land, as the "Seat ipire"—the "Fountain of Intelligence"—the t of Nations"—the "Golden City!" This n "Babylon the Great," celebrated for every that can minister to the delights of sense, deserves ely higher distinctions than those which arise sublunary sciences, useful arts, or the most regratifications!

don boasts her scholars the most profound—her ophers the most penetrating—her statesmen of ghest wisdom—her commanders of the greatest —and her patriots of the noblest order: and her numerous sons are worthily the subjects of nstant glory.

don, daily throughout the year, exhibits the new eries, and the useful labours of her scientific,
, and active sons: but MAY, the loveliest of all volving months, consecrated by the servants of to godlike benevolence, is distinguished in this polis by the high festivals of religion and charity, iversal philanthropy.

"Hail! thou, the fleet year's pride and prime!
  Hail! month, which fame should bid to bloom!
Hail! image of primeval time!
  Hail! emblem of a world to come!"

ciples of the Son of God, "created in Christ unto good works, which God had before ordained e should walk in them," in this month especially their holy confederation in labours to enlighten, less with evangelical riches the whole family of ind. They recognize man as the "offspring of ' destined for immortality, and born to live for but appointed to learn on earth the mysteries
rnal grace; to receive his education in this world, to qualify him for the possession of everlasting mansions in the glorious city of God.

Sworn "to do good," acknowledging every child of man a brother, feeling the illuminating and inspiring influences of the Holy Spirit, and guided by the Holy Scriptures, which they regard as divinely adapted to be the means of recovering the wandering children of Adam in all nations to the knowledge, and friendship, and image of their blessed Maker, the disciples of Christ in Britain hold their sacred anniversaries in May, while reviving, blooming nature seems especially to invite them to glorify God their Saviour. Regarding with reverential affection the faithful and gracious promises of God, they embrace in their enlarged benevolence of heart, all the nations and tribes of the earth, assured that they are not labouring in vain, but that in their persevering efforts, crowned with the Divine benediction, "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea."

Consecrated to patriotism, philanthropy, and religion, London now possesses a noble edifice, in which the people of God, the friends of humanity, assemble to report their annual proceedings in the great institutions. EXETER HALL, the temple of Christian benevolence, though externally less splendid than royal palaces, is an object of deep interest in the British metropolis. It attracts its thousands from all parts of the kingdom, from the Continent, and even across the Atlantic Ocean, to share in the luxury of doing good; and it presents on those delightful occasions the most inspiring scenes, which can be contemplated by men or angels.

We purpose giving brief reports of the principal Societies as they may hold their anniversaries this May; but for the information of our readers, we shall give here a brief account in chronological order of the formation of the principal institutions, which adorn and bless our age and country; by which they will be enabled to form a more tolerable idea of the progressive advancement of scriptural religion!

America, it should be remembered, was first colonized by Missionary efforts, commencing in 1620; from which several institutions arose; among which are to be reckoned "The Incorporated Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge," formed in 1698, and a branch of this, denominated "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts." These arose out of the First Bible Society, formed in 1670, at whose head was Dr. Thomas Gouge; and the "Society or Company for Propagating the Gospel in New England and the parts adjacent in America," in 1663, whose principal founders were, the Rev. Richard Baxter, Henry Ashworth, Esq., and the Honourable Robert Boyle.

1709. Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland.
1732. The Moravian Missions commenced.
1736. Rev. John Wesley went as Missionary to Georgia, America.
1737. Rev. G. Whitfield went to join Mr. Wesley.
1750. The Book Society for promoting Religious Knowledge among the Poor. This was a kind of Bible Society; and as its subscribers receive back their amount of subscription in the most valuable religious books, chosen by themselves, at a reduced price, with liberty to purchase to any amount at the price, we recommend it to the consideration of all our readers.
1780. The Naval and Military Bible Society.
1784, and 1817. In the former year Mr. Wesley, in Conference, determined on sending assistance to America, and various labours were undertaken in the West Indies under the direction of Dr. Coke; but in the latter year the Methodist Missionary Society was formed.
1785. The Sunday School Society was formed.
1792. The Baptist Missionary Society.
1795. The London Missionary Society.
1796. The Scottish Missionary Society.
1796. The Village Itinerancy, or Evangelical Association for Spreading the Gospel in England.
1796. The London Itinerant Society.
1797. The Baptist Home Missionary Society.
1799. The Religious Tract Society.
1800. The Church Missionary Society.
1803. The Sunday School Union.
1804. The British and Foreign Bible Society.
1805. The British and Foreign School Society.
1806. The London Hibernian Society.
1808. The Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews.
1812. The Prayer Book and Homily Society.
1814. The Irish Evangelical Society.
1816. The Irish Society.
1818. The Continental Society.
1818. The Port of London Society, for Promoting Religion among British and Foreign Seamen.
1819. The Home Missionary Society.
1822. The Irish Society of London.
1823. The Ladies' Hibernian Female School Society.
1825. The Christian Instruction Society.
1828. The British Society for promoting the Religious Principles of the Reformation.

For a more detailed account of these and other similar institutions, see book ix, chap. ii, of "Church History through all Ages," by T. Timpson.

Christianity, from such an immensity of agency, must, under the Divine blessing, be making incalculable progress in the world. Surely every patriot, every philanthropist, every Christian must contemplate such a series of efforts as these Societies include, with the most heartfelt gratification, praying, "God be merciful unto us, and bless us; and cause his face to shine upon us. That thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations." Psalm lxvii, 1, 2.

HISTORIC NOTICES OF BABYLON.

Alexander, dying in the year B. C. 323, left "the world which he had conquered" in confusion; and we learn but little more of this mighty city for nearly two hundred years. About that period, Humerus, a Parthian conqueror, destroyed the noblest monuments of art yet remaining in Babylon. Several new cities, especially Seleucia, called New Babylon, were built by successive sovereigns in these regions, on the Euphrates and on the Tigris, for the purpose of immortalizing their own names; and by this means the old city was drained of its inhabitants, and spoiled of its building materials.

Babylon contained but a very thinly scattered, wretched population, at the commencement of the Christian era; and extensive tracts of land within its walls were brought under a partial cultivation. It continued to decline, and its desolation increased, till, in the fourth century, it was made a hunting-park for the Persian monarchs, its walls forming an inclosure for the breeding of wild beasts. Many ages succeeded, in which no record was made concerning Babylon; while, as was testified by the prophet, it was rapidly advancing to its appointed utter desolation.

Intelligent travellers from England, France, and Germany, have, within the last two centuries, satisfactorily ascertained the site of ancient Babylon. They have described its various ruins from personal inspection, and their testimony, which is in perfect harmony, illustrates the Divine prediction. Babylon, from being "the glory of kingdoms," is now the greatest of ruins; and after the lapse of two thousand four hundred years, it exhibits to the view of every visitor, the precise scenery described by the prophets of God.

As the counsels of Heaven had determined, "the name and remnant" are "cut off from Babylon." There "the Arab pitches not his tent:" there "the shepherds make not their folds:" but "wild beasts of the desert lie there, and their houses are full of doleful creatures." It is "a place for the bittern, and a dwelling place for dragons:" it is a "dry land and a desert," "a burnt mountain," "empty," "wholly desolate," "pools of water," "heaps," and "utterly destroyed," "a land where no man dwelleth," "every one that passes by it is astonished."

Superstition filling the minds of the wandering Arabs, and leading them to dread "the abode of evil spirits," and the natural terror at the wild beasts which dwell among the ruins of Babylon, restrain them from pitching their tents or making their sheepfolds there. The princely palaces and mansions of that wonderful city, utterly destroyed, present nothing to view but unshapely heaps of bricks and rubbish. Instead of their stately chambers, there are now caverns, where porcupines creep, and owls and bats nestle; where lions find dens, and jackals, hyenas, and other noxious animals, their unmolested retreats; from which issue loathsome smells, and the entrances to which are strewed with the bones of sheep and goats. On one side of the Euphrates, the canals are dry, and the crumbled bricks, on an elevated surface exposed to the scorching sun, cover an arid plain, and Babylon is "a wilderness," "a dry land," "a desert." On the other side, the embankments of the river, and with them the vestiges of ruins over a large space, have been swept away: the plain is in general marshy, and in many places inaccessible, especially after the annual overflowing of the Euphrates. Thus "no son of man doth pass thereby;" "the sea," or river, "is come upon Babylon," and "she is covered with the multitude of the waves thereof."

"Birs Nimrood," or the temple of Belus, which was standing after the commencement of the Christian era, is still to be distinguished. Several modern English travellers have visited and described it; from which it appears, that from its mere immensity, it is still worthy of being a relic of "Babylon the Great:" for though a mass of ruins only, it is no less than two hundred and thirty-five feet high. On these ruins, there are vast fragments of brickwork, which have been completely melted, and they ring like glass; by which it appears that they must have been subjected to a heat equal to that of the strongest furnace. From the summit of this mass, a distinct view may be had of the frightful heaps, which constitute all that now remains of ancient and glorious Babylon; and imagination itself could not conceive a more perfect picture of absolute desolation!

How vain the proudest works of the greatest mortals! Here we behold them brought to nothing; and the loftiest monuments of their power, genius, and riches levelled with the dust, and preserved in ruins for the purpose of illustrating and confirming the faithful testimony of the eternal God, recorded in his holy word against sinners. How wonderful are the predictions of his inspired servants, when compared with the events to which they direct our contemplation! and what a convincing demonstration do these afford of the truth and divinity of the Holy Scriptures! With what affecting propriety does Jehovah allege this awful instance of his foreknowledge, in relation to Babylon, and challenge all the false divinities and their votaries to produce any thing similar! "Who hath declared this from ancient time? Who hath told it from that time? Have not I, the LORD? And there is no God else beside me, a just God and a Saviour, there is none else beside me. Declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Isa. xlv, 21; xlvi, 10.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXVI.

On Grammar.

Dear Madam,

YOUR son must also learn grammar, which, although the etymology of the word does not express it, is the art of speaking or writing any language correctly. If the importance of this science be measured by its utility, it will be found to be inestimable; because the habit of expressing oneself correctly, either in writing or in speaking, secures the use of the fewest words really needful, the selection of the best words, and the use of such words as will convey the sense most explicitly and in the most unequivocal manner. This science, which, according to the ancient definition, teaches the use of right words in right places, serves to give the admirable precision we observe in legal documents, mathematical demonstrations, the description of philosophical experiments, the forms of contracts and agreements. The study of it tends to establish the habit of taking and of communicating clear perceptions. Whatever then may be the future occupation of your son, he will by the use of this habit save himself and others much trouble, and procure to himself and others much benefit. Half the controversies of mankind one with another result from the loose, indefinite manner in which they express themselves. Half the trouble in conducting a controversy is generally to ascertain the sense in which each party uses his terms. And the end of most controversies is, that when immense pains have been taken to determine this one point, the antagonists find that they each of them mean the same thing. Men take the same perceptions of a thing generally, but owing to an imperfection in their grammar, they express themselves as if their perceptions were different.

While you are teaching your child the rudiments of English grammar, and no one can teach them so well as his mother, you are teaching him the rudiments of the grammar of every other language which he may hereafter learn, since the terms used, and the sense of those terms (I speak of the principles of the art), are the same in reference to every language whatever.

I think it is to be sincerely wished that the nomenclature of grammar were improved. How awkward are the antiquated technicals of this science, such as noun substantive, noun adjective, verb, adverb, conjunction, preposition, &c. Why not call the first name instead of noun? How little does the word adjective express the meaning of the thing! What a metaphysical word is substantive!

Till, however, these terms are changed away for others, you must adopt them. If your son called these things by other names, and afterwards went to school, where the barbarous technicals are retained, he would feel, and to all intents and purposes be, a foreigner to the rest of the boys, and the rest of the boys would be foreigners to him. Upon the subject of grammar they would have no common means of communication. You must then be content to use these terms; and you have to hope, that though hard, repulsive, and unmeaning, except to the accomplished scholar, your child will in the course of time learn to associate ideas with them.

But little more can be said for the definitions of these terms which you find in most Grammars. You will perhaps be surprised to hear the definition of noun substantive, which is taught now in every school using the Eton Latin Grammar.

"A noun is the name of whatsoever thing or being we see or discourse of, and has commonly a, an, or the, before it. A noun adjective requires to be joined to a noun substantive, of which it shows the nature or quality!"

You will not adopt these definitions. You need not adopt any out of any published Grammar, at least in the first instance. You will converse with your child, and in conversation alone will convey a luminous idea of the definitions of these words. You will tell him, that whatever he can perceive through his senses, whatever he can see, or hear, or smell, or taste, or feel, is called a noun.

That the word which tells what sort or quality the noun is of, is called an adjective; as, a white cloud.

Apply these two lessons first. Exercise him in the first by asking him, what the several objects around him are called, such as the table, window, chair, &c. &c. Then ask him to tell you what part of speech the quality, colours, &c. &c. of these things are called. A green tree: what part of speech is the word green? Thus diversify your application of these lessons to the utmost extent, and you will have taught him in one morning what he never would have learnt if he had devoted whole years in a purblind recital of written definitions.

Then proceed to the verb. Teach him that whatever I can do is called a verb. Tell him to think whether he or any one else can do the meaning of the word, then it is a verb. Thus, to love, to write, to sell, to walk, &c. Exercise him in this in a vast variety of particulars.

Then proceed to the adverb. The word which tells you how the verb is done is called an adverb. Thus, I see clearly; clearly tells me how I see: then it is an adverb. I write slowly, they sell dearly, he walks quickly. Slowly, clearly, quickly, are adverbs. Exercise him indefinitely upon this lesson.

Then teach him the pronoun. Every word which tells me who does or did it is a pronoun. I walk, you know, he told, we went, you said, they ran. Here I, you, he, we, you, they, are pronouns. Let the exercise on conversation on the pronoun be the next lesson.

Let the participle follow. Explain it thus: every word which tells me that any thing was being done, is called a participle. Thus, he walked along singing. Here, singing is the participle. Let a copious exercise follow.

In another lesson, tell him that the word which joins one thing to another, or separates one thing from another, is called a conjunction. Thus, a pen and a book, neither a man nor a dog. Here and and nor are called conjunctions. Illustrate this term by a multitude of instances.

Then tell him, that every word that means the place or the means whereby any thing is done, is called a preposition. Thus, I am going to London, he broke it with a hammer, he lives in London. Here to, with, in, are called prepositions. Set him examples.

Illustrate the interjection as being every word which calls out, as, Oh dear! &c. &c.

In a very short time he will be able to parse, or to tell you the technical names for the different words in a sentence. He will never forget these lessons: should he go to school, and be drilled into the system of committing verbal definitions of grammar to memory, he will understand them, he will make progress, and his progress will be comparatively cheerful.

With regard to the rules of grammar applicable to our own language, that is, the modes observed in writing and speaking by the most approved writers and speakers, you may teach him these also in conversation. Above all things, set him the pattern of perfectly grammatical language upon all occasions. Watch over every sentence he utters. Never let an error pass. Make the error troublesome to him. Make him delight in accuracy, precision, elegance. If you need a book to assist you, you will find the smaller and larger English Grammar of Mr. Murray quite sufficient. Nor do I see any reason why the intelligent and well-educated mother might not teach her children, by conversation and verbal exercises, and by watching over their language, every grammatical rule relative to our language. As soon as you begin to teach them the syntax of the language, let them write an exercise every week. Let them write a letter to you, or describe a visit to a public exhibition, or, which is better still, relate from memory an incident of authenticated history which they have been reading, and in which they feel interested. They will then use their own language, and they will use language which will afford an opportunity for every variety of grammatical exercise. English grammar, or the art of writing or speaking English correctly, is to be acquired as a habit. The habit is better acquired by exercise in the method I have advised, than by committing rules of grammar to memory. Happy the mother who is capable and willing to save her children the labour, and to communicate the entire principles of this useful science, in this vivid, easy, delightful, and permanent mode.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

CLERICUS.

DEATH OF ADMIRAL LORD GAMBIER.

APRIL 19, in the 77th year of his age, this pious nobleman departed this life, at his seat at Iver, near Uxbridge. Doubtless he has entered into his eternal joy, through faith in the Redeemer, whom he gloried publicly to acknowledge as his Divine Lord.

Lord Gambier was one of the few surviving officers who commanded on the memorable first of June. On that occasion he commanded the "Defence" of 74 guns, which was the first ship that broke the line. The "Defence" was dismasted in the action, and had to contend with two French ships of the line, one on each side, both of which struck to him. At the taking of Copenhagen in 1807, Admiral Gambier was the commander-in-chief of the naval force; and for that service he was rewarded with a peerage, under the title of Baron Gambier of Iver, in the county of Buckingham. A pension of 2,000*l.* a year was also granted to him: but, like a noble-minded patriot, he generously declined the pecuniary reward. His lordship again commanded the naval force against the French, in the Basque Roads.

This venerable nobleman deserves an honourable record on account of "his gallant conduct" as a commander in the British navy. But while we acknowledge his "professional talents," and his personal bravery, we confess that we have been accustomed to entertain respect for his character as a firm believer in the gospel of Christ, and a consistent, active, generous friend to those institutions, which have been formed to promote the kingdom of Christ among mankind. The Church Missionary Society, and the Port of London and Seaman's Friend Societies, have lost in him a valuable patron and a liberal supporter: but as the cause of Christ did not originate with Lord Gambier, nor depend on him, we trust that divine grace will be shed forth upon many who will be like-minded, and still more useful, possessing a double portion of his spirit.

Lord Gambier was worthy of his pious ancestry. Nicholas Gambier, his lordship's great-grandfather, was a French Protestant, who took refuge in England from the dreadful persecutions which were revived in France on the shameful "Revocation of the Irrevocable Edict of Nantz," in the year 1685.

For the sake of our less informed readers, we will, in a future number, give an account of this most interesting occurrence in Church History.

ON THE BIRTH OF THE THIRD DAUGHTER,

The Fifth Child. March 12, 1833.

Helpless stranger, thou art welcome!
  God in goodness thee has given;
Thou shalt have our kind attention,
  Training thee for earth and heaven.

Thou art born to live for ever!
  O how precious is thy soul!
Suns and stars shall be extinguish'd,
  Yet wilt thou survive the whole!

By our precept and example,
  We will teach the heavenly road,
Show the path of truth and duty,
  Lead thee to thy Saviour God.

Grow in stature, fill'd with wisdom;
  We will seek the Spirit's grace:
God, thy sun and shield, shall bless thee,
  Every step throughout thy race.

Then at last in heights of glory
  We shall shine at God's right hand;
Sing redeeming power and mercy,
  Join'd with all the blissful band.

THOUGHTS ON THE SACRED HISTORY OF THE CREATION.

It is of peculiar importance to that happiness we derive from intellectual convictions, that we possess in the beauties and blessings of the vegetable creation, such universal and exuberant witnesses to us of the philanthropy of the Divine Creator The flowers, fruits, and foliage of nature's verdant kingdom, have been purposely made what they are, purely to give us the pleasure they excite and the benefits they convey. We never act towards each other with that inventive, persevering benevolence, which has been exerted by our Maker in the formation of his vegetable kingdom; and this benefaction is still in all regions reproduced at every vernal and autumnal season. Every flower we handle is an evidence to us of this particular deliberation, and therefore of the kindness which suggested it. And yet they have all been created with such an exuberance, that not only every peopled country swarms with its own beauties, but heaths and deserts and uninhabited islands and mountains, scarcely accessible, have their peculiar and interesting vegetation. And there are no intelligent beings but ourselves to feel and value this loveliness. It has therefore been made specially, purposely, and exclusively for us; and in this view it is an unceasing testimony, that the grandest and mightiest of all Beings is the kindest that exists, and has been studiously careful to exhibit to us that he is so.

Grace, beauty, and elegance are the prevailing characteristics of the vegetable world. Thus plants are the representations to us of these divine ideas and feelings: they are the mirrors of the thoughts and imaginations of the Deity from whom they derive their being, and without which they could not have existed. In the vegetable world we therefore read an interesting portraiture of that wonderful intellect to which all creation is indebted for the science, loveliness, and sublimity which it so constantly exhibits to our contemplation or research.

Without vegetation, none of the animals we know, but those that live on water or air, could have continued in existence; for neither man nor animal can subsist on any thing in the mineral kingdom, until vegetation, by first making it vegetable substance, has prepared it for a future conversion into their own. Hence the justness of the Mosaic account, in placing the creation of plants before that of animals. Vegetation could have remained without animals; but these, unless their food had been ready for them, would, under their present economy of being, have soon disappeared.

It is likewise another expressive indication of the foreseeing and provident benevolence of the Almighty, that he has made the most useful trees and plants transferable from one region to another. It is from this property in them that we now possess many of our valued trees and flowers, and most gratifying luxuries of fruits and herbs. What pleases in one climate is transplanted into another, and there successfully naturalized.

From the creations we have described, the Deity proceeded to the formation of a very different description of material organization. This other grand division of life is that which constitutes the animal kingdom.

This new system of creation was begun on the fifth day in the production of the fishes and birds. "God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven." Thus the two earliest classes of animated beings were those that were to inhabit the two fluid mediums on our globe, the water and the air. Water differs from air in being 810 times heavier: sea water has still greater gravity. Fish have therefore in all their motions to force themselves through an element nearly 900 times heavier, and as such more resisting to them, than the air is to birds. This greater gravity assists their suspension, but impedes their motion; just as the vastly superior lightness of air facilitates the flight of birds, but gives no aid to their floating in it. The suspension of fishes in water, their power of floating, arises from the great fact, that their bodies are so made as to be of an equilibrium of weight with it. If we were to select one marking instance of the great exertion of intellect which must have accompanied creation, a more impressive one could scarcely be adduced than the adapted formation of every fish to the gravity of its watery abode. If all had been of one weight, one effort of thought and contrivance would have enabled all to swim; but every species of fish, and almost every one of that species, differs in its weight and size from each other.

But the creative skill and providing care were not confined to this equalization of space and bulk. Though the water itself differs in its gravity, as before mentioned, yet the fish float and swim alike amid this diversity. This is accomplished by means of an air-bladder in the middle of their body, which they can contract or expand as they please. Soles and flat-fish, which live at the bottom of the water, have not this vesicle. Fish likewise have a power and flexibility in their tail, which, by striking backwards against the water, impels them forward, as a bird's wings; and that it may have the habitual ability of doing so, it is made with the largest muscle in a fish's body. Even the faculty of sight they possess in common with other creatures, though specially modified and adapted to their element. Their mode of breathing is also with admirable ingenuity suited to the watery fluid they live in: this has always some air intermingled with its particles, and the winds and storms supply it with new additions. No portion of water is without air in its natural state, and fishes are so framed as to require no more than it thus contains. A very kind attention to their comfort also appears in the fact, that their natural temperature is but little above that of the fluid they inhabit, so that there is never a greater difference than two or three degrees. This benevolent provision secures them from the sensation of cold, which they would otherwise have suffered from. Their food is that which their element contains, and of which there is always abundance. Some subsist only on plants which grow in the sea, or on its shores: many more feed on herbs, worms, and insects: some use a kind of soft and fat earth: a larger number derive their sustenance from worms and insects, without any vegetable mixture. But the great majority of the fish nation subsist on each other: some of them even consume those of their own species which they can master.

Fishes for the most part have pleasing forms: the largest number of the fish tribes are very agreeable objects to our sight; many, eminently beautiful in their colours and in their general appearance. Though dwelling in a watery medium, yet the light often combines richly its adorning beams in their exterior surface, and emanates from them its softest and sweetest brilliance. Our commonest fish are often highly pleasing: some have golden spots or hues; and many, a silvery gloss: others display a fine tinge of blue; some, pleasing tints of green: delicate diffusions of various colours make other species interesting to us. The effect of the whole is, that the general appearance of the fish creation, in their forms, colours, brilliancy, rapidity of movement, and animation, excite sentiments of pleasure and admiration.

The general character of fish is that of gentleness and harmlessness. This is impressively exhibited by most of its largest tribes: the great whale pursues no other animal, leads an inoffensive life, and is harmless in proportion to its strength to do mischief: the massy sturgeon is of the same gentle nature. These mightier chiefs of the finny nation are the true representatives of its general character: all are for the most part the same mild, playful, unoffending beings. But the ocean contains some of a different humour, as the woods and mountains have the wolf and tiger. The grampus will attack the whales and seals: the dorado pursues the flying-fish, but the object here is food: even the dreaded shark is rather unmolesting, except towards its appointed food; and the great deep usually presents to our consideration an immense space of animal harmony and temperate enjoyment. No life can be simpler than theirs: none seems more universally pleasurable: they represent to the contemplative mind an actual image of placid happiness in life, and of unfelt departure from it. It is our advantage above them, that we can add to their placidity the enjoyment of moral principles, mental sensibilities, the sublimer feelings of our highest destination, and the gratifying pleasures of social communication. Yet amid life's varied streams and sources of transport and pain, we learn at last to prefer those milder and more enduring pleasures, to the excitements that engage our youth and maturer strength. As age advances, we appreciate the value of sedate tranquillity, of patient hope, of intellectual rumination, and of those solemn aspirations of gratitude and humble reliance on the Great Mediatorial Deity, which close our mortal days with true dignity, and make even dissolution an inestimable blessing.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICE OF THE LATE REV. ROWLAND HILL, A.M.

The Rev. Rowland Hill merited the esteem and confidence of the nation; and thousands of Christians of all denominations are deeply lamenting his loss, saying, in the language of King David for a distinguished but unhappy nobleman, "Know ye not that there is a great man fallen in Israel." 2 Sam. iii, 38.

This lamented minister of Christ was born Aug. 12, 1744. He was named after his excellent father, Sir Rowland Hill, Bart. of Shropshire. Mr. Hill was educated at Eton college, and at St. John's, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.A. with éclat. At the age of about twenty-two, he preached occasionally at the Rev. G. Whitfield's Tabernacle, and the chapel in Tottenham Court Road, by which he threw difficulties in the way of his ordination.

The bishop of Bath and Wells was, however, induced to admit him to Deacon's orders; but not being willing to promise conformity to ecclesiastical order, in refraining from ministerial intercourse with other denominations of Christians, Mr. Hill could not obtain Priest's orders. Making but little account of further ordination in the church of England, he declined seeking preferment, and determined on having an independent chapel for his own ministrations in London. He laid the first stone of Surrey Chapel in 1783, and in 1784 it was finished and opened. About this period Mr. Hill married Miss Mary Tudway, sister of Clement Tudway, Esq. M.P. for Wells. After about forty-four years of much domestic happiness, Mrs. Hill departed this life a few years ago, leaving no issue.

Mr. Hill usually spent about six months of the year in London, and the other part of the year officiating at another of his chapels at Wotton-under-Edge, Gloucestershire, or as a deputation for some of the great religious institutions: and through his public ministry, during a period of about sixty-seven years, perhaps no man, unless we may except the Rev. John Wesley, has ever borne so much opposition, or been the instrument of so much good, maintaining so upright and venerated a character. Mr. Hill was enabled to prosecute his labours almost to the close of his life. His last sermon to his congregation was on Mar. 31, 1833, on 1 Cor. ii, 7, 8, "We preach the wisdom of God in a mystery," &c. His last public address was on Tuesday evening, April 2, to the Sunday Schools assembled at Surrey Chapel, on 1 Cor. xv, 58, "Therefore be ye stedfast, always abounding in the work of the Lord," &c. He entered his eternal rest on Thursday afternoon, April 11, 1833.

A GREAT MAN HAS FALLEN IN ISRAEL!

The Rev. Rowland Hill was great in Family rank. Shropshire has for many centuries been adorned and blessed with the family of the Hills. At the time of the Reformation, in the reign of Henry VIII, we find interesting notices of this family. In conversation with our late venerable friend, he stated it as one of his most gratifying reflections in relation to his own family, that one of his ancestors, bearing the name of his revered father, and his own name, Sir Rowland Hill, was the first Protestant Lord Mayor of London. History verifies this statement. Our readers are aware also that Lord Hill, Commander in Chief of the British Forces, is a nephew of the late Rev. Rowland Hill.

The Rev. Rowland Hill was great as a Preacher. Whitfield excepted, perhaps England has never been blessed with a greater preacher. He was sound, orthodox, evangelical, and above all, by the blessing of God exceedingly USEFUL. Mr. Hill could not be compared with Dr. Chalmers or Robert Hall, for elegance of style or beauty of diction; but, notwithstanding some eccentricities, for those qualities which are adapted for usefulness, especially to the mass of the people, Mr. Hill possessed qualities far superior. We remember after a sermon, a few years ago, from our late friend, hearing a gentleman, who is one of the finest writers of our times, say he was astonished to hear from any one so many excellent things, in the course of an hour, as had been just uttered by Mr. Hill. His popularity continued to the close of his labours.

The Rev. Rowland Hill was great as a Christian. Personal piety was the spring of all his moral excellence. Experimental Christianity shed that loveliness over his whole character, which shone both in public and private through a long and unspotted life. Mr. Hill's religious principles were those of the British martyrs, in which the whole body of Christians through all ages have been substantially agreed, and which are now held by the pious part of the Church of England, the Church of Scotland, and the principal bodies of Dissenters. The great points of Mr. Hill's theology were the following: The perfection of the Holy Scriptures as a divine revelation, and the only rule of faith and practice — the essential divinity, the incarnation and atonement of the Son of God — justification through the righteousness and sacrifice of Christ — regeneration and sanctification by the influences of the Holy Spirit — and the resurrection to eternal life and happiness, as the free gift of sovereign grace through the mediation of Christ. These principles were the constant theme of Mr. Hill's ministry, and the support of his mind in the hour of dissolution. Reflecting on the holiness of God, and our obligations to glorify Christ with all our powers and talents, as the proof of a true faith, and on the withering influence of that awful abuse of the Christian profession, whose great peculiarity is unfruitful SELFISHNESS, Mr. Hill, a few minutes before he died, raised himself up in his bed, and with his characteristic emphasis said to a friend sitting by him, "The greatest curse that ever afflicted the church of God is dirty Antinomianism!"

A short time before he breathed his last, a friend at his bed-side said to him, "You will soon be with the Lord Jesus." "Yes," added this great Christian, "and like him too." Thus as he lived he died, thirsting for holiness.

> "His God sustain'd him in his final hour:
> His final hour brought glory to his God."

The Rev. Rowland Hill was great as a Patriot. Patriotism was the natural fruit of his scriptural piety. For the peace and security, the liberty and prosperity of his country, Mr. Hill laboured and prayed. "He went about doing good" to his country, after the blessed example of his Divine Master. And whatever had a manifest tendency to meliorate or improve the condition of the population, found in him a generous patron. Schools, alms-houses, chapels, throughout the United Kingdom, received from his liberal hand a prompt contribution, and eternity alone will disclose the amount of good effected by his liberality, example, and influence.

The Rev. Rowland Hill was great as a Philanthropist. Beyond mere patriotism, Mr. Hill regarded the whole human race with a refined Christian compasssion. His philanthropy was engendered and cherished in his heart by the Spirit of God. Contemplating mankind through the medium of the Holy Scriptures, and believing their misery and corruption by the fall could be counteracted and cured only by the saving knowledge of Christ, he was the zealous supporter of every institution formed to promote the extension of the Gospel. Mr. Hill was an active member and a generous friend of the Missionary Societies, Bible Societies, Tract Society, Religious Book Society, British and Foreign School Society, Home Missionary Society, and other evangelical institutions; believing from the word of God, that "charity to the soul is the soul of charity."

We understand that his regular annual subscriptions to these various societies were about eighty guineas; but we should think that his occasional contributions exceeded five times that amount. Many splendid donations and contributions of Mr. Hill we have in distinct recollection, one of 2,700*l.*; another of about 2,000*l.*; and another of 1,500*l.*; the particulars of which it may not be prudent to state in this place.

What further need we say of this truly GREAT MAN? He was a great Preacher, a great Christian, a great Patriot, and a great Philanthropist! Let our readers reflect upon his great principles, drawn from the Gospel of Jesus Christ; and while they embrace and cherish the same, let them remember that the "residue of the Spirit" is with God, and pray that it may be shed forth in plentiful degrees, to form multitudes equally eminent with our sincerely lamented friend—the Rev. ROWLAND HILL!

"The Bee that wanders, and sips from every flower, disposes what she has gathered into her cells."—SENECA.

MONSIEUR HOMEL.

HE was pastor of the Protestant church at Vivaretz, in the province of Cevennes in France; and was with the most horrible popish cruelty broken upon the wheel at Tournon, a city in the same province, October, 1683.

The following account was written by an eye and ear-witness, who declared that the remembrance of it caused him to tremble, and his hair to stand upright.

"I count myself happy," said this saint at his execution, "that I can die in my Master's quarrel. What! Would my gracious Redeemer descend from heaven to earth, that I might ascend from earth to heaven? Would he undergo an ignominious death, that I might be possessed of a most blessed life? Verily, if, after all this, to prolong a frail and miserable life, I should lose that which is everlasting; should I not be a most ungrateful wretch to my God, and a most cruel opposer of my own happiness? No, no—the die is cast, and I am immoveable in my resolution. I breathe after that hour. O when will that good hour come, that will put a period to my present miserable life, and give me the enjoyment of one which is infinitely blessed? Farewell, my dear wife. I know your tears, your continual sighs, hinder your bidding me adieu. Do not be troubled at this wheel upon which I must expire: 'tis to me a triumphal chariot, which will carry me into heaven. I see heaven opened, and my sweet Jesus with his outstretched arms ready to receive me; for he is the divine spouse of my soul. I am leaving the world, in which there is nothing but adversity, in order to go to heaven and enjoy everlasting felicity. You shall come to me, I shall never return to you. All that I recommend to you is, to educate our dear children in the fear of God, and to be careful that they swerve not from the way prescribed to them in the holy scriptures. I have bequeathed them a little formulary for their instruction, to the end that if ever they be brought into the like condition with myself, they may undergo it courageously, and be confident in the goodness of our God, who will send the Divine Comforter to strengthen them in all their straits and distresses. Prepare them for suffering betimes, that in the great day, when we shall appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, we may be able to bespeak him, Lord, here we are, and the children whom thou hast graciously given us. Ah! I shall never have done. Ah! why am I hindered from departing? Farewell, my dear people. 'Tis the last farewell I shall ever give you. Be stedfast; be fixed; and know, that I never preached to you any thing but the pure truth of the gospel, the true way which leads to heaven."

A person telling him that he had spoken too much—"How!" said he, "have I spoken too much? I have spoken nothing but the very truth. I have neither spoken nor done any thing in the least injurious to the sacred majesty of our august monarch; on the contrary, I have always exhorted the people committed by the Lord to my charge, to render those honours which are due to our King. I have taught them that our lives and fortunes are at his disposal, and that we are bound to employ them in the defence of his estate and crown. But as for our consciences, we hold them of our God, and must keep them for him."

Immediately upon this, his judges turning from him, ordered the executioner to perform his office; which thereupon he did, by breaking his arms and legs: and being then asked, whether he would die a Roman Catholic?—he answered, "How, my lords! Had it been my design to change my religion, I would have done it before my bones had been thus broken to pieces. I wait only for the hour of my dissolution. Courage! courage! O my soul! Thou shalt presently enjoy the delights of heaven. And as for thee, O my poor body, thou shalt be reduced to dust; but 'tis that thou mayest be raised a spiritual body. Thou shalt see things that never entered into the heart of man, and which are in this life impossible to be conceived."

Again addressing himself to his wife, he said, "Farewell once more, my well-beloved spouse. I am waiting for you. But know, that though you see my bones are broken to shivers, my soul is replenished with inexpressible joys."

Every limb, member, and bone of his body, were broken with the iron bar, forty hours before the executioner was permitted to strike upon his breast le coup de grace—that death-stroke which put an end to all his miseries.

EPITAPH inscribed on the Tombstone of an honest Carter, who was killed by his waggon. Written by Dr. Bowden, of Frome, 1760.

Warn'd by my fate, be ever on your guard,
Lest sudden death surprise you unprepar'd.
Healthy and strong, I thought no danger near,
Stranger alike to sickness, pain, and fear.
Pleas'd with my team, I thoughtless drove along,
The horses' bells kept jingling to my song;
And little did I ween—ah! simple swain!—
That Death on his pale horse was in the train;
Or that the pond'rous vehicle I drove
Would soon my hearse and funeral carriage prove;
The tilt become a shroud, and every bell
Chime but a prelude to my passing knell.
Alas! my fate was spun in early age,
And Death here drove me to my final stage!

lendid building, but it is doubtful whether a gospel sermon were ever preached within its Probably our readers will be interested with phical notice of the Saint, to whose honour the is dedicated, rather than a description of the g.

artin is said to have been born A. D. 316, at , now called Stain, in Lower Hungary. His ras a military tribune; and Martin himself was to carry arms, though he was greatly inclined retirement, and to cherish peace. While a man he was eminent for his temperance and II. the practice of virtue: but being converted to Christianity, he renounced the profession of arms, was baptized in the name of Christ, and embraced the monastic life. After passing some years in solitude, he returned to Sabaria, and converted his mother, and with great zeal opposed the Arians, who prevailed in Illyria, and by them he was publicly whipped. Martin afterwards retired to the neighbourhood of Poictiers, where he remained till he was chosen bishop of Tours, A. D. 374. He built the celebrated monastery of Marmontier, near Tours, between the Loire and a steep rock, where he displayed the most exemplary sanctity. He afterwards became a missionary through France, diffusing the doctrines of Christianity among the heathen of that country, and destroying their temples. Martin was treated with distinguished honours by Valentinian, and the tyrant Maximus. He used his influence in support of the persecuted Priscilianists, while suffering from the bigotry of Ithace and Idace, bishops of Spain. He died at Candes, A. D. 397, or as others say, in 400. The Roman Catholics canonized Martin as a Saint; and it is remarkable that he was the first to whom the Latin church offered public prayers, in their criminal idolatry. We cannot but believe that Martin was a man of God, superior to many of his time, and zealous for the conversion of souls to Christ.

SEVERUS'S ARCH

Was erected in honour of that emperor's conquest of Parthia. Severus was an African, distinguished for his ambition, activity, and avarice. He was born A. D. 155, and died A. D. 211, at York. Our design will not allow us to give a detailed account of this renowned emperor, of whom it was said, as of Augustus, "It would have been better for the world had he never been born, or had never died." While Severus was temperate, and a professed lover of justice, in his stoical virtue, it is said of him, "He never performed an act of humanity, nor forgave a fault."

SEVERUS'S WALL IN ENGLAND.

Our readers will, however, be gratified by an account of the celebrated Roman barrier, erected under the direction of this emperor in Britain, as a security against the Caledonians, and called "SEVERUS'S WALL." Spartianus, a Roman historian, speaks of this rampart in these terms: "He fortified Britain with a wall drawn across the island from sea to sea; which is the greatest glory of his reign. After the wall was finished, he retired to the next station (York), not only a conqueror, but the founder of an eternal peace."

Rapin says, "The wall was of free stone, as is certain from what is yet visible. In some places, where the foundation was not good, they seem to have made use of oaken piles. The inner part of this wall is filled with pretty large, and mostly broad and thin stones, always set edge-ways, somewhat obliquely. Upon these the running mortar or cement was poured, and by this contrivance the whole wall was bound as firm as a rock. These stones are supposed to have been brought from Helbeck-Scur on the Gelt and Leuge-Crag, as appears from an inscription on the rock that hangs over the Gelt. The wall generally measures about eight feet thick, and twelve high. Upon the wall were placed castles, or Chesters, sixty feet square, about six and a half furlongs from each other, and turrets four yards square, about three hundred yards from each other. There seems to have been four turrets between every two castles. The centinels placed in the turrets being within call, the communication quite along the wall might be kept up, without having recourse to the fiction of pipes laid under-ground to convey the sound: though this seems to be credited by Echard and others.—It is observable, that the legionary soldiers were employed in building this wall, as they generally were in works of this nature. This is evident from the Centurial inscriptions on the stones of the wall, showing what part was built by each Centuria."

The length of this wall, from Cousin's House near the mouth of the Tyne on the east, to Boulness on the Solway Frith on the west, has been found from two actual measurations to be little less than sixty-eight English miles, and a little less than seventy-four Roman miles. The usual complement allowed for the defence of this celebrated wall was as follows:

Twelve cohorts of foot, consisting of 600 men each..	7,200
One cohort of mariners in the station at Boulness....	600
One detachment of Moors, probably equal to a cohort	600
Four alæ, or wings of horse, about 400 each...	1,600
	10,000

For the convenience of marching these troops from one part of the wall to another with greater ease and expedition on any service, it was attended with two military ways, paved with stones in the most solid and beautiful manner. This prodigious wall proved an impenetrable barrier to the Roman territories for nearly two hundred years. But about the beginning of the fifth century, the Roman empire being assaulted on all sides, and their forces being withdrawn from Britain, this rampart fell before swarms of daring Scots and Picts. Its beauty and grandeur procured it no respect in the dark and tasteless ages which succeeded, and it became the common quarry for more than one thousand years, out of which all the towns and villages around were built; and at the present day it is so entirely ruined, that the penetrating eyes of the antiquary can scarcely trace its vanishing foundation!

THOUGHTS ON THE SACRED HISTORY OF THE CREATION.

A NEW system of exterior figure, and a new species of beauty, arose to visible existence in the feathered creation. The birds eminently surpass all the marine classes in their attractive appearance. Form, motion, and colour, are the elements of what is beauteous in both orders of being; but the lovely and the pleasing impress us with more interesting effect in the sprightly tenants of the trees and air, than in the inhabitants of the seas. Beauty is indeed everywhere about us, and every mind may be sensible of it that will observe where it exists. For our own sakes we ought to cherish a taste for it: for such are its soothing effects, that it cannot be anywhere seen and felt without sensible pleasure. The bird classes partake of it so generally in some respect or other, that the rudest minds become milder or happier from their presence, in all climes and in all ages. Wilson, in his American Ornithology, says, he has observed the rudest and most savage of the Indians softened into benevolence, while contemplating the interesting manners of these innocent little creatures.

The plumage of birds is peculiar to their order, and is remarkable for the skill and delicacy of its composition. In the equatorial regions it is more rich and splendid in its colours, yet always harmonizing in its most contrasted tints, and in its lights and shades; and though the effect is sometimes gorgeous, yet it is never tawdry. Birds also charm the ear as well as regale the sight, and thus satisfy our two most intellectual senses. The music and the beauty do not always unite in the same bird in equal excellence: our nightingale and peacock are instances of the separation. In the Indian hemisphere, both however are frequently combined: and in North America, the bird that is called the Virginian Nightingale, is also styled the Cardinal from his brilliant red plumage.

The birds of song abound in every known country, in the new continent as well as the old one; but as they are seldom found in the depth of dense forests, they are the more usual companions of civilized man: they frequent most the cleared and cultivated plains, as if to increase the number of human pleasures. Neither childhood nor manhood can hear them with indifference: their notes are everywhere a large addition to human gratification, and become connected with the sweetest remembrances of the most joyous season of our life. It is an error to say that Nature has denied melody to the birds of hot climates, and formed them only to please the eye with their gaudy plumage: Ceylon abounds with birds equal in song to those of Europe.

Birds are distinguished from all other creatures by their power of supporting themselves in a medium so light as air, when, by the laws of gravity, they would fall like a stone. This they effect by the amazing strength and moveability of their pectoral muscles, and the expansile form and peculiar texture of their wings. Here again the most special and scientific calculation are manifest to our consideration. No blind force or random power could here have availed: a deliberating and knowing mind must have been their creator, combining what we term mathematical and mechanical science. The bodies of every species of birds differ in weight and bulk; but in order that they may fly, and remain suspended in the air while they do so, their motive energies must be proportioned to their individual gravity, and to the tenuity of the air: no general fitness would do; each distinct kind must have allotted to it a different degree peculiar to itself. So patient a condescension of Almighty Power and Intelligence, deigning to apply so much thought for the purpose of giving a multifarious variety to its creation, is far beyond our conception or panegyric. Yet it is an impressive testimony of his provident wisdom, acting for the instruction of his intelligent creatures.

Birds surpass all other creatures in the faculty of continuing their motion without resting as well as in rapidity. The fleetest horse cannot run more than a mile in a minute, nor support that speed more than five or six minutes: but the swallow does this for pleasure, for ten hours a day. Our carrier pigeons move with at least half that celerity from one country to another; and the golden eagle is supposed to dart through the fiercest storm at the rate of forty miles an hour.

One of the most special appointments of the Creator as to birds, and which nothing but his chosen design can explain, is, the law that so many kinds shall migrate from one country to another, and most commonly at vast distances from each other. They might have been all framed to breed, be born, live, and die, in the same region, as quadrupeds and insects do: but He has chosen to make them travel from one climate to another, with unerring precision, from an irresistible instinct, with wonderful courage, and in a right and never-failing direction. They cross oceans without fear, and with a persevering exertion that makes our exhausting labours comparative amusement. Philosophy in vain endeavours to account for the extraordinary phenomenon. Warmer temperatures are not always the object of emigration: the snow bunting, though a bird of song, goes into the frozen zone to breed and nurture its young. We can only resolve all these astonishing journeys into the appointment of the Creator, who has assigned to every bird its habits, as well as form, according to his good pleasure.

The quantity of individuals of the bird species at all times existing in our world, surpasses not only supposition, but even all power of human numeration. But this surprising quantity of birds renders it necessary that the insect world, on which all the smaller kinds feed, should be a thousand times more numerous. The 2,000,000 of starlings usually resident in the United States of America, have been computed to consume of the worms, caterpillars, &c. on which they subsist, during the four months of their breeding and nurturing their young, about 16,000,000,000. And if a single class of birds have this supply, all the other classes who use the same nutriment require as much. It is obviously impossible to enumerate the amount of the creatures which are always existing on our globe, and partaking of its produce in some way or other: yet so admirably are the whole placed and disposed, and so carefully regulated and adapted, as to us and to each other, that we are neither disturbed by, nor even conscious of the number. There is no crowding, no confusion, the enormous amount is nowhere visible to our sense: we must search it out in order to know it. What but an almighty sagacity, infinitely beyond the highest expansions of human genius, could have arranged such inexpressible multitudes of living beings into positions, limitations, and habits, so wisely appropriated to each, so productive of comfort to every one, and yet so conservative of the harmony, the order, and the general welfare of the immense and multiform whole!

We may remark, that the bird mind displays all the common faculties of animal intellect. Its memory is tenacious: the bulfinch never forgets the songs it has learned: most of the singing birds may be taught the notes of others. But it is in their nests that they display the most striking and varied indications of contriving and judging, and therefore of thinking intellect; confined indeed in the extent of its operations, but resembling reasoning intellect within this compass. Their affection for their young, their anxious contrivances to protect them, and little stratagems to mislead the marauder, evince feelings and mental activities analogous to those of other reasonable beings.

THREE MONTHS IN JAMAICA, IN 1832,

Comprising a Residence of Seven Weeks on a Sugar Plantation. By Henry Whiteley.

Mr. Whiteley arrived in Jamaica on the 3d of September 1832, being sent out by a respectable West India house in London, under the patronage of a relative of his, who is a partner in that house. He was recommended to a situation as clerk in a store, or a bookkeeper upon a plantation: but the horrors which he witnessed in the treatment of the slaves, and the shocking licentiousness of the whites, so disgusted him, that he determined on returning. The first day he arrived on the plantation, September 4, he saw six slaves brought up for punishment on account of an alleged deficiency of work. "No question," says he, "was asked of the culprits themselves, nor was any explanation waited for. Sentence was instantly pronounced, and instantly carried into execution.

"The first was a man of about thirty-five years of age. He was what is called a pen-keeper, or cattle-herd; and his offence was having suffered a mule to go astray. At the command of the overseer he proceeded to strip off part of his clothes, and laid himself flat on his belly, his back and buttocks being uncovered. One of the drivers then commenced flogging him with the cart-whip. This whip is about ten feet long, with a short stout handle, and is an instrument of terrible power. It is whirled by the operator round his head, and then brought down with a rapid motion of the arm upon the recumbent victim, causing the blood to spring at every stroke. When I saw this spectacle, now for the first time exhibited before my eyes, with all its revolting accompaniments, and saw the degraded and mangled victim writhing and groaning under the infliction, I felt horror-struck. I trembled, and turned sick: but being determined to see the whole to an end, I kept my station at the window. The sufferer, writhing like a wounded worm, every time the lash cut across his body, cried out, 'Lord! Lord! Lord!' When he had received about twenty lashes, the driver stopped to pull up the poor man's shirt (or rather smock-frock), which had worked down upon his galled posteriors. The sufferer then cried, 'Think me no man? Think me no man?' By that exclamation I understood him to say, 'Think you I have not the feelings of a man?' The flogging was instantly recommenced and continued, the negro continuing to cry 'Lord! Lord! Lord!' till thirty-nine lashes had been inflicted. When the man rose up from the ground, I perceived the blood oozing out from the lacerated and tumefied parts where he had been flogged; and he appeared greatly exhausted. But he was instantly ordered off to his usual occupation.

"The next was a young man apparently of eighteen or nineteen years of age. He was forced to uncover himself and lie down in the same mode as the former, and was held down by the hands and feet by four slaves, one of whom was a young man who was himself to be flogged next. This latter was a mulatto—the offspring, as I understood, of some European formerly on the estate by a negro woman, and consequently born to slavery. These two youths were flogged exactly in the mode already described, and writhed and groaned under the lash, as if enduring great agony. The mulatto bled most, and appeared to suffer most acutely. They received each thirty-nine lashes. Their offence was some deficiency in the performance of the task prescribed to them. They were both ordered to join their gang as usual in the afternoon at cane-cutting.

"Two young women of about the same age were, one after the other, then laid down and held by four men, their back parts most indecently uncovered, and thirty-nine lashes of the blood-stained whip inflicted upon each poor creature's posteriors. Their exclamation likewise was 'Lord! Lord! Lord!' They seemed also to suffer acutely, and were apparently a good deal lacerated. Another woman (the sixth offender) was also laid down and uncovered for the lash; but at the intercession of one of the drivers she was reprieved. The offence of these three women was similar to that of the two young men—some defalcation in the amount of labour.

"The overseer stood by and witnessed the whole of this cruel operation, with as much seeming indifference as if he had been paying them their wages. I was meanwhile perfectly unmanned by mingled horror and pity. Yet I have no reason to believe that the natural feelings of this young man (whose age did not exceed twenty-four years) were less humane or sensitive than my own. But such is the callousness which constant familiarity with scenes of cruelty engenders. He had been a book-keeper, for four years previously, on another estate belonging to the same proprietors, and had been appointed overseer on this estate only a few months before. His reception of me when I arrived was so kind, frank, and cordial, that I could not have believed him, had I not seen it with my own eyes, to be capable of inflicting such cruelty on a fellow-creature.

"As soon as this scene was over, the overseer came into the hall, and asked me to drink some rum and water with him. I told him I was sick, and could taste nothing: that I was in fact overwhelmed with horror at the scene I had just witnessed. He said it was not a pleasant duty certainly, but it was an indispensable one; and that I would soon get used, as others did, to such spectacles. I asked if he found it necessary to inflict such punishments frequently. He replied it was uncertain: 'I may not,' he said, 'have to do it again this month, or I may have to do it to-morrow.'

"This, my first full view of West India Slavery, occurred on the 4th of September, 1832, between twelve and two o'clock, being the day after my landing in the island, and within an hour after my arrival on the plantation."

We recommend all our readers to procure a copy of this Tract for preservation, as an illustration of West India Slavery.

PROLONGATION OF INFANT SLAVERY IN ENGLAND.

Mr. Editor,

That they who have been accustomed to do evil should learn to do well, has been pronounced by the highest authority to be as impossible as for the Ethiopian to change his skin, or the leopard his spots. It is on this principle alone to be accounted for, that the Factory Slaveholders should cling to the grasp they have fastened on the unfortunate children of their countrymen, notwithstanding the universal cry that has been raised against their nefarious and destructive system.

Long and lamentable experience has shown, that when the love of gain once takes firm possession of the heart, honour and conscience, the rights of man and the laws of God, are alike sacrificed to the indulgence of the darling passion. The praiseworthy efforts made on behalf of the unhappy victims of the Factory System, have for the present been rendered abortive by the exertions of those interested in the continuance of this foul blot upon our Christian name and character:—and upon what plea? Upon the flimsy pretext of not legislating without further evidence! Evidence indeed! Can volumes of new evidence set aside the value of that which is already recorded to the disgrace of our country? Will proof, if it be obtained, that A or B's factory is properly conducted, have any tendency to disprove the enormities already shown to exist? Would proof of my safe arrival at home last night avail in any degree to rebut the fact of another man having been waylaid and murdered? The pretence is too contemptible to deceive the weakest mind, and only shows in a clearer light the necessity of the law sought for, by the absence of any thing like a reasonable ground for its refusal. What need of all this ado to show that factories are orderly and well-conducted establishments? If they be really so, the proposed law will not injure or interfere with them; if they are not, it is high time their abominations were put an end to.

Of this we may rest assured, that no exposure will rescue the unfortunate children from the grasp of avarice. The strong arm of the law alone can afford them any effectual protection. Mammon never quits his hold of his victims but by force. To the honourable merchants of Liverpool and Bristol, the clanking of the chains on board our slave ships made delightful music. The callous West Indian Slaveholder sees nothing in the condition of the wretched Negro, but an enviable state of easy servitude, and a comfortable provision in old age. Other honourable merchants find nothing amiss in the horrid orgies of Juggernaut. And the Cotton Factory Slaveholder takes credit to himself for the employment he furnishes to his poor neighbours, and reads the inflated accounts that are published from time to time of the wonders of steam, and the importance of the cotton trade, with feelings of pride in the vast consequence he supposes it imparts to himself. All act from one principle: that love of money which is the root of all evil, has blinded their eyes to the miseries they inflict upon their fellow-creatures, and rendered them deaf to the voice of humanity.

I hope, Mr. Editor, the Christian public will not suffer this pretence for delay to be any bar to their exertions against so monstrous an evil. Let us not cease for a moment to petition, and urge, and remonstrate, and leave no lawful means unresorted to for the overthrow of an abomination lamented by every humane mind at home, pointed at with scorn abroad, and which must be abundantly provoking in the eyes of Him to whom the cry of the oppressed is never raised in vain.

Anniversaries of Religious and Benevolent Societies.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

This valuable Society held its anniversary at Exeter Hall, on Monday, April 29, the Right Hon. Lord Morpeth in the chair. After singing the 100th Psalm, and prayer by the Rev. J. Entwistle, a very interesting Report of the Society's labours and successes during the past year was read by the Rev. J. Beecham and the Rev. R. Alder; from which it appeared, that there are in the schools in the Wesleyan Mission 27,676 children and adults, of whom 4,571 are slaves. The contributions for the past year amounted to 47,715*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.* being the largest amount yet realized from the ordinary sources of the Society.

It will be truly gratifying to every real Christian to find the increasing catholic spirit which prevails in this, as it advances we trust in every other Missionary society. This is evident from the speakers being of different denominations. The resolutions were moved and seconded by the Rev. J. Hannah, of Huddersfield, Methodist; the Rev. G. Clayton, of Walworth, Independent; Captain Pakenham, R. N. Churchman; John Hardy, Esq. M. P. Recorder of Leeds, Churchman; Rev. P. Duncan, Wesleyan Missionary from Jamaica; H. Pownal, Esq. Churchman; T. F. Buxton, Esq. M. P. Churchman; Captain Fenton, M. P. for Huddersfield; the Rev. R. Newton, President of the Methodist Conference; Thomas Guest, M. P.; the Rev. E. Ryerson, Missionary from Upper Canada; Lancelot Haslope, Esq. Treasurer of the Society; and J. Heald, Esq. of Stockport. The most delightful spirit of Christian piety and zeal seemed to pervade the meeting, and a determination to pursue the glorious work, depending on the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

The Twenty-ninth Anniversary of this great Institution was held at Exeter Hall on Wednesday the 1st of May. The chair was taken by the Right Hon. Lord Bexley. An abstract of the Report of the Society being read, it appeared that the cause of the Bible is gloriously progressing in almost every part of the world. A measure of gloom seemed to be thrown over the meeting by the announcement, that the receipts of the Society were less by about 6000*l.* this year than the last; but the friends of the Bible seemed alive to the interests of the Society; acknowledgments of too little zeal were made on the part of some of the speakers, and professions of more determined devotedness to promote its prosperity. Several donations were sent up to the chairman during the meeting, one of 100*l.* another of 50*l.* and several of 10*l.* as evidence of a resolution to make up the deficiency. The meeting was addressed by the Bishop of Winchester; Joseph John Gurney; a member of the Society of Friends; Dr. Cox, a Presbyterian minister from America; ——— Shepherd, Esq. of Frome, we believe a Baptist; Rev. J. Entwistle, Methodist; Dr. Pinkerton, Agent to the Society at Frankfort; Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, Minister of the Episcopal chapel, Bedford Row; Dr. Morison, of Chelsea, Independent; ——— Plumptree, Esq. M. P. for East Kent; Rev. D. Wilson, Vicar of Islington; Lord Mountsandford; and the Bishop of Chester.

Scriptural, elevated piety appeared eminently to pervade the minds of the speakers: the communications of Dr. Cox of New York were peculiarly gratifying; especially relating to the progress of religion in America, and the printing at the American Bible Society's establishment at New York of a thousand Bibles per day! Dr. Pinkerton assured the meeting that the government of France, having thrown off Popery as the established church, was favourable to the admission of the New Testament as a school-book. May this glorious cause prosper throughout the world, till "all flesh shall see the salvation of God!"

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

On Tuesday, April 30, the Thirty-third Anniversary Meeting of this excellent Society was held at Exeter Hall. Prayer having been offered up by the Secretary, Sir R. H. Inglis, Bart. was unanimously called to the chair. The Secretary read an abstract of the Report, full of interesting details of the progress of the institution. The receipts of the Society during the past year, ending March 31, were 48,600*l.*; to which benefactions for special purposes being added, the whole amount would be 49,300*l.* being an increase of about 7,850*l.* on the receipts of the preceding year. The Bishop of Chester, the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, the Rev. Hugh Stowell, the Bishop of Winchester, the Rev. E. Bickersteth, the Marquis of Cholmondeley, the Rev. G. Hazlewood, the Rev. H. Venn, and the Rev. E. Ward, advocated the claims of the Society with much zeal and eloquence; after which this interesting meeting was closed by singing, "From all that dwell below the skies," &c.

We were particularly impressed with the speech of the Rev. B. Noel. "Let the meeting," said that eloquent clergyman, "consider what was the present extent of missionary labours, or rather of missionary means, in the whole Christian world. He meant, of course, Protestant missions. The entire number of clergymen employed in those labours throughout the world, did not exceed 600; and if to these were added 400 laymen, they would have an aggregate of 1,000; and these were the whole to preach the Gospel to the heathen world, comprising 600,000,000 of souls. That was, there was one missionary to every 600,000 heathens. What would the Meeting think of one clergyman for the entire principality of Wales? — or two for the whole metropolis? — or four for Scotland? — or only twenty for the whole island? — for that was about the proportion. What, he would ask, could be expected from the exertions of that number of clergymen spread over so large a sphere of action? Where the means were small, how was it possible to expect great results? We should rather be thankful that so much was done with such small means at our disposal. Let them suppose the missionary at Benares, where there were 300,000 idolaters. After the missionary had mastered a language so very difficult and so widely different from his own, what was he alone to do in a city crowded with Bramins, whose belief in their own faith, if it was not one of conviction, was upheld by their interests? — But there was another difficulty which the missionary had to encounter. It was, that even where he might produce conviction on the mind of the Hindoo, the convert was deterred from an open profession of Christianity, as it would take him from his family and his friends, and cast him out on the world. Under such circumstances, the missionary at Benares would despair if he were not upheld by confidence in Him in whose cause he had embarked. It was that alone that could sustain him in his task, rather than any appeals from the Society at home, however strong or affectionate. Were they not then too sanguine in their expectations of what could be done by individual exertion? — They had an encouragement in the great increase of their funds in this year. But their funds came from probably 3,000 churches in the country. Why should not each church exert itself to give an increased stimulus to missionary exertions?

He should like to see some of the rich men of the country giving support to one or two or more missionaries, according to the extent of their means, which they might do without any diminution of their present rank and state in society. He threw out the same suggestions to some of the rich churches of the country. Let them recollect that there were 600,000,000 of their fellow-men in the darkness and vice of heathenism. Let them attack that great enemy of human happiness, and attack it on its own shores. Let them increase their missionary labours, and they might expect, with God's blessing, to see results a hundredfold more than they could yet show."

Lord Gambier, the Vice-Patron and President of the Church Missionary Society, having departed this life only a few days before this anniversary, the Rev. Mr. Ward, minister of Iver, where is the seat of that lamented nobleman, referring to the venerable President, said, "I have been requested, and indeed enjoined, to recal to your recollection once more the ever-to-be-regretted loss we have sustained in the death of the revered and beloved President of our Society. Much has been said, and most truly and touchingly said, of the Christian graces which adorned the life of this eminently good man. You have heard how he lived: it remains for me, as the minister of his parish, to tell you how he died. You will hear with concern that his last illness was attended with extreme suffering; but he bore it without a murmur, and it seemed as if God had determined that his faithful servant should glorify him in the fire, and that 'patience should have its perfect work.' When speaking to me of the acuteness of his pains, he observed, 'They interrupt my quietness, but they do not disturb my peace;' and he added, 'Though I do not, in my debilitated state, exercise lively faith, I have constant communion with my Saviour.' In referring to a meeting of a neighbouring Bible Society, over which he was to have presided, he said, 'Tell them they have my best wishes; and tell them besides, that, while I was enabled, I felt it my bounden duty and my delight to assist that good cause to the utmost of my power, considering that I thereby advanced the kingdom of my Redeemer.' In adverting to his approaching dissolution, he said with peculiarly solemn emphasis, 'When I am deposited in the ground, you will have to perform the service; you will say something over me: pray be as concise as possible; but remember these words,—God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him, should not perish, but have everlasting life! This is my hope. That is my Rock of Ages, in the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost!'"

Thus died this amiable and venerated disciple of Jesus Christ, leaving his memory embalmed in the hearts of all good men.

GENERAL SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING DISTRICT VISITING.

This Institution, formed after the example of the Christian Instruction Society among the Dissenters, held its Fifth Anniversary on Thursday, April 25. The chair was taken by Lord Radstock. Collects having been read by the Rev. R. Munro, the Report was read by the Secretary. It stated, that the various districts under its patronage were divided into 845 sections, employing 573 visitors; 10,455 families were visited monthly on an average; about 115,462 visits had been made during the past year, and about 102,622 tracts had been circulated; 2,941 children had been sent to schools of different kinds; 2,191 individuals had received medical relief; 47 had been sent to hospitals; and 10,000 reliefs had been given, either in food, money, clothes, or coals. The receipts of the past year amounted to upwards of 645*l.*

The meeting was then addressed by the Hon. Captain Waldegrave; the Rev. H. Venn, of Hull; the Lord Bishop of Chester; the Rev. Daniel Wilson, of Islington; the Rev. W. Thompson, of St. Barnabas church, St. Luke's; the Rev. W. Monro; the Rev. H. Raikes; the Rev. S. Robins; the Rev. J. Hull, of Lancaster; and the Rev. G. Marsh, of Hampstead. Similar institutions have been formed in five cities, twenty-seven towns, and twenty-one parishes, which were reported as in prosperous operation.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL SYSTEM.

An Essay, with the above title, obtained a prize of fifty dollars from the American Sunday School Union last year; and it is republished by the Sunday School Union in London, price Two Pence. It is an admirable little Tract, worthy of being perused by every Sunday school teacher, as will be seen from the following passages.

"In every age and country, the character and virtue of a people, the prosperity which they enjoy, and the institutions which they possess, depend almost entirely upon the nature of their instruction. And what means are better adapted to promote the highest interests of a nation in these respects, than the correct religious education of the individuals composing it? What but this can raise them from the savage to a civilized state; from slaves to citizens; from the grossness of sensuality to the dignified enjoyment of cultivated life? What will so effectually diminish their temptations to crime, give a proper direction to their valuable qualities, control those which are dangerous and hurtful, and even render them subservient to the best interests of society? These are questions of the deepest interest to the philanthropist and to the Christian. And while the 'world is impelled with such violence in opposite directions, while a spirit of giddiness and revolt is shed abroad upon the nations, the only safety is in the improvement of the mass of the people in knowledge, probity, and the fear of the Lord. In the neglect of these, the politeness and refinement of knowledge accumulated in the highest orders, weak and impotent, will be exposed to the most imminent danger, and will perish like a garland in the grasp of popular fury.' Yes, the only security is to be found in early religious instruction. This, the Sunday school, supplying parental neglect or deficiency, or assisting parental faithfulness, attempts to furnish.

"Ignorance is not the mother of devotion, but sound religious instruction is the best preservative from superstition, fanaticism, and infidelity. Facts testify, that of those who at the present day become truly converted to God, a large proportion are those who have been brought up in Sunday schools. Of 787 hopefully converted to God in one district of North America within a year, 592 were either teachers or pupils of Sunday schools. In another district, reports from 50 towns give 150 teachers and 522 scholars, who in a single year made a profession of their faith in Christ, of whom 110 entered upon the study of divinity. Not less than 5,000 teachers, and 10,000 scholars, are estimated, by the annual report of the American Sunday School Union, to have been converted in the year ending May 1832. The number of conversions of persons connected with Sunday schools, reported during the first eight years of the existence of that society, was 26,393. A multitude of concurrent facts might be adduced."

Death-Bed Testimonies.

COLLECTED BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM BUTTON.

No. VI.

REV. GEORGE HERBERT,

Rector of Bemerton, about a mile from Salisbury. Died of a Consumption in 1635.

In the time of his decay, he was often visited and prayed for by all the clergy that lived near him, especially by the bishop and prebends of the cathedral church in Salisbury; but by none more devoutly than his wife, his three nieces (then a part of his family), and one Mr. Woodnot, who were the sad witnesses of his daily decline; to whom he would often speak to this purport: "I now look back upon the pleasures of my life past, and see the content I have taken in beauty, in wit, in music, and in pleasant conversation; how they are all passed by me as a shadow that returns not, and are all become dead to me, as I to them; that as my father, and generations have done before me, so shall I now suddenly (with Job) make my bed also in the dark; and I praise God I am prepared for it; and that I am not to learn patience, now I stand in such need of it; and that I have practised mortification, and endeavoured to die daily, that I might not die eternally; and my hope is, that I shall shortly leave this valley of tears, and be free from all fevers and pain; and, which will be a more happy condition, I shall be free from sin, and all the anxieties that attend it; and this being past, I shall dwell in the New Jerusalem, dwell there with men made perfect, dwell where these eyes shall see my Master and Saviour, Jesus, and with him see my dear mother, and other relations and friends; but I must die, or not come to that happy place; and this is my content, that I am going daily towards it, and that every day that I have lived hath taken a part of my appointed time from me, and that I shall live the less time for having lived this and the day past."

These and the like expressions, which he often uttered, may be said to have been his enjoyment of heaven before he entered it. The Sunday before his death, he arose suddenly from his couch, called for one of his instruments, took it into his hand, and said,

"My God, my God,
My music shall find Thee,
And every string
Shall have his attribute to sing."

And having tuned it, he played and sang,

"The Sundays of man's life,
Threaded together in Time's string,
Make bracelets to adorn the wife
Of the eternal glorious King:
On Sundays, heaven's door stands ope,
Blessings are plentiful and rife,
More plentiful than hope."

Thus he continued, meditating, and praying, and rejoicing, till the day of his death; and on that day he said to Mr. Woodnot, "My dear friend, I am sorry I have nothing to present to my merciful God, but sin and misery; but the first is pardoned, and a few hours will put a period to the latter." Upon which Mr. Woodnot took occasion to remind him of the building of Layton Church, and his many acts of beneficence: to which he made answer, "They be good works if they be sprinkled with the blood of Christ, and not otherwise." After this discourse he became more restless, and his soul seemed to be weary of her earthly tabernacle; and this uneasiness became so visible, that his wife and three nieces, and Mr. Woodnot, stood constantly about his bed, beholding him with sorrow, and an unwillingness to lose the sight of him whom they could not hope to see much longer. As they stood thus beholding him, his wife observed that he breathed faintly, and with much trouble, and that presently he fell into a sudden agony, which greatly surprised and distressed her, and caused her to inquire anxiously how he felt himself? To which he answered, "That he passed a conflict with his last enemy, and had overcome him by the merits of his Master, Jesus." After which answer he looked up, and saw his wife and nieces weeping to an extremity, and charged them, "If they loved him, to withdraw into the next room, and there pray every one alone for him; for nothing but their lamentations could make his death uncomfortable." To which request their sighs and tears would not suffer them to make any reply, but they yielded him a sad obedience, leaving with him only Mr. Woodnot and Mr. Bostock. Immediately after they had left him, he said to Mr. Bostock, "Pray Sir open that door, then look into that cabinet, in which you may easily find my last will, and give it into my hand." Which being done, he delivered it into the hands of Mr. Woodnot, and said, "My old friend, I here deliver you my last will, in which you will find I have made you my sole executor, for the good of my wife and nieces, and I desire you to show kindness to them as they shall need it. I do not desire you to be just, for I know you will be that for your own sake; but I charge you by the religion of our friendship to be careful of them." Having obtained Mr. Woodnot's promise to be so, he said, "I am now ready to die: Lord, grant me mercy, for the merits of my Jesus: and now, Lord, receive my soul." With these words he peaceably and calmly breathed forth his soul into the hands of Him who gave it, Mr. Woodnot and Mr. Bostock attending his last breath and closing his eyes.

(Note by S. J. B.)

Of this excellent man, Jeremy Collier, (H. D. vol. i), gives the following account. "HERBERT (George) a famous English poet, a younger brother of the noble family of the Herberts of Montgomery; born in 1593. He was a man of florid wit, obliging humour in conversation, fluent elocution, and great proficiency in the arts; which gained him so much reputation at Cambridge, where he spent his more youthful age, that he was chosen University Orator. At last, taking upon him holy orders, not without special encouragement from King Charles I, who took notice of his extraordinary parts, he became parson of Bemerton, near Salisbury, where he lived a seraphick life, converting his studies altogether to serious and divine subjects, which in time produced those divine poems, intituled, 'The Temple,' and the 'Country Parson.' He died about 1635."

Chalmers says, "In the year 1630, Mr. Herbert married a lady nearly related to the Earl of Danby, and on the 26th of April in the same year, was inducted into the rectory of Bemerton, near Sarum; where he discharged the duties of his function in a most exemplary manner."

REFLECTIONS ON GARDENS.

A garden has ever had the praise and affection of the wise. What is requisite to make a wise and happy man, but reflection and peace? and both are the natural growth of a garden. Nor is a garden a promoter only of a good man's happiness, but a picture of it; and in some sort shows him to himself. Its culture, order, fruitfulness, and seclusion from the world, compared to the weeds, wildness, and exposure of a common field, is no bad emblem of a good man compared to the multitude. A garden weeds the mind; it weeds it of worldly thoughts, and sows celestial seed in their stead. Who cannot look on a flower till he reasons himself out of Infidelity?—Dr. Young.

SPRING MORNING.

Young Spring! that sittest on that daisy knoll,
With wreaths of infant green upon thy brow,
The new birds, fearless of the chill control
Of frosts and heavy skies, are blithesome now;
Music is pealing from each feathery throat,
To greet thy coming: at thy smile serene
New life and universal beauty glows;
And round thy presence float
Airs that are telling of the healthful green,
White hedge and blossoming rose.

Thine handmaid, the gay Flora, trips along,
Garlanded round with bloom, elate with glee,
Strewing the earth with flowers, that wake the song
Of their meek lover, the industrious bee.
She paints the blossom of the purple plum,
The downy peach, bright cherry, luscious pear,
And all the nurslings of the southern breeze:
When autumn days are come,
The pulpy fruit shall hang in ripeness there,
The treasures of the trees.

All Nature breathes luxuriance, and man
Catches the feeling from her ample page,
And Fancy builds some rainbow-colour'd plan,
Like those we know in youth, smile at in age:
The sloping hill and the sheep-spotted mead,
Touch'd by the sunny pencil, mantle o'er
With verdure, and black clouds have left the sky;
Gone is the oaten reed;
But thou canst glad man's heart unto the core,
And brighten Sorrow's eye!

THE SPIRIT AND PRACTICE OF POPERY.

"English Protestants in the present day, who view the doctrine of purgatory in an abstracted form, apart from the jugglery and practical absurdities with which it has ever been inseparably connected, can scarcely estimate the magnitude of its evils. We discern these more graphically when we read such statements as the following, which was stuck up three or four years ago in the churches of Madrid. 'The sacred and royal bank of piety has relieved from purgatory, from its establishment in 1721, to November 1826,

1,030,395 souls, at an expense of………	£.1,720,437
11,402 ditto, Nov. 1826, to Nov. 1827.	14,276

"The number of masses calculated to accomplish this pious work, was 558,921; consequently, each soul cost one mass and nine-tenths, or thirty-four shillings and four pence."—Christian Observer.

THOUGHTS ON IMMORTALITY.

That we belong to a class of beings, whose existence will not cease with their present earthly life, but will continue elsewhere, although the body we now animate will decay and separate into its elementary particles, we believe from reason, from our intellectual feelings, from the consent of the best philosophers of all ages, from the traditions of all nations, and from the deciding communications of the Christian Revelation. We do not perish when our material frame dissolves: our thinking and feeling principle survives its fleshy limbs and organs, which are but the instruments of its use and pleasures here; and will, after the visible death of our corporeal frame, and in reunion with another, possess its consciousness, its sensitiveness, and its active powers, under such other circumstances as its Creator shall appoint.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.

"The dragons of the wilderness."—Mal. i. 3.

"Dragons of the wilderness" are land serpents grown to an enormous size. In the earlier ages of the world, many kinds of animals, living undisturbed by man, grew to a size of which we have no examples in modern times. Amongst others, serpents attained in the unmolested recesses of the wilderness a magnitude which made them a terror to the inhabitants of the countries which they infested. Not to mention the serpent Python, which classic mythology states to have been slain by Apollo, and other similar instances, we have authentic historical evidence of one having been killed by Regulus, the Roman general, in his expedition against Carthage, which measured the astonishing length of one hundred and twenty feet. After destroying several of the Roman soldiers, it was at length killed by a large stone from one of the Roman engines. The skin was preserved in the Capitol, and an ovation decreed to its conqueror. Though from the increased population of the earth they do not attain to this enormous size in our days, yet they are still met with occasionally nearly fifty feet in length. Captain Stedman, in his Expedition to Surinam, describes one killed by him and his Negroes which measured forty-five feet, and was of the thickness of the trunk of an ordinary-sized tree. It was of that species called the Boa Constrictor, of which some beautiful specimens are now being exhibited in Fleet Street, London, one of which is about fifteen feet in length, and as thick in the middle as a man's leg. At the same place are also two specimens of the Crocodile, each about four feet long, believed by many of the best commentators on Scripture to be of which such an animated poetical description is given in the book of Job, chap. xli. In less populous ages they were found very much larger than at present. But they are known now to grow to the length of twenty or thirty feet, and to be very terrible in the great rivers of tropical countries. The Nile, the Ganges, the Oronooko, the Amazons, &c. are celebrated for their Crocodiles and Alligators, which are a terror to those who visit those streams.

These wonderful works of God are well worthy of notice; and though they are not grown to maturity, they will excite the admiration of those who delight to see particular passages of the Holy Scriptures illustrated by a reference to the wonders of nature.

PHAROS OF PTOLEMY, KING OF EGYPT.

ᴀʀos, and especially Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of 'pt, stand connected with the first translation of the ly Scriptures. Archbishop Usher places the transon of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, in the ith year of Ptolemy, and in the year 277 before the ent of Christ: this great work, in the merciful ngement of the providence of God as the pre-atory means of diffusing the gospel through all ons, is said to have been completed by the learned ish interpreters in the island of Pharos.

n the first number of the Christian's Penny Maga-
: we referred to this dispensation of Providence;
in a future number we purpose giving a brief
ory of the translation of the Holy Scriptures.

'tolemy Soter having reigned in Egypt twenty years n the time of his assuming the title of king, and ty-nine from the death of Alexander the Great, having attained the age of eighty years, placed son Ptolemy Philadelphus on his throne, as artner in the kingdom. Commerce had amazingly
'eased in Egypt during the long reign of Soter, and famous light house, called Pharos, was finished in first year of Philadelphus, for the benefit of ships in the Mediterranean Sea. Pharos was a small island at the mouth of the river Nile, over against Alexandria, the capital of Lower Egypt.

This most magnificent tower was reckoned one of the "Seven Wonders of the World." It was a square pile of building, consisting of several stories and galleries, with a lantern at the top, in which fires were kept continually burning for the direction of seamen in the night, and its light might be seen at the distance of one hundred miles. The several stories were adorned with columns, balustrades, and galleries, of the finest marble and the most exquisite workmanship; to which some add, that the architect had contrived to fasten some looking-glasses so artificially against the highest galleries, that the reflection of light was greatly increased.

This tower of Pharos is said by some ancient authors to have been six hundred feet on each side of its base, and three hundred cubits, or four hundred and fifty feet high; but this appears a mistake. Josephus, the Jewish historian, who had seen it, speaks of the Tower of Phasælus at Jerusalem, as "not less than that of Pharos," and that he describes as a square building of forty cubits, or sixty feet on every side, and ninety cubits, or 135 feet high. Still this supposition of the lowest altitude for Pharos, must have rendered it very conspicuous at sea, as we may well imagine from a view of the Monument in London, whose whole elevation from the pavement is two hundred and two feet.

Dr. Prideaux remarks, "It cost in the building 800 talents. This, if computed by Attic talents, amounts to 165,000*l.* of our sterling money; but if by Alexandrian talents, it will come to twice as much. The architect who built it was Sostratus of Cnidus, who craftily endeavoured to usurp the honour of it with posterity to himself by this fraudulent device. The inscription ordered to be set on it being 'King Ptolemy to the gods the saviours, for the benefit of those who pass by sea;' instead of Ptolemy's name, he craftily engraved his own in the solid marble, and then filling up the hollow of the engraved letters with mortar, wrote upon it as he was directed. So the inscription, which was first read, was according as it was ordered, and truly ascribed the work to King Ptolemy, its proper founder; but in process of time, the mortar being worn off, the inscription then appeared to be thus: 'Sostratus, the Cnidian, son of Dexiphanes, to the gods the saviours, for the benefit of those who pass by sea;' which, being in lasting letters deeply engraved into the marble, lasted as long as the tower itself. This tower has been demolished for some ages past. There is now in its place a castle called Farillon, where a garrison is kept to defend the harbour; perchance it is some remainder of the old work. Pharos was at first wholly an island, at the distance of seven furlongs from the continent, and had no other passage to it but by sea. But it has many ages since been turned from an island into a peninsula, by being joined to the land, in the same manner as Tyrus was, by a bank carried through the sea to it, which was anciently called in Greek the Heptastadium, or the seven furlong bank, because seven furlongs was the length of it. This work was performed by Dexiphanes, the father of Sostratus, about the same time that Sostratus finished the tower, and seems to have been the more difficult undertaking of the two. They being both very famous architects, were employed by Ptolemy Soter in the works which he had projected for beautifying, adorning, and strengthening the city of Alexandria: the father having undertaken the Heptastadium at the same time his son did the Tower, they finished both these works at the same time, that is, in the beginning of the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus."

ON THE SILVER MOUNTAIN OF POTOSI, IN PERU.

A South American writer who ascended to the top of this mountain, has given us the following effusion on the good and bad effects of the riches it has produced. The sublimity, he says, of the surrounding scenery did not so much interest my feelings as the celebrated mountain which has poured forth its lavas of silver upon the world, to animate enterprize, and reward industry; to pamper the luxurious, and minister to the comforts of the sober and the virtuous; to disseminate knowledge and religion, and to spread the desolations of war, marshalling armies in the field, and pointing the thunder of navies upon the ocean; filling cities with monuments of taste and art, and overwhelming them with ruin; founding mighty empires, and levelling them to the dust; inciting, in short, to virtue and to vice, and being the source of much good, and the root of all evil in the world.

THOUGHTS ON THE SACRED HISTORY OF THE CREATION.

The sixth stage or day of creation began with the formation of quadrupeds, insects, and reptiles, which completed the animals that inhabit our globe. Each were peculiar conceptions and inventions of the Deity: both in external figure and physical powers, these were so many new effusions of his rich imagination. The structure, and functions, and organizations of each had to be designed, and the whole plan having been fully settled, the mandate was given for their simultaneous existence, and the three orders of animals arose obediently to the command. The quadrupeds were those with which the pleasure, the sustenance, and the convenience of man, are more immediately concerned. Their clothing distinguishes them from the other orders of created beings; it is composed of soft, separate, flexible hair, little subject to injury; which is more plentifully bestowed on the inhabitants of cold regions, than on those which live in the warmer parts of the earth. In aquatic quadrupeds it is sometimes wanting. That they have also organs of sense corresponding with ours, we all well know. They see, hear, taste, smell, and feel, as well as we do, and some much more acutely; both the dog and the wolf have an exquisite sense of smell, the cat and some others can see in the dark, the lynx is acute both in sight and smell, the racoon is peculiarly sensitive in both smell and touch; others have a quickness of hearing superior to ourselves, and some are impressible by musical sounds. An historian tells us that one of the Roman emperors had a troop of elephants disciplined to dance to music; the dog too sometimes howls at certain musical notes.

All quadrupeds utter sounds of some sort or other, which they can vary into so many tones as are necessary to give vent to their feelings, to denote their wants, or to communicate with each other. Each species uses particular sounds to signify to their fellows what they wish them to understand, and each seems perfectly to comprehend the meaning of the speaker. A monkey has been noticed to utter vocal syllables; and dogs have been taught to express human words, even so many as thirty, distinctly intelligible.

It is one of the great distinctions of the animal kind, that it is teachable to several intelligent actions. Even of the wild and ferocious, the largest part have been found tameable. The tiger, who may be considered as the fiercest of the fierce, has exhibited this improvement; so has the savage and voracious hyena. Crocodiles have been made harmless and docile; the leopard likewise. The wolf has also shown that it possesses what we may term affectionate docilities. The baboons become vigilant guardians of their protector's property. These facts prove that there is nothing in the nature of the wildest animals to make their future gentleness and sociability either impossible or improbable. We see by the dog and cat, that the carnivorous may be mild and friendly; and even the devourers and their prey may, by kind and judicious management, be trained to live peaceably and harmlessly together. Nothing appears more effectual to produce this pleasing melioration, than patience, persevering and gentle treatment.

That animals have feelings and passions very analogous to our own, appears from many instances. Our rugged or oppressive conduct towards them, usually puts their resentful emotions into action: but many species show what must be called kind affections. Monkeys evince such to each other; cows will protect each other, and feel strongly for their young, and sometimes show a marked remembrance of those who have been kind to them. Even the hog we despise is not destitute of them, and is peculiarly sensitive of weather. Most animals too evince pleasure at being caressed.

From the sensibilities of quadrupeds, let us pass to the consideration of their indication of a perceiving and thinking mind. To collect provisions for their future use, to hoard them in safe places, and to use them gradually for their daily sustenance, are actions in the human race which display and require great prudence and foresight: a very large portion of mankind will not exert either this forethought, or the self-government that alone makes it effectual.

The Scottish nation is eminently and honourably distinguished for this intellectual quality. The lower Irish are too often conspicuous for the want of it. Yet it is strikingly exhibited in the Alpine hares, who literally make hay for their winter food; in the active and provident squirrel; and in the ingenious beaver. The quadruped animals, of their own will and nature, and from inborn instincts, do actions which require knowledge, reasoning, and judgment, in mankind. Reindeers follow and obey leaders of their own species. Elephants also make their journeys on the same plan, when necessary. Baboons have been found to make defensive arrangements, like military tactics. Mules and cats make signals to have a door opened. The black bear's mode of fishing is as dexterous as any schoolboy's could be, but much more patient. Deliberation and judgment, with real building skill, appear as much in the beaver's construction of his cabin, as in any human fabrication of a cottage. If it be foresight and caution in a military officer, to place sentinels to watch and give alarm on danger, is it any other quality in animals who use the same precaution? Marmots do this, the wild asses likewise, and many other classes. If the assembling in societies among mankind, arises from a sense of mutual wants, safety, and benefit, and from sympathies that we term moral, must there not be some feelings analogous to these in those species of quadrupeds who voluntarily associate together? The social mouse pairs, and the families they form live together as neighbours; the beavers unite from a distance into societies, for the express purpose of building their habitations in vicinity to each other, and co-operate in their labour, like emigrants in the wilds of America, to build their log-houses and forest towns. Individual instances, of what in human beings we should call contriving mind, have been also remarked in animals. The squirrel's mode of passing a river, the jerboa's provision for his escape if attacked in his retreat, the opossum's mode of obtaining crabs which his paws cannot reach, the monkey's use of his tail as a hand or finger, the bear himself finding out the plant which will heal his wound and making and applying a plaister from it, the wolf's caution too in taking the babe from the mother's bed so gently as not to disturb her, and their resolute co-operation in their fatal attacks,—are instances of a thinking power that designs and comprehends.

There is another class of animals called oviparous quadrupeds, the tortoise, crocodile, and lizard tribes: these spring from eggs, without parental brooding, like fish and insects: and as they have left for our present knowledge of their ancient nature, amid the destructions they underwent, some important fossil remains of their bones and figure, they ought not to be omitted in our general review of the economy of the primitive creation. The oviparous quadrupeds are very distinct from the figures and functions of the other quadrupeds. Their blood is not the red, warm fluid, but a cold and pale one. They breathe, but with frequent and long suspensions, which no land animal could endure. They have the same senses, but in feebler action, with the exception of sight. Their brain is proportionably smaller, they require less food, and can remain a long time without any. Their manners are gentler: they exhibit no ferocity, and appear to enjoy a much longer and more tranquil life. They usually inhabit the sea shores, rivers and their banks, marshes, pools, and other wet and moist places; they herd together, are generally inoffensive, and can be tamed; the young never know their mothers, nor receive any nourishment from them.

The Creator has made nothing that is unuseful, nothing which is not serviceable or instrumental to other purposes besides its own existence. This principle has been pursued throughout the animated classes of nature. No one species of living beings has been formed only for itself, or can subsist in absolute uselessness to others. This is one grand purpose for causing so many races of animal being to subsist on each other. By this system each enjoys the gift of life; and is made to contribute, by the termination of that gift, to the well-being of others. Fishes are thus useful to each other, to many birds, and animals, and to man. Quadrupeds have the same double use in their existence—their own enjoyment, and the benefit at their death to those who have been appointed to derive nutrition from their substance. The amphibious order of nature is no exception to these general results. Its various genera contribute their proportion to the common stock of mutual utilities.

ON A PROPER COURSE OF STUDY.

Letter to a Friend, in answer to his request to point out a List of Books, which may serve to enable an English reader to acquire habits of correct reasoning, as well as to comprehend the elements of Moral Science.

Dear Sir,

I have received your Letter, and shall endeavour to comply with the request contained in it. I shall point out to your attention some elementary works in the order in which they are to be read, making such observations upon them as I proceed, as may tend to exhibit the reasons for my recommendation. The books themselves are so connected one with another, as that the one immediately preceding introduces the next. Altogether, I hope they constitute an introduction to the various topics of mental philosophy and moral science. I have also endeavoured to confine my recommendation to as few books as are essential; yet I hope I have not carried my wish not to overburthen your attention, so far as to omit any that are really useful.

You complain of "an inability to pursue a chain of reasoning steadily to its conclusion; that you find your mind invariably wandering away from the subject proposed; that you do not see clearly the relation of one idea to another, nor exclude needless steps in your argument." Although all this may very likely be true, yet be assured it is owing rather to a fault in your education than to a defect in your understanding. In a word, you have not been taught to reason; and reasoning is as much an art as fencing. The most powerful and acute understanding, unless it has learned to use its own faculties, is really nothing more than what a sharp and heavy sword would be in the hand of a strong man, who was however ignorant of the rules of defence. It is possible he might do execution with it occasionally, but it would be owing to accident rather than to skill; and certainly would be enabled to do far less with it, even under the most favourable circumstances, than if he had been initiated in the best method of using it. I shall therefore recommend you the study, in the first place, of De Crouzaz's Art of Thinking. In this book you will find an explanation given of all those rules in use among reasoners, which indeed they do not formally allude to whenever they reason, but under the regulation of which their minds proceed by habit.

In lieu of this book you might make yourself master of Dr. Watts's Logic, or even Duncan's Logic, which is still less, and in a more compendious form.

From Logic you should proceed to Mental Philosophy. For this purpose you will find inestimable assistance in Mr. Locke's Essay upon the Human Understanding. You should spare no pains, and think no time too long, to make yourself thoroughly acquainted with the contents of this book. His reasoning will appear much plainer upon reading it over the second time. Unconquerable difficulties you should carry to some friend competent to explain them. From this book you will acquire the habit of precision in the use of your words, you will learn to attach the same ideas to them, to perceive when the ideas you have usually attached to them are changed. You will also become acquainted with the true limits of the faculties of the human mind.

From Locke's works you should pass to those of Reid upon the same topics, which you will find easy of perusal after the former, and which comprise the next step of advancement in the science. You may then pass onward to the works of Professor Dugald Stewart, in which you will become acquainted with the present advanced state of mental philosophy. Along with these books, as a kindred study, you would do well to read Euclid's geometry, at the rate of a few propositions each day. Some intelligent friend will also be able to put you in the way of reading this author, from whose works you will derive a knowledge of the method of accurate reasoning. These books will communicate to your mind the habit of requiring proof for every thing, of discerning between argument and sophism, and of discriminating when a topic is established by proof and when it is not; a habit of mind which is of the greatest value, and which, when once acquired, can readily be directed with the utmost advantage to any subject of study.

Having finished these books, I recommend you to make yourself thoroughly acquainted with Dr. Paley's Natural Theology, in which you will see the argument for the being of a God stated and illustrated in the ablest manner. You will also gain conviction from the perusal of it: I do not mean that you will become persuaded of the existence of a God; this you are already; but you will find that your belief of it, which you had received upon prescription, or nearly so, now rests upon its own appropriate reasons in your own mind. You will also look with a new vision upon created objects, as specimens of the skill and power of the Creator. Thenceforward, in the language of this invaluable author, "the world will become one temple to you, and life a continued act of adoration."

I recommend you then to proceed to his Evidences of Christianity, which consist of a condensation of the numerous and ponderous volumes of Lardner's Credibility and other standard works; but every thing needful to the argument is brought together in Paley's Evidences, which has been pronounced upon very high authority to be the best book upon the subject extant in any language.

You may then proceed to his Moral Philosophy, in which you will find the nature of virtue, and the reasons for selecting virtuous conduct, most clearly stated. These reasons are, the express command of Scripture, where it can be procured; when this does not exist, the nature of the action is inferred from its tendency to produce the greatest measure of happiness to mankind. If this can be made out, it is inferred that the action in question is agreeable to the will of God, whose perpetual will, is the happiness of mankind. This is the true Paleian doctrine of expediency, of which you will see no reason to be alarmed. I never yet found that the man who condemned it understood it. In this, as in many other cases, a word capable by itself of an ill sense, was used by the author; and persons who never troubled themselves to ascertain the sense in which the author used it, raised an objection upon it. There are many persons in the world, whose whole power of argument is bottled up in a word, in an appellation, in an epithet. If they can but use this, they discard all further discussion as useless. You will not be desirous of being numbered in their society.

The book to which you may next proceed is Butler's Analogy of Natural and Revealed Religion. Your previous acquaintance with the former will prepare you to understand it, and to share the benefit of perusing it. There you will find a new field of evidence to the truth of revelation, derived from the obvious, universal, invariable tendency of human conduct upon human happiness. You will then understand that there is a moral law in the order of providence—a law delivered, not audibly indeed, but with quite as much effect by action, by a certain effect always being associated with virtuous, and a certain effect being always associated with vicious conduct.

I advise you also to commence reading Doddridge's Family Expositor more systematically and attentively after the perusal of those books: in the latter you will find precision and accuracy in the use of language, and habits of close reasoning, contributing their concentrated effects to simplify and explain the Scriptures of inspired truth.

By a diligent, persevering, and exclusive study of these books, for the next two years, so as to become thoroughly accustomed to their contents, you will, I doubt not, acquire those habits of mind, and that information upon the first principles of religion and morals, which you so earnestly covet.

I am, with best wishes,
Dear Sir, yours, &c.
Clericus.

REFORM OF THE FRENCH CHURCH.

"Who hath despised the day of small things?" said the inspired prophet. Who can tell to what the following facts may lead? The Patriot newspaper of last week remarks,—"A sect sprang up some time since in Paris, having for its object the shaking off all connection with the Pope. These sectarians call themselves 'The French Catholic Church.' They disown the authority of Rome, or any foreign authority. They perform the whole of their ceremonies in their own language, that the people may understand that which they are called on to profess. They moderate several of the ancient tenets, reduce the number of sacraments, and abolish the celibacy of the priesthood. In short, they seem to take their stand not very far from the position of Henry the Eighth, after his first attack on Romanism. They are rapidly increasing their number and influence. A few months since they met in a small building, fitted up as a church, on one of the Boulevards, in Paris. They have recently acquired a much larger one, in the Rue St. Honore, and contemplate the necessity of obtaining others."

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. IV.—THE WISDOM OF GOD.

Pride is an evil of so great magnitude, that no means which are employed can be sufficiently powerful to eradicate it from the human heart. Man being constituted lord of the lower creation, and possessing so much power over animate and inanimate creatures, seems to forget that there are multitudes of beings superior to himself, and that he is only one link in the great chain of creation. It is nevertheless of infinite importance that he should be taught to feel his own insignificance, that he should be made to know how small a portion of wisdom he has yet attained, and that it is therefore his duty to be clothed in humility. And surely nothing can be better calculated to effect such an object, than considerations like those which now occupy our attention. Nothing more conduces to engender pride than ignorance. A man who knows no more of the world than what he sees of it within the precincts of his own parish,—who thinks the heavenly host mere spangles in some real canopy of blue,—and is unconscious of the mechanism displayed in every insect that flutters in the sunbeam;—might be well disposed to look on himself as really important and great, just because his situation, as connected with those around him, might be more lofty and elevated: but when told that millions of beings swarm this earth, all endowed with rational faculties like himself; that myriads upon myriads of irrational creatures derive their support from its productions, and yet that this earth, with all its teeming population, is a mere nothing when compared with the numberless worlds which he sees above him; and when told moreover that all these, great and splendid as they may appear, are but a little part, a very little part of the works of One All-Powerful Being; will he not be found to bow down in the deepest humiliation, and confess that all his fancied superiority is insignificance itself?

Such are the feelings with which I am desirous of entering upon the subject before us. And it opens one of so immense magnitude and importance, that it is difficult to select the most fitting subjects for meditation. All that we see displays infinite wisdom; and as the limit of the present essay prevents any thing like a minute discussion even on a few of the Creator's works, I must content myself with referring in general terms to the following topics:—

1. The Creation is a lasting testimony to the inscrutable wisdom of Him who was its Author. Had it been permitted to any one of us to view the earth when without form and void, and when gloomy darkness brooded over it in death-like silence, and had we then been told to convert it into a beauteous and blooming structure, with what tools should we have accomplished the object, or rather, on what plan should we have proceeded? Surely we must own that human ingenuity would have been baffled: nay, more, that all the faculties of the creature would have been locked up in amazement, as he contemplated the shapeless mass before him. Let us suppose it possible that a human ear could have heard the magnificent command, "Let there be light!" and seen its speedy accomplishment; and then let us strive to work our own feelings into a train similar to that which under such circumstances would have rushed across the mind of him, who saw the wondrous achievement. Oh! it is most pleasing, when the sun is shedding a genial lustre over all created things, to walk on the green carpet wherewith the Almighty has covered the earth; and when the sweet and solemn silence is broken only by the murmuring of a distant brook, pursuing its useful and almost silent course; or the sweet and simple notes of those gay and sprightly beings with whom the Deity has peopled the air; to lift our thoughts from earth to heaven, and look through the wondrous productions of nature up to Him at whose command they all burst into existence. And what is the lesson which every created thing teaches? When we look at the little insect, and discover in its form, not only perfect uniformity and beauty, but a wondrous fitness for the task which its Creator has assigned it, shall we question his wisdom thus strikingly declared? Examination has always found, and the deeper we search the clearer I doubt not will the fact appear, that there is some end to be answered by every created thing, and that every created thing is wonderfully fitted to effect this purpose. It is not only in the great and stupendous productions of nature that this wisdom is to be seen, it is clearly pourtrayed in the smallest as well as in the greatest, and pervades every portion of the Creator's works. The best productions of men, are those which are framed according to the model laid down by the All-wise Maker of the universe. Every discovery and exertion of human intellect, tends only the more forcibly to illustrate the wisdom of Him, of whom it may indeed be said, that he has always chosen the best ends, and accomplished those ends by the best means. Nothing is wanting for human ingenuity to supply: no deficiencies of the Creator to be made up by the creature, but all perfect and sufficient. True it is, that as yet we know but a very little of the wondrous things which surround us on all sides; the wisest of our philosophers pronounce themselves but children, and confess that what they have discovered, tends forcibly to point out to them how much remains unknown: but yet let this form no barrier to our admiration; rather let it exalt our imaginations of that unknown and incomprehensible Being, whose knowledge is too wonderful and excellent to be scanned by human ingenuity.

Nature, in all its endless forms and wondrous phenomena, serves to illustrate this attribute of the Deity. By what process a seed is eventually enabled to burst through the ground which contains it, spring up and become a tree wherein the birds of the air can build their nests, we cannot tell; these are operations over which a veil is drawn, and our best conjectures on the subject cannot arrive at certainty. The animal kingdom is no less strikingly a proof that the wisdom which planned the universe, and peopled its boundless domains, is of a greatness too immense, and of an accuracy too minute, to be scanned by the reason of frail mortality. Nevertheless, we are enabled to discover the wondrous fitness of each particular being to discharge the duties committed to its care. The eagle, whose province it is to soar beyond the limits of human perception, is endowed by its Creator with the faculty of sight in so great a degree, that it fails not to perceive its victim at an immense distance; and though when we cast our eyes upwards, or look around us, we may be unable to discover any marks of the approach of birds of prey, yet let a carcass be exposed, and very soon it will be found that vultures are hastening to make their repast on it. B. Z.

A Solemn Calculation.—The aggregate population on the surface of the known habitable globe, is estimated at 895,300,000 souls. If we reckon, with the ancients, that a generation lasts thirty years, then in that space 895,300,000 human beings will be born and die; consequently 81,760 must be dropping into eternity every day, 3,407 every hour, or about 56 every minute! How awful is the reflection! E. A. J.

CHRISTIAN INSTRUCTION SOCIETY.

This truly "inestimable Institution" held its Eighth Annual Meeting on Tuesday evening, April 30, at Finsbury Chapel. Lord Henley presided, and the attendance was very numerous and respectable.

The services having been commenced by singing and prayer, the Noble Chairman made an interesting speech, declaring, among other reasons for his attachment to this Society, that "he had the authority of one of the most learned and pious men in this country, for stating, not more than one-fifth of the manufacturing population of England had any means whatever of hearing or attending to the gospel of Jesus Christ."

The Rev. J. Blackburn read the Report of the Association. There were in the

In the 63 Associations there were 1,297 voluntary agents, who statedly visited 32,452 families, and who maintained, amidst the poorest neighbourhoods, 89 weekly prayer meetings. Those operations had secured the constant circulation of more than 100,000 Loan Tracts every month, the issue of 586 copies of the Holy Scriptures, the admission of 1,603 poor children into Sunday or Day Schools, and the temporal relief of 2,335 cases of distress during the past year. The local Prayer Meetings and Preaching Stations had increased from 84 to 89, which were differently attended from 50 to 150. The series of Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity had been continued during the past year, and the preaching in Five Tents during the summer, in the neighbourhood of London.

The total receipts during the past year were 1,133*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.*, and the expenses 1,302*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, leaving the Institution in debt 169*l.* 6*s.* 11*d.*

The Meeting was addressed by the Rev. Dr. Morison; J. Labouchere, Esq. Treasurer of the District Visiting Society, belonging to the Established Church; the Rev. Dr. Styles; W. A. Hankey, Esq.; the Rev. C. Stovell; and Josiah Conder, Esq. Lord Henley vacating the Chair on account of indisposition, Thomas Challis, Esq. succeeded him: the Rev. Dr. Cox, and the Rev. Mr. Blackburn having addressed the Meeting, the business was concluded by singing "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," &c.

We know not in what terms sufficiently to commend this apostolical and beneficial Society. But we trust its plan of operations will be adopted in every populous neighbourhood, and in every town throughout the kingdom, as admirably adapted by its peculiar system of means,—Visits—Loan Tracts—Prayer Meetings,—and Scripture expositions,—to evangelize and bless our neglected population.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOL SOCIETY.

On Monday, May 6, the Twenty-eighth General Meeting of this noble Institution was held in Exeter Hall, when the chair was filled by the Right Hon. Lord John Russell. Henry Dunn, Esq. read the Report, which was most interesting, showing both the need of education even yet in England, and the progress of this truly national system and its extension in foreign countries. The central school is in a flourishing state. During the past year, sixty-three candidates had been admitted to learn the system; fifty-one had been appointed to the charge of (new) schools; eight schools had been supplied with teachers; fifteen missionaries had been instructed in the system, to carry it, and establish it among the heathen. France is stated to be alive to the importance of this system, having had opened 1,581 schools. There are now in that country 2,900,000 receiving the benefits of the system of mutual instruction. Scriptural truth is decidedly advancing in France; large supplies of Bibles and Testaments have been granted by the British and Foreign Bible Society; and 40,000 copies of the Scriptures have been ordered to be printed, by the Council of Instruction. Various other parts of the world are noticed in the Report, particularly Greece, and Western and Southern Africa, as having been greatly benefited by this Society. The income of the Society, during the past year, amounted to 2,978*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* and its expenditure to 3,212*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*

The Rev. J. W. Cunningham, vicar of Harrow, moved, and H. Pownall, Esq. seconded the adoption of the Report. The latter gentleman remarked: "It has been proved, that out of 260 malefactors in the agricultural districts, not one could read: that in the town of Bedford alone, out of 50 criminals, only 4 could read: that in Hertfordshire, out of a population of 41,700, only 24,220 were able to read."

The Rev. G. Clayton, of Walworth, moved a Resolution, acknowledging with gratitude the munificent donation of 100*l.* from his Majesty: this was seconded by the Rev. J. Philippo, late missionary at Spanish Town, Jamaica. The references of this gentleman, to the assistance afforded by this Society in promoting education in Jamaica, and its beneficial influence upon the wretched blacks, were received with many expressions of approbation.

The Rev. J. Burnet, the Rev. G. Marsden, Mr. France of Plymouth, and the Rev. G. Clayton, further addressed the Meeting, which was dismissed, after the Right Hon. Chairman had made some observations on the word Toleration, which the Rev. Mr. Burnet had reprobated, as having his cordial hatred. His Lordship expressed his concurrence in that expression of sentiment,—the word proper for such occasions was Liberty. In referring to the speech of Mr. Philippo, his Lordship remarked, that he had "long employed himself industriously and usefully in the island of Jamaica. It was to exertions such as his that we must look for the true welfare and prosperity of the colonies: for he trusted that the time was now past when the safety of the colonies was to be looked for in the perpetuation of a state of slavery and ignorance." We trust that such sentiments are cordially embraced by all his Majesty's ministers, and that Colonial Slavery will soon cease for ever in all the dominions of Great Britain.

RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY.

On Tuesday morning, May 7, the Thirty-fourth Annual Breakfast and Public Meeting of this great Institution was held at the City of London Tavern: it was most numerously and respectably attended.

Joseph John Gurney, Esq. of Norwich presided, after the Rev. J. Dyer had implored the blessing of God on their proceedings. As a member of the Society of Friends, Mr. Gurney had long hesitated to unite with the Religious Tract Society; but, he observed, "the longer he lived, the more he was persuaded that the welfare of mankind, civilly, morally, and eternally, depended on the diffusion of the Gospel. And if there was one circumstance more than another that indicated the progress of the truth, it was the extraordinary fact, that 180,000,000 tracts, containing the Gospel, had been distributed by this Society." Mr. Jones read an abstract of the Report, full of the most interesting details. "The total number of publications circulated in the year was 12,995,241, being an increase of 880,271 beyond the preceding year. The total circulation of Tracts, in more than seventy languages, amounts to nearly 180,000,000. The total of the free contributions for 1832, was 3,374*l.* 6*s.* 7*d.*; for 1833, they are 4,070*l.* 4*s.*; being an increase of 695*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.* The sums received for the sales of the Society's publications in 1832 amounted to 26,949*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*; for 1833 they are 34,460*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.*; being an increase of 7,511*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* The total amount of the Society's receipts for 1832, including sales, were 31,376*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.*; for 1833, they are 40,000*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.*; being an increase of 8,624*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*

The Meeting was addressed by the Rev. W. Morgan, of Bradford; the Rev. N. M. Harry, of London; the Rev. J. Alexander, of Norwich; R. Peek, Esq. Sheriff of London; the Rev. W. Wade, M.A.; the Rev. J. Thornton, of Billericay; the Rev. J. Dyer, Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society; and the Rev. J. W. Alexander, a converted Jew.

THE PORT OF LONDON AND BETHEL UNION SOCIETY.

On Monday, May 6, the Annual Meeting of this useful Society was held at the City of London Tavern, the Right Hon. Lord Mountsandford in the chair. This much-needed Society appears to have recently declined; still it is doing much good. The Rev. E. Muscutt read the Report, which stated, that "Bethel-meetings at home had been constantly held, and well attended. The Floating Chapel was still supplied gratuitously by various ministers: 4,067 sailors had attended public worship on board, and nearly an equal number of general hearers: 987 books, and 34 Bibles and Testaments had been distributed by this Society among seamen. There were 220 children receiving instruction in the Day-schools at Wapping: the patronage of the Merchant Seamen's Orphan Asylum had been considerably augmented: the institution had received 48 boys and 24 girls during the five years of its existence. The Rev. J. Clayton; Capt. Smith, R. N.; the Rev. W. Hodson; the Rev. C. Hyatt; W. Manning, Esq.; Captain Orton; the Rev. Robert Ainslie; R. C. Hyatt, Jun.; R. H. Marten, Esq.; George Jackson, Esq.; and the Rev. W. Drury, addressed the Meeting. Mr. Marten pronounced a just eulogium on the character of the late President, Admiral Lord Gambier, who is succeeded in that honour by the Right Honourable Lord Mountsandford.

THE SAILORS' SOCIETY.

On Monday Evening, May 6, a public meeting, most numerously and respectably attended, was held at the London Tavern, for the purpose of forming a new Society under the above denomination, having for its object the "Moral and Religious Improvement of Seamen." The chair was taken by the Lord Mayor.

The Rev. E. Richards, of Wandsworth, having offered prayer for the Divine blessing, the Lord Mayor stated the objects of the meeting. The Rev. F. A. Cox, LL.D. proposed the first Resolution, declaring the expediency of the Society: the Rev. Doctor stated, as a reason for it, that there were 24,000 vessels, manned with more than 150,000 seamen, continually afloat, connected with our country, and more than 10,000 continually within reach of the metropolis. The Rev. R. Ousby, chaplain to the House of Correction, seconded the Resolution. The Meeting was further addressed by J. Brown, Esq. of Wareham; the Rev. C. B. Wordman; the Rev. G. Gibbs; G. F. Augas, Esq.; G. Miller, Esq.; D. Wire, Esq.; Dr. Oxley; J. Backland, Esq.; and Mr. Moore. The Lord Mayor; G. F. Augas, Esq.; and J. Perry, Esq. each put down his name for Ten Guineas. G. F. Augas, Esq. made the following weighty remark: that "the moral condition of sailors, to whom 130,000,000*l.* worth of merchandize was committed in the course of a year, should certainly be no indifferent subject to British merchants."

EXPENSIVENESS IN BLOOD AND TREASURE OF COLONIAL SLAVERY.

James Douglas, Esq. of Cavers, the learned and eloquent author of "The Advancement of Society in Knowledge and Religion," and several other valuable works, has recently published a pamphlet, which we sincerely recommend to our readers: it is entitled, "Address on Slavery, Sabbath Protection, and Church Reform." pp. 66.

On the former of these subjects especially, Mr. Douglas makes some affecting appeals. He says,—

"The West Indies are an example, that the laws of God are never neglected with impunity, and that no lasting prosperity can be based upon injustice and human misery. Whether we look to the wretched slaves; the bankrupt planters; or their creditors, the merchants, who lend out their money upon usury, in vain sought to be wrung out of the tears and blood of wretched men; or to that portion of the British army, which, to the disgrace of this country, forms the only solid support of a system as impolitic as it is unjust, we everywhere behold the curse of an avenging God pressing heavily upon the abettors of this slavish tyranny, which is without its equal in atrocity, either in ancient or modern times. If there is a spot in existence (except the regions of eternal punishment) where all things are contrary to the mind and laws of God, we must certainly find it in the West Indies, where property is robbery; labour, tyrannous exaction; law, merciless oppression; governors, murderers and men-stealers; and where all things are conducted, not according to the maxims of a wise and holy Being, but according to the devices of the enemy of human happiness."

Mr. Douglas proceeds to answer the inquiry,—For whose profit does this miniature of hell exist? Not, according to their own showing, for that of the planters. As far back as the twenty years from 1772 to 1792, the Committee of the Jamaica Assembly reported, that there had been in the course of that time 177 estates sold for debt, and 55 thrown up; while, at the end of that period, 92 estates remained in the hands of creditors. Since that period things have become worse.

"If then," continues Mr. Douglas, "neither the planters nor the merchants are gainers by the colonial system, is Britain a gainer? If squandering life and money be a gain to her,—if adding to her taxes, and providing graves for her soldiers,—if becoming a party to wrongs which are crying to Heaven for vengeance be gain to Britain, then has she found in the West Indies an inexhaustible treasure. By an elaborate and moderate computation, the military and naval expenses of maintaining the West India islands in a state of slavery, especially if the Mauritius and the Cape are added, cannot fall short of 2,000,000*l.* sterling annually. The duties and drawbacks on sugar have been estimated, with equal care, at 1,200,000*l.* sterling; and if we add the loss that we suffer from excluding the productions of the richest countries of the East, the total amount of Britain's loss cannot possibly be much overstated at 4,000,000*l.* a year.

"The loss of money, however, be it ever so great, cannot compare with the cruel waste of life occasioned by sending our soldiers to those pestilential regions, whose very atmosphere is, in many cases, death to the uninured whites, and certain loss of health to all. In 1826, of the eighty-three regiments then in the British service, twenty were placed in the West Indies. While twenty regiments were required for the West Indies, nine were deemed sufficient for Britain. The secretary at war is understood to have said, that out of three regiments, consisting of 2,700 men, sent to one of the islands, one-third had perished in one season!"

Who can compute the amount of loss, guilt, and folly, inseparable from West India Slavery!

PAUL PREACHING AT ATHENS.

Suggested by viewing one of the Cartoons.

Who stands within that far-fam'd court
 Which Solon form'd in days of yore;
To which the learned made resort
 On that proud classic, favour'd shore; —
Athens, the great, renown'd, and free,
The famous seat of Liberty?

Around him lie the mighty dead!
 All who their country's battles won;
Those who at Salamis had bled,
 And those who fell at Marathon;
Here Socrates and Plato taught;
Here Xenophon both wrote and fought.

Here rose the noblest works of art,
 Whose praise has through the nations rung:
Demosthenes here charm'd the heart,
 And Phidias wrought, and Homer sung.
Who on those steps excels them all?
'Tis he — the Christian teacher — Paul!

'Tis he! the servant of that Lord,
 Whom Grecian sages never knew;
Come to declare His name and word,
 And teach them to believe and do.
Behold him, by the Spirit mov'd
Of Jesus, whom he preach'd and lov'd!

All that divine and holy zeal,
 Which ever signaliz'd his name,
Now fill'd his heart, and made appeal
 To their's who heard: from far he came,
To preach of Jesus and His blood,
And to reveal "The Unknown God!"

His auditors have crowded round,
 Eager to hear what he might teach;
But few among them can be found
 Whose hearts those glorious truths could reach.
In mental darkness long they lay,
But now has dawn'd a brighter day.

Here stands the Cynic, deep in thought,
 Forming objections in his heart;
And there the Stoic hither brought,
 And unconvinc'd he will depart,
Aged, and leaning on his staff:
Both these express their inward wrath.

Near them a group of Atheists sit,
 Sophists, Freethinkers, dead to all
They ought to feel; — and here they meet
 To cavil, and the Preacher call
A setter forth of doctrines strange;
And they from error will not change.

At farther distance, turn'd away,
 Two Jewish doctors may be trac'd,
Who have not hail'd this glorious day,
 Nor that Messiah had embrac'd,
Whom their own prophets had foretold,
And whom their eyes did once behold,

Teaching within that hallow'd dome,
 Which still remain'd their dearest trust;
And, harder than the marble stone,
 They from His veins beheld to burst
The gushing blood on Calvary's hill:
They felt not then, they scorn Him still.

But not in vain that tongue must teach
 With eloquence sublime and rare,
And now a risen Saviour preach,
 And show his love and mercy there:
Some hearts the Holy Spirit brought
Deeply to feel the truths he taught.

See the result! those earnest eyes
 And hands uplifted here behold;
Their hearts to God in prayer arise,
 And all collected in His fold,
Shall not depart in spirit bound,
One with the Saviour they are found.

Him they revere who came to preach
 Salvation only in His name.
Go forth, ye Greeks, and also teach
 That Jesus to the Gentiles came.
His death and resurrection show,
Until the world your Lord shall know.

Singular Sign of Mourning.—The Landers, recent travellers through Africa, mention an extraordinary custom which they witnessed. "Many women with little wooden figures of children on their heads, passed us in the course of the morning — mothers, who, having lost a child, carry such rude imitations of them about their persons for an indefinite time as a symbol of mourning. None of them could be induced to part with one of these little affectionate memorials."

The African Butter Tree. — The Mi-Cadania, or butter tree, yields abundance of a kind of vegetable marrow, pleasant to the taste, and highly esteemed by the natives. It is used for lights, and other domestic purposes. The tree is not much unlike our oak in appearance, and the kernel of its nut is about the size of our chestnut. It is exposed in the sun to dry; after which it is pounded very small, and boiled in water: the oily particles it contains float on the surface; when cool they are skimmed off, and made into little cakes for use, without any further preparation.

DIFFERENT KINDS OF TORTURE INFLICTED IN THE "HOLY INQUISITION."

HISTORY OF THE ROMISH "HOLY INQUISITION."

Pope Innocent the Third," as Gibbon remarks, may boast of the two most signal triumphs over sense id humanity, the establishment of Transubstanti- ion, and the origin of the Inquisition."

Humanity shudders while reflecting upon the dia- lical cruelties and murders perpetrated by this most rrible "Court;" for the whole history of human ckedness, embracing every nation, does not present y system of policy to be compared with it for in- stice, atrocity, or hypocrisy. That which peculiarly gravates the criminality and blood-guiltiness of that ourge of Christendom is, that its proceedings were ways conducted by ministers of religion, and in the essed name of Him, who is the "Prince of Peace," e fundamental law of whose kingdom, enjoined upon l his servants, is, "Whatsoever ye would that men ould do unto you, do ye so even unto them."

This fearful Tribunal of the Inquisition was erected the Pope, about A. D. 1200, in several Roman atholic countries, for the examination and punish- ent of heretics, the papal chair being then filled by nocent III. The immediate object of the Inquisition as the extermination of the Waldenses, who, under several denominations, continued marvellously to increase in France, Spain, Germany, and even in Italy. The principles and general character of the Waldenses, are brought before us in an interesting and satisfactory manner. We have extant some of their own "Apologies" and "Confessions of Faith," which are truly excellent. Besides, Reinerius Saccho, who had been brought up among them, and was therefore acquainted with their principles and character, was appointed legate and inquisitor, for the purpose of extirpating them. Though an apostate from them, and one of their determined enemies, he testifies as follows: "Of all the sects that have risen up against the church of Rome, the Waldenses have been the most prejudicial and pernicious. They live righteously before men, believe rightly concerning God in every particular, holding all the articles contained in the creed (Apostles' Creed), but hating and reviling the church of Rome, and on this subject they are readily believed by the people." We cannot but believe that such a people, concerning whom an enemy would so write, were living by faith on the Son of God, and enjoying the comforts of the Holy Spirit. Especially when we reflect that it was their glory that there was scarcely one among them who was not better acquainted with the Scriptures than the doctors of the Romish church.

However sound and scriptural their principles, and pure and exemplary their morals, the Waldenses could not escape persecution. By methods which required more than depraved human ingenuity to devise, the inquisitors and their officers proceeded in their bloody work, and the beginning of the thirteenth century was distinguished by thousands of the Waldenses being put to death, by hanging, burning, and various other dreadful tortures. Under the denomination of Waldenses and Albigenses, in France alone, it was computed, that by the direction of the papal legates and inquisitors, not less than a million were murdered, in several barbarous crusades! while their only crime was that of being dissenters from the popish domination and superstitions, separating to enjoy the gospel of Jesus Christ, and to live together as his obedient disciples!

The princes under whom these dissenters lived, afforded them protection on account of their habits of good order and their industry: but as they rejected the impositions of popery, and admitted only the Scriptures as their rule of faith and duty, by order of the papal court, armies were raised to exterminate them as heretics, and several of the nobles fell with their people, being treated with every species of perfidy, injustice, and brutality, by their bigoted invaders. As these crusading legions were marching, a turbulent inquisitorial monk was murdered in the dominions of Raymond, Count of Thoulouse; and this served as a pretext for Pope Innocent III, to publish an edict, a part of which is as follows: "We moreover promise to all those who shall take up arms to revenge the said murder, the pardon and remission of all their sins. And since we are not to keep faith with those who do not keep it with God, we would have all to understand, that every person who is bound to the said Earl Raymond by oath of allegiance, or by any other way, is absolved by apostolical authority from such obligations; and it is lawful for any Roman Catholic to persecute the said Earl, and to seize upon his country. We exhort you, that you would endeavour to destroy the wicked heresy of the Albigenses; and do this with more rigour than you would towards the Saracens themselves; persecute them with a strong hand; deprive them of their lands and possessions; banish them, and put Roman Catholics in their room."

Such were the shocking sentiments and language of one who called himself the chief minister and vicar of Jesus Christ! The orders of the Pope were executed without delay; and in such a manner, that a detail of the accompanying acts of hypocrisy and treachery, of indecency and savageness, would harrow up the sensibilities of the most unfeeling soul. Hundreds at a time were butchered in the most terrible manner. Noblemen and governors, who attempted to defend the innocent inhabitants of the Waldensian cities, were anathematized, and the people indiscriminately massacred! Writers of the greatest veracity declare, that "the armies employed by Pope Innocent III destroyed two hundred thousand of them, in the short space of a few months."

St. Dominic has the honour of first erecting this extraordinary "Court of Inquisition;" and the two orders of St. Dominic and St. Francis were at this time instituted. The first inquisitors were vested with a double capacity, not very happily united in the same persons; one was that of preachers, to convince the heretics by argument; the other, that of persecutors, to instigate magistrates to employ every method of extirpating those who were not convinced by the reasoning of the merciless fanatics and wretched sophisters. At first indeed the inquisitors had no tribunals: they merely inquired after heretics, their numbers, strength, and riches. When they had detected them, they informed the bishops, who at that time had the sole power of judging in ecclesiastical affairs, and whom they urged to anathematize, banish, or otherwise chastise such heretical persons as they brought before them. On some occasions they excited princes to arm their subjects against the heretics; or inflamed the rabble, whom they themselves headed, to take up arms, and unite in extirpating them. Those who could be induced to devote themselves to this service, obtained the title of Crusaders, and wore a cross upon their garments. The efforts of the inquisitors were greatly assisted by the emperor of the Romans, Frederick II, who, in 1224, promulgated four edicts of the most ferocious and sanguinary description against heretics. These edicts were approved and confirmed by the pope, and inserted in his bulls; and the persecuting spirit which pervades them became gradually incorporated into the laws of almost every country in Europe.

After the death of Frederick, about the middle of the thirteenth century, Pope Innocent IV remaining sole arbiter of the affairs of Lombardy and other parts of Italy, commenced diligently to extirpate heresy, which he feared was increasing; and as the past labours of the Franciscan and Dominican friars, unrestrained either by respect of persons or the fear of dangers, by any regard to justice or the feelings of humanity, had highly recommended them to the pontiff, he cheerfully availed himself of their services. Preaching was not found to succeed; and the military executions were suspended for the sake of erecting tribunals, armed with tremendous authority, for the purgation of heretical pravity. These noble tribunals were to consist of the inquisitor and the bishop of the place. The inquisitor, however, was to be the principal; and the bishop had little more than the name of judge. The secular powers were indeed allowed to appoint the subordinate officers to the inquisition, but still subject to the approbation of the inquisitor. Of all the confiscated property belonging to the heretics, a third part was granted to the community, in return for the whole expense of keeping the prisons and supporting the prisoners. The infliction of the punishment on those condemned was vested in the magistrate, who could not avoid executing it without incurring the fearful vengeance of the church; so that he was executioner for the spiritual judge.

On this footing the "Holy Office" was placed in the year 1251 in the ecclesiastical states of Italy; and before A.D. 1300 we find it extended to Paris, Thoulouse, Syria, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Poland, Bohemia, &c., under the management of Dominican friars, thirty-one rules or articles defining their jurisdiction and powers, and regulating the procedure of this spiritual court of judicature. All rulers and magistrates were commanded, by a special papal bull, to give, under pain of excommunication, the most punctual obedience and every possible assistance to this "Holy Court."

Under Ferdinand and Isabella, this scourge and disgrace of human nature was established in Spain and Portugal, where tribunals of the Inquisition were erected with all possible pomp and magnificence. Happily for mankind, this infernal Institution has been abolished in many countries, which are yet Roman Catholic, as the greatest outrage upon the dearest rights of man; and the final erasure of the Inquisition from the face of the earth cannot be far distant, together with all the superstitions and errors of Antichrist, by means of the general diffusion of the Holy Scriptures.

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. IV.—THE WISDOM OF GOD.

Does not anatomy testify, that on the frail tenement of clay in which it is our allotment for a few years to reside, the Deity hath lavished infinite skill, and fitted it for our reception with all the wondrous contrivances of mechanical art? Oh! it is marvellous to think on His skill, who even at this moment is supporting and sustaining existence in myriads of myriads of beings, arranging all things for their present happiness, and administering to all their wants with the tenderest anxiety. It was wisdom indeed past finding out, which first called into existence the whole race of animate beings; but surely it must be owned that no less wisdom is needed to devise means whereby each may enjoy the existence thus imparted. Many eminent men have made it their business to examine the wonders of nature, and I am sure it will be found that the purest amusement, as well as the most useful instruction, may be derived from a perusal of their works.

But I must not forget to say something with respect to that magnificent display, which the firmament presents when the darkness of night has shrouded the lovely and placid scenery of the world in which we live. And what is it that the astonished gaze of a creature is permitted to view? Ignorance may possibly have so clouded his mind and obscured his understanding, that he supposes what he beholds to be nothing more than bright spangles in some canopy of blue. But it is time for the veil of such ignorance to be rent in twain: it is time now to let mankind know their real position—that they are placed in regions of infinite space, and kept from falling by no other power than that of the Creator; that the world in which they move, great and mighty as it may seem to them, is but a very small part of the works of God's hands; that every star which they behold just glimmering at an inconceivable distance, is doubtless a world, and in all probability the sun of a system as great or greater than our own. All the proud and noble edifices which have employed for so long the care and skill of mankind, appear insignificant when compared to the mighty extent of that earth upon which they are erected; and that earth itself dwindles into nothingness when compared with the mighty system of the heavens. Be it known to you, O vain man, that the world in which you live, and which you make the theatre of your pride and vain boasting, appears only like a little star when viewed from some of the bright globes which we behold, and is invisible to many. Think of these things, and join in the rational, consistent, and devout exclamation of the Psalmist: "Lord, what is man, that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man, that thou visitest him?"

"Thou, proud man, look upon yon starry vault,
Survey the countless gems which richly stud
The night's imperial chariot. Telescopes
Will show thee myriads, more innumerous
Than the sea sand; each of those little lamps
Is the great source of light, the central sun,
Round which some other mighty sisterhood
Of planets travel, every planet stock'd
With living beings impotent as thee.
Now, proud man, where is thy greatness fled?
What art thou in the scale of Universe?
Less, less than nothing!"

Considerations such as these are eminently calculated to increase our reverence of God; for we cannot fail to be convinced, that He who orders all these wondrous planets, who prescribes rules which none of them can break, yea and calleth them all by their names, must be infinite in wisdom, and all his ways past finding out.

2. The Providence of God no less displays the attribute now under consideration. It must be owned that there is more obscurity hanging over this subject than any other; and the reason of it I conceive to be, because we are not able to look into both worlds, and collect in one view the present and the future. We are all apt to judge of things by the aspect which they present to our senses; and as I observed when treating on the Justice of God, the condition of men is not now what their moral worth, as compared with each other, requires it should be. Nothing more is needed to establish the necessity of a future state, wherein just judgment may be rendered to the sons of men, than the simple statement of this fact, so well known to all. Oh! it is gratifying, in the midst of a world where injustice abounds on every side,—where the cry of the distressed is drowned in the clamour of the persecutor, and the merit of the worthy is overlooked in the contemplation of splendid and gorgeous iniquity,—it is, I say, gratifying to remember that there is an appeal from earth to heaven, and a judgment-seat yet to be erected, around which shall be gathered the long-forgotten generations that have thronged each portion of this globe. The poor and indigent man will at that day discover, that though man has been unmindful of him, God has not: that all his wants and his sufferings are recorded in a book of everlasting remembrance, which will be opened at the last day, and read to assembled worlds. Of the proceedings of that judgment we know and understand but little; nevertheless, enough has been communicated to convey to us the knowledge of every thing connected with it which it is necessary for us to know: and when all the mighty but incomprehensible workings of the Deity shall be fully explained to admiring myriads, I doubt not that each one will be struck with enraptured amazement at the wisdom with which the Deity has conducted all things, and casting at His feet the crowns wherewith he has rewarded their diligence, will be irresistibly urged to exclaim, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty; just and true are all thy ways, thou King of Saints!"

But I would most anxiously wish every human being to know, that all his concerns are now under the superintendence of God, who will not fail to make all things work together for good to them who love him. It may seem indeed that trials and sufferings are very doubtful proofs of the care and preservation of the Deity; but let those who suppose this, if they be Christians, seriously ask themselves whether they have not always found, that what appeared dark and gloomy in their condition was absolutely necessary to their eternal welfare? In fact, I cannot suppose it possible, that if men could persuade themselves that God did really interfere with their affairs, they would for one moment doubt the correctness of the conduct pursued. And after so many declarations, both in his word and in his works, that he careth for us—that though unnumbered worlds demand his attention, he is not unmindful of our griefs and sorrows,—let us not doubt a truth which is alone calculated to cheer the darkness of temptation, and cast a gleam of sunshine over the rugged and desolate paths which lead to the mansions of blessedness. When therefore our cheek is lighted up with a smile, or when our eye is filled with a tear, let us not be unmindful of Him who ordereth all things after the counsel of his own will: and when our heart begins to doubt the mercy or wisdom of God, in some strange dispensation of his providence, let the rising doubt be instantly checked with the Saviour's words, "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter."

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXVII.

On learning Geography.

Dear Madam,

A KNOWLEDGE of the principles of geography is indispensable to your son. This knowledge, in the degree of preparing him for further instruction, you can yourself communicate.

All that you will want will be a globe, or at least a map of the world, tolerably full; that is, having the names of the principal countries and cities marked upon it. You can then begin to teach your juvenile pupil.

As a first lesson, show him an orange, and an ivory ball; and tell him, that the earth on which we all live is not in shape like the ivory ball, perfectly round, but like the orange, flattened at two opposite points, and bulging out rather, all around the two other opposite points.

Now show him a terrestrial globe; and then explain to him the nature of a map,—that it is a drawing in miniature of the outlines of places in their relative sizes and situations.

Go into the garden with him, and choosing some situation whence the whole can be viewed, make a map of it, with the names of the different objects in their places. Let your next lesson be to teach him to make a map of the street in which you live, or the village or neighbourhood, including the principal buildings and other objects. Let this be done on a large scale, and not too many places marked down. Let him put down the boundaries of the different places. Then show him a map of England: point out to him that the different lines include the different counties, or the different portions into which the first kings of England ordered that the whole kingdom should be considered as divided: point out the towns and cities and rivers, and show him the boundaries of each: then point out the boundaries of the whole island, and their names. Then take him to the terrestrial globe, and show him the relative situation of England to the rest of the countries. Tell him that the upper part of the map is called the north, and so of the globe; the lower part the south, the right hand the east, and the left hand the west. Show him how high up towards the north England is: point out to him across the sea the situation of Ireland. Let the next lesson be to show him, that just across the English channel you come to France: show him, still farther on the globe, one country of Europe after another, and the bounds of Europe. Thence proceed to Asia. Direct his attention to the sea extending everywhere, and the islands and countries standing out of it. As to the vacant space around the north pole, tell him that no one has ever been to explore it; so also of the south pole. In another lesson, point out remarkable points, such as the Cape of Good Hope and Cape Horn. Show him Madras, and then ask him to trace with his finger the way by sea to Madras, and then with a pencil the way over-land.

You may then afterwards begin to teach him geography more minutely.

Do this simply by conversation, and on no account ever allow him to commit verbal descriptions of countries to memory. He will loathe the whole study, both now and for ever, if you do.

You may have such a book as Goldsmith's Geography in your hand, and which may suggest to yourself the principal countries and cities, which you may ask him to find on the map. Pursue this plan by little easy, pleasant lessons. Proceed from one thing to another: do not require of him the remembrance of a great number of names; a few principal cities in the different countries is enough. Let him especially learn their relative positions; and whenever you wish him to tell you where any place is situated, bid him to fancy his map before him, and in imagination to find it on the map. This must always be the rule; and by this method he will, by the laws of the association of ideas, soon surprise you by the facility with which he will reply to your inquiries.

You may then initiate him into the knowledge of longitude and latitude. Teach him that the circle or globe, by common consent of learned men, for the purposes of science, and not owing to any natural property, is divided into 360 degrees, or equal parts; so that a half circle contains 180 of these arbitrary parts, and a quarter 90. Then show him the line round the globe called the equator; and the parallel lines to it: tell him that these are called the lines of latitude: then show him the lines which cross them from pole to pole, and tell him that these are called the lines of longitude. Make him understand that there are no such lines in nature really and to be seen, but that they are agreed upon in order that by being numbered, persons may by the number find out in the map the different countries which lie between the lines, or under them. Instruct him to refer to the different countries, and to bear the association of the longitude or latitude in his mind. Whenever you ask him a question of this nature, or whenever in reading he meets with a country which he wishes to find, let his mind not ramble through the earth, but recur to the map or globe, and to the very spot where he has been accustomed to see it, and the association will suggest it. If he meets with the name of a city, and the country, &c. where it stands is not mentioned, then let him refer to you, and you may refer to the Universal Directory, or System of Geography, and there you will find the country mentioned. Having told this to him, let him recur to it, and search till he finds it. Let him always feel that there is no disgrace in not knowing where a city or town, or even a province is, which he had not heard of before.

These general principles will be enough, as the nucleus of his future knowledge. By looking for places as he needs them in reading, he will know a sufficient number in the course of time.

The general rule however should be, that he should both actually and in memory, whenever he wants to know the situation of a place, refer to the same globe or map.

THE EARL OF KINGSTON'S MOTTO,

"SPES TUTISSIMA CŒLIS."

The safest hope is in heaven.

Hope, sweetest comfort, steady friend,
Who ever dost thy succours lend
Whene'er my mind's opprest:
Oft have I found thy genial rays
Dispel the clouds of darkest days,
And set my soul at rest.

But ah! on earth I dare not cast
Hope's precious anchor, lest the blast
Of Time's rude winds should shake,
And loose its hold; and in this gale
Of snares and tempests me should fail,
And my fond schemes should break.

The safest hope 's in heaven above,
Stable and firm 'twill ever prove,
For God will ne'er deceive:
'Tis in his Son that I confide,
And with his promise satisfied
I safe and joyful live.

THOUGHTS ON THE SACRED HISTORY OF THE CREATION.

THE first order of amphibia, the tortoise kind, are the most immediately serviceable to man. The flesh of the sea-turtle is both a valued delicacy and a useful medicine: it is a gentle and harmless animal, without any means of hurting others: its occasional subsistence is grass, sea-weeds, and shell-fish; but it can subsist for many months without any. The green sea-turtles generally assemble in numbers: they can remain long under water, and sleep upon it. The land-tortoise has the same gentle and peaceable manners: it enjoys a great length of life, and can live without food. This class of animals were thus made to be in the waters what the sheep are on the hills; harmless, gentle, patient, and useful; one of the most pleasing forms of character of all animated being.

The lizard division presents to us as its leading class the formidable crocodiles, a name to which dread and aversion are by the prejudices of our defective knowledge almost inseparably attached: yet it is neither a fierce nor cruel animal; it seeks its prey when hunger urges it, but it destroys only for food. They are sometimes thirty feet long: their whole body is covered with strong, hard scales, except the top of the head: having no lips, their teeth are always bare. On land, they can overtake a man in direct running; but if he turn quickly round, he escapes with ease, as the animal cannot so rapidly wheel round its great length of body. They abound chiefly between the tropics, but are met with several degrees nearer the poles; they are smaller, however, as more distant from the equator.

The other lizard tribes are small and pleasing animals; some are beautiful in their colours. The guana species is highly interesting. The varieties of the green lizard are most striking. The gilded lizard is not less attractive. All are very gentle and harmless, and have the property of living without food. The most remarkable are the flying lizard and the salamander. The flying lizard is the nearest resemblance to the fabled dragons of antiquity that nature contains; but it seldom exceeds a foot in length, and is a weak animal, perfectly innocent and peaceful: it flies from branch to branch of a tree, feeding on ants, flies, and insects, and can flutter from one tree to another within thirty paces. The salamander, instead of living in fire, delights in cold, damp places: it retires into the hollows of old trees, and can remain a considerable time under water: the instant it touches fire, it covers itself with a milky fluid, but never in such abundance as to extinguish the smallest flames.

The frog genus discovers sagacities and feelings like those of other animals. The pearly frog of Brazil is distinguished for its beauty; so is the common tree frog, which lives like birds on the branches of the forest, and in seeking insects is almost as light and nimble as they are. The red tree frog is used by the Indians of South America to give a fine red or yellow colour to the feathers of their parroquets.

The beavers have been proverbial for their intelligence ever since North America, their chief seat, has become known; and the otter displays the same maternal sensibilities which other orders of animals so strikingly exhibit. Thus all quadrupeds seem to have been created with one analogous mind, uniform in its essential qualities, but acting variously, according to the diversities of its bodily investments.

The serpent tribe is another of the departments of the same grand empire of organized living forms; full of mingled beauty and terror, presenting to us a new exercise of the Divine imagination in its system of creation, but more exclusively existing for its own enjoyment, and less serviceable to man or the rest of nature than any other animal kind. Though destitute of feet and wings, few animals are so nimble as serpents, or can transport themselves from place to place with equal agility. Whether to seize its prey or to escape from danger, the serpent moves with the rapidity of an arrow, twisting and untwisting its flexible body around the trunks and branches of the highest trees with such celerity, that the sharpest eye scarcely follows its motion. Their size greatly varies; some are but a few inches long, while others extend to forty or fifty feet: all are covered with scales, and by this analogy are connected with the lizards and fishes.

Serpents are extremely vulnerable, and easily killed by blows on the back part of the head: the rest of their skeleton has a strong resemblance to that of fishes; but from the nature of their respiration they cannot remain long under water. All parts of their body have great force, agility, and elasticity. They are most abundant in warm and temperate regions; but increase in size and numbers in proportion to the heat and moisture, and to the freedom of their range. They have less blood than quadrupeds; but are more animated in times of tempest and hurricane. Their sense of hearing is dull, but their vision acute: their eyes for the most part are excessively brilliant and animated: they have a membrane to draw over the sight when the sun's rays are too powerful, or any injury approaches. Their sense of taste is probably of considerable delicacy, as the tongue is very slender, and divided into two points. Several species of them live quietly about the habitations of mankind, and sometimes enter their houses, and fix their residence there: they destroy troublesome animals and noxious insects, but are so far from hurting human beings, that they often pass over them when asleep without doing them any injury.

Serpents are sometimes so tamed as to show stronger signs of attachment to their masters than many domesticated birds or animals, being only surpassed in fidelity by the dog. Their length of life is unknown, and most likely differs in their various species. They have no voice, but a hiss; and this utterance is softer or stronger according to circumstances. They have great strength also, from the peculiar construction of their body; and are so tenacious of life, that it is difficult to kill them by wounds in the body, or by the exhaustion of air. Severe cold only suspends the activity of their vital principle, without destroying it. Some of them too are eminently beautiful in their brilliant colours.

It is a curious distinction, lately ascertained, that all the species of serpents of which the young are born alive, are venomous: the oviparous vipers have no fangs nor venom: the more we are familiarized to them, the more we shall be pleased to meet with them in our woods, fields, and gardens; they are an addition to the ornaments of the fields, and contribute, with the other animated beings, to embellish the vast and magnificent theatre of vernal nature.

Of the other serpents it need only be mentioned, that the enormous boa twists itself round calves, and sheep, and goats, to crush their bones, and then swallows them whole: it has been seen to overcome and devour tigers in this way, though not till after a desperate struggle. In Egypt and other parts of Africa, serpent flesh has been made an article of human food, and modern as well as ancient nations have made them objects of religious veneration.

Anniversaries of Religious and Benevolent Societies.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

On Thursday, May 9, the Thirty-ninth Annual Meeting of this great Institution was held at Exeter Hall. It appears that this was the most numerous assembly convened during the present anniversaries. The Rev. Mr. Douglas having offered prayer for the Divine blessing, the chair was taken by Thomas Wilson, Esq. Treasurer to the Society.

The Rev. W. Ellis read an abstract of the Report, which exhibited a most important scene of labour. The following plan exhibits the present state of this Society's operations.

	Stations.	Missionaries.	Native Teachers.
South Seas	33	14	41
Ultra Ganges	5	7	3
East Indies	142	32	113
Russia	4	4	0
Mediterranean	2	2	0
South Africa	25	25	13
Madagascar & Mauritius	3	5	93
British Guiana	6	4	1
	220	93	264

Making, with upwards of 400 schoolmasters, assistants, catechists, &c. between 500 and 600 persons more or less dependent on the Society, exclusive of families.

The number of native churches is 54, and that of native communicants 4,557; of schools, the number is 448, and that of scholars 27,257. The number of printing establishments is 13, from nine of which have been printed 250,050 books, including 37,500 portions of scripture, and from eleven stations, 113,237 copies of books have been put in circulation during the past year.

The amount of receipts of the Society is nearly 37,500*l.* and the expenditure nearly 41,600*l.*; leaving a balance against the Society of upwards of 4,000*l.* for the past year. For the support of the present operations of the Society, from 45,000*l.* to 50,000*l.* per annum are indispensably required, and we trust the amount will be readily furnished.

The Meeting was addressed by the Rev. Dr. Wardlaw, of Glasgow; J. Davies, Esq. of Wales; the Rev. Dr. S. H. Cox, of New York; the Rev. R. H. Hamilton, of Leeds; the Rev. J. Langley, of Wallingford, of the church of England; the Hon. Capt. Waldegrave, R. N. lately returned from the South Seas; the Rev. Dr. Doran, late a Church Missionary at Travancore; the Rev. J. Roberts, late Missionary in Ceylon; the Rev. D. Stuart, of Dublin; and the Rev. J. Philippo, Missionary from Jamaica.

The true spirit of the gospel seemed eminently to pervade the Meeting; and during the progress of the business, the chairman announced the receipt of 100*l.* to which he proposed adding his 100*l.* if 600*l.* could be thus raised. J. Dyer, Esq. announced a donation of 100 guineas from an anonymous friend, and 363*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.* were collected at the Meeting.

HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

On Tuesday evening, May 14, the Fifteenth General Meeting of this valuable Institution was held at Exeter Hall. After singing the 117th Psalm, and prayer by the Rev. T. Jackson of Stockwell, Thomas Thompson, Esq. the Treasurer of the Society, took the chair. A most interesting abstract of the Report was read, by which it appeared that the Society is greatly increasing in the estimation of the Christian public, as indispensably necessary to promote the evangelization of the villages in Britain. The receipts of the Society for the past year had amounted to 4,947*l.*; removing the debt which for several years had impeded the operations of the Institution.

The Meeting was addressed by the Rev. J. Clayton; the Rev. J. Sibree, of Coventry; the Rev. Dr. Morison; the Rev. Mr. Luke, of Taunton; the Rev. Dr. Bennett; the Rev. Mr. Brook, of Birmingham; the Rev. Mr. Edwards, Secretary to the Baptist Home Missionary Society; and the Rev. J. E. Good, of Bristol.

Several donations were announced; 10*l.* from W. A. Hankey, Esq.; and the Rev. Mr. Brook stated, that the Rev. T. East of Birmingham had placed 50*l.* in his hands, to give to the Society, on condition that the collection amounted to 100*l.* Mr. Brook observed, that the Home Missionary cause was gaining ground in Birmingham, in which we sincerely rejoice, as the Christians in that great town have for a long period shown how much they can do for the interests of Christ, and for every philanthropic cause which has been ever laid plainly before them.

SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

On Thursday evening, May 2, the Anniversary Meeting of this institution was held at Exeter Hall. Lord Henley took the chair, after singing and prayer.

Mr. W. F. Lloyd read an abstract of the Report of the past year, full of the most interesting details. We can notice only a few particulars. It mentioned, that the last report of the American Sunday School Union stated the total number of 9,187 Sunday Schools, 80,913 teachers, and 542,420 scholars. The total number of Sunday schools at the present period in Great Britain, is stated to be 11,275, of teachers 128,784, and of scholars 1,158,435; being an increase, during the last year, of 329 schools, 12,468 teachers, and 22,915 scholars. From the depository accounts, it appeared that the sales, during the past year, had amounted to 7,030*l.* 3*s.* 2½*d.*

The Meeting was addressed by the Rev. Dr. Morison; the Rev. J. Burnett; Sir Andrew Agnew, M. P.; the Rev. J. M. Philippo, late Missionary at Jamaica; George Bennett, Esq. of Sheffield; the Rev. J. Beaumont; Andrew Johnston, Esq.; Mr. Wilson, Sunday school Missionary; the Rev. C. Stovel; and Dr. Allcorne.

We are especially delighted with the purpose of the establishment of a "Library and Reading Room for Sunday school Teachers" at the Depository, Paternoster Row, London. Why not such an establishment in Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, &c.?

IRISH EVANGELICAL SOCIETY.

On Tuesday evening, May 7, the Nineteenth General Meeting of the Irish Evangelical Society was held at Finsbury Chapel, Moorfields. Thomas Walker, Esq. Treasurer, in the chair Prayer having been offered by the Rev. R. Vaughan of Kensington, an abstract of the Report was read by the Rev. A. Tidman, Secretary. An interesting detail was given of the stations occupied, the number of agents employed, the nature of their labours, and the successes which had crowned their operations. The income of the Society amounted to 3,096*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*, and the disbursements to 3,098*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*; there were engagements and debts to the amount of 600*l.*, and 500*l.* had been sold out of the funded property.

The Meeting was addressed by the Rev. G. Clayton; the Rev. D. Stuart, of Dublin; Josiah Conder, Esq.; the Rev. J. Burnett; the Rev. Dr. Styles: and the Rev. Dr. Morison. By their intelligent and powerful appeals, the wants of Ireland were made to produce a deep impression on the assembly; and during the progress of the business, the Rev. J. Burnett announced donations of 10*l.* 10*s.* from Mr. Hollam; 21*l.* from T. Walker, Esq.; 10*l.* 10*s.* from T. Challis, Esq.; 10*l.* 10*s.* from W. A. WHIT-SUNDAY.

Whit-sunday, originally called White-Sunday, is the day on which is commemorated the extraordinary effusion of the Holy Spirit upon the Apostles, as promised by Christ. John xiv, xv, xvi; Acts ii. On this auspicious day, the memorable Jewish Pentecost, those heralds of Messiah were miraculously qualified to fulfil their high commission, being so endowed as perfectly to understand the prophecies of Christ contained in the Old Testament Scriptures, and to speak in the languages of all nations as the Spirit gave them utterance.

Without this divine assistance their commission to evangelize the world would have been in vain; but with this, they were enabled to "preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ," and to write the inestimably precious records of the New Testament for our edification and salvation.

White-Sunday is the name given to this memorable day, on account of the white garments used in the early ages of Christianity. Baptism was administered on this day with much parade and ceremony, unknown to the primitive Christians, and not prescribed by the Apostles, the candidates for baptism appearing in white robes, to indicate the purity of their Christian profession.

The Greeks called this Bright-Sunday, on account of the general use of white garments, worn on that day, as an emblem of the holiness of their professed religion. The name given to this Sunday in the old Roman church was Dominica in Albis, the Lord's day in White garments.

The Holy Scriptures enjoin no religious observance of this day; nor is it recommended to us by the example of the Apostles. It seems to have originated in sincere piety; but in the dark ages of popery, it was abused to superstition and licentiousness. James I, to conciliate the Papists and to provoke the Puritans, pulished a "Declaration," called "The Book of Sports," which commanded the people who came to church twice on the Lord's day, to "recreate themselves, by dancing, archery, leaping, vaulting, May-games, Whitsun-ales, Morice-dances, Maypole-dancing, and other sports of a like kind."

Whitsun-ales, a pernicious popish custom, was thus revived, and in many of the villages of our country it still prevails in the popular Wakes, which are attended with customs and practices most degrading. We trust, however, that the system of Sunday school instruction, and the operations of the Home Missionary Society, and of various other institutions, diffusing the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, will produce a moral renovation throughout the population of Great Britain, preparing and qualifying them to commemorate the glorious facts of Pentecost, as one of the most momentous events of the Divine dispensation.

ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY.

THIRD CENTURY.

31. Clemens Alexandrinus. Titus Flavius Clemens is called Alexandrinus, from the place of his residence, Alexandria in Egypt. By Christian writers of that age, he is celebrated as a man of learning, surpassing most if not all of his time. Clemens is believed to have been brought up an idolater: but thirsting for knowledge, he studied at Athens, of which he is supposed to have been a native; pursued his investigations in various parts of the East; and perfected his inquiries in Egypt. He had thus fully examined the doctrines of the different sects of pagan philosophers; but finding nothing in their various systems which could satisfy the soul of man, or relieve the guilty conscience, he was prepared to abandon them as false and pernicious, and embrace the gospel of Christ.

Clemens settling at Alexandria, about A. D. 190, assisted Pantænus in the famous catechetical school in that city, after having been instructed in the doctrines of Christianity by that renowned father. Clemens was ordained Presbyter in the church of Alexandria, and became a zealous preacher of the faith of Christ. On the death of Pantænus, A. D. 216, Clemens succeeded his revered instructor, as president of the Academy. His labours appear to have been eminently useful; but we have not all the information that is desirable concerning this distinguished father in the church of Christ. The Commentary of Clemens upon the Canonical Epistles is lost: but his Stromata, Pedagogue, and Exhortatations addressed to the Greeks are extant, and which abundantly show the extent of his learning, and the force of his genius. While, however, he enjoyed the highest respect of the most eminent Christian teachers of that age in the East, it is certain that, adhering to many of his early philosophic notions, he obscured the brightness of divine truth, by incorporating them with the gospel. In his Stromata, Clemens says, "I espoused not this or that philosophy, not the Stoic, nor the Platonic, nor the Epicurean, nor that of Aristotle; but whatever any of these sects had said that was fit and just, that taught righteousness with a divine and religious knowledge, all that being selected, I call philosophy."

Persecution under the emperor Severus raging especially at Alexandria, many of the Christians fled to other cities and provinces for security, and we find Clemens at Jerusalem. Alexander, bishop of the church in that place, was in prison for the cause of Christ, and by Clemens he wrote a letter to the Christians at Antioch, the following fragment of which exhibits all the parties in an interesting point of view: "Alexander, a servant of God, and a prisoner of Jesus Christ, to the blessed church at Antioch, in the Lord, greeting. Our Lord has made my bonds, in this time of my imprisonment, light and easy to me; while I understood that Asclepiades, a person admirably qualified by his eminence in the faith, was, by divine providence, become bishop of your holy church of Antioch. These letters, brethren, I have sent you by Clemens, the blessed presbyter, a man of approved integrity, whom ye both do know already and shall still further know: he hath been here with us according to the good will of God, and hath much established and augmented the church of Christ."

Clemens returned from Antioch to Alexandria, where he finished his mortal course; but by what death he glorified his Saviour we are not informed. An extract or two from his "Exhortations to the Greeks," cannot fail to be interesting. He points out the difference between the design of Jesus Christ, and that of Orpheus, and of those musicians, who were the authors of idolatry. Clemens says, "These, captivated men by the sweetness of their music, with a view of rendering them miserable slaves to idols; and of making them like the very beasts, the stocks, the stones, which they adored; whereas Jesus Christ, who from all eternity was the Word of God, always had a compassionate tenderness for men, and at last took their nature upon him, to free them from the slavery of demons, to open the eyes of the blind and the ears of the deaf, to guide their paths in the way of righteousness, to deliver them from death and hell; and to bestow on them everlasting life, and to put them in a capacity of living a heavenly life here upon earth; and lastly, God made himself man, to teach man to be like unto God.—If you were permitted," says he, "to purchase eternal salvation, what would you not give for it? And now you may obtain it by faith and love; there is nothing can hinder you from acquiring it; neither poverty, nor misery, nor old age, nor any state of life. Believe, therefore, in our God, who is God and man, and receive eternal salvation for a recompense. Seek God, and ye shall live for ever!"

AN APPEAL TO THE ATHEIST.

PSALM XIV, 1.

THE fool hath said "There is no God."
No God! Who lights the morning sun,
And sends him on his heavenly road,
A far and brilliant course to run?
Who, when the radiant day is done,
Hangs forth the moon's nocturnal lamp;
And bids the planets, one by one,
Steal o'er the night-vales, dark and damp?

No God! Who gives the evening dew,
The fanning breeze, the fostering shower?
Who warms the spring-morn's budding bough,
And paints the summer's noontide flower?
Who spreads, in the autumnal bower,
The fruit-tree's mellow stores around;
And sends the winter's icy power
T' invigorate th' exhausted ground?

No God! Who makes the bird to wing
Its flight like arrow through the sky;
And gives the deer its power to spring
From rock to rock triumphantly?
Who form'd Behemoth, huge and high,
That at a draught the river drains;
And great Leviathan, to lie,
Like floating isle, on ocean plains?

No God! Who warms the heart to heave
With thousand feelings soft and sweet;
And prompts th' aspiring soul to leave
The earth we tread beneath our feet,
And soar away on pinions fleet
Beyond the scene of mortal strife,
With fair ethereal forms to meet,
That tell us of an after-life?

No God! Who fix'd the solid ground
On pillars strong, that alter not?
Who spread the curtain'd skies around?
Who doth the ocean bounds allot?
Who all things to perfection brought
On earth below, in heaven abroad?—
Go ask the fool of impious thought,
That dares to say—"There is no God!"

THE WOODLARK.

(Alauda arborea. LINNÆUS.)

IN a former paper upon the skylark (vol. i, p. 95), we stated that there were only two species of the genus lark known in England. That which we are now about to describe, the woodlark, is one of our sweetest songsters, and continues in song almost all the year round, with the exception of the months of June and July. It sings, like the skylark, on wing; but differs from that bird in the mode of its flight, wheeling round in widely-extended circles, and pouring forth its most beautiful and melodious notes for a whole hour at a time. "The skylark's song is very sweet, full of harmony, and cheerful as the blue sky and bright sunny beam in which he sports, and he is heard and admired by all, from the ploughman to the prince; but the note of the woodlark is local, not generally known, and from its remarkable softness must almost be listened for, to be heard, and claims nothing of the hilarity of the other. Its gentle, quiet melody, seems rather that of placid contentment."

The general characteristics of this bird are similar to those of the skylark: its length is about six inches, and its weight about eight drams. It is by no means so plentiful as the skylark; neither does it congregate in such flocks as that bird, but it associates only in little families; these may be met with in most parts of the kingdom.

The woodlark breeds very early, beginning to build its nest in March. Col. Montague says he has found the nest with eggs as early as the 4th of April. "The nest is placed on the ground, most commonly on rough and barren land, under a tuft of high grass, furze, or some low bush; and is made of dry grass, lined with finer grass, and sometimes with a few long hairs. The eggs are generally four in number, brown, mottled with dusky and ash colour, mostly at the larger end: they are somewhat less than those of the skylark, and weigh from forty to fifty grains. This bird feeds upon grain and seeds of various kinds, as well as insects."

The following lines from the Forest Minstrel are beautifully descriptive of this little bird.

No tree's leafy foliage embowereth his nest,
But lowly it lies on the earth's trodden breast,
And he flits through the wintry scene
With a silent, but strong and unmurmuring wing,
Till he marks the first glimpse of the green-vested spring.

Then away—away—through the splendours of day,
To heaven he carries his praise:
Ah! who does not love that delectable lay,
As o'er mountain and forest it plays?
Though lowlier he build than each musical bird,
Yet longer and louder his carols are heard,
And heaven his glad anthem repays,
As, day after day, to its portals he towers,
More sweet grows his nest midst deep verdure and flowers.

THE WILL OF THE LATE REV. ROWLAND HILL.

WE understand the will of the late venerable Rowland Hill has been proved under 17,000*l.*; and we are informed that about 11,000*l.* has been left to be devoted to the promotion of evangelical religion in the destitute and neglected villages of Britain. We regard this as a lovely expression of the purest Christian patriotism.

AREOPAGUS, OR MARS' HILL, THE SUPREME COURT AT ATHENS.

AREOPAGUS

o called from two Greek words, Areios, of Mars, Pagos, a court. Our readers will remember that is the place to which the Athenians brought the tle Paul, Acts xvii, 19—22, when he preached in renowned city, the doctrine of salvation by Jesus st. This famous place was the highest court of ature at Athens, erected on a hill dedicated to s, the fabulous god of war. On this account the Greek words, which in ver. 19 are rendered Areo-is, in ver. 22 are translated Mars' Hill. However, s' Hill was not limited to that court of justice, but ided the whole of an immense rock; and so trans-g the words, leaves the station and dignity of onysius the Areopagite," ver. 34, less evident to learned reader, as one of the judges of that famous t.

eopagus is thought by some to have been instituted court of justice by Cecrops, the first king of ns, about the time of Moses; and to have been d after Mars, because he was the first that was ed there, on this occasion: Mars had murdered irrhothius the son of Neptune, for abusing Alceppe his daughter; and Neptune arraigned Mars before a jury of twelve deities, by whom he was acquitted.

Areopagus was celebrated all over Greece and other distant countries, for the strict impartiality of its decisions; and Demosthenes tells us, that to his time, there never had been so much as one of their determinations, which either plaintiff or defendant had called in question. Foreign states, therefore, frequently referred to their decision. Ancient authors relate some remarkable decisions of this tribunal. Aulus Gellius, and Valerius Maximus, mention the case of a woman, who was accused of having poisoned her husband and her son, in the time of Julius Cæsar. She was taken, and brought before Dolabella, who was proconsul of Asia. She was no sooner in his presence than she acknowledged the fact; and added, that she had very good reason for putting her husband and son to death. "I had," said she, "to my first husband a son whom I tenderly loved, and whose virtues rendered him worthy of my affection. My second husband, and the son whom I bare to him, murdered my favourite child I thought it would be unjust to have suffered those two monsters of barbarity to live. If you think, Sir, that I have committed a crime, it is your province to punish it: I certainly shall never repent of it." This affair embarrassed Dolabella, and she was sent to Areopagus. That court, having examined her very particularly for a long time, dismissed her, ordering her and her accuser to appear before them again a hundred years after from the first day of her trial!

Learned men are not agreed respecting the number of judges that composed this august court; for some limit them to thirty-one; others to fifty-one, and some say they amounted to five hundred. The truth seems to have been that their number was not fixed; but became more or less in different ages. Originally this tribunal appears to have consisted of only nine persons, of those who had discharged the office of Archon, or chief magistrate of the city, having acquitted themselves with integrity and honour in that high trust, and who could give a satisfactory account of their administration in a rigorous examination.

The Areopagites were judges for life: their salaries were paid out of the public treasury, and they received for each cause three oboli (an obolus was the sixth part of a drachma, which was equal to about seven pence halfpenny): they never sat in judgment but in the open air, and that only at night time, that their minds might be less liable to distraction by surrounding objects, and that no object of pity or aversion might influence them in relation to either the criminal or the accuser. At first, the Areopagus took cognizance of criminal cases only; but in process of time, their jurisdiction became greatly extended. Blasphemy against the popular divinities, and impropriety in the performance of the sacrifices and other mysteries, engaged their special regard.

Socrates, as some of our readers will remember, was condemned by this court of Areopagus, then consisting of five hundred judges. That extraordinary man, acknowledged the best and wisest of the Athenians, being aware of the absurdity of the popular idolatry of Greece, inculcated upon the youth of Athens a far purer theology; on which account, he was sentenced to death by drinking the fatal hemlock!

Paul was brought into this dreadful court of Areopagus, to give an account of Jesus and the doctrine of the resurrection. On that memorable occasion, he delivered a most powerful discourse, a part of which at least is contained in Acts xvii, 22—31. That sublime and beautiful, as well as rational and evangelical apology for Christ, was lost upon most of the proud and self-wise Athenians: though one of the judges at least, received the word in meekness of wisdom. "When they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked: and others said, We will hear thee again of this matter. So Paul departed from among them. Howbeit, certain men clave unto him, and believed: among the which was Dionysius the Areopagite, and a woman named Damaris, and others with them." Acts xvii, 32—34.

RESIGNATION AND PRAYER RECONCILED.

"How does your Ladyship," said the famous Lord Bolingbroke once to Lady Huntingdon, "reconcile prayer to God for particular blessings with absolute resignation to the Divine will?" "Very easily," answered she; "just as if I was to offer a petition to a monarch, of whose kindness and wisdom I have the highest opinion. In such a case my language would be, 'I wish you to bestow on me such or such a favour; but your majesty knows better than I, how far it would be agreeable to you, or right in itself, to grant my desire. I therefore content myself with humbly presenting to you my petition, and leave the event of it entirely to you.'"

MODES OF TORTURE EXERCISED BY THE "HOLY INQUISITION."

From the most authentic accounts of this dreadful tribunal in Spain and Portugal, we learn, that the nobles of those countries esteemed it an honour to be familiars, who were a kind of bailiffs to the inquisitors, defending them in the execution of their office. On the testimony of one accuser only, the inquisitors had power to apprehend any native of their jurisdiction, or a foreigner who had once been a papist. The prison is called Santa Casa, the holy house: it consists of several porticoes, each of which is divided into a number of small square cells, ten feet high, all vaulted, and built over each other in two rows: the walls are five feet thick, and each cell is fastened with two doors; the inner one thick, covered with iron, the lower part having an iron gate, and the upper a small window, through which the prisoner receives his food. When the prisoners are secured, their heads are shaved, whether men or women, without regard to their birth or quality. They are not allowed even books of devotion; nor permitted to sing, pray, or moan, under the penalty of a severe beating from the keepers. Those who are confined in the lower cells, generally sit in darkness, and sometimes remain in confinement for several years, that their spirits being broken by the miseries of so dreadful an imprisonment, they may be led to confess things agreeably to the wishes of the inquisitors. Various kinds of torture are employed to extort confessions from the wretched beings, to effect their own ruin or that of others.

The place of torture in the Spanish Inquisition is generally an underground and very dark apartment, the entrance to which is through several doors. There is a tribunal erected in it, in which are seated the inquisitor, inspector, and secretary. Candles being lighted, the person to be tortured is brought in; when the executioner, dressed in black linen, his head and face except his eyes covered with a black cowl, seizes his terrified victim, who is stripped naked, without regard to sex, only women are afterwards allowed a pair of linen drawers. They torture them either with cords, or on the rack, or by some other diabolical invention.

The ordinary mode of torture will be better understood from the details of one case, which we give in the sufferings of Lady Joan Bohorquia, wife of the eminent Francis Varquius, Lord of Higuera, in Spain. Her sister, Mary Bohorquia, a young lady of great piety, who was afterwards burnt for her profession of the Protestant faith, having upon the torture declared that she had several times conversed with her sister Joan, concerning the doctrine for which she now suffered, the inquisitor caused her to be apprehended. On account of her peculiar circumstances, she was imprisoned for three months, when her child was taken from her at eight days old, and seven days after she was closely confined, and made to undergo the fate of the other prisoners. In this dreadful calamity, she had only the comfort of a fellow-prisoner, a pious young woman, for a companion, who was afterwards burnt for her religion by the sentence of the inquisitors. This young person was, on a certain day, carried out to the torture, and brought back in so dreadful a condition, that when she lay on her bed of rushes, she was unable to turn herself, and her place of repose increased the pain of her disjointed limbs. Bohorquia tenderly endeavoured to comfort her; when in a few days she herself was carried out, and tortured on the rack with such diabolical cruelty, that the cords cut through the flesh to the bones of her arms, legs, and thighs. In this state she was brought back to prison, the blood streaming from her mouth! She died through these tortures in eight days. But as she was a person of consequence, the court published her sentence, part of it in these words: "Because this lady died in prison, and was found to be innocent upon inspecting and diligently examining her cause, therefore the Holy Tribunal pronounces her free from any further process, doth restore her both as to her innocence and reputation, and commands all her effects, which had been confiscated, to be restored to those to whom they of right belonged," &c.

This is but one example similar to all others which have been published of this horrible tribunal. People stood in such fear of its terrors, that masters delivered up their servants, parents their children, and husbands their wives, to its officers, without daring to utter the least murmur: and as soon as they were imprisoned, their friends put on mourning for them, and spoke of them as dead, not daring to solicit their pardon, lest they should be brought in as accomplices!

THOUGHTS ON THE SACRED HISTORY OF THE CREATION.

The insects and worms were the creeping things which were ordered to appear among the creations of the sixth day. The insect race are in number by far the most considerable portion of animated beings; and whoever duly studies their habits, economy, and uses, will acknowledge that they have been created by design, and will not doubt but the design was benevolent. Linnæus arranged them into seven orders, and these again into a large multiplicity of species: the real quantity of them we may conceive, when we find that three thousand species are to be found in Great Britain alone. It is not necessary to say that they are the favourite productions of the Creator, because each of his kingdoms claims and deserves the same idea. The flower and the fish have been as finely imagined and as elaborately executed as the richest butterfly and the most brilliant beetle: but we may admit that He has combined and displayed in the insect world, the beautiful and the graceful, the interesting and the alluring, the curious and the singular.

The metamorphoses of insects are their most characterising peculiarity: in these we certainly behold three distinct animals, as dissimilar from each other, as to some of them, as the bird is from the serpent, and yet united into one and the same living being, by the personal identity of their principle of life. The same animal crawls in its caterpillar shape, sleeps as a torpid chrysalis, and springs from earth into air with its new wings in the butterfly or moth configuration. What a stupendous wonder this magical transformation would be to us, if it were not so familiar! It seems like a resurrection from the tomb into a fresh life, with celestial destinations; it is so analogous to that which the human spirit must undergo, that we cannot well avoid viewing it as the emblem, the token, the natural herald, and the promise of our own. The ancients, without our Christian revelation, thought so; for one of their most pleasing imaginations yet visible on some of their gravestones which have been dug up, is that of a butterfly over the name which they record: they place the insect there, as the representation of the surviving soul — as the intimation that it will appear in a new form and region of being: the allusion and the applicability are so striking, that I cannot but believe that one of the great purposes of the Deity, in creating his insect kingdom, was to excite this sentiment in the human breast, to raise the contemplative mind to look forward to a revival from the tomb, as the butterfly from its sepulchral chrysalis. Like the insect, man has three changes and forms of being, but continues indestructible through all: he emerges from the womb into the figure and life of the present fleshly body; he rests in his earthy grave unextinguished, though invisible to mortal eye; and he will rise at the appointed time into his ethereal nature and immortalized capacities — always the same self in each transmutation; never dying or dissolving, but surviving to bloom in everlasting youth with an imperishable vitality. The fly passes through such changes to its winged state; so does the gnat, and the beetle likewise.

The actions and habits of the insect world display the same kind of animal mind and feeling which the birds and quadrupeds exhibit. Indeed the ants, bees, and wasps, combine for purposes, and achieve ends, that bring them nearer to mankind than any other class of animated nature. The earwig, like the fowl, sits and hatches its young; a remarkable analogy of maternal instinct: and one species of spider manifests the same care. That the mason wasp, when she deposits her egg, should also leave in the same place enough food for her young ones when they leave their shell, announces a parental foresight and provision. Beetles also evince parental care for the sustenance of their emerging brood, and exert great labour to provide it. Diminutiveness here makes no disparity — the mother is as complete in the pettiest as in the largest, in the ant as in the whale.

Insects have the same senses as other creatures, though varying in their acuteness. One of their most extraordinary properties is that which some display, of producing light within their own bodies: the brilliance of the glow-worm appears to have the usual qualities of common light, even to the effect of heat. As to their habits and occupations, they are divisible into two classes; those which lead a separate, individual life, and those which are born and live wholly in regular societies: very few have been much studied, and it requires a long, persevering, and patient attention, to perceive and understand their habits. That insects have spontaneous self-motion, we continually see: they fly about as they please. No fly comes in one straight, undeviating line, compelled to move only in that; but can and does move in all directions, and in all degrees of quickness and slowness. Every butterfly, gnat, or beetle, does the same. We equally see the full and free exercise of individual choice and will. Try with any walking insect: it will move, not as you choose, but as it likes: check it in one path, and, unless through fear it pauses, it will take another: there is nothing like automatical agency or compulsion about them: their motions exhibit continual changes of will and self-choosing action. They have also as clear a perception of external things as we have: the fly knows the treacle; the wasp the sugar; and the bee his hive: the bee does not go to a leaf, instead of the flower: they perceive what they want, and move to it accordingly: in this conduct they judge as rightly about it as we should do and act as consistently towards it.

No human parent could exert more reasoning and affectionate foresight for the benefit of the child that was about to be born, than one species of bee uniformly displays. To assist a fellow-creature with the co-operation of our labour when it is needed, is an act both of observing mind and benevolent feeling; and such an operation is performed by the pellchafers and the ants. Insects are admitted by all to have the sense of sight in a very perfect degree: some at least show that they hear: their touch also is very nice: as they select what they eat, they must have a discriminating taste. The same agencies of light, sound, heat, cold, and moisture, which act upon our senses, act on theirs: hence it follows, not only that they have sensations as we have, but that those sensations must be like those which we experience. Our experience every moment verifies these conclusions: there seem to be reasonable grounds to infer that insects communicate their ideas and wishes to each other; and that ants perceive what another needs, and voluntarily assist him to attain his end. Dr. Franklin inferred this from a fact of his own observation. It is the opinion of Huber, that insects which live in society have a species of language by which they communicate intelligence to each other. It is clear also that they examine objects, and move from place to place to explore and to seek for what they want, and make movements with their proboscis to ascertain what is fit, as we see by the flies, and indeed by every winged or other insect that we may choose to observe.

But the insect mind peculiarly displays itself in the habitations which some tribes build for themselves or their young. The nests of birds, wonderful as they are, yet are eclipsed by the structures formed by many insects. The regular villages of the beaver must yield the palm to a wasp's nest: nor are the spider galleries, with openings like doors as moveable as any upon hinges, less ingenious. It is however in the habits of those insects which live in societies, that we perceive the most extraordinary demonstrations of intelligence; in the political communities, with established governments, social ranks, appropriated occupations, and regulations or exacted habits of conduct. All species of ants perform actions, possess and preserve institutions, and display faculties and capacities, which seem on the whole not to be inferior to those of any of the animal orders; indeed to be superior to what is known perhaps of any. They furnish another illustration of the great fact, that mind is energy within itself, and is alike independent of figure, bulk, or substance: it uses matter as its servant, but never originates from it; its source is far more exalted and celestial.

We have now surveyed distinctly all the material forms in which the living principle appears on earth, except the human frame; and it is in the phenomena of the vegetable and animal kingdoms, that we derive a larger knowledge of our Divine Sovereign and Benefactor than the common occupations and habits of life can supply. It is this fact which makes Natural History and Philosophy so important and so interesting to us. Creation is everywhere a picture and an elucidation of its Maker's conceptions, reasonings, feelings, and will. The more we study it in this light, the more we shall know of Him; and the more fully and truly we know Him, the more we shall admire what we know, and love what we admire. To explore nature without the associated idea, that it is His mind and thoughts which we are beholding, is to forego the sublimest knowledge and sensibilities which are attainable by human nature. The God is in all his works, as much as the man is in his literary compositions. God has chosen the medium of language, whenever he has deemed it proper to have recourse to it; but he holds a constant communication with us by his creations and his providence, by his course of nature and by his direction of human history and life. It is for us to learn to read them as we ought: they cannot be so studied without expanding and enriching the mind, which thus applies itself to know, feel, and appreciate them; for it is the perfect wisdom of Omnipotence that we shall contemplate; and the comprehensive study of created nature becomes to us an oracle of enlightened Theology, and will prepare the mind for better receiving and appreciating its specific and invaluable revelations.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXVII.

In the same familiar manner you may teach your son the first principles of popular astronomy.

You may do this by an orrery. If you do it without, you can represent the sun as central, yet turning round on its own axis. Then you can represent the different planets revolving round him at different distances, one orbit within another. Then you can teach him the doctrine of our moon revolving round this earth, and the same of Jupiter's moons revolving around Jupiter. Then that all the stars which are external to the orbit of the planet most distant from the sun are called the fixed stars.

Teach him also to distinguish the constellations: tell him how the idea of constellations originated; that the shepherds of Chaldea, who were also learned men and often kings, since flocks in their days constituted the chief property of mankind, were the first astronomers, and used to observe and study the stars. That these men, in order to know where to find any particular star when they wanted, imagined the stars to be like different things, just as your child may often have pleased himself by imagining castles and steeples in the fire; and that this imaginary grouping forms the several constellations. Make him familiar with those which are most striking, such as Orion, &c. After a lesson or two, he will point out to you the faint circle of stars which form the head, and next the bright stars which form the shoulders, the three brilliant stars which form the belt, and the numerous little stars which form the sword, and those which form the knees and the feet. Make him familiar also with the constellation called the Bear, or as others call it the Wain, or Waggon: show him the three stars which are like three horses, and the four stars which are like a square waggon. Tell him that the two last stars of the waggon are called the pointers, because they point towards the pole star: that if he fancies a line drawn through these two stars and continued upwards, it will lead him to the pole star, a dim star of the third magnitude. Make him acquainted also with that beautiful constellation, the Northern Crown, or circle nearly complete of faint stars. Teach him also to distinguish Cassiopeia's Chair, or the Lady in her Chair, as others call it: the two stars which stand for the two tips of the chair's back, the three or four which constitute the seat, and the two brilliant stars for the feet.

A knowledge of these and some few others will add interest to a winter's evening. They will serve too for many reflections in after-life: when after many years and changes are gone by, should he live, he will look up to these constellations shining in all their wonted brilliance, and he will derive not merely the melancholy pleasure arising from the associations of youth and home which they suggest, but the useful lesson of the unchangeableness of the great Architect of all.

You can teach him also the reason why the pole star has its name. Thus, rectify the terrestrial globe in your parlour, and tell him, that if an iron rod, or some such thing, were to spring out of the north pole of the globe and extend to a wafer on the ceiling, then he would see that the world turns round in this slanting position, with the north pole towards this star; whence its name. You can proceed to explain the zodiac, or imaginary belt, extending 80 degrees across the heavens. He can get acquainted with the names of the signs and their order, by Dr. Watts's lines invented for the purpose.

"The Ram, the Bull, the heavenly Twins,
And next the Crab the Lion shines,
The Virgin, and the Scales;
The Archer, Scorpion, and the Goat,
The Man that holds the Water Pot,
And Fish with glittering tails."

Tell him that these are the names of the several constellations comprehended in that imaginary space called the Zodiac, and that the sun appears to pass through one after another, completing the whole journey in a year.

Examine him as to their names, thus—What sign is next to the Virgin, &c. Show him these upon the celestial globe. Make him acquainted with the Galaxy, or Milky-way: it is a splendid and beautiful object.

You may then instruct him as to the alleged distances of the planets, the velocity with which light travels, &c. In another lesson you can explain the received theory of the tides: that the waters being easily moved, are drawn up towards the sun or the moon when either passes over them, just as a stone at liberty is drawn towards the earth: that if we could stand at a point some hundreds of miles high in the air, and could plainly see from thence, we should behold the waters of the ocean drawn into a vast heap by the attraction of the sun, thus of course drawing the waters from the shores, and making low tide; then the tide is down: and that when the sun or moon, by the earth's moving onward, ceases to attract the waters, the heap of waters gradually flows down again, and occasions what we call the high tide. Save this lesson, however, if you can, till you reach the sea-side, at a time when he can understand the subject.

I need not remind you how superficial all this is: at the same time it is needful that your child should know something of this subject when his understanding and age are sufficiently mature; and the knowledge you may thus communicate to him will be enough for all ordinary purposes for some time to come. All this you can readily teach him in a lesson of an hour every day for a month, provided that you confine yourself to the communication of principles only, and that you clearly understand them yourself: all beyond this point may be left to be made the subject of future acquisition.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

Clericus.

BRITISH AND ROMAN SLAVERY.

Slavery, among the ancient Romans, was founded on the right of conquest. "They seem to have usually acted," observes Mr. Blair on the Roman Slavery, "upon the rule of granting life and liberty to enemies who surrendered without a contest; but of carrying away as prisoners those who had made resistance. The most of such captives, often after the humiliation of being led in triumph, were sold into slavery, or sent to fight in the amphitheatre as gladiators or combatants with wild beasts; but some were usually retained by the state as public slaves."

"Colonial slavery," observes Mr. Halley, in his Sinfulness of Colonial Slavery, "is the bondage, not of the warrior, but of the kidnapper and man-stealer. Were we to go back to the infancy and early rudiments of the world, we could not vindicate it, even by the license of that imperfect state of morals and religion. It is not retaliation, which was then permitted, but the original and unprovoked infliction of wrong. Were we Jews, it is forbidden by Moses; were we heathens, it is condemned by the light of nature. When did the Negro race attempt to enslave us or our ancestors? When did their vessels visit our shores, and their armed men burn our villages, break up our families, carry away our children, and doom them to cruel, hopeless, exhausting, interminable bondage?"

Mr. Blair gives the following illustrations of the system of Roman slavery. "The most common terms for slaves are generally thought to be derived from words expressive of capturing, or of preserving; and a few examples will suffice to show how abundant a supply of bondsmen was obtained by the Romans in their wars. After the fall of the Samnites at Aquilonia, 2,553,000 (or 2,033,000) pieces of brass were realized by the sale of prisoners, who amounted to about 36,000. Lucretius brought from the Volscian war 1,250 captives; and, by the capture of one inconsiderable town, no less than 4,000 slaves were obtained. The number of the people of Epirus, taken and sold for behoof of the army under Paulus Æmilius, was 150,000. On the Romans' descent upon Africa, in the first Punic war, they took 20,000 prisoners. Gelon, prætor of Syracuse, having routed a Carthaginian army, took so many captives, that he gave 500 of them to each of several citizens of Agrigentum. On the great victory of Marius and Catullus over the Cimbri, 60,000 were captured. When Pendenissus was taken by Cicero, the inhabitants were sold for more than 100,000*l.* Augustus, having overcome the Salassi, sold, as slaves, 36,000, of whom 8,000 were capable of bearing arms. Julius Cæsar is said, by Plutarch and Appian, to have taken, in his Gallic wars alone, no fewer than 1,000,000 of prisoners; a statement which is, no doubt, much exaggerated, but which shows that the number was considered to be great: perhaps we may adopt the estimate of Velleius Paterculus, who says merely that they exceeded 400,000."

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. IV.—THE WISDOM OF GOD.

(Concluded from p. 163.)

3. The Redemption of the World, furnishes us with the last and the greatest display of the Wisdom of the Deity, setting forth every attribute of his nature with a vividness and a vigour to which creation had heretofore been a stranger. No man of sound sense will be disposed to deny that the grand object of every government must be the suppression of crime, and the encouragement of virtue. And if even our feeble and immature reason supposes and perceives the importance of this as a general principle, shall we suppose, nay, is it not blasphemy to think, that the Deity can wink at sin, and overlook transgression? Now, wickedness had entered the dwelling-places of the sons of men; nay, it had established itself firmly in the world, insomuch that depravity filled every heart, and the treason-flag of rebellion floated over every province of the Almighty's jurisdiction. We have the warrant of Scripture in asserting, that God was moved with compassion when he beheld the wretched and lost condition of the creatures whom he had formed, and for whose eternal happiness he was most anxious. Their state of alienation grieved him, and he resolved to proclaim deliverance to the long enslaved captives of sin, and recovering of sight to the blind. But how was this to be accomplished? For God to proclaim forgiveness was impossible; for man to purchase forgiveness was equally impossible; for what offering could he have presented to the throne of the Deity, wherewith to appease the greatness of his anger, or satisfy the mighty debt which unnumbered transgressions had contracted. Had heaven been stript of its bright and glorious jewellery, and every human being piled up in huge mounds the possessions he had acquired and the riches he possessed, would that have been sufficient to procure the ransom of the prisoners? Oh no! It would only have been giving to God what was his own, and mocking an insulted Benefactor, by striving to appease him with an offering taken out of his own treasuries. It is in this point of view that I am convinced of the utter impossibility which existed for man to atone for sin. And yet sin is to be atoned for. The gracious Parent of the Universe could not suffer the creatures whom he had formed, to go forth into a world waste and howling as a wilderness, and black with the gathering storms of his almighty wrath, and doom them to groan through weary years beneath the scorpion scourge of despair, without one glimmering hope of better days, without one peaceful prospect of a serener sky. Far be it from me to deny that man deserves this; but happy am I to be able to declare, that God determined that mercy should be heard to the utmost extent, and that of man should be exacted much less than his iniquity deserved. And truly it was not an easy task to find out a means whereby mercy might flow compatibly with justice; and had not the Deity exerted his infinite wisdom, ruined sinners might for ever have groped their dismal way, surrounded by a darkness too intense to be penetrated by any bright rays of hope. Since, therefore, the mighty secret was known only to the Deity, we may be sure that his love to our fallen race was immense, otherwise he would never have revealed that, in the execution of which, his own Son was so deeply concerned. For the fact is, that to accomplish the redemption of mankind it was indispensably necessary that the eternal Son of God should leave the throne of Omnipotence, take upon him the form of a servant, fulfil the law which man had broken, and at length suffer an ignominious and cruel death upon the cross. I am quite willing to own that I am unable to understand how the death of Christ atoned for our sins. Nor do I blush in making the confession, for I am taught to believe that it is a mystery into which angels desire to look. Nay, I have no doubt that the business of eternity will in some measure consist in discovering as much as it is possible for created and glorified beings to know concerning the death and redemption of Christ. It is quite enough for my purpose to be able to declare, that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, that he has accepted the offering of Christ, and that the only obstruction to the final salvation of every human being, is their own obstinacy and hardness of heart. Here, therefore, we perceive that the apparently conflicting attributes of mercy and justice are reconciled, inasmuch as Christ paid to the last farthing of each man's debt. And here I think it will not be improper to mention the convincing proof which this fact affords of the essential divinity of our Lord. Make him a creature (I care not if you call him ten thousand times higher than the highest archangel), and you do away at once with the possibility of his offering any thing to God by way of atonement; for I must own, that to my mind there is something paradoxical in supposing that that can be called a gift or an offering, which is in fact absolutely the rightful possession of him to whom it is given.

The several parts of this subject which have now passed under consideration, rank high in their interest and importance, for they comprehend doctrines indissolubly connected with the present and eternal happiness of the human race; and much would it delight me if my feeble efforts should be the means of causing even one heart to be lifted up in adoration of that glorious and eternal Being, whose wisdom is wonderful and excellent. Of this I am quite sure, that no one can avoid perceiving the great lessons here inculcated. A few remarks of a practical nature will close the subject.

The present life is one which experience testifies to be full of troubles. The smiles of youth and the blandishments of gaiety last not for ever: but are quickly succeeded by heavy cares and oppressing difficulties. Much, therefore, does it behove those who have the race of life yet to run, well to consider what it is they are entering upon. Many a wreck of youthful promise remains, to tell the sad tale of what the end must be of those who have no better supporter than themselves. I hope, therefore, that our young readers will learn from all that has been written to fix their thoughts on God. No fear can then be entertained as to future consequences, for the Almighty is too wise ever to be outwitted by the wicked energies of man and demon. Let, therefore, fear be banished, let sorrow be laid aside; for who can fear, or who can grieve, when under the protection of One whose wisdom will be sure to order all things for the best, and will afford us every needful supply of grace. To him, therefore, let each man commit his soul in well doing. Seeing that hitherto he has worked with unerring wisdom, let us not suppose it possible that our difficulties are too mighty for him to overrule; and let us wait with patience till that final consummation of all things, when it will be permitted us to join with the heavenly host in devoutly saying, "He hath done all things well." CONVERSION OF THE DUKE OF LEEDS.

Anecdote relating to Leslie's work, entitled "A Short and Easy Method with the Deist," first published in 1714, by the Rev. Charles Leslie, M. A.

The history of the Tract of Leslie may teach the reader how to estimate the importance and value of the testimony as to the truth of the Christian religion, derived from the existence of the Sacrament. The anecdote, given by Jones of Nayland, came through Dr. Delany from Captain Leslie, the son of the Author.

It was the fortune of Mr. Leslie to be acquainted with the Duke of Leeds of that time, who observed to him, that although he was a believer in the Christian religion, he was not satisfied with the common modes of proving it; that the argument was long and complicated, so that some had neither leisure nor patience to follow it, and others were not able to comprehend it; that, as it was the nature of all truth to be plain and simple, if Christianity were a truth, there must be some short way of showing it to be so; and he wished Mr. Leslie would think of it. Such a hint to such a man, in the space of three days produced the rough draught of the "Short and Easy Method with the Deist," which he presented to the Duke, who read it over, and then said, "I thought I was a Christian before, but now I am sure of it: as I am indebted to you for converting me, I shall henceforth look on you as my spiritual father." And he acted accordingly, for he never came into his company afterwards without asking his blessing.

The providence of God, by the institution of the Sacrament, has afforded the gospel that short and easy proof of its truth, which it is the nature of all truth to have, which the unbeliever might have been justified in demanding, but which, now he is in possession of, renders him without excuse in his unbelief. The importance and value attached to this testimony by the disciples of infidelity may be perceived in the eagerness they have shown to discover some false fact, which is accompanied with all the marks laid down as the infallible organs of truth by Leslie. Dr. Middleton is said to have inquired for twenty years, with the hope of finding some instance which might be set in opposition to the evidence of Christianity afforded by the Sacrament, and, with all his learning, inquired without success.

Arimathea (a lion dead to the Lord), the city of Joseph the counsellor, who begged for the body of Jesus from Pilate, and laid it in a sepulchre that was hewn in stone, wherein never man before was laid: St. Jerome places this city between Lydda and Joppa. It was anciently called Ramah, where the prophet Samuel dwelt. 1 Sam. i, 19; vii, 17.

Arca, once a famous city of the Arkites, the offspring of Canaan. It lies five miles from Sumrah to the east: it is built over against the northern promontory of Mount Libanus, in a most delightful situation, having a prospect to the northward of an extensive plain, diversified with an infinite variety of towns and villages, ponds and rivers; to the westward it sees the sun set in the sea, and to the eastward sees the sun rise over a long and distant chain of mountains. Here likewise are not wanting Thebaic columns, and rich entablatures, to attest the splendour and politeness which it once possessed. The citadel was erected upon the summit of an adjacent mountain, which, by the figure and situation of it, must have been impregnable in former times: for it is sloped like a cone or sugar loaf, in an ascent of fifty or sixty degrees. and appears to have been originally intended for a mons exploratorius, not being a work of nature, but of art and labour. In the deep valley below, there is a brisk stream, more than sufficient for the necessities of the place; but it has been judged more convenient to supply it with water from Mount Libanus; for which purpose, they united the mountain to the city by an aqueduct, whose principal arch, though now broken down, could not have been less than one hundred feet in diameter.—See Dr. Shaw's Travels, p. 270.

Arnon, a river or brook, whereof there is frequent mention made in Scripture: its spring-head is in the mountains of Gilead, or of the Moabites, and it discharges itself into the Dead Sea.

Ashdod (pillage, theft), 1 Sam. v, 1, 2. Azoth according to the Vulgate, and Azotus according to the Greek, a city which was assigned by Joshua to the tribe of Judah: it was possessed a long time by the Philistines, and rendered famous for the temple of the god Dagon. It lies upon the Mediterranean Sea, about nine or ten miles north of Gaza; and in the times when Christianity flourished in those parts, was made an episcopal see, and continued a fair village till the days of St. Jerome.

Asia (muddy, boggy), in its largest acceptation, denotes the whole Asiatic continent, being the eastern and greatest of the three parts of the old world, four thousand eight hundred miles long from east to west, and four thousand three hundred from north to south. In this sense it is distinguished into two parts. Asia the Lesser, now known as the Turkish province of Natolia, and Asia the Greater, denoting all the rest of the Asiatic Continent.

Asia Minor, contained the provinces of Bithynia, Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, Phrygia, Mysia, Troas (all mentioned in the New Testament), as also Lydia, with Ionia, and Æolis (both included sometimes under Lydia), Caria with Doris (sometimes included under Caria), and Lysia. Of these, Lydia and Caria, taken under larger acceptations, Mysia and Phrygia (including Troas, otherwise called Phrygia Minor), make up the Roman Proconsular Asia, which has been thought to be the same as the Scripture Asia. But it is evident (says Dr. Wells) to any one diligently reading the travels of St. Paul, in the New Testament, that Mysia, Phrygia, and Troas, are by the sacred writer reckoned as distinct provinces from Asia, so called in Scripture. Wherefore it is with great reason taken for granted by the most judicious, that by Asia in the New Testament is to be understood Lydia, it its largest acceptation, or taken so as to include Ionia and Æolis; within which compass lay the seven cities, the churches whereof are styled by the sacred penman the churches of Asia.

The ancient Hebrews were strangers to the division of the earth into three or four parts, and we never find the name Asia in any book written in the Hebrew. This nation seemed to think that the continent consisted only of Asia Major and Africa. The rest of the world, and even Asia Minor, were comprised under the name of Isles of the Gentiles. We are unacquainted with the true etymology of the word Asia, we find it in no part of the Old Testament; but in the books of the Maccabees, and in the New Testament, in frequently occurs. Asia is looked upon as that part of the world, which, of all others, has been peculiarly distinguished by Heaven: there it was the first man was created; there the Patriarchs lived, the Law was given to Moses, and the greatest and most celebrated monarchies were formed; from thence, the first founders of cities and nations in other quarters of the world brought their colonies. Lastly, in Asia, Jesus Christ appeared; there it was that he wrought the salvation of mankind, that he died and rose again, and from it the light of the gospel was diffused all over the world. Laws, arts and sciences, and religion, almost all had their origin in Asia.

BRITISH REFORMATION SOCIETY.

On Thursday, May 10, the General Meeting of this Institution was held at Exeter Hall. In the absence of the Rt Hon. the Earl of Roden, the chair was taken by Lieut. Col. Phipps. The object of this Society is truly noble, which is, "Promoting the Religious Principles of the Protestant Reformation." This Institution has a special regard to the prevalence of the Roman Catholic profession of religion in England and Ireland; and it proposes by education, Scripture readers, miscellaneous publications, and public local discussions, to excite public interest in the controversy, to diffuse information on the subject, and thus to destroy the influence of the priests, and convert the Catholic population to the doctrines of the Holy Scriptures.

Mr. Tottenham, the Secretary, read an abstract of the Report, which detailed the various operations of the Society in some instances with happy effect; but it complained of the great want of suitable agents to carry into effect the objects of the Society. The Meeting was addressed by the Marquis of Cholmondeley; the Rev. J. Cummings, of the Scots church; the Very Rev. the Dean of St. Patrick's; J. Cummings, Esq. of Cork: J. E. Gordon, Esq.; G. Finch, Esq.; Mr. E. Tottenham, the Secretary and Travelling Agent of the Institution; the Rev. W. L. Beaufort; A. Johnstone, Esq. M. P.; the Rev. J. Lyons; the Rev. C. Seymour; the Right Hon. Lord Barham; and Captain F. V. Harcourt.

Mr. Finch read some very striking extracts from an "Enclytical Letter" lately issued by Pope Gregory XVI, in which his Holiness laments especially "that worst and never sufficiently to be execrated and detested liberty of the press, for the diffusion of all manner of writings!" False religion must necessarily dread this liberty: but truth, and the religion of the Holy Scriptures need fear nothing; because the more they are examined the brighter will they appear in their native glory. His Holiness concludes his Letter by imploring the patronage of the Blessed Virgin, to "draw down an efficacious blessing on his plans, his proceedings, his desires, in the present straitened condition of the Lord's flock."

THE CHRISTIAN WARFARE.

"Take up the cross, and follow me!"
Heard ye the call divine?
Soldier, brace on thy panoply!
Advance thy Captain's sign!
Conquering to conquer forth he goes;
By thy weak arm his might can crush his proudest foes.

With Truth's unsullied baldric gird
Upon thy mailed side
The Spirit's glaive, thy Leader's word;
Let Virtue's corslet, tried
In strife and furnace, guard thy breast;
And let Salvation's helm thy dauntless brow invest.

But most upon thy martial arm
Take Faith's impervious targe,
To quench the fiery shafts of harm
Amid the deadly charge;
Then forth on thy victorious way
Speed on, thy steps prepar'd on Love reveal'd to stay.

Saw'st thou the waters foaming high?
'Tis Passion's restless sea.
Heard'st thou the storm that swept the sky?
'Tis stern Adversity.
Heed not: tread on,—the billows, cleft,
Shall fence with crystal wall thy right hand and thy left.

Saw'st thou the broad and arid plain?
No sheltering leaf is there;
No fount, where scorch'd and fainting pain,
Beneath the sultry glare,
May slake his lips: nor fear, nor fly;
Heaven's stores shall ope for thee when earth and wave deny.

Greater and mightier far than thou,
The hosts that bar thy way;
Yet let not that high spirit bow,
A loftier power than they Conducts thy march: before Him driven
Melts Anak's giant horde and rampart wall'd to heaven.

True, dark Ingratitude is there,
And Disappointment cold;
And mean Suspicion from his lair
Unwinds his viper fold:
Yet fear not,—He, whose knight thou art,
With energy divine can nerve thy human heart.

True, Earth in treacherous charms array'd,
With eye too wildly sweet,
Would seek to her unhallow'd shade
To lure thy pilgrim feet.
Yet yield not,—She who woos thy vows
With crown of bleeding thorn enwreath'd thy Master's brows.

Say not thy yoke is hard to bear;
But look on Him who bore
For thee a weightier load of care,
And then repine no more.
His yoke is light; His ways are rest:
They that endure with Him, with Him too shall be blest.

Fear not, and thou shalt overcome,
Yea, through His love who led;
With palm of more than conquest's bloom
Twine thine unhelmed head.
'Mid white-rob'd hosts of fair renown,
The morning star shall shine first jewel of thy crown.

Fear not! in victory thou shalt stand
Upon the glassy sea;
And chaunt, with heaven's own lyre in hand,
The pæan of the free;—
"Sing to the Lord! The fight is done!
The fearful woe is whelm'd; the rest eternal won!"

MAP OF THE TRAVELS AND VOYAGES OF ST. PAUL.

By the Sunday School Union. Single Sheet, canvassed.

The Sunday School Union have earned immortal laurels, by their labours to promote the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. This Map is a most valuable addition to their other publications, and worthy of a place in every Sunday School—Vestry—Minister's Study—or Family Sitting Room. We rejoiced to see their Map of Canaan; but we think this of the Travels of the great Apostle of the Gentiles likely to be far more useful. We give it our unqualified recommendation, and rejoice that its cheapness will place it within the reach of many in the most humble circumstances.

THE ABYSSINIAN FLY.

"And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost parts of the rivers of Egypt, and they shall come and shall rest all of them in the desolate valleys." Isa. vii, 18, 19.

The periodical rains which take place in Africa, and constitute one of the marvels of nature, produce another which is almost equally extraordinary. As soon as the rich earth of the mountains of Abyssinia becomes saturated with water, immense swarms of flies burst into existence, and assist to drive almost every living thing before them. This insect, though scarcely larger than a common bee, becomes formidable from its immense numbers; and its buzzing sound is no sooner heard than the cattle forsake their food and run wildly about the plain, till they actually die from fear, pain, and fatigue. The camel, whose patience under every other affliction is proverbial, gets ungovernable from the violent punctures of these flies; his body is covered with putrid lumps, and the wretched creature, termed by the Arabs "the ship of the desert," founders and dies. Even the rhinoceros and the elephant, whose hides are almost impenetrable to a musket ball, are severely persecuted by these clouds of insects. All the inhabitants of the south coast of the Red Sea to the mountains of Abyssinia are obliged annually to seek refuge with their cattle in the cheerless sands of the desert; and so many human beings and huge animals thus flying before an army of flies, certainly forms a very remarkable and wonderful feature in the great picture of nature, besides being an highly interesting confirmation of Sacred Writ.

THE TYRANT REPROVED BY HIS SLAVE.

A poor West Indian Negro, employed as a domestic in the house of his master, who had purchased him, having bought a trifling article of a fellow Negro, who had procured it by clandestine means, was detected with the property about him; and therefore ordered by his master to be very severely whipped. After he had received the punishment, he said to the officer who inflicted it, "Why you no flog white man?" "So we do," answered the officer, "when they buy stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen." The Negro replied, "There stand my massa; why you no flog him, as you flog poor me? He buy me; he know me stole."

RANELAGH CHAPEL, CHELSEA.

STATISTICS OF CHELSEA.

elsea has, for many centuries, been a place of conerable note. Its immediate vicinity to the Court end London, and beautiful situation on the banks of the ames, has rendered it a desirable retreat for the althy and noble; and on account of its numerous blemen's seats, Chelsea has been called "The llage of Palaces."

King Henry VIII had a royal palace at Chelsea;
Thomas More, the celebrated Chancellor to that narch, had his residence here; and in 1752, that inent physician and benefactor of his country, Sir ns Sloane, died at his seat in this village.

Chelsea is no longer the beautiful rural village; but orbed, with its increased population, in the great tropolis. It is now famous chiefly on account of Royal College, for the reception of aged and rm soldiers. Of this useful Institution, we purpose a future occasion to give some historical notice, as it v forms one of the most noble of our endowed na-nal asylums.

Our readers will perceive the evidences of the sur-sing transformation of Chelsea, from the following les of its increasing population, during the last rty years.

Population of Chelsea.

Chelsea has been highly favoured during some years
h the means of religious instruction; though it does yet enjoy that provision which its population seems require. Still, however, we believe that all the red edifices are not attended with crowded congregations. The following are all the places of worship which we know:

The rectory of the Old Church, Chelsea, was endowed in the early part of the fourteenth century, of course by the Roman Catholics, and its first rector was Roger de Berners. The present officiating minister is the Rev. J. Rush, M. A. who has been curate for about twenty-five years.

St. Luke's is an elegant modern structure, the foundation of which was laid in October 1820, and it was opened in 1824. The Rev. J. W. Lockwood, M. A. is rector, who succeeded Dr. Wellesley in 1832.

Trinity Church is a still more modern edifice. By a recent Act of Parliament, "Hans Town" is divided, as far as regards ecclesiastical matters, into a separate parish, and is called "Upper Chelsea;" so that the Rev. H. Blunt, M. A. is styled Rector of Trinity Church, Upper Chelsea.

Connected with the history of religion in Chelsea, the names of several clergymen will be long remembered. Among these are the Hon. and Rev. W. B. Cadogan, M. A. second son of Lord Cadogan. He was born 1751, and on taking orders was preferred to the livings of St. Giles, Reading, and St. Luke's, Chelsea. With his evangelical ministry the revival of evangelical religion is reckoned to have commenced, both at Reading and Chelsea. He died at Reading, Jan. 18, 1797, after only a few days' illness. For an account of this excellent clergyman, see Evangelical Magazine for January 1798.

The Rev. Erasmus Midddleton was curate to Mr. Cadogan at Chelsea, and his judicious ministry was much esteemed by the pious people of Chelsea. This useful minister of Christ was one of the "Six Young Men who were expelled from Edmund Hall, Oxford, in 1768, for reading, praying, and expounding the Scriptures in private houses." He was afterwards enabled to prosecute his studies at Cambridge, by the generous and unsolicited support of W. Fuller, Esq. banker, and a Dissenter. A monument to the memory of this useful minister of Christ, was raised by himself in his excellent "Evangelical Biography," in four volumes octavo. See a memoir of this valuable minister in Evangelical Magazine for August 1805.

The Rev. John Owen, M. A., the first Clerical Secretary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, officiated at Park Chapel from 1812 till his death, 1822. The labours of that eminent man are too well known to need mention. We believe his ministry at Chelsea was blessed to the salvation of many, and his "History of the British and Foreign Bible Society" will carry down his name with honour to posterity.

RANELAGH CHAPEL, CHELSEA.

Ranelagh Chapel deserves particular notice, on account of the benefits it has been the means of diffusing in Chelsea and its vicinity. This elegant place of worship arose under the labours of its present devoted minister, the Rev. R. H. Shepherd. The place in which the congregation originally assembled, being insufficient to accommodate the crowds who were flocking to hear the gospel of Christ, some ground was purchased, and this commodious chapel, with its school rooms, was erected at an expense of about 5,000*l*. It was opened in July 1818, by the Rev. Dr. Winter, the Rev. Dr. Collyer, and the late Rev. J. Townsend. For several years Ranelagh Chapel was the most capacious place of worship in that vicinity, it being calculated to contain seats for 1,200 persons. The erection of the two new churches, in the immediate neighbourhood, has somewhat lessened the congregation, but still it is very considerable. The Liturgy of the Church of England is used by this congregation to direct their devotions, and the ministry of the Rev. Mr. Shepherd is truly sound and evangelical.

Justice seems to require that it be further stated, that 3,000*l*. of the cost of this Chapel has been paid, principally, we understand, by the proceeds of the seat rents, as the excellent minister's labours have been during the fifteen years altogether gratuitous! Probably the interest of the debt upon the chapel has amounted to little less than 2,000*l*. more. Sincerely do we pray that the devoted minister may be amply rewarded in his "work of faith and labour of love," seeing many individuals "seals to his ministry," and living "epistles of Christ," "written with the Spirit of God."

During the period of fifteen years, the Sunday school connected with Ranelagh Chapel has afforded instruction to several thousand children of the poor, besides the daily instruction of about three hundred and fifty. Surely it is not possible to compute the amount of good produced by such a series of benevolent labours, and we may confidently challenge the whole annals of infidelity to produce a similar instance of pure patriotism and philanthropy. This is the fruit of Christianity!

ACT OF FAITH OF THE "HOLY INQUISITION."

OUR readers will not fully comprehend all the horrors of this execrable institution of Popery, without a relation of the gaol delivery of the Inquisition, called "Auto da Fé," or "THE ACT OF FAITH." This is a solemn day, observed for the purpose of absolving innocent persons, who may have been accused, and punishing those convicted of heresy. It is usually contrived that it shall fall on some grand festival, that the execution may strike the multitude with the greater awe. It is always on a Sunday. The process is as follows. In the morning the prisoners are brought into a great hall, where they are all clothed in certain habits, which they must wear in the procession, and from which they learn their doom.

The procession is led on by Dominican friars, who enjoy this privilege, because St. Dominic their founder was the originator of the Inquisition. Before them is carried the standard of the holy office, on which the image of the founder is wrought in rich embroidery, holding a sword in one hand, and an olive branch in the other, with the inscription, "Justice and Mercy." These friars are followed by the penitents, who have narrowly escaped burning, and who over their black coats have flames painted with their points downwards. Next come the relapsed, who have flames on their habits pointing upwards. After these follow such as profess doctrines contrary to the faith of Rome, and who, besides flames pointing upwards, have their picture painted on their breasts, and surrounded by dogs, serpents, and devils, all open-mouthed. Each prisoner is attended by a familiar of the Inquisition; and those intended to be burnt, have also on each side a Jesuit, who is continually advising them to abjure. After the prisoners follow a troop of familiars upon horseback; after them, the inquisitors, and other officers upon mules; and lastly, the inquisitor-general upon a white horse, led by two men with black hats and green hat-bands. A scaffold is erected sufficiently large for containing two or three thousand people; at one end of the scaffold are the prisoners, at the other end the inquisitors. After a sermon, consisting of encomuims on the Inquisition, and of invectives against heretics, a priest ascends a desk near the scaffold, and having received the abjuration of the penitents, recites the final sentence of those who are to be put to death, and delivers them to the secular power, at the same time earnestly beseeching that their blood be not touched, nor their lives put in danger!!!

Hypocrisy is thus carried to its utmost height; the prisoners being now in the hands of the civil magistrate are immediately loaded with chains, and carried first to the secular gaol, and thence, in an hour or two, brought before a civil judge. After inquiring in what religion they intend to die, the civil judge pronounces sentence on such as declare they die in the communion of the church of Rome, that they shall first be strangled and then burnt to ashes; on such as die in any other faith, that they be burnt alive. Both are immediately carried to the place of execution, where as many stakes are set up as there are prisoners to be burnt, and about each stake is laid a quantity of dry furze. The stakes of the professed, or of such as persist in heresy, are about four yards in height, and towards the top have a small board, on which the prisoner is seated. The relapsed being first strangled and burnt, the professed mount their stakes by a ladder; and the Jesuits, after repeatedly exhorting them to be reconciled to the church, part with them and say that they leave them to the devil, who is standing at their elbow to receive their souls, and to carry them with him to the flames of hell. On hearing this, the multitude raise a great shout, and cry, "Let the dogs' beards be made!" This is performed by thrusting flaming furzes, fastened to long poles, against their chins, till their faces are burnt to a coal. This inhuman act is accompanied with the loudest acclamations of joy. At last, fire is set to the furze at the bottom of the stake, over which the professed are chained so high, that the top of the flame seldom reaches higher than the seat upon which they are set, so that they seem rather roasted than burnt. There cannot be a more lamentable spectacle: the sufferers continually cry out, as long as they are able, "Pity, for the love of God!" Yet it is beheld by those of all ages, and by both sexes, with transports of joy and admiration!!

Our readers are prepared to denounce this as the perfection of infernal ingenuity: but the idea of all this being perpetrated in the name of RELIGION, and by PRIESTS professing the RELIGION OF JESUS CHRIST, must excite the utmost astonishment! Popery, the antichristian system of corrupted religion, which could sanction such outrages upon human nature, must indeed be, as the pen of inspiration has declared it, "THE MYSTERY OF INIQUITY," 2 Thess. ii, 7; and "MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH." Rev. xvii, 5.

We leave our readers for the present to make their own reflections upon the above; from which they will doubtless be led to adore that merciful Providence, by whose bounty and grace we in Britain enjoy the blessings, both civil and religious, which flow from the possession of the Holy Scriptures.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXVIII.

On learning History.

Dear Madam,

A COMPETENT knowledge of History must follow the attainment of Geography, in your system of Education.

It seems natural, and on many accounts advisable, to begin the study with some short history of the city or town or neighbourhood or country in which we live.

In the case of an inhabitant of London, I think some short luminous History of London might be the best book to put into the hands of children in the commencement of the study of history.

Being familiar with the objects, they would thus obtain a clearer and more complete idea of the nature of history. By the history of London they would learn is meant a description of London from the period of its first existence, as far as it is known; and the transfer of this idea to the country at large is easy, namely, a description of the country of England from the earliest period. The best History of England, all circumstances being considered, is perhaps that of Mr. Hume. Let your son read this aloud to you, half an hour each day, as one of his lessons.

When each lesson is over, let him close the book, and require from him an account of what he has read, in his own language. Be satisfied, if he can give you a delineation of the most striking events; and while he is faithfully reciting them, allow him as much liberty as he pleases. He will thus obtain a habit of delivering his sentiments in his own language, freely and elegantly. As you read onwards, let him write down the dates of great events alone; and these he may commit to memory, rather by frequent recurrence to them than by learning them by heart all at once as a task. You must nevertheless require him really to know them, and frequently exercise him in his knowledge of them. About twenty dates will be sufficient, as far as the history of England is concerned; these consisting of the principal occurrences alone, any minor occurrences will be recollected as having happened between some two of these principal dates; and this is precision enough.

I need scarcely remind you, that the history of any country should be read with the maps of it, and that the places should be found as they are mentioned. Should it be deemed necessary that your son should, in that part of his education which is conducted by yourself, acquire some knowledge of the other principal nations of the world, modern or ancient, the study should be pursued by similar methods. Goldsmith's History of Rome, and the History of Greece by the same author, will be found amply sufficient to afford a knowledge of the chief events in the career of those most illustrious nations of antiquity. I have however generally observed, that the history of these nations is but feebly pursued by young persons. They are devoid of the charm of interest to any but those of an age to admit of mature reflection. Hence they are generally read as part of the drudgery demanded by the study of the classics. Attention to them will be useless to your son if he is to become a tradesman or merchant; and if he is to become a scholar, may be properly left to the occupations of the grammar-school and university.

With regard to the moral use of historical reading, which is proposed by some preceptors, I believe the attempt rarely answers with children. It requires some degree of maturity before a young person knows what is meant by the philosophical use of history. A person must mingle with mankind in the great concerns of human life, before he can understand how to trace conduct to motives: he must have learned the value of such observations, before he will heartily and therefore successfully engage in them. All moralizing to children respecting the intentions of princes and statesmen in their various acts of legislation, the influence of their private views and interests upon their public measures, the insignificance of the causes from which the mightiest events have sprung, the utility for which Divine Providence overruled the malicious designs of heroes, and all similar deductions, inferences, and speculations, ought not to be required of children, and are lost upon them. This use of history can indeed be scarcely derived from any but the fullest, and most impartial documents; and these are accessible but to few. This philosophical use of history is serviceable but to very few persons, chiefly to senators, &c.; and as it is one of the highest occupations of the human mind, so it can only be undertaken successfully by a highly cultivated understanding, and under the advantage of the greatest leisure. It is the occupation of a retired statesman. The ordinary and obvious lessons of history, which force themselves upon our view, should indeed be pointed out to children: of this nature are, the unjustifiableness of injurious undertakings, their prosperity for a time perhaps, but the final misery of the perpetrators; the odiousness of cruelty or injustice; the excellence and moral loveliness of amiable, virtuous, and useful characters; the misery occasioned by war, and the blessings of peace and good government, &c.

It may be useful to require, as an exercise once every week, that your son should, while reading history, write out from recollection the account of any particular person or event, and describe the impression which it has made upon his own mind. You will look over these very carefully, and correct any errors of orthography and punctuation which they may contain: these should all be preserved. He will thus be insensibly accustomed to express his sentiments in writing, and will gain an English style much sooner and better than if he were required to write an exercise. The utmost simplicity, which is the basis of style, should be required in these compositions: this, together with perspicuity, seem to be the two chief objects of attention, needful to the young writer.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.
CLERICUS.

LANDSCAPE.

EVER charming, ever new,
When will the landscape tire the view?
The fountain's fall, the river's flow,
The woody valleys warm and low,
The windy summit wild and high,
Roughly rushing on the sky!
The pleasant seat, the ruin'd tower,
The naked rock, the shady bower,
The town and village, dome and farm,
Each gives to each a double charm,
As pearls upon an Ethiop's arm.

Now, even now, my joys run high,
As on the mountain's turf I lie;
While the wanton zephyr sings,
And in the vale perfumes his wings;
While the waters murmur deep;
While the shepherd charms his sheep;
While the birds unbounded fly,
And with music fill the sky;—
Now, even now, my joys run high.

THOUGHTS ON THE SACRED HISTORY OF THE CREATION.

THE creation of man is placed by the Mosaic narration immediately after the completion of the animal kingdom: "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth." It was a superb destiny that man should be appointed to be the image and likeness of God; but it is here emphatically revealed to us that this was the object of his creation, and as such demands our most intellectual meditation. Let us consider the means by which this sublime result was intended to be produced.

Man consists, like the animal classes, of a material body, and of an immaterial principle of intellectual life. But he differs from them in this great and distinguishing peculiarity, that his mental principle is of a diviner nature, and is stated to have originated from the Deity himself. For after mentioning his formation from earthly elements, the dust of the ground, the sacred record expressly adds, that his Creator "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." No difference of origin could be more distinctly marked. The regal Solomon has very impressively signified his clear perception of it, by these words: "Then shall the dust return to the earth, as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God, who gave it." The origin of the soul therefore was the Divine breath: it is an emanation from the Divine Spirit; and in this sacred source of its existence, its similitude to its Creator began. Its intellectual and moral powers and qualities may be assumed to have a proportioned resemblance in essential nature, though but in remote miniature and infinitely inferior. He has made our intelligent spirit in such a likeness to his own, that there can be intercourse and communion and sympathy and affection between man and his God. We are essentially his image and likeness in our original nature and capacities, and the more we advance to all the attainable perfections of our being, the more complete the actual assimilation will become.

Thus capacitated to receive and comprehend the ideas and sentiments of the Divine mind, an ample store of these was prepared in the rich and multifarious creations of its provided habitation. The various departments of nature which have been briefly recapitulated, the planetary, the terraqueous, the vegetable, the animal, constitute, with His subsequent communications, the knowledge which He has appointed to be the knowledge of mankind. We must furnish our minds from this large and diversified provision: we must obtain this knowledge, or none. Another world will open a new scene of his creations; but in the present we can only obtain what is before us and about us: most of us are contented with a moderate portion; some with a very slight and superficial survey; others with almost none: this is left to our personal taste and choice: it is ever inviting us to make it our possession, and the reward of its acquirement is mental happiness.

We need not ask why that particular kind of knowledge which the earthly creations display, was appointed to form the mind of man; for the right answer must always be, that it is what the wisdom of the Creator has decided to be most proper for His human race, most beneficial, and most improving. Indeed all other kinds of knowledge would probably only have a similar result; for every sphere of being is but a varied portraiture of Himself; so far as it extends, each conveys to those who will duly contemplate its works, so much of the Divine thoughts, feelings, and will, as its substances and agencies exemplify. Hence all kinds of knowledge from nature are valuable to us, and our own world as effective for our improvement as any other in this view is likely to be.

Independent of all metaphysical discrimination, the literature, the history, the arts, the mechanisms, and the manufactures of mankind — all that ennobles, enriches, and delights a cultivated nation — show at once with an irresistible certainty the immense superiority of the human soul. When our moral principles begin, when we rise beyond our animal wants and desires, when our improvabilities develop, we distinguish our spirit from the animal mind for ever. To none of these can that attain: their faculties, instincts, and powers, are admirable for their class of being, and enlarge our notions of the benevolence as well as omnipotence of our common Maker; but they bear no comparison with the transcending capacity and qualities of their human master.

The soul of man indeed exhibits a greatness, a strength, penetration, and creative power, which urge us to inquire if any order of being, except the Divine Source, is superior to what the human now is, and will become in its most perfect state. Seraphic beings may differ in qualities and knowledge: they must do so, if their form and sphere be dissimilar to our own. Our knowledge is derived from our senses and external world, as theirs must also be. All knowledge gives power to its possessor, according to its nature: this power it produces in those who attain it, beyond what others have who are deficient in it. We have no personal knowledge that there are any beings in existence beside ourselves; but this is no reason for our denying or disbelieving that there are any. No educated mind can doubt that the universe is replenished with as many spheres of animated beings as there are orbs fitted for their abodes; but it does not follow that they are in spirit and intellect of a superior order to ourselves. If their worlds of residence were exactly like our earth, they could have no other materials of knowledge than those which we are enjoying, and would thereby only be on an equality with us; for dissimilitude is not in itself essential to superiority. But knowledge is only the furniture, the materials, and the instruments of the mind, and not the mind or spirit itself. This may be alike in all classes of intelligent being, and their dissimilarities of power and qualities may result from their material frame and appropriated world. The angelic classes and the human race may have the greatest resemblance to each other. There could be a Satan among angels, as well as an Adam among men. Both orders of being are therefore fallible; both furnish instances of transgression; and thus the suggestion, that the human spirit may, in its essential nature and in its powers and improvable capacities, be inferior to no order of being which the General Creator has been pleased to form, seems not to be an irrational or unwarranted conclusion.

One marking principle of the human soul is, that it progressively furnishes itself with knowledge, and forms its moral character. It is placed in a world full of the materials of knowledge, which it is to acquire. We strive by artificial tuition to give its thoughts and habits, during its younger period, the tendencies we prefer. Instruction is a great assistant; our own conduct a greater. Youth comprehend and imitate what they see, much more than they understand or apply what they hear. But in every instance it is self-formation which forms the matured spirit. It acquires its own sensations, makes its own perception, feels alone its own feelings, makes for itself its own reasonings, has and uses its own will, and forms its own judgment and habits. By this separate self-agency, every soul, as its earthly life continues, forms itself into a personality which is peculiar to itself; which cannot but have many similarities to that in others, from possessing a like frame and living in the same society; but which always exhibits some qualities, habits, and feelings, particular to itself: and though the superior power of other persons or things may fetter its actions, it will still always be a peculiar self, a distinct personality, an individual being, feeling and thinking and wishing as it may like and choose.

With this principle of self-formation, the soul seems also to possess an indestructible property of self-will. No man thinks in all respects like another; and no man wills in all things like another. Each thinks and wills, as he sees, for himself. Self-will, or the willing according to his own nature, is therefore the inseparable property of every one. None can divest themselves of their will, more than of their thought: it has in this respect no master, and no overruling necessity: any compulsion comes not upon our will, but on our acting. We have a natural freedom of will, but not as free a power of acting upon our will. Even under the severest tortures, inflicted on purpose to compel him to will as his tormentors require, the human spirit has on numerous occasions proved that it not only will exert its free-will, but that it can even avow that it will continue to exercise its liberty. Even where it seems to yield to violence, it is rather an extorted submission than an actual surrender of its freedom: it wills to comply with the injunctions of the cruel power, but in its secret movements it wills also to hate the persecutor, and the conformity to which it assents. The will too never seems to change, but by its own choice. And for these reasons I infer, that this self-will, or free-will, is an essential property of the human soul, of which it cannot divest itself, or be divested.

OBSERVATIONS ON BEHAVIOUR IN THE HOUSE OF GOD.

"Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God." Ec. v, 12.

As men that walk in danger look to their steps, and take care where they set their feet; so he that enters the house of prayer, hath need to enter with great cautiousness and watchfulness. For he comes into the more immediate presence of God, who knows his thoughts, notices his designs, and looks into the secret recesses of his soul: observes his looks, and postures, and behaviour; and will at last call him to an account for his carelessness and irreverence. Were these things seriously thought of, how could the generality of us come into His house with no greater awe, and with as loose affections, as if we were going to a place of mere amusement? How durst we stare about in prayer? How could we let our thoughts rove and wander while we seem to be engaged in devotion? How could we hear with so much indifference? How could we apply ourselves to the duties required of us with that coldness which is so visible in most congregations? How could we turn our services into mere formalities, and stand before the great God unconcerned, and return from his house without a relish of the mysteries of godliness? To see what decency and gravity men observe in the presence of an earthly prince, and to think how little regard we have to the presence of a glorious and omnipotent God, in the house which he is pleased to call his tabernacle and dwelling-place, is enough to make the holy angels conclude, that in the midst of his temple we are infidels.

To see how supinely some sit at prayers, as if they were praying to a stock or stone;—to see how others compose themselves to sleep, as if the God they came to worship, with Baal, were asleep too, and they come to honour him with that posture;—to see how some come to show their finery, and to be seen and taken notice of, and to be admired by spectators;—to see how others strive for places, for superiority, and the chief seats in these synagogues, and there discover their pride, their anger, and their malice, where they ought to express their greatest humility and charity;—to see how others talk here of their worldly concerns; or, if they do not talk of them, yet act and behave themselves as if they thought of nothing else, where they should mind only the great concerns of their immortal souls;—to see all this, what can we infer, but that men have no sense of the tremendous Majesty on high; no apprehension of the mysteries which the very angels desire to look into!

These things ought not so to be. When, therefore, thou goest to the temple of the Lord, remember, reader, the magnificence of that God at whose footstool thou goest to worship: when thou enterest the door of this sacred house, leave there thy worldly thoughts and carnal desires, and come filled with the Spirit into the tabernacle of the Lord; sit, and stand, and kneel there as before the Searcher of all hearts; resolve to come away thence edified, and with a greater store of spiritual blessings than thou hadst before. In praying, fix thy thoughts upon Him who heareth prayer; and if thou dost, thou canst not but appear in such a posture as doth best express thy inward sense of His greatness and holiness. In hearing, apply the general admonitions, and exhortations, and reproofs, to thine own soul. In reading, make some spiritual reflection on the examples, precepts, and promises that are brought before thee. In singing, mind the matter more than the tune. At thy going into the house of the Lord, beg of God to prepare thy heart: at thy coming out, beg that thou mayest not lose the things that have been wrought in thee;—this is to "Keep thy foot when thou goest into the house of God." May the Spirit of God and of his Christ be granted unto thee, that thou mayest be enabled to profit by these admonitions. W. E. H.

THOUGHTS ON NEGRO SLAVERY.

Mr. Editor,

The very affecting pamphlet lately published by Mr. Whitely on the present state of our Negro brethren in Jamaica, has given rise to the following thoughts, which I offer for insertion in the Christian's Penny Magazine. They might have been much amplified, but I wish not to occupy too large a space in your valuable Miscellany.

1. The first and most obvious reflection is, that Slavery presents the same hideous features now that it did forty years ago. Time has not at all changed that deformity which is natural to this monstrous product of human depravity. All the highly-varnished stories we have heard from the parties interested in the continuance of the system, about the improvement in the condition of the Slaves, and the amelioration of their sufferings, disappear like dew in the morning sun before this plain statement of facts, which shows West Indian Slavery to be the same compound of cruelty and impurity that it ever has been; and shuts us up to the conclusion, that it is as unalterable in its nature as it is accursed in its effects.

2. We see in the next place the total falsehood of the pretended desire on the part of the planters to do any thing for improving the moral condition of their victims. They are well aware that Slavery and Knowledge cannot exist together, and they therefore systematically and strenuously oppose every effort for enlightening the Negro mind, and thus rendering him capable at any time, however distant, of enjoying the blessings of freedom.

3. From this it seems to follow of course, that one of two things must be chosen: either to leave the unhappy African to the miseries of interminable slavery; or to dissolve at once the tie between him and his master. Let us not deceive ourselves: there is no middle way: the planter must cease to have a property in his black brother, or the cruelties of the one and the sufferings of the other can never terminate.

4. One cannot but be deeply affected at the influence of the Slave system upon those by whom it is carried on. The bodily sufferings of the Negro are indeed sufficient to make us shudder at their contemplation; but to what condition is the oppressor brought by the exercise of these cruelties? Who can contemplate without horror the adamantine state of that man's heart, who can order and witness the infliction of such tortures on his fellow-creatures, and then sit down to enjoy himself "with as much unconcern as if he had been only paying them their wages?" Who can read this record of the impurities of their life, without feeling that they are morally sunk far, very far, below the victims of their cruelty and lust? Who can witness their unceasing efforts to shut out the light of truth, and not see that they are themselves in the most awful subjection to the prince of darkness?

5. It seems clear that emancipation and evangelization ought to go hand in hand in this great work. Nothing but the light of the glorious Gospel can effect that change in the Negro, which will render him fit to enjoy liberty; and nothing but the influence of the same Gospel can change his flinty-hearted master from his present worse than brutalized condition, to become a fit ruler over his brethren in this world, or to escape that tremendous judgment which awaits him in the world to come.

6. Let all, then, who feel as they ought their duty in this great matter, use their utmost efforts for breaking at once and for ever the chains of the Negro. This is the grand object to be accomplished: minor considerations may be left open to discussion; but the great work must not in any degree be compromised—the total and final extinction of Slavery. The glorious day has dawned; and we may at length rejoice in the prospect of the elevation of our coloured brethren to their proper rank in the human family. And let us be equally zealous in the support of our persecuted Missionaries, those angels of mercy, who at the peril of their lives are devoting themselves to this labour of love: never omitting to do all with fervent prayer and entire dependence on Him who hath "made us all of one blood," and who for our encouragement has himself pronounced, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

PROTESTANT EMIGRATION FROM IRELAND.

Surely there must be some lamentable want of scriptural zeal and wisdom in relation to Ireland, or we never should read such an account as the following: "The number of Protestants, who have emigrated from Ireland during the last few years, is as follows: In 1829, 12,000; in 1830, 21,000; in 1831, 29,500; in 1832, 31,500; making a total of 94,000 during the short space of four years!"—*Dublin Univ. "THE WAY OF SALVATION."

ACTS XVI, 17.

THE redemption of man, and the restoration of our fallen race to the favour of Almighty God, arising from the infinite grace of that God, and secured by his thoughts of love and promises of mercy towards us, were the themes of prophecy, the expectation of patriarchs and prophets, and the constant subject of glorious anticipation.

Thus the Almighty by his prophet declares to us, that "His righteousness was near—His salvation was gone forth," Isa. li, 5; "That his salvation should be for ever, and his righteousness should not be abolished," ver. 6; and in another place, "That all the ends of the earth should see the salvation of our God." Isa. lii, 10. The Hebrew monarch gloried in the character of God when he exclaimed, "Our God is the God of salvation," Ps. lxviii, 20; and so earnestly did he, amongst the worthies of old, desire to know more of this great and unutterable blessing, that he tells us, that "his eyes failed (Ps. cxix, 123), and his "heart fainted (ver. 81) for the salvation of God."

Now, dear reader, what is this salvation to which our Creator has so earnestly invited our attention; which prophets and patriarchs so anxiously desired; which apostles and evangelists preached, and dying saints and martyrs have gloried in? Yes, the fulness of time spoken of in the Scriptures has come, Gal. iv, 4; "Life and immortality have been brought to light through the gospel," 2 Tim. i, 10. Let the word of inspiration proclaim its message to you.

"But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe: for there is no difference: for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God; to declare, I say, at this time his righteousness: that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." Rom. iii, 21—26.

You have surely heard of this most blessed Saviour, God in our nature, 1 Tim. iii, 16, "The one mediator between God and man," 1 Tim. ii, 5. You must have heard of him, of his pure and spotless life, of his death on the cross, where he died "the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God," 1 Pet. iii, 18. You must have heard of his glorious resurrection and ascension, Ps. lxviii, 18; Eph. iv, 8; and of his prevalent intercession before the throne of God for us, Heb. vii, 25. "It is finished," were the last words of our divine Saviour, John xix, 30; and blessed be God that it is a finished salvation for us; yes, "Christ died for us," 1 Thess. v, 10; and all are invited "to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and be saved," Acts xvi, 31. His servants are commissioned to "preach the gospel to every creature," Mark xvi, 15; and "let him that heareth say, come" (Rev. xxii, 17), to his neighbour, and so on from one to another, until these glad tidings of great joy are conveyed over our world. Yes, God is the author of salvation (Heb. v, 9); man is its object; Christ Jesus is "the way, the truth, and the life," John xiv, 16; "He is for salvation to the ends of the earth," Isa. xlv, 22. "In him are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," Col. ii, 3; "In him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily," Col. ii, 9; and "He came into the world to save sinners," 1 Tim. i, 15. And God, the eternal Spirit, whose aid will be given to us, and who taketh of the things of Jesus, will reveal them to those, who feeling their sin and misery, cry out with the publican of old, "God be merciful to me a sinner," Luke xviii, 13. This blessed Spirit will purify and renew the soul, and by his all-powerful influence lead you up, to see in God, through Christ Jesus, a reconciled Father and an Almighty Friend.

Reader, surely you must have heard of these things: but have you duly regarded them? Have you sought "this great salvation?" Have you found this mighty Saviour? "For as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name," John i, 12. If Christ has been formed in you "the hope of glory" (Gal. iv, 19), then "the pearl of great price" (Matt. xiii, 46), is yours; and connected with this great salvation, all blessings both for time and eternity are yours. 1 Cor. iii, 22.

But, reader, and fellow-pilgrim towards eternity, if you do not know God as "your God" (Ps. xlviii, 14), Christ as "your Saviour" (John xx, 28), and the Holy Spirit as "your sanctifier and guide" (John xvi, 13); If you are "yet in your sins," unconverted, unreconciled to God by Christ Jesus, "far off from God," and "an enemy in your mind by wicked works," Col. i, 21; if you have never yet solemnly asked the question, "What must I do to be saved" (Acts xvi, 30), and had it satisfactorily answered; if you have never yet cried out from your inmost soul, "Lord, save me or I perish," Matt. viii, 25;—oh! be warned: "Fly from the wrath to come." Matt. iii, 7. Delay not a moment: fly, it is for more than life. The happiness of your soul for eternity is at stake (Matt. xvi, 26). There is no promise to delay. The invitations of God are immediate. "To day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart." Ps. xcv, 7, 8. "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation." 2 Cor. vi, 2. "There is no other name given among men whereby they may be saved, but that of Jesus Christ."

But where will you fly? Where can you fly from the wrath of a holy God? God himself points you now to the city of refuge. "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world!" John i, 29. The gates of this city are "open continually night and day." Rev. xxi, 25. And the Saviour is as willing as he is powerful, and as able as he is willing. Hear his own most gracious words. (And can you reject such love? Can you treat it with unconcern or delay?) "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life." John iii, 16. "In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace," Eph. i, 7. "And him hath God exalted with his right hand, to be a prince and a Saviour, to give repentance to Israel and forgiveness of sins." Acts v, 31. And that Saviour is calling to you, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Matt. xi, 28. "Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters" (Isa. li, 1), "and take of the waters of life freely," Rev. xxii, 17. And "him that cometh I will in no wise cast out" (John vi, 37). "He is able to save to the uttermost all that come unto God by him." Heb. vii, 25.

And now farewell: "search the Scriptures." John v, 30; whether these things are so or not. And "may the grace of God that bringeth salvation" (Titus ii, 11), and the blessing of God Almighty, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost be with you, for Christ's sake. Amen.

A single intention to please God, and to approve ourselves to Him, should animate and govern all that we do in His service.

THE NEGRO'S LIBERTY.

Loud let the trumpet sound,
Swift the glad tidings run,
To earth's remotest bound,
Far as the rising sun;
Farewell, dark night of Slavery!
Welcome, sweet dawn of Liberty!

Thou birthright of mankind,
Gift from the Deity,
By God most high design'd
The boon of all to be.
Hail, heaven-born child, sweet Liberty!
Dearer than life art thou to me.

For thee our fathers bled,
The good, the great, the wise;
What seas of blood were shed
To gain the glorious prize!
Bright gem, that sparkles through our coast,
Our joy and glory, Britain's boast.

Here pause, my Muse, to sigh,
Drop thine exalted tone:
If ask'd the reason why,
The cause I blush to own;—
Britons, who boast of liberty,
Hold others bound in slavery.

Oh! inconsistent deed
For those who freedom prize:
Should God in wrath proceed,
And let his anger rise,
Should He at length retaliate,
What vengeance must our land await!

Rouse, Christian Britons, rouse!
King, Lords, and Commons, rise!
The Negro's cause espouse,
Attend their groans and cries.
Shall we purloin the gifts of Heaven,
Withholding what the Lord has given?

The patriot answers "No!"
The Negro shall be free;
We'll not augment their woe,
Deep'ning their misery.
It shall not be of Britain said,
That they in human beings trade.

Do not the angels wait,
The joyful news to bear
To the celestial gate,
That all heaven's hosts may hear,
And hearing tune their golden lyres,
And freedom chaunt through all their choirs?

Thou Lord of earth and skies,
We turn from all to thee;
Do thou in mercy rise,
And set th' oppressed free.
The hearts of all are in thy hand;
'Tis done, if thou but give command,

In answer to the prayers
Which from thy church arise,
With Negro groans and tears,
Deep sobs and bitter cries,
Extorted by oppression's rod,
Invoking thee, Almighty God!

Relying on thy grace,
We hail the happy day,
The beamings of thy face
Shall chase our fears away.
The trump shall sound the jubilee,—
Africa's free! for ever free!

But we expect a day
Of brighter glory still,
Which shall thy love display,
And thy blest words fulfil;
When all shall thy salvation see,
By God the Son from sin set free.

THE BISHOP AND THE POOR MAN.

How frequently does the tried Christian mistake his troubles for proofs of his heavenly Father's displeasure!

It is related, that a poor but worthy inhabitant of Paris once went to the bishop of the place, with a countenance beclouded, and a heart almost overwhelmed. "Father," said he, with the most profound humility, "I am a sinner—I feel that I am a sinner;—but it is against my will. Every hour I ask for light, and humbly pray for faith; but still I am overwhelmed with doubts. Surely if I were not despised of God, he would not leave me to struggle thus with the adversary of souls."

The bishop thus consoled, with the language of kindness, his sorrowing son. "The king of France has two castles in different situations, and sends a commander to each of them. The castle of Montelberry stands in a place remote from danger, far inland: but the castle of La Rochelle is on the coast, where it is liable to continual sieges. Now which of the two commanders, think you, stands the highest in the estimation of the king, the commander of La Rochelle, or he of Montelberry?" "Doubtless," said the poor man, "the king values him the most who has the hardest task, and braves the greatest dangers." "Thou art right," replied the bishop: "and now apply this matter to thy case and mine; for my heart is like the castle of Montelberry, and thine like that of La Rochelle."

STATE OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH IN IRELAND.

The Rev. Robert Adam, M. A. an English clergyman, gives the following account of the "Irish church." "In Ireland there are about 2,246 parishes, of which 293 are in the gift of the Crown, 367 in that of laymen, 21 in that of Trinity college, 1,470 in that of the bishops, &c. &c. The archbishop of Dublin presents to 144 livings, the bishop of Ferns to 171, the bishop of Cloyne to 106, and the bishop of Kildare to 131."

"By the fifth article of the Union in 1800, the United Church is the only church recognized in Ireland; yet her members are comparatively few, not being supposed to exceed 400,000, whereas her revenues are immense."—Religious World displayed, abridgment, p. 204.

By an account recently presented to the House of Commons, and printed by its authority, it appears that the number of benefices in Ireland of above 2000*l.* a year in value is eleven, one of them being of the annual value of 2,800*l.*; of those above 1,000*l.* and under 2,000*l.* value, the number is 91; of 750*l.* to 1,000*l.* there are 96; of 500*l.* to 750*l.* there are 425 livings; and all the remaining livings in Ireland, to the number of 583, are below the annual value of 250*l.* many of them being very considerably below that amount.

PILGRIMAGES TO THE HOLY SEPULCHRE.

A HISTORY of the Holy Sepulchre could not be given o our readers without much that is marvellous and egendary, and a portraiture of the horrors of the nemorable Crusades. As we gave an account of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, in No. 22 of the Christian's Penny Magazine, we shall limit our remarks principally to the ceremonies which are observed at this celebrated place.

In galleries round about the church, and also in small buildings on the outside, are many apartments for the eception of friars and pilgrims; in which formerly almost every nation in Christendom maintained a society of monks, each society having its proper division assigned to it by the Turkish government. But the extortions of the Turks in rents and fees have caused all to relinquish their establishments except the Roman Catholics, the Greeks, the Armenians, and the Copts of Egypt. Besides their several apartments, each fraternity have their altars and sanctuaries allotted to their separate use, at which they have a peculiar right to perform their religious services, to the exclusion of other nations.

The privilege of keeping the Holy Sepulchre has been the occasion of many contests and of much bloodshed in former times; but the king of France prevailed with the Grand Vizier in 1685 to grant that honour to the Roman Catholics; and since that period they alone have had the liberty of saying mass in it, and of performing any other solemnities of religion. They have generally about ten or twelve priests, with a president over them, usually residing at this holy place; and every day they make a solemn procession, with tapers and crucifixes, and other emblems of their religious system, to the several sanctuaries, singing at every one of them a Latin hymn, relating to the subject for which the place is celebrated. But their grand ceremonies commence on Good Friday night, which they call "Nox tenebrosa"—the black night. A description of these will doubtless be interesting to our readers.

As soon as it grows dusky, all the friars and pilgrims are convened in the Chapel of the Apparition (which is a small oratory on the north side of the Holy Grave), so called as being the supposed place where Christ appeared to Mary Magdalene after his resurrection, adjoining to the apartments of the Latins, in order to go in a procession round the church. But before they set out, one of the Latin fathers preaches a sermon, during which all the candles are put out, to heighten the solemnity of the occasion. Sermon being ended, which generally lasts about half an hour, every person present has a large lighted taper put into his hand, and all necessary preparations are made for beginning the procession. Among the crucifixes, there is one of a great size, bearing upon it the image of our Lord, as large as life. The image is fastened to it with great nails, crowned with thorns besmeared with blood; and so exquisitely formed, that it represents in a very lively manner the lamentable spectacle of our Lord's body as it hung upon the cross. This figure is carried all along at the head of the procession, after which the company follow to all the sanctuaries in the church, singing their appointed hymns at every one.

The first place they visit is the Pillar of Flagellation, a large piece of which is kept in a little cell, just at the door of the Chapel of the Apparition. There they sing their proper hymns, and another sermon is preached in Spanish, touching the scourging of our Lord. From hence they proceed in solemn order to the Prison of Christ, where they pretend he was secured whilst the soldiers made things ready for his crucifixion. Here likewise they sing their hymn, and a friar entertains them with a sermon in Italian.

The next visit is paid to the Chapel of the Division of Christ's Garments, where they only sing a hymn, without adding any sermon. Having done here, they advance to the Chapel of the Derision, at which after their hymn, they have a fourth sermon in French.

From this place they go up to Calvary, leaving their shoes at the bottom of the stairs. Here are two altars to be visited; one where our Lord's cross was erected, and another where he is supposed to have been laid on the cross. At the former of them they lay down the great crucifix upon the floor, and act a kind of resemblance of Christ's being nailed to the cross; and after the hymn a friar preaches a sermon upon the crucifixion, in Spanish.

From hence they remove to the adjoining altar, where the cross is supposed to have been erected. At this altar is a hole in the natural rock, said to be the very same individual one, in which the foot of our Lord's cross stood. Here they set up their cross, with the bloody crucified image upon it; and leaving it in that posture, they first sing their hymn, and then the father guardian, sitting in a chair before it, preaches a passion sermon in Italian.

At about one yard and a half distant from the hole in which the foot of the cross was placed, is a remarkable cleft in the rock, which in all probability was made, as it is said to have been, by the earthquake that happened when the Son of God suffered (Matt. xxvii, 51—54). That this is a natural and genuine breach, and not counterfeited by art, the sense and reason of every one who sees it (say travellers) must convince him; for the sides of it answer exactly to each other, even where they are inaccessible to the tools of the workman.

The ceremony of the passion being over, and the guardian's sermon ended, two friars, personating, the one Joseph of Arimathea, the other Nicodemus, approach the cross, and with a most solemn air both of aspect and behaviour, draw out the great nails, and take the feigned body from the cross. It is an effigy so contrived, that its limbs are soft and flexible, as if it had been real flesh; and nothing can be more surprising than to see the two pretended mourners bend down the arms which were before extended, and dispose them upon the trunk in such a manner as is usual in corpses.

The body being taken down from the cross, is received into a fair large winding sheet, and carried down from Calvary, the whole company attending it to the stone of unction. This is taken for the very place where the precious body of our Lord was anointed and prepared for the burial. Here they lay down the imaginary corpse, and casting over it several sweet powders and spices, wrap it up in a winding sheet, singing a hymn, after which, one of the fathers preaches a sermon suitable to the occasion. These obsequies being finished, they carry off their fancied corpse, and lay it in the sepulchre, shutting up the door till Easter morning. And now, after so many sermons and so long and tedious a ceremony, the weariness of the company, and the time of night, make it needful to go to rest.

The next morning nothing extraordinary passes. In the afternoon of Saturday, the congregation are assembled in the area before the holy grave, where the friars spend some time in singing over the Lamentations of Jeremiah, which function, with the usual procession to the holy places, is all the ceremony of this day. On Easter morning, the sepulchre is again set open very early. The clouds of the former morning are dispersed, and the fathers put on a face of joy, as if it had been the very time of our Lord's resurrection. Mass is celebrated in the morning just before the holy sepulchre, where the father guardian has a throne erected; and being clothed with episcopal robes, with a mitre on his head, he gives the host to all Christians who are disposed to receive it, several Turks standing by as spectators. This being over, they retire out of the church, and most of the pilgrims are entertained by the father guardian at the convent.

THE SACRED FIRE, IN THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE.

Pious frauds had a very early origin among the professors of Christianity. They arose with the corruption of religion, and were designed to induce the ignorant to embrace the profession of the gospel. Falsehood and blasphemy are their essence, and words are insufficient to express the dishonour they have done to God, or the injury which they have occasioned to the souls of men. The impious delusion of the "Holy Fire," was first devised, according to Gibbon, in the sixth century; and, lamentable to acknowledge, from want of the saving knowledge of the Scriptures, it still exists in the nineteenth.

Many travellers have described this gross imposition upon an ignorant people; but the following is from a very instructive "Memoir of the Rev. Levi Parsons, first Missionary to Palestine from the United States," who was ordained to his noble office in 1817, landed at Smyrna in Jan. 1820, and fell under his labours at Alexandria, Feb. 10, 1822. He says, "Every apartment of the church was crowded with Turks, Jews, Christians, and with people from every nation under heaven. These assembled to witness the supposed miraculous descent of the Holy Spirit, under the similitude of fire. It is estimated that at least 5000 people were present. The governor of the city and Turks of rank were there. A very convenient place was allotted me to observe distinctly every ceremony. About twelve o'clock we witnessed scenes of a very extraordinary nature, and highly derogatory to the Christian profession. A body of Arab Christians, natives of Palestine, were admitted to perform their part in the duties of the holy week. They began by running round the holy sepulchre with all the frantic airs of madmen, clapping their hands, throwing their caps into the air, cuffing each other's ears, leaping half-naked upon the shoulders of their companions, hallooing, or rather shrieking to the utmost extent of their voices. This was the exhibition to five thousand people, who were in expectation of soon witnessing the descent of the holy fire.

"About one o'clock the Turks entered the small apartment of the holy tomb, extinguished the lamps, closed the doors, and set a watch. I was determined to enter myself the holy sepulchre, with the Russian Consul, to see from what direction the fire proceeded. But they replied, 'The Turks will not give permission to strangers to enter! Shortly after, the principal Greek priest entered the holy sepulchre, attended by the Armenian patriarch, and also by the Syrian patriarch. The Greek priest, however, entered the sacred apartment unattended. Every eye was fixed as the time approached. As we stood waiting, suddenly there darted from the sepulchre a flaming torch, which was carried almost instantaneously to a distant part of the assembly. I stood among the first to receive the fire, and to prove that, as to its power of burning, it contained no extraordinary qualities. The zeal of the pilgrims to get a part of the fire before the superior qualities departed (as they say it burns like other fire in a few minutes), endangered the lives of many. Several were well nigh crushed to death. Some lighted candles, others tow, with a view to preserve a part of its influence. Some held their faces in the blaze, saying, 'It does not burn.' Others said, 'Now, Lord, I believe; forgive my former unbelief.' After this the pilgrims retired, abundantly satisfied with what they had seen and heard."

How truly distressing to reflect upon the mysteries of our most holy faith being thus burlesqued, and the minds of men thus blinded and abused, upon the very spot where the Apostles preached so faithfully and effectually the doctrines of salvation by Jesus Christ! May every Christian pray, that the people may be delivered from such absurdities, and their minds blessed with the edifying light of the Scriptures!

REVOCATION OF THE "IRREVOCABLE EDICT OF NANTZ."

Agreeably to our intimation, when noticing the death of the late lamented Admiral Lord Gambier, whose great grandfather was a persecuted French Protestant, we here give some notice of the "Revocation" of the "Irrevocable Edict of Nantz." That transaction cannot fail to be interesting to our readers; not only on account of the calamities which befel the professors of the gospel, but the benefits which resulted to the manufactures of Great Britain. Previously, however, a short sketch of the history of the Protestant faith in France may be desirable, to render the circumstances of that dreadful event more clearly understood.

Learning had begun to revive in France, in common with other countries of Europe, at the era of the Reformation. The art of printing had been the means of circulating the writings of Luther in France; and the Waldenses, in the southern provinces of that country, estimating their own numbers at eight hundred thousand persons, contributed to diffuse the light of divine truth, while they were encouraged in their profession of Christ by the increase of scriptural knowledge among their neighbours. Margaret, queen of Navarre, sister to Francis I, embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and afforded protection to the preachers of the gospel to the extent of her power.

Brissonet, bishop of Meaux, countenanced the reformed doctrines; and encouraged James le Fevre d'Etaples, William Farel, and Gerard le Roux, in preaching the truth as it is in Jesus, and many embraced the gospel; but a persecution arose, and the members of the scriptural society which had been formed at Meaux, were scattered through the nation, by the vigilant Papists. In 1524, John le Clerc, founder of the reformed community at Metz, after enduring grievous torments for the gospel, was burnt alive! And numerous were the sacrifices of the same kind, which were made by the superstitious bigotry, or the popish policy of Francis; who personally assisted, bareheaded, in a grand procession at Paris, in 1535, while he was an eye-witness of the burning of six Protestants on account of their faith!

Several celebrated preachers under the patronage of Queen Margaret, were eminent instruments in diffusing the gospel. Among the great lights of France, promoters of the Reformation, was John Calvin. He was a man of extraordinary genius, immense learning, and flowing eloquence; which were sanctified by the most elevated piety, and improved by indefatigable industry. All his talents were consecrated to the cause of Christ, from 1534, when he embraced the doctrines of the Reformation. Calvin endured various persecutions from Francis I, to whom he dedicated his famous work, entitled, "Institutes of the Christian Religion." In 1536, Calvin settled at Geneva, which became a city of the greatest note, through his learned and orthodox writings and commentaries on the Scriptures; so that by his wisdom and industry, he became the principal counsellor to the reformers in every nation throughout Europe, after the death of Luther.

France appears to have contained almost as many Protestants as even Germany, toward the close of the sixteenth century: for in 1570, it was found that there were 2,150 congregations, some of them including 2,000 members. Probably in no country have their persecutions been more dreadful, and volumes might be filled with most affecting examples of French martyrs.

Francis I was the rival of Charles V; and the wars occasioned by their ambition were most calamitous; and to secure the influence of the Pope, they were both led to sacrifice the Protestants in their several states. The French king manifested his zeal for the church in a dreadful persecution of the Waldenses, and others who were believed to have embraced the reformed doctrines, to gratify his Holiness. Francis is reported to have been heard declaring, "that if he thought the blood of his arm was tainted with the Lutheran heresy, he would cut it off; and that he would not spare his own children, if they entertained sentiments contrary to those of the Catholic Church." How shocking to live under the power of such a wretched bigot!

Francis I died in 1547, and was succeeded by Henry II, in whose reign a multitude of martyrs fell a sacrifice to papal vindictiveness. In 1557, a congregation of Protestants was discovered in Paris; their place of meeting was surrounded; many of them were seized, and nine of them perished in the flames. Philippa de Luns, the widow of a nobleman of Gascony, was one of them. This lady was only twenty-three years of age; in her execution she was most barbarously tortured, with a view to intimidate others. But the divine principles for which she suffered, continued to spread; and many persons of rank were known to be favourable to them, particularly Antony Bourbon, king of Navarre, and his brother Louis, prince of Condé.

Henry II, we are informed, entered into the Parliament of Paris at the time it was being debated respecting the punishment of heretics; and he gave orders, that two of the counsellors, Faber and Du Bourg, should be apprehended, because they had expressed themselves favourable towards the reformers. Henry had declared, that he would "see the execution of Du Bourg:" but while proceedings against these upright men were going forward, the king was killed by a wound which he received in his eye at a tournament! Many regarded it as a mark of the Divine judgment, recollecting his violent declaration. Du Bourg suffered with a joyful hope in God his Saviour; praying, "O Lord, my God, forsake me not, lest I forsake thee."

Francis II succeeded Henry; and having married Mary Stuart, by her right he became king of Scotland: but he reigned only to the close of the year following, when his brother Charles IX, only nine years of age, was placed on the throne. Catherine de Medicis, mother of these two princes, had the chief authority in the kingdom, and disputes were carried on between the two political parties of the Guises and the Bourbons. The Guise party, with the cardinal of Lorraine and his brother Francis, were implacable in their hatred of the reformers; while the Bourbon princes, with Louis prince of Condé at their head, patronized them. In 1561, Catherine, affecting moderation, obtained a conference between the Papists and Protestants; but in vain, as nothing would be yielded by the Pope and the Council of Trent, and a civil war was the consequence, in which about 50,000 Protestants were sacrificed. As the Guise party prevailed, the most shocking barbarities were exercised upon the unoffending Hugonots, as they called the Protestants. By the peace, however, in 1563 they obtained liberty of conscience: but the conflict was renewed in 1567, and again in 1568; when in 1569, a new peace was made on advantageous terms for the reformers.

The Protestants thought themselves secure; as the heads of their party were received at the French court with expressions of liberality and kindness: but at that period a most dreadful tragedy was being prepared. The pages of history do not record such another instance of monstrous perfidy and malignant barbarity, as was perpetrated in 1572 in France, under the cloak of the religion of Jesus, the Prince of Peace. The Pope and his agents influenced the French king to resolve upon exterminating, by one decisive effort, all the dissenters from the Roman Catholic church. For this purpose, many of the principal Protestants were invited to Paris, under a solemn oath of safety, to celebrate the marriage of the young king of Navarre with the sister of the French king. The queen dowager of Navarre, a zealous Protestant, was destroyed before the festival, by means of poison concealed in a pair of gloves! She bore her sickness with patient resignation worthy of a Christian. "As for life," said she, "I am in a good measure weaned from the love of it, by reason of the afflictions which have followed me from my youth hitherto; but especially because I cannot live without daily offending my good God, with whom I desire to be with all my heart," &c.

A few days after, August 22, Admiral Coligni was shot at and wounded in the streets of Paris; when the hypocritical king paid him a visit, and told him, "You have received the wound, but it is I who suffer." The royal word allayed the suspicions of Coligni; but the same night a council was held to deliberate on the mode of accomplishing a general massacre of the Protestants. St. Bartholomew's Eve, at midnight, was the time fixed, and the appointed signal was the tolling of a bell near the Louvre. The wounded admiral was apprised of his danger, and said, "I perceive what is doing—I bless God I shall die in the Lord, through whose grace I am elected to a hope of everlasting life. You, my friends, flee hence as fast as you can, the presence of God is abundantly sufficient for me." The murder of this venerable man was the commencement of the bloody work. The duke of Guise himself waited below stairs, with the chevalier d'Angoulême, till his mangled corpse was cast from the window, to be dragged through the streets and burnt: it is said that his head was sent to Rome by the queen-mother!

In the Louvre, many of the gentlemen belonging to the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé, were killed under the king's eye. He himself is said to have fired with his long gun at the groups that he saw attempting to escape by the river. Among the slain were Count Rochefoucault, Feligni, the admiral's son-in-law, the Marquess Ravely, and Peter Ramus, a man of great fame for his learning; and of all ranks, it is calculated, that, in the space of three days, there were thus murdered no less than ten thousand in Paris. The young king of Navarre and the prince of Condé were compelled to be present at some of the executions, and also to assist at a jubilee of solemn thanksgiving to God for the success of this scheme declared so favourable to religion! The massacre extended to all places in which these professors of scriptural religion were known. Private orders were sent to the governors of the provinces to fall upon them; and similar scenes of blood were exhibited at Meaux, Orleans, Troyes, Angers, Toulouse, Rouen, and Lyons; so that in the space of two months, it is computed that not less than 100,000 Protestants were thus murdered!

This horrible tragedy was well known to have been contrived by the fathers of the Roman Catholic church. Medals to commemorate it were struck at Paris; and the annunciation of it was received by the clergy in Spain, and at Rome, with expressions of unbounded exultation. The person who carried the news to Rome was rewarded with 1000 crowns; and when the letters of the papal legate, residing at the French court, were read in the assembly of cardinals, it was decreed, that the pope should march with his cardinals to the church of St. Mark, to offer solemn thanks to God for so signal a blessing conferred on the See of Rome!

The Protestant king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé, were devoted to the same destruction: but their lives were spared on their professing themselves reconciled to the Church of Rome—the French king, with a terrible oath, proposing to them, "The Mass, Death, or the Bastile for life!" Divine justice, however, could not be bribed. The guilty king could never afterwards pacify his conscience: his countenance indicated his mental anguish; he could never sleep soundly, and he awoke in dreadful agonies: and soon after died in extreme horror of mind.

Henry III succeeded his brother; and the Guises formed a confederacy, which they called the "Catholic League," compelling the king to declare himself its head. The duke of Guise and Henry III both perished by violent deaths! and the king of Navarre, after much contention and various battles, succeeded to the throne, as Henry IV; and though he had embraced the Roman Catholic faith, he granted the famous Edict, dated Nantz, April 13, 1598. This decree was called "Irrevocable;" by which they were allowed liberty of conscience, the free exercise of their religion, and access to all places of trust and dignity. With this security, the Hugonots became prodigiously increased, to the most grievous mortification of the blood-thirsty partisans of Rome!

A Martyr's Firmness.—Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna (supposed to be a disciple of St. John), suffered martyrdom A. D. 167, when he came to the stake, desired to stand untied, saying, "Let me alone, for He who gave me strength to come to the fire, will give me patience to endure the flame, without your tying."

LETTER XXIX.

On Natural History and Natural Philosophy.

Dear Madam,

A KNOWLEDGE of these topics (of course I mean to the same superficial extent as of the preceding) will be very useful to your child.

By the former, you of course understand me to mean a description of the different tribes of the inferior creatures, consisting of birds, beasts, fishes, and insects.

The objects of this knowledge then are none other than the animated works of the great Creator himself. If we gaze with interest and delight upon the statue, which was the production of some ancient sculptor, and feel a veneration for the intellect of the man which could imagine a form so lovely, and for the skill which enabled him to give reality to conceptions so beautiful and exact; if we justly think we perceive reflections of the mind of the architect in the building, and of the artist in the picture;—with what intense curiosity and awe might we not expect that mankind would gaze upon the works of the almighty, invisible Framer and Ruler of all!

The works of the Creator are also the most beautiful of all objects. His conceptions, which are realized in the works of his hands, are the standard of all taste and propriety. In proportion as the work of any artist is natural, that is, is conformed to the objects produced by the Divine Being, it is beautiful and perfect. How admirable are the majesty and beauty of many species of the inferior creatures! How indescribably interesting are the tints of many flowers, the hues of the plumage of many birds, and the colours of multitudes of shells and fishes! At the same time the contemplation of the immense variety of animated beings with which the universe is replenished, from the whale to the animalcula, from the condor to the insect of a day, from the elephant to the creature which can only be distinguished through a microscope, tends to raise our conceptions of the infinite resources of the power of God. Nor less does the contemplation of the provision he has made for their happiness, tend to enlarge our conceptions of his love. At the same time the countless tribes of creatures inferior to man, may open our minds to admit the existence of the intelligences superior to ourselves, and which are not improbably as great in number and as varied in habits and capacities as those below us.

I consider you fortunate, so to speak, that you live in a time when the facilities of contemplating these objects are greatly multiplied. The conductors of the Family Library, and the editors of several other similar publications, have presented to the world, but especially to the youthful part of society, an inestimable treasure of knowledge for the study of natural history. The plates, representing the various animals in all their different habitudes, are most natural and striking; and the description appended is concise, authenticated, and free from objections.

A similar explication of the stores of natural history has been made with regard to insects; and the public expectation has been encouraged to consider these as by no means the last effort of the same nature contemplated by the enlightened, liberal, and indefatigable conductors of those publications.

These volumes generally contain easy and sensible allusions and inferences respecting the wisdom, power, and goodness of the Creator; and one of them has been conducted with an express view to the elucidation of these topics: I refer to the book entitled Insecto-Theology.

The strict adherence to truth and nature which characterizes the plates and the descriptions in these volumes, are happily seconded by the opportunity which is afforded by public national exhibitions of most of the creatures. The British public may now, in the metropolis especially, and in several large towns of the kingdom, amid the recesses of a public garden, behold the inhabitants of foreign deserts and mountains and forests and lakes, each exhibited in his natural habitudes, and undistressed by the degree of confinement which in former times counterbalanced much of the benefit of beholding them in the mind of the spectator. There the elephant bathes, the ostrich paces as if in the desert, the goat of Cashmere looks down from the rocks, and the alligator basks upon the bank of the stagnant pool. To read the description of such creatures which is furnished by the press of the present day, and to visit these and other exibitions of them, certainly constitute some of the principal advantages of the rising generation.

The resources of information with respect to natural philosophy, or the description of the objects of the inanimate creation, are equally abundant and desirable. In most large towns of the kingdom, and at a very small expense, lectures sufficiently extensive and profound may be heard, upon geology, mineralogy, galvanism, electricity, chemistry, mechanics, hydrostatics, &c. &c. illustrated by interesting experiments. Now although the knowledge gained of natural philosophy from such lectures must be merely superficial, as indeed all natural philosophy without being pursued by mathematics must be, yet an attentive child may derive from this source a considerable insight into the powers and properties of matter, the discoveries of modern science, and the application of the sciences to arts and manufactures. And the knowledge of the existence of such powers, qualities, and properties is valuable: it will serve to add to his ability to conceive and illustrate other subjects: it tends to expand his knowledge of the Creator's works, and of His character from whom he receives every supply, and upon whom he must throughout eternity be dependent. The knowledge of these topics is also facilitated by the numerous small pamphlets and catechisms upon them which have been published within a few years, and which any public lecturer upon them would readily point out to you. I refer to such books as Pinnock's Catechisms, &c.

At the same time it will rest with you to prevent the mischiefs which may arise from his familiarity with these topics. Perhaps after having seen philosophical experiments, or after having seen collections of shells, vegetables, and minerals, or even coins and pictures, he may be seized with an insatiable desire to become a collector. Hence you will be put to expense, and he will suffer loss of time and distraction of mind, for no earthly good whatever. In a few years he would assuredly despise and neglect the few shells, coins, plants, &c. which he might now collect, and even the electrical machine, the possession of which he now thinks would constitute the sum of earthly happiness.

Should he exhibit a craving for these objects, resolutely yet skilfully and mildly deny it. Explain to him, that whenever he wants to see such objects, a visit to a museum, or attendance at lectures, will always employ him and gratify his wishes. That upon the same principle that he wishes to set up in natural philosophy, he ought to wish to be his own grocer, apothecary, &c. That in these, and indeed in every other instance, except that of his own peculiar profession or art, he must be indebted to others. Explain to him the doctrine of the subdivision of labour, and quiet his wish for an apparatus, &c. Should you fail, endeavour to get an introduction for him to some one possessing such things. After he has been permitted to plague himself for a few days amid phials and machines, he will have become surfeited, and the expense of a few breakages will be your least, and possibly your last on that score. In giving you remedies for this mania, I am describing a very possible case, and one of frequent occurrence. On no account gratify this propensity, but seek to divert it. Do this as you would be unwilling that your son should present that pitiable object — a lad who knows a little and can do a little in all the -ologies, and knows nothing of them worth knowing; who has learned to talk and to be conceited; who, while his attention has been directed to a variety of subjects, is really master of none; and in that particular branch from which his future maintenance is to be derived, is even inferior to many of his schoolfellows or companions. Yet the deluded parent all the while thinks her son amazingly clever, because he has an apparatus, &c. and knows a few barbarous words for some plants, minerals, &c. I hope, however, in a future Letter to expose upon proper grounds and very much at large the preposterous delusion of aiming at what is called general knowledge, and to which, alas! the system of many an unprincipled schoolmaster designedly contributes. The extent to which I would allow your son to be acquainted with these topics, does not endanger this perilous and preposterous deception.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

CLERICUS.

THOUGHTS ON THE SACRED HISTORY OF THE CREATION.

(Concluded from p. 180.)

THE bones, muscles, blood, arteries, &c. of the human frame, are nearly similar to those of most quadrupeds; yet if closely compared, the human body is found to have some peculiarities, which, exclusive of the soul, attach to man a decided and permanent superiority, which no order of animals can acquire. Of these it will be sufficient to particularize four differences.

The first is, the erect structure. All other animals are so framed as not to possess this beauty and advantage: they are made to be always prone; and though the ape and baboon class have more power of supporting an erect posture, yet they cannot do it with the facility, energy, and natural ability of man; nor do they appear to derive any benefit from it over their fellow-brutes. But in the human race, this erect structure is the foundation of their dominion and superiority over all the rest of the animal world.

The second peculiarity is the bony and muscular structure of the human legs and feet, which give us a solidity of support, and an agility and facility of movement, that no other animal possesses in equal applicability and effective power. By his legs and feet, man is fitted for every kind of motion, except that of flying; and though some quadrupeds excel him in temporary speed, none can vie with him in his power of continuing it. A man cannot outrun a horse, but in a protracted journey will frequently walk him down.

The third and distinguishing superiority is the human arm, with its hand and fingers. This is indeed the sceptre of his power: it has the potency of an enchanter's rod; and has achieved those wonders of human art, strength, and ingenuity, which the magicians of our imagination might toil in vain to surpass. All that we admire and dread and use, in mechanism and manufacture, in art, war, luxury, labour, and comfort, is the produce of the human hand. These three advantages give all the bodily efficiency which man's transcending soul requires: without that informing spirit, little comparative benefit would be attained from them; as that without these would be also ineffective; but both united, man is the irresistible sovereign of the globe he inhabits.

The fourth great dissimilarity, is the beautiful and delicate skin of the human body. Hasty men have inveighed against Providence, for sending us into the world so destitute of natural clothing, so exposed to all injuries of temperature and wet. Would any such querulous declaimers exchange their admirable skin for the hide of a beast, the scales of a crocodile, or the feathers of a turkey? But independent of all beauty, the connection between our mind and our delicate skin is unceasing: a fine nervous expansion, proceeding from the brain, is purposely spread over the outside of our bodies, immediately under the last cuticle. That our intellect may have the benefit of this sensitiveness, it is materially associated with our feelings and sympathies. With the hide of a rhinoceros, or the wool of a sheep, we should not possess the feelings of a human heart, or the intellectual sensibility of a cultivated mind.

But one of the most beautiful and most benevolent ideas of the Divine mind was the conception and formation of the female sex. No other production has contributed so much to the improvement and happiness of human nature: it was the divinest of our great Author's works on our earth. When He declared, as the reason of this particular creation, "It is not good that man should be alone," He pronounced a truth which every age and clime and nation have verified. If man had been alone upon earth, his populations had been little else than fierce, savage, and battling brutes. In this state the uncivilized tribes of the earth are found to be, where women are degraded or despised; that is, where they are deprived of that influence which they were created to diffuse and possess, and by its magic enchantment to humanize and meliorate. Respect and love to their wives and females, is the great civilizing principle which has contributed to the unceasing progress of the nations who conquered Europe from the Romans, and spread over it the present kingdoms, with a superiority that has never retrograded. There is something in the active spirit of the manly portion of our species, which loves enterprize, exertion, competition, and personal display, and would too often lead us into civil discord and strife, if no softer companions were about us, to occupy some portion of our thoughts and attentions, and to create and cherish milder and sweeter feelings. The female sex were indeed created to be such a blessing to ours, that they have in all ages operated to make us better, wiser, and happier, in proportion as their gentler nature has had the influence it was made to possess.

The Deity having formed his human being, and stationed him in a pleasant region of the earth, began his intellectual education by causing the various classes of the animal kingdom to approach him, that he might observe their qualities, and from thence attach to them the verbal sounds or names by which he would afterwards know them. Language thus began with the names of living things: the first words were the notations of existing beings, the true foundation of all human speech.

We now approach the great mystery of our creation, the fall and sin of man — the commencement of moral evil and of personal suffering; the defection of man from his Creator; the preference of self-indulgence to self-restraint; the devotion of the spirit to its present enjoyments, and a disregard of future consequences. Whatever opinion we may form as to the original cause of these errors, the fact of their occurrence, prevalence, and continuance, is indisputable: they appear in every page of human history, in the characters and conduct of all ages and nations, in our own individual hearts and lives. Such a being man has been ever since his primeval day; yet in such a perversity as this he could not have been created: to be such a mutilation of the Divine likeness, is a counteraction to His purposes, and the present triumph of that which is most hostile to Him. The separation from a condition of unmingled happiness into the common world, where trouble and sorrow, as at this day, accompanied moral delinquency, these were the unhappy effects of the primitive departure from reason and obedience; and the depravation became so universal, that the Sovereign Lord thought it fittest for the welfare of all succeeding ages, that the corrupt population should be suddenly cut off. A deluge was the appointed visitation to accomplish this: but from this catastrophe one family was excepted, and in the ark of safety found shelter, with such of the animal world as were intended to replace the species that should perish: and when these provisions for repeopling the earth were completed, the tremendous revolution occurred. The fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the floodgates of the heavens were opened. We can but faintly conceive the appalling scene. Mankind were surprised, in the midst of their usual festivities and employments, by the sudden alarm of portentous danger. The sun was seen no more! midnight darkness usurped the day! lightnings dreadfully illuminated! thunder rolled with increasing fury! all that was natural ceased, and in its stead, whirlwind and desolation! Earth rending! — cities falling! — the roar of tumultuous waters! — shrieks and groans of human despair! — overwhelming ruin! — universal silence! — and the awful quiet of executed and subsiding retribution!

LEAF VIII.

"The Bee that wanders, and sips from every flower, disposes what she has gathered into her cells." — SENECA.

REMARKABLE ANECDOTE OF THE REV. JOHN ROGERS.

Sir Richard Cradock, a justice of peace, was a violent persecutor of the Dissenters, and exerted himself to enforce all the severe laws then in being against them *. He happened to live near Mr. Rogers, against whom he bore a particular enmity, and wanted above all things to have him in his power. Hearing that he was one day to preach some miles off, he thought a fair opportunity offered for accomplishing his base design, and accordingly hired two spies to go and take down the names of all the hearers whom they knew, that they might appear against both them and Mr. Rogers. The plan succeeded to his wishes. They brought him the names of several persons who were present at the meeting, and he summoned them with Mr. Rogers to appear before him. Knowing the violence of the man, they came with trembling hearts. While they were waiting in the great hall, a little girl about six or seven years of age, who was Sir Richard's grand-daughter, happened to come into the hall. She looked at Mr. Rogers, and was much taken with his venerable appearance. He being naturally fond of children, took her upon his knee and caressed her, which occasioned her to conceive a great fondness for him. At length Sir Richard sent a servant to Mr. Rogers and the rest, to inform them, that as one of the witnesses was taken ill, and unable to attend, they must come again another day. They accordingly came at the time appointed, and being convicted, the justice ordered the mittimus to be written to send them to prison. Mr. Rogers expecting to see the little girl again, brought some sweetmeats with him to give her. As soon as she saw him, she came running to him, and appeared fonder of him than before. This child being a particular favourite of her grandfather, had got such an ascendancy over him, that he could deny her nothing; and her spirit was so violent, that she could bear no contradiction; so that she was indulged in every thing she wanted. On one occasion, being contradicted, she ran a pen-knife into her arm, to the great danger of her life. In the present instance, this bad spirit was over-ruled for good. While she was sitting on Mr. Rogers's knee, eating the sweetmeats, she looked earnestly at him, and said, "What are you here for, Sir?" He answered, "I believe your grandfather is going to send me and my friends to jail." "To jail!" said she, "Why, what have you done?" "Why I did nothing but preach at such a place, and they did nothing but hear me." "But my grandpapa sha'nt send you to jail." "Aye, but, my dear, I believe he is now making out our mittimus to send us all there." Upon this she ran up to the room where Sir Richard was, and knocked with her head and heels till she got in, and then said to him, "What are you going to do with my good old gentleman in the hall?" "That is nothing to you," said he, "go about your business." "But I won't," said she: "He tells me that you are going to send him and his friends to jail, and if you do, I'll drown myself in the pond as soon as they are gone; I will indeed." When he saw the child thus peremptory, it shook his resolution, and he was induced to abandon his malicious design. Taking the mittimus in his hand, he went down into the hall, and thus addressed these good men. "I had here made out your mittimus to send you all to jail, as you deserve; but at my grandchild's request, I drop the prosecution, and set you all at liberty." They all bowed, and thanked his worship. But Mr. Rogers going to the child, laid his hand upon her head, and lifting up his eyes to heaven, with great solemnity said, "God bless you, my dear child! May the blessing of that God whose cause you did now plead, though as yet you know Him not, be upon you in life, at death, and to all eternity!" He and his friends then went away.

The above remarkable story was told by the Rev. Timothy Rogers, the son of the ejected minister, who had frequently heard his father relate it with great pleasure; and the celebrated Mr. Thomas Bradbury once heard it from him when he was dining at the house of Mrs. Tooly, an eminent Christian lady in London, who was distinguished for her religion, and her love to Christ and his people; and whose house and table, like Lydia's, were always open to them. What follows, is yet more remarkable, as affording a striking proof of the answer which was returned to good Mr. Rogers's prayers for this child, and the blessing which descended upon her who had been the instrument of such a deliverance for these persecuted servants of God.

Holy prayer is a shelter to the soul, a sacrifice to God, and a scourge to the devil. — Augustine.

Luther is said to have spent three hours every day in prayer. He used to say that prayer was the best book in his study.

Oh! it is more bitter than death to be spoiled of prayer. Daniel chose rather to run the hazard of his life, than lose his prayer. — Chrysostom.

Though Daniel's prayer did not keep him out of the lion's den, it preserved him in the lion's den. — Waite.

THE WAY TO WEALTH.

Wealth would be wealthier still, and aye to gold aspires:
Wealth, would'st thou wealthier be? — diminish thy desires.

---

* In the time of King Charles the Second.

THE INCREDULITY OF THOMAS.

There was a seal upon the stone,
A guard around the tomb:
The spurn'd and trembling band alone
Bewail'd their Master's doom.
They deem'd the barriers of the grave
Had clos'd o'er Him who came to save,
And thoughts of grief and gloom
Were darkening, while depress'd, dismay'd,
Silent they wept, or weeping prayed.

He died; — for Justice claim'd her due,
Ere guilt could be forgiven:
But soon the gates asunder flew,
The iron bars were riven;
Broken the seal; the guards dispers'd,
Upon their sight in glory burst
The risen Lord of Heaven!
Yet one, the heaviest in despair,
In grief the wildest, was not there.

Returning, on each alter'd brow
With mute surprise he gaz'd;
For each was lit with transport now,
Each eye to heaven uprais'd.
Burst forth from all th' extatic word —
"Hail, brother, we have seen the Lord!"
Bewilder'd and amaz'd
He stood; then bitter words and brief
Betray'd the heart of unbelief.

Days past, and still the frequent groan
Convuls'd his lab'ring breast,
When round him light celestial shone,
And Jesus stood confess'd.
"Reach, doubter! reach thy hand," he said,
"Explore the wound the spear hath made,
The print by nails impress'd:
No longer for the living grieve;
And be not faithless, but believe."

Oh! if the iris of the skies
Transcends the painter's art,
How could he trace to human eyes
The rainbow of the heart;
When joy, love, fear, repentance, shame,
Hope, faith, in swift succession came,
Each claiming there a part; —
Each mingling in the tears that flow'd,
The words that breath'd—"My Lord! my God!"

RELIGION PROMOTED BY RAILWAYS.

"The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea." To accomplish this glorious prediction, without miracles, all the improvements of the arts and sciences will be required. Steam Presses and Rail Roads are wonderful facilities in America, and they are among the means to subserve the cause of the Redeemer, we trust, all over the world. We cannot but rejoice in the passing of the bill for the Birmingham Railway. The traffic between Birmingham and London will be understood by the following estimate for one year, by the present road and canal conveyance. Passengers, 233,155; goods, 62,389 tons; parcels, 46,799; beasts, 50,839; sheep, 365,000; pigs, 15,634. The expense by the existing means of transit is about 1,338,217*l.*; while by the railway it will not exceed 800,728*l.*; thus exhibiting an annual saving to the country of 537,489*l.* independently of the advantages to be expected from the unrivalled celerity of this mode of conveyance.

BENEVOLENCE PECULIARLY CHRISTIAN.

THE legal ordinances of the Romans were founded on the principle of retaliatory justice. Vengeance there followed the commission of crime, and summary punishment was thought to be the most efficacious preventive of offence. Consistently with such a doctrine, the exercise of mercy formed no prerogative of their governors, but the strict letter of the law guided their decisions. In no case is the superiority of Christianity more manifest than in the inculcation of those sublime doctrines of benevolence and charity, which so strongly tend to mollify the human heart, and to check the progress of that depravity, which, being so much in unison with the perverted inclinations of man, would for ever hold the world in subservience.

Approximating so closely to the purity of heaven, the general adoption of such doctrines would unite the innumerable families of this lower world in celestial harmony and concord, the sabre would be turned into the pruning hook, and the plough be a substitute for the sword. Every territory, from the undiscovered pole to the torrid east, would become the abode of happiness unalloyed, and iniquity and misery no more desolate the world with their frightful ravages.

A RESOLUTION WORTHY OF EVERY CHRISTIAN.

JONATHAN EDWARDS, an American divine of the [illegible] century, has left a reputation in the church of [illegible] both as a theologian and a man of Christian [illegible] which will engage the admiration of the wise and [illegible] down to the end of time. His elevated piety and [illegible] attainments resulted from the practical adoption of [illegible] following worthy resolution: —

"That on the supposition there never was [illegible] but one individual in the world at any one time, [illegible] was properly a complete Christian, in all respects of [illegible] right stamp, having Christianity always shining in [illegible] true lustre, and appearing excellent and lovely from whatever part and under whatever character viewed, he would strive to be that one who should live in his time."

KRISHNA SUFFERING. KRISHNA TRIUMPHING.

INCARNATIONS OF THE HINDOO DEITY VISHNOO.

Solomon, by divine inspiration, declared, "Lo, this only have I found, that God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions." Eccles. vii, 29.

Probably nothing affords a more affecting proof of the apostasy of man from God, than the various absurdities of paganism in their "inventions" relating to religion. And, at the same time, scarcely any thing furnishes a more interesting confirmation of the truth and divinity of Christianity, than is found in their traditions. The great fundamental doctrine of Christianity is, that the Son of God, the Second Person of the adorable Trinity, descended from heaven, and became incarnate, as the universal prophet and priest of mankind, the Mediator between God and man, and the spiritual king of his holy church.

This glorious doctrine of salvation, which is the substance of Divine revelation, is evident in many of the absurd traditions of the heathen in all the ancient nations.

Hindooism teaches that the Deity has made ten descents on earth, which they call "Avatárs," a Sanscrit word, signifying incarnation. Brahm or Brahma, the "Great One," the learned Hindoos regard as the Creator; Vishnoo, the Preserver; and Siva, the Destroyer. Vishnoo, they say, has been incarnate nine times. In the first he is represented as issuing from the body of a fish; to teach, as it is said, his preservation of a devout person with his family consisting of seven others, and pairs of animals, in an ark, during a deluge, which destroyed the impious population. In the second he appears supported on a tortoise, to remind the people, that in the shape of a tortoise Vishnoo supported the earth, while the gods churned the sea, to make it cast up the things which it had swallowed. In the third, he appears with a boar's head, as is said to teach, that in such shape the god drew up the earth with his tusks from the depth of the ocean. Fabulous and absurd as these representations may appear, it seems evident that they have reference to the history of Noah and the Deluge mentioned in the Scriptures; and their extravagance may be accounted for by the consideration, that before the invention of writing, ancient traditions were represented by pictures, which in an ignorant and superstitious age would be corrupted, and that their interpretations would naturally be most ridiculous. Six other incarnations are said to have taken place, equally childish in their representation, and they are believed to allude to some momentous events in the history of the world in subsequent ages.

Krishna is the eighth, and Buddha the ninth incarnation. Concerning Krishna, the Hindoo priests, in a long history of his life, relate the greatest extravagancies and follies. Sir William Jones supposes that many of the stories of Krishna, which are similar to the events in the life of our blessed Saviour, must have been borrowed from the spurious Gospels, which were carried to India by some of the early professors of Christianity. Many false accounts of our Saviour, it is well known, were published concerning His mysterious incarnation and wondrous mission, and circulated throughout the East. The representation in our engraving was copied from a painting on the wall of an ancient pagoda in India.

Krishna is seen here, first in a state of suffering, from the coils and venomous bite of an enormous serpent. Again he is exhibited as a crowned conqueror, having escaped the power of the monster, and standing on its head No one can hesitate to admit the probability of this representation referring originally to the tradition of the merciful promise of God to our fallen parents, Adam and Eve, and the expressive curse denounced upon the serpent, Gen. iii, 15, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." The exposition of this passage by the grandson or great-grandson of Noah, when first settling in Hindoostan, by the incarnation of the Son of God, would give occasion to some representation of it, to preserve it from perishing; especially if he had lived and died in a state of reconciliation with God, and in the assurance of eternal salvation from all the evils which the enmity and subtlety of the serpent had brought on mankind.

While we possess the uncorrupted Oracles of God in the Holy Scriptures, and the pure gospel of Jesus Christ, making known to us the joyful tidings of eternal life, through the sufferings and triumph of Immanuel, God with us, our high privilege is to triumph with our exalted Lord, anticipating his kingdom and glory: but it is no less our duty, and our delightful privilege, to contribute to the destruction of the corrupt superstitions and idolatries of the heathen, and the advancement of their regeneration and salvation, by means of the ministry of evangelical missionaries! This is in accordance with the revealed purpose of God—that idolatry and impurity shall be purged, and "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

JUVENILE FRIARS.

A few miles from Buenos Ayres a woman was busily employed in making a Franciscan friar's dress for her son, two years old; he had been unwell; and during his illness the mother vowed to St. Francis, that if he would restore her son to health, she would make him a friar of his order. St. Francis obligingly interfered, and the child recovered; he has now his head shaved, and is only waiting for his frock, cowl, and sandals, to fulfil his mother's vow. In Spain and Portugal I have seen children of all ages dressed as nuns, monks, or friars, in consequence of vows of this kind. Their appearance to strangers is truly ridiculous; and I doubt if even their patron saints would view a number of nuns and friars, from five to ten years of age, playing at leap-frog and other gambols, without thinking it far from creditable.

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. V.—THE MERCY OF GOD.

Mankind have at all times been willing to admit, that much of imperfection and weakness clings to their nature; and when seriously called upon to state the foundation upon which their hopes of eternal happiness are built, are not disposed to deny, that much dependence must be placed on the mercy of Him who is to be their future judge. The revelation which He has made of Himself, and the writings of those men who found their opinions on this revelation, seem most forcibly to imply, that He who possesses every attribute in infinite perfection, takes chief delight in manifesting the immensity of His mercy. Unhappily, however, no attribute of the Deity is more subject to misapprehension than this; the sound of mercy is so sweet to the ears of a guilty sinner, that he will listen to nothing else; and when called upon to bear in mind that there are threatenings in the word of God most awfully denounced against sin and all uncleanness, he quiets his rising fears with the consideration that God is merciful.

The object I have in view in the present essay, is to make some few remarks on the real nature of the mercy of God; hoping that by this means I may be able to show some, that the foundation they depend upon for acceptance in the sight of God is frail and insecure; while at the same time we shall discover, that the broad canopy of mercy the Deity has erected, is large enough to shelter beneath it every inhabitant of the world. His mercy is higher than the heavens, and broader than the wide expanse of earth.

I. Let us take a scriptural view of the mercy of God.

The correct definition of mercy seems to be, that it is that disposition of mind by which we are excited to pity and relieve those who are in distress, or to pass by their crimes without inflicting punishment upon them.

Unaided by the light of Revelation, human reason could never have attained a correct view of the true nature of God. The deplorable condition of the heathen world, and the wild and absurd system of theology, which even the learned and the philosophic have successively supported, prove that it is quite possible for the same man to understand many mysteries connected with the world in which he lives, and to have many correct opinions in philosophy and science, while at the same time he is deplorably ignorant of the nature and character of the Divine Author of all things. It seems indeed to me impossible, that one ignorant of the immortality of the soul, and the nature of its future destination, could form even a favourable opinion of the Deity; for the many cases which occur of oppressed virtue and successful villany, would argue that God was unmindful of His creatures, or that He did not possess either the power or the will to uphold the best and most virtuous of mankind against the attacks of their malicious enemies. It was left, therefore, for that system, whereby light and immortality are brought to light, fully to vindicate the Divine government; and, therefore, the greater part of my remarks will have reference to the gospel of Jesus Christ.

1. Mercy is an essential perfection of the Divine nature. Misery and wretchedness have the power of calling forth the pity of human creatures; and when we behold complicated sorrows endured by some unfortunate being, we feel disposed to exert the utmost of our power in relieving these distresses. In the Deity, however, this attribute is the expression of his wise and deliberate determination, guided by infinite wisdom. Every declaration of scripture in which this attribute is referred to, maintains that it is absolutely and essentially a part of the nature of the Deity, insomuch that God could as soon cease to exist as cease to be merciful. The inference from this doctrine to which we should attend, is, that the mercy of God can never be exercised without the concurrence of His other attributes; while, at the same time, it no less proves that mercy and truth may meet together. It seems to me that much importance is attached to these considerations; for I conceive that if it could be proved, that the mercy of God is merely a disposition of mind occasioned by exterior circumstances, there is but little ground for sinners to place their confidence in it. That justice is an attribute of Deity none can doubt: is there not then every reason to suppose that the inexorable demands of this infinite perfection of the Deity would sway His conduct more forcibly than all the prayers we could put up, if it were not that His mercy is as much disposed to save sinners, as His justice is to punish them? Let us hear the description which Jehovah gives of Himself, "The Lord, the Lord God merciful and gracious, long suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty." Now you will observe, that in this passage, the unbounded mercy of the Almighty is represented as compatible with His justice: in short, it is clear from this quotation, that God possesses the ability "to punish sin, and at the same time forgive the sinner." How this could be effected will hereafter be shown.

Now, from the remarks above made, I think it appears that the misery of the creature is not the cause of the mercy of God. This attribute of the Deity existed before man had sinned, and, consequently, before there was any need for its manifestation; and all that the misery of man has done is to furnish an object upon which mercy can work. Neither is it any merit or deserving in the human species which has been effectual in rendering God favourable towards them; for all the misery which man endures has been occasioned by sin, and thus all possibility of claim on the part of the sufferer is quite done away. Neither was it the death of Christ which made God merciful. Unhappily, there are many who entertain false and repulsive views of God the Father, on the supposition that nothing could move Him to stretch forth the hand of mercy to His suffering creatures, but the death of Christ. The contrary of this is the truth. Our blessed Saviour, before He left the mansions of eternity and assumed the form of man, had conferred with His Father on the subject of man's redemption, and had offered to work out an atonement for his sins, and open a channel for mercy to flow to the rebel tribes of earth. Now there was not the slightest necessity for God to accept this sacrifice and offer of His Son; and it was, therefore, nothing but mercy, and that in its greatest and mightiest manifestation, which could induce Him to listen to the proposals of a propitiation, and to suffer those proposals to be carried into effect at so dreadful a price as the sufferings of His own Son. Had not God been disposed to be merciful, had He not longed to receive His long-lost children back again to His paternal embraces, had He not desired that the banner of unbounded loving-kindness should float over the rebellious regions of earth, He would never have consented to the death of His Son, and would have told Him, when making preparations to descend upon this world of ours, that all His labour and sufferings would be of no avail. Adore then the mercy of God, not merely as a disposition of mind, given rise to by some exterior cause, but as an inherent and inseparable attribute of His nature.

2. Moreover, when contemplating the mercy of God, we should be careful to bear in mind, that it could only be exercised on miserable beings. Those bright and glorious angels who surround the throne of God, and tune their golden harps to notes of never-ending praise, were never the subjects of God's mercy. Spotless and pure as when first they proceeded from the hand of their Creator, He has ever looked on them with the benignant smile of eternal goodness. The joyful anthems of the morning stars, and those shoutings of the sons of God, which resounded through all the celestial regions when the Deity contemplated the structure of the universe, and declared His production to be very good, were far different from the songs of the angelic choir when the birth of the Redeemer was the subject of their verse. In the former case, joy was occasioned by the new fields of delight opened by the goodness of the Deity, and the display of His unbounded benevolence, which took pleasure in creating new forms of beings, in order that He might make the channels of happiness flow farther and wider; but in the latter, it was peace that had to be declared to beings who had long been at enmity with their Maker, it was good-will that had to be announced to those who had no reason to expect any thing but the pouring forth of Divine indignation. Well, therefore, did the angels declare that their message was good tidings of great joy, which should be to all people. Most probably, therefore, some distinction will be made in the abodes of blessedness, between the happiness of those who never sinned, and that of those whose only title to a place around the throne of God is the blood of a Redeemer; and though doubtless the pure and spotless inhabitants of heaven will join with the redeemed in magnifying the inconceivably great mercy of God, yet their feelings on the subject must in a great degree be different from ours. We are too apt to confound the mercy of God with His goodness and benevolence; and it seems to me that the only way to secure ourselves from error, is perpetually to keep in mind, that mercy is manifested only in connection with misery, superinduced by disobedience and guilt.

LONGEVITY OF THE ANCIENTS AND MODERNS.

"Were the years of the patriarchs, Adam, Methuselah, and Noah, equal to those by which we now compute our time?"

Inconsiderate persons have repeatedly objected to the statements of the Holy Scriptures, relating to the longevity of the antediluvian patriarchs. Such objections are unreasonable and without foundation. As we cannot imagine that our Correspondent is a sceptic, but a sincere inquirer after the truth, we have great pleasure in devoting a column to his inquiry.

The years of the patriarchs before the Deluge were doubtless not lunar, but solar, as accurately calculated, it is probable, as our computation of time. Should any one imagine that they were lunar years by which the patriarchs computed their time, he will suppose that Enoch became father of Methuselah when he was less than six years old, and several of the others mentioned by Moses in Gen. v, which we presume will render the apparent difficulty still greater.

Moses states, that many, whose names he gives, lived before the Deluge to the age of between 900 and 1000 years. Nor is this in the least unreasonable to suppose, when the world was to be peopled by only a single human pair. It seems perfectly rational that the Creator would ordain, that many at least should live in health and vigour to so great an age. Such is the tradition of the most ancient nations, as well as the testimony of Moses. Josephus, the Jewish historian, says on this subject, "Let no one, upon comparing the lives of the ancients with our lives, and with the few years which we now live, think that what we have said of them is false; or make the shortness of our lives at present an argument, that neither did they attain to so long a duration of life; for those ancients were beloved of God, and (lately) made by God himself; and because their food was then fitter for the prolongation of life, they might well live so great a number of years; and besides, God afforded them a longer life on account of their virtue, and the good use they made of it in astronomical and geometrical discoveries, which would not have afforded the time of foretelling [the periods of the stars] unless they had lived six hundred years; for the Great Year is completed in that interval. Now I have for witnesses to what I have said, all those that have written Antiquities, both among the Greeks and Barbarians; for even Manetho, who wrote the Egyptian History, and Berosus, who collected the Chaldean Monuments, and Mochus, and Hestiæus, and besides these Hieronymus the Egyptian, and those who composed the Phœnician history, agree to what I say; Hesiod also, and Hecatæus, Hellanicus, and Acusilaus, and besides these, Ephorus and Nicolaus, relate that the ancients lived a thousand years."

On these authors cited by Josephus, Dr. Collyer, in his "Lectures on Scripture Facts," remarks, "These men either were in possession of traditions relating to this fact, or they borrowed them from Moses: and in either case our purpose is answered. For, if they received them from prevalent traditions, it will be granted that these traditions had originally some foundation in fact; and they correspond with the sacred history. But if they borrowed them from Moses, two points are gained on our part. It is proved that such a man as Moses did really exist; that his writings were then extant; that they were in substance what they now are; and that they bear an antiquity more remote than these, which are allowed to be the most ancient of the heathen writers. It is proved further, that his history was highly esteemed, and that it was supposed by these writers to contain facts. Whether they drew from Moses or from tradition; either way, the Mosaic account of these early ages is corroborated by the oldest fragments of antiquity."

Immediately after the Deluge, when there were only three couples to stock the world, their age was reduced, and none of those patriarchs, but Shem, arrived at 500. In the second century we find none that reached 240; and in the third none but Terah lived 200 years. The world, or part of it at least, was by that time so well peopled that they had built cities, and they were cantoned out into distant nations. By degrees, as the number of people increased, their longevity dwindled, till it was reduced to the average of about 70 or 80 years, about 3500 years ago, in the time of Moses. Abraham lived 175 years; Isaac 180; Jacob 147; Joseph 110; Moses 120; Joshua 110.

Human life during the last 3000 years has continued about the same as in the time of Moses; and instances are found even in the British Isles, of those whose term of life considerably exceeded his years.

"From the list of births and deaths published by the synod in St. Petersburgh, it appears, that in 1825 there died eight hundred and forty-eight persons above 100 years of age, thirty-two above 120, four between 125 and 130, and four between 130 and 135 years of age."

A recent St. Petersburgh Gazette states, that there is living near Polosk, on the frontiers of Lithuania, a man named Demtarius Crabowski, who is now 168 years old. This Russian Methuselah has always led the humble but tranquil life of a shepherd, assisted by his two sons, the eldest of whom, Paul, is 120, and the younger, Anatole, 97 years old.

THE SACRIFICE OF BREAD AND WINE.

The ancients held the oblation of the Eucharist to be answerable in some respects to the legal sacrifices: they believed that our Saviour ordained the Sacrament as a rite of prayer and praise to Almighty God, instead of the manifold and bloody sacrifices of the law; that as the legal sacrifices were types and shadows of the great Sacrifice on the cross, and had a relation to Christ that was to come; so the Christian sacrifice of bread and wine looks back, and has a relation to Christ that was crucified. There was also among the Jews an ancient tradition, as has been observed by learned men, that in the time of the Messiah all sacrifices should cease but that of Bread and Wine.—Nelson's Christian Sacrifice.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXX.

On Pronunciation and Reading.

Dear Madam,

THE subjects of this Letter are connected with those observations upon grammar which you lately received from me; for as grammar is the science which teaches to write our language correctly, so lessons upon pronunciation and reading teach the correct mode of uttering it.

And first with regard to pronunciation, it is requisite that some standard should be acknowledged. The standard which persons have agreed upon, is the way in which words are called in the court of any nation, upon the supposition that the court is an assemblage of the classes of society who are best educated. Still it is plain that the highest class among the courtiers themselves, that is, those whose education has been most liberal, and which has comprehended a due attention to this subject, should be regarded as the standard; it being no uncommon thing to hear provincial accent, and even provincial pronunciation, from some persons who would certainly be included among the general name of the court.

The next standard is the mode of pronouncing our language adopted by members of the learned professions. Still, as the same provincial varieties may often be heard even from these persons, the same limitation is applicable to them also, as to those orders constituting the standard previously alluded to.

If a written authority be required, perhaps Walker's Pronouncing Dictionary may be considered as embracing a pronunciation sanctioned by the greatest number of the most approved speakers, and freer than any similar work from fancy and caprice.

The perfection of pronunciation is then only attained by a speaker, when it is impossible for the most discriminating and practised ear to tell by his mode of speaking in what county he was educated. This, however, is a most rare acquisition.

In this as in most other respects, you are the model which your child will imitate. In proportion then as you are attentive to the subject, will be the purity of your child's pronunciation. Nor will you deem the subject unworthy of much attention: you are aware, that the higher we ascend in the scale of excellence in this respect, the more beautiful are our tones, and the more musical are our words.

Besides, the cultivation of refinement in any branch of education or knowledge, has a reflex action upon the mind, rendering its mode of thinking exact, and communicating an exalted state of feeling to all those inward perceptions, with whose purity and correctness even rectitude of heart itself is not remotely connected.

A loose, slovenly, inaccurate method of pronouncing our words, is generally the index to a similar state of our mental perceptions. One of the multitude of excellent maxims to be found in the Apocryphal Books is the following: "A man's language, dress, and gait, show what he is." In whatever station your child is to move, if he were to be a menial servant, he will find even a worldly advantage in having been habituated to a correct pronunciation of his native language. It will infallibly be recognized by all classes around him. His inferiors will treat him with the respect which the lower orders instinctively pay to superior education: his equals will feel him worthy of their respect: while his superiors, from the same cause, will feel a greater interest in his welfare. He will be able to present himself, as it is called, to persons of every class, without that feeling of conscious inferiority, which multitudes have experienced to be the bane of their happiness and success.

The rules for a correct pronunciation are few and simple.

1st. Let attention be paid to your child's pronunciation and your own, that no provincialism of accent clings to the vowels. It is in the proper enunciation of the vowels, whether single or in combination, that purity of speech greatly consists.

2dly. Let every letter of a word have its due pronunciation, as distinctly though not so prolonged, as it would have in the recital of the alphabet.

3dly. Let the letters, whether vowels or consonants, which terminate a word, be distinctly pronounced.

Closely connected with pronunciation is reading, upon which you will perhaps allow me to offer you a few observations.

Books abound with a variety of directions as to the art of reading well, and dilate considerably upon tone, emphasis, pronunciation, manner, &c. All these rules, however, appear to me to be practically comprehended under the following, which are all that are necessary to be attended to, at least during the first years of education.

1st. Endeavour to communicate the habit to your child of reading slowly. This rule is exhibited in those well-known words:

> "Learn to read slow: all other graces
> Will follow in their proper places."

The philosophy of this rule is this: that under the method of reading slow, there is time for the reader to remember and to keep in view all the other directions as to good reading with which his mind has been furnished. Besides which it is to be remembered, that reading has reference to other persons rather than to the reader himself. The use of the eyes is all that is needful to the solitary reader; but as reading aloud has regard to other persons, who may be situate at distances more or less remote from the reader, the habit recommended in those lines is the best adapted that can be imagined to secure his being heard and understood of them all. This rule, of course, ought not to be carried to an extreme; nor will it, if the following be attended to in conjunction with it, namely,— 2dly. That the reader, whatever may be the composition which he is to enunciate, should make it his first and most imperative rule, to understand most thoroughly what he is about to read to others; — then let him put himself into the mental attitude (so to speak) of the writer; and the more he observes these two rules, and the more he disregards all attention to tone and manner, the more natural, and therefore the more pleasing and forcible will his manner become.

Observe too most carefully to instil into your pupil's mind, that he is to transfer his mode in conversing into his reading. Never, under any circumstances, allow him to believe, that an assumed manner can be half as good as that which is natural to him. Thoroughly disgust him with the idea of putting on a different manner when he is about to read, from what he would have in conversation on the same subject. Let it be your cardinal rule with him, that the more truly natural he can be, the more truly excellent his manner will become. Let him however be taught not to think about being natural. He will become unnatural, if he strives to be natural. The best plan, for him and for every one, in reading, is not to think at all about manner, but to begin; — to force, to cultivate, to affect nothing. If he should not succeed, it is because his mind is not so active as at other times: he is tired, sleepy, out of health, &c. &c. He will do better at another time, when these circumstances are different.

ILLUSTRATION OF JOB IX, 33.

"Neither is there any daysman betwixt us."

"MARIANNE" has imposed on us a very agreeable task in soliciting an explanation of this significant passage in the book of Job: and we beg to assure her, that we shall have great pleasure in complying with the wishes of our readers, and especially of young persons, in affording illustrations of difficult texts of the Holy Scriptures.

The remarkable word in this verse means an umpire, arbitrator, or mediator; and the ancient Greek translation adopts the word mediator. Many truly pious readers of the Bible, ignorant of Greek, in meeting with this passage, would think only of Jesus Christ, our blessed and almighty Daysman, the only "Mediator between God and man;" and such an ingenious application would be not only harmless to the individual, but might be the means of much spiritual enlargement and delight. That afflicted saint, however, did not complain, "Neither is there any daysman betwixt me and GOD." Divine teaching had graciously prepared him to say, "I know that my Redeemer liveth;" and thus he could rejoice in the soul-inspiring fact, that there was a DAYSMAN betwixt him and God; so that his infinite holiness, his inflexible justice, and his terrible majesty, did not overwhelm him in guilty despair.

Fully to understand the meaning of Job, and clearly to perceive the beauty of the passage, it will be necessary to consider the condition of the venerable sufferer, and the peculiarity of his circumstances.

Job was an extraordinary character, designed for the instruction of the world: his wisdom, piety, and uprightness, equally with his elevation in society and his riches, had been celebrated throughout the East; but a sudden stroke of a mysterious providence had stripped him of his property, bereaved him of his children, and plunged him into the depth of personal affliction. His noble and pious friends, respectable chiefs of Arab clans, came to minister to their esteemed superior the balm of consolation: but on witnessing his calamities, they were struck with astonishment, and in their fleshly wisdom rashly concluded that their venerable friend must have been a hypocrite—a deceiver—a wicked man: they therefore severely reproach him, and urge him to seek reconciliation with God by immediate and sincere repentance.

Eliphaz, the elder, commences the uncharitable attack upon the sincerity and integrity of the afflicted saint. Job answers the accusations in an address apparently sufficient to soften and melt the hardest heart: but Bildad continues the censure, with an equal or increased measure of severity. Job replies to Bildad in a most instructive speech, in which he expresses the most exalted ideas of the infinite purity and glorious majesty of God; so that no creature, or creature holiness, could stand before him, or be pure in his sight. "For he is not a man as I am," says this humble saint: he is a spirit, infinite, eternal, immutable, invisible, holy, just, and true; but I am dust and ashes, a feeble, worthless, sinful mortal. It cannot therefore be imagined "that I should answer him, and we should come together in judgment. Neither is there any daysman between us, that might lay his hand upon us both."

Job is here not speaking of the grand affair of eternal salvation, respecting which he entertained no doubt: he knew that his state was safe, having an interest in his living Redeemer, his glorious Mediator. But he referred to the present dispensation of providence, and the clearing of his character for innocency and uprightness to the satisfaction of his friends. And since God did not judge it proper, at least for a time, to change the scene, there was no one to interpose in his favour; and it was in vain and criminal to contend with God. This passage is rendered in Greek, "O that there were a mediator between us;" and this favour was granted, for the honour of God, for the benefit of Job, for the reproof of his mistaken friends, and for the edification of the church of God in all ages.

Elihu seems to refer to this expression of Job, chap. xxxiii, 6, 7; where he invites the attention of the afflicted patriarch to listen to his observations. We beg to recommend our readers to consider the character and language of Elihu in illustration of this passage.

Herodotus, the most ancient uninspired historian, mentions a custom among the Arabians, which is thought to have been common in the time of Job. He says: "When they enter into covenant with each other, another man stands in the midst of both, and with a sharp stone cuts the inside of the hands of the covenanters near the larger fingers, and then takes a piece out of each of their garments, and anoints with the blood seven stones that lie between them; and whilst he is doing this calls upon a deity; and when finished the covenant-maker goes with his friends to an host or citizen, if the affair is transacted with a citizen; and the friends reckon it a righteous thing to keep a covenant."

GRAND SCENERY OF PERU.

PERHAPS there is not in the world more singular and extraordinary scenery, than what I passed through to-day for forty or fifty miles. One of the places where I changed horses appeared as if enclosed in an immense volcano, at the bottom of which the road lay, and in its serpentine turning in the valley no opening appeared either before or behind; all round was a rampart of rocky mountain of most fantastic form, sometimes awfully impending over our heads, sometimes rising in craggy turrets to the clouds, grand, terrible, and sublime: the whole presenting indubitable attestation of some dreadful convulsion of nature, either of violent volcanic action, or of a resistless flood of waters that had swept over the face of the earth at some remote period, either at the formation of the world, or at the time of the universal deluge. Either or both of these events must have contributed to produce the chaos which there existed. "Yet it is with astonishment we reflect, that a work of such apparent disorder and desolation should produce objects of the grandest character of beauty, and become sources of the sublimest sentiment to mankind." So says the author of the "Comparative Estimate of the Mineral and Mosaical Geologies;" and it is in truth impossible to view these astounding productions of nature without entering into the feelings of that learned writer. And there is no man who views the creative wisdom and power of Almighty God in the wonders of nature in this portion of the globe, where they are represented in a majesty of character so peculiarly imposing, but will readily subscribe to the opinions of that writer, "that the earth derives a far sublimer and more profoundly stamped moral physiognomy from its inanimate features, its naked spires of granite, and its awful tokens of convulsions and revolutions, than it can possibly derive from all the united productions and memorials which man's power has yet been able to achieve."—Travels in various parts of Peru.

REMARKABLE ANECDOTE OF THE REV. JOHN ROGERS.

(Concluded.)

MRS. TOOLY listened with uncommon attention to Mr. Rogers's story, and when he had ended it, said, "And are you that Mr. Rogers's son?" He told her he was: upon which she replied, "Well, long as I have been acquainted with you, I never knew that before: and now I will tell you something which you do not know: I was the very little girl your dear father blessed in the manner you have related; and it made an impression upon me which I never could forget." Upon this double discovery, Mr. Rogers and Mrs. Tooly felt themselves bound to each other by an additional tie of affection; and then he and Mr. Bradbury expressed a desire to know how she, who had been brought up in an aversion from the Dissenters, and to real religion, now manifested such an attachment to both. Upon which she cheerfully gave them the following narrative.

After her grandfather's death she became sole heiress to his estate, which was considerable. Being in the bloom of youth, and having none to control her, she ran into all the fashionable diversions of the age, without any restraint. But she confessed that when the pleasurable scenes were over, she found a dissatisfaction both with them and herself, that always struck a damp to her heart. Having contracted some slight illness, she thought she would go to Bath, especially as she heard it was a place for pleasure and diversion, as well as health. When she came thither, she was providentially led to consult an apothecary who was a very worthy and religious man. When he inquired what ailed her, she answered, "Why, Doctor, I don't ail much as to my body, but I have an uneasy mind, that I cannot get rid of." "Truly, Miss," said he, "I was so till I met with a certain book, and that cured me." "Books!" said she, "I get all the books I can lay my hands on; all the plays, novels, and romances I hear of; but after I have read them my uneasiness is unabated." "That may be, Miss," said he, "and I don't wonder at it. But as to this book I speak of, I can say of it what I can say of no other I ever read, that I never tire in reading it, but can read it again and again as if I had never read it before; and always find something new in it." "Pray, Doctor, what book is that?" "Nay, Miss," answered he, "that is a secret I do not tell every one." "But could I not get a sight of that book?" said she. "Yes," replied he, "if you speak me fair, I can help you to a sight of it." "Pray then get it me, Doctor, and I'll give you any thing you please." "Yes," said he, "if you will promise me one thing, I will bring it you; and that is, that you will read it over carefully, and if you should not see much in it at first, that you will give it a second reading." She promised faithfully that she would. After coming two or three times without it, to raise her curiosity, he at last took it out of his pocket and gave it to her.

This book was the New Testament. When she looked at it, she said, with a flirt, "Poh! I could get this at any time." "Why, Miss, so you might; but remember, I have your solemn promise to read it through carefully." "Well," said she, "though I never read it before, I will give it a reading." Accordingly she began to read it, and soon felt herself much interested. She saw something in it wherein she had a deep concern; but her mind now became ten times more uneasy than ever. Not knowing what to do, she returned to London, resolved to try again what the diversions there would do to dissipate her gloom. Nothing, however, of this kind succeeded. She lived at the Court end of the town, and had with her a female companion.

One Saturday night she had a remarkable dream, which was, that she was in a place of worship where she heard a sermon, of which, however, when she awoke she could recollect nothing but the text. Still, this dream made a deep impression on her mind; particularly as the idea she retained of the place and the minister's person, was as strong as if she had been long acquainted with both. On the Lord's day morning she told her dream to her companion, and said, that after breakfast she was resolved to go in quest of the place, though she should go from one end of London to the other. They accordingly set out, and went into several churches as they passed along, but none of them resembled the place she saw in her dream. About one o'clock they found themselves in the heart of the city, where they dined, and set out again in search of this place of worship.

Being in the Poultry about half-past two, they saw a great number of people going down the Old Jewry, and she resolved to see where they went. She mingled with the company, and they conducted her to the meeting-house in that street, where Mr. Shower was then minister. As soon as she entered the place, she turned to her companion, and with some emotion said, "This is the very place I saw in my dream." In a short time she saw Mr. Shower ascend the pulpit, when with still greater emotion she said, "That is the very man I saw in my dream; and if every part of it hold true, he will take for his text Psalm cxvi, 7, 'Return unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee.'" When he rose up to pray, she was all attention, and every sentence went to her heart. Having concluded his prayer, he took for his text the very passage she had mentioned; and God was pleased to make the discourse founded upon it, the means of her saving conversion; and thus she at last found what she had so long sought elsewhere in vain, rest to her soul. And now she obtained that blessing from God, the fountain of felicity, which pious Mr. Rogers, so many years before, had so solemnly and so fervently implored on her behalf.

The above extraordinary narrative was communicated by the late Mr. Davidson of Braintree, to Mr. Arch. Wallace, merchant at Edinburgh, Oct. 12, 1767, authenticated by the well-known and respected Dr. Wood, of Norwich. The venerable Dr. Erskine printed it in a volume of Letters, chiefly addressed to the afflicted. It was also published some years ago in a pamphlet, by the late eminent Mr. Decourcy.

REPROOF OF A SURGEON TO A PROFANE PATIENT.

MR. MEIKLE, late a surgeon in Carnwath, Scotland, being called to a gentleman who had been stung in the face by a wasp or bee, found him very impatient, and swearing wrathfully under his pain. "Oh, Doctor!" said he, "I am in great torment; can you any way help?" "Don't fear," says Mr. Meikle, "all will be over in a little." The gentleman still persisting in his curses and oaths, Mr. Meikle became quite uneasy, and wished to reprove him; "I see nothing," says the Doctor, "only it might have been in a better place." "Where might it have been?" asks the gentleman; "Why, my good friend, on the tip of your tongue."

THE JEW.

Suggested by Rembrandt's celebrated Picture in the National Gallery.

Viewing those lines so finely wrought,
What character, what truth we trace,
What room for deep, sublimest thought,
As we behold in this one face
A nation's destiny and name,
And all that can our faith confirm,
Jehovah and his truth proclaim,
While we to distant times return;

And by the Holy Spirit led,
(For what without His help are we?)
To read the history of the dead,
Search out those times of mystery,
When mighty miracles were wrought
Among the nations by His hand:
Jehovah then His people brought
By cloud and fire, through sea and land.

Among their leaders we may trace
Names, which our northern boasted clime,
To that renown'd and favour'd race,
Are as eternity to time,—
Are as the gourd to that proud tree
Which wav'd on Lebanon of yore:
What, Europe — British Isles — are ye,
To Western Asia's sacred shore?

Names that ascend to those high times
When He the mercy-seat would shake,
Reminding Israel of their crimes,
Or them into communion take.
Names, which their splendour have deriv'd,
Not from the fount of this world's springs;
But at their honours they arriv'd
By mandate of the King of kings.

Yes, they that awful voice have heard,
Which bade them to the mount draw near,
While one, obedient to His word,
Ascended to its tops in fear:
There he remain'd in pious awe,
While God proclaim'd His sacred name!
There he receiv'd the holy law!
This was the house of Israel's fame.

Such were the chiefs of Judah's line,
But such, alas! they are no more:
Now trampled down in every clime,
Like reeds beneath the tempest's roar.
And why is Judah thus disgrac'd?
Why does the house of Israel mourn?
Why is that dear and favour'd race
Condemn'd to this world's jest and scorn.

It is because their King came down,
According to the promise made;
But not in power and proud renown;
Born of a humble Jewish maid.
They quite mistook His works and claims:
They knew him not; they slew their Prince;
Though high in glory now He reigns,
They have been slaves and wand'rers since.

Present they are in every land,
But yet they find a home in none;
Known by the ingot in their hand,
The highest state to which they come.
With every country intermix'd,
Yet separate, alone, in each;
They are not lost, they are not fix'd;
A lesson to each heart they teach.

A Jew! how can we hear the name —
A Jew! how can we pass him by —
Without reflecting on the fame
Of that lov'd nation's history?
Without anticipations bright,
Which future times must yet reveal; —
On which the prophets cast a light,
But Judah's Lion shall unseal;
Restoring to their ancient place
That once renown'd and favour'd race?

A COMPANION FOR THE SEASON OF MATERNAL SOLICITUDE;

With an Appendix, containing Hints for the Nursery. By Thomas Searle, of Stony Stratford, Author of "An English Grammar in Verse." pp. 224. 18mo. cloth, Second Edition.

"Maternal Solicitude" has been unaccountably disregarded or forgotten to a surprising extent, by our pious and gifted authors. This cannot have been from want of affection, as many of our most interesting writers on devotional subjects are known to have been among the most worthy examples of conjugal tenderness. We will not attempt to assign a reason for the neglect of maternal claims, but offer our sincere thanks to Mr. Searle for the valuable manual which he has presented to the public. In our judgment, he has entitled himself to the gratitude of the whole Christian community, and we can only express our desire that it may become known in a degree equal to its merits.

THE PATH OF LIFE.

This mortal life, of few and feverish days,
Time hurries on, — of every ill the cure:
Bear then its yoke and chain, and still endure,
In spirit mourning, but with lips of praise;
For thou art taught, through dark and dangerous ways,
A Saviour's hand will lead thy footsteps sure:
So wrap thy heart within His mantle pure;
Lean on his cross, a staff that none betrays;
Awake thy spirit from the dream of death
That bound it trembling to its native dust;
Gird on thy strength of faith, in holy trust
Warming thy being in immortal breath;
And shun "the broad way," that the King of kings
May keep thee 'neath His own almighty wings.

READING OF THE LAW IN THE JEWISH SYNAGOGUE.

HISTORIC NOTICES OF THE JEWISH SYNAGOGUE.

EWISH ANTIQUITIES constitute one of the most valuale branches of human learning. They include the istoms of the true worshippers of God, and relate to stitutions both of human and divine appointment in ie earliest ages of the world. Our readers, we preime, are all most deeply interested in the writings f the New Testament, and the life and ministry f our blessed Saviour: to them, therefore, some count of the Jewish Synagogue cannot fail to be lifying.

Synagogue is from the Greek Συναγωγη, which, with ie corresponding word in Hebrew, properly signifies a ngregation. It is of the same import as the word iurch, which invariably in the Scriptures denotes a ongregation. But as the word church in modern mes, so with the Jews the word synagogue, was ommonly applied to the building in which the congreition assembled.

The synagogue was generally erected in an eligible tuation, and fitted up with suitable conveniences, especially a pulpit or desk for the minister. The women were seated in a gallery inclosed with lattice-work, where they could see and hear without being seen.

At what period of the Jewish history synagogues were first erected cannot be determined. Some suppose they were used while the temple of Solomon was standing, and even in the times of the Judges. Prideaux, Stackhouse, and others, think there were no such buildings before the captivity: but that some places of public worship and religious instruction existed, besides the temple of Solomon, we have certain evidence: for on the burning of that splendid edifice, B. C. 588, the inspired prophet Asaph complains of the savage fierceness of the Babylonians, and their dreadful ravages, destroying their synagogues: "They have cast fire into thy sanctuary; they have defiled by casting down the dwelling-place of thy name to the ground. They said in their hearts, Let us destroy them together: they have burnt up all the synagogues of God in the land." Psalm lxxiv, 7, 8.

Dispersed in foreign countries, the Jews became more thoughtful of their religious privileges, and more zealous in seeking divine instruction. They assembled in private houses for religious conference and worship; and, where they could obtain license, they erected meeting-houses for their accommodation. On their re-establishment in Canaan after their return from Babylon, and especially after the reformation under Ezra and Nehemiah, these buildings became common. In after-ages, when Alexander the Great induced 100,000 Jews to settle in his newly-erected city, Alexandria in Egypt, with privileges both civil and religious equal to his native Greeks, they built a most magnificent edifice, concerning which the Jews were accustomed to say, "Whosoever hath not seen the great synagogue at Alexandria, hath not seen the glory of Israel."

In the time of our Saviour's ministry, there were twelve synagogues in Tiberias, a city of Galilee, and no less than four hundred and eighty in Jerusalem; besides many in different parts of Canaan, as intimated in the New Testament. In the Acts of the Apostles, we find mention made of synagogues of the Jews in many distant cities, which were visited by the apostolic missionaries.

By the Jewish polity, a synagogue might be erected in any place where there were ten Batelnim—persons of mature age and free condition, who had leisure to attend to divine service daily; as ten persons, according to the Jews, were a congregation. Our blessed Lord appears to allude to the smallness of a synagogue, or church, in his declaration, "For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them," Matt. xviii, 20. Any person, even a Gentile, might build a synagogue; and thus we find that a Roman centurion is commended by the Jews: "He loveth our nation, and hath built us a synagogue." Luke vii, 5.

Over the door of these buildings was such an inscription as—"This is the gate of the Lord, into which the righteous shall enter;" and upon the walls within were written such sentences as—"Remember thy Creator"—"Keep thy foot, when thou goest into the house of God"—"Silence is commendable in the time of prayer"—"Prayers without attention are like a body without a soul."

1. Prayers were the first part of the service of the synagogue. Originally it appears that their devotional exercises were extemporaneous, as all the prayers mentioned in the Scriptures were; but in the time of our Saviour they had prescribed forms. Dr. Prideaux says, "Their prayers at first were very few; but since they are increased into a very large bulk, which makes their synagogue service very long and tedious; and the rubric, by which they regulate it, is very perplexed and intricate, and encumbered with many rites and ceremonious observances; in all which they equal, if not exceed, both the superstition and the length of the popish service. The most solemn part of their prayers are those which they call 'Shemoneth Eshreh,' that is, the eighteen prayers. These, they say, were composed and instituted by Ezra and the Great Synagogue; and to them Rabbi Gamaliel, a little before the destruction of Jerusalem, added the nineteenth, against the Christians." The learned Doctor remarks: "It must be acknowledged, that some of these prayers seem to have been composed after the destruction of Jerusalem."—"Our Saviour found fault with their prayers for being too long in his time. (Matt. xxiii, 14; Luke xx, 47.) Many additions in their liturgies have made them much more so since."

2. Reading the Scriptures constituted another part of the synagogue service. The Shema, the Law, and the Prophets, were the divisions of the sacred books. The Shema consists of three portions of Scripture: the first is from the beginning of the fourth verse of the sixth chapter of Deuteronomy to the end of the ninth verse; the second from the thirteenth verse of the eleventh chapter to the end of the twenty-first verse; and the third, from the thirty-seventh verse of the fifteenth chapter of Numbers to the end. And because the first of these portions in the Hebrew Bible begins with the word Shema, i. e. "hear," they call the three together the Shema, and the reading of them "Kiriath Shema," that is, the reading of the Shema.

Besides the Shema, the Five Books of Moses were read on the Sabbath, they having been divided into so many portions for the year. After the dispersion under Antiochus, king of Syria, so many sections of the Prophets were read instead; and when the Maccabees had restored the true worship, both were retained, the Law for the first lesson, and the Prophets for the second. Hence we understand the order of the service, as mentioned Acts xiii, 15, in the synagogue at Antioch, when "after the reading of the Law and the Prophets, the rulers of the synagogue sent unto" Paul and Barnabas, to exhort the people.

3. The Exposition of the Scriptures, and Preaching, formed part of the Jewish service. Expounding the Scriptures, according to Prideaux, "was performed at the time of the reading of them," and preaching "after the reading both of the Law and the Prophets was over. It is plain Christ taught the Jews in their synagogues both these ways." Stackhouse justly remarks, "After that the Hebrew language had ceased to be the mother-tongue of the Jews, and the Chaldee grew up into use instead of it, the custom of the synagogue was, that one should first read a paragraph of the Scriptures to the people in the Hebrew tongue, and then another interpreted it in the Chaldee, which they better understood. And this seems to suggest the reason why those sections of Scripture came to be divided into verses, viz. that by this means the reader might certainly know how much he was to read, and the interpreter how much he was to interpret, at every interval."

Dr. Prideaux's observations contain an edifying comment on Luke iv, 16, &c. "When Jesus came to Nazareth, his own city, he was called out, as a member of that synagogue, to read the Hapterah, that is, the section or lesson out of the Prophets which was to be read that day. And when he had stood up and read it, he sat down and expounded it, as was the usage of the Jews in both these cases. For out of reverence to the Law and the Prophets, they stood up when they did read any portion out of either; and, in regard to themselves as teachers, they sat when they expounded. But in all other synagogues, of which he was not a member, when he entered into them (as he always did every Sabbath-day wherever he was), he taught the people in sermons, after the reading of the Law and the Prophets was over. And so St. Paul taught the Jews in their synagogue at Antioch in Pisidia; for there it is expressly said, in the sacred text, that his preaching was after the reading of the Law and the Prophets was ended."

"From what has been said," as Stackhonse remarks, "it appears that the ministration of the synagogue-service was not confined to the sacerdotal order; for the priests were consecrated only for the service of the temple, which was widely different from this, as consisting chiefly in the offering up of sacrifices and oblations; but to this in the synagogue, any one that by learning was qualified for it was admitted. Only, for the preservation of order, there were in every synagogue some fixed officers, whose business it was to take care that all religious duties were therein decently performed.

4. Officers of the Synagogue.—The rulers of the synagogue, of whom we frequently read (Mark v, 22; xiii, 9), appear to have been trustees of the property, and managers of the general affairs of the places of worship. The "minister (Luke iv, 20) of the synagogue, whose business it was to offer up to God the public prayers of the congregation, and being for this purpose delegated as it were by them to God, is therefore, in the Hebrew language, called 'Sheliach Zibber,' i. e. the angel of the church, or congregation; from whence the name of the bishops of the seven churches, mentioned in the Revelations, is manifestly borrowed." Besides this angel of the church, each synagogue had its "Chazanim," or deacons, whose business was to take care of the books and sacred utensils of the house of God. And, if need were, an interpreter was hired for a salary, to recite the Chaldee lessons, as they were read in Hebrew to the congregation.

5. The Times of Public Worship. The ordinary days of worship in the synagogue were Monday, Thursday, and Saturday; learning from Exod. xv, 22, that the soul needs the water of life from the word of God oftener than every three days. Half of the Sabbath lesson they read on the Monday, and the other on the Thursday. On the Sabbath they read the whole, both morning and evening: the latter "for the sake of labourers and artificers, who could not leave their work to attend the synagogues on the week day." Three times a day the synagogue was open for prayers; to which custom, it is thought, Daniel's practice had regard, Dan. vii, 10. On festival days the services commenced earlier, especially in the temple-service.

The rulers of the synagogue were magistrates, and the government which they exercised consisted in punishing the disobedient, and in taking care of the alms. Their censures, excommunications, fines, and scourgings were dreaded: but as the law allowed them to give only forty stripes, they reduced the punishment to thirty-nine, lest they should exceed that number. Paul alludes to this custom, when, enumerating his sufferings, he says, "Of the Jews, five times received I forty stripes save one." 2 Cor. xi, 24. Every synagogue was furnished with two treasury chests, one for donations to their own poor, and another for those to relieve strangers. No beggars were suffered in the land: hence the remarks of the emperor Julian the apostate, in the fourth century, "What a shame is it that we should take no care of our poor, when the Jews suffer no beggars amongst them; and the Galileans (as he called the Christians), impious as they are (so his inveterate malignity led him to characterize them), maintain their own poor, and even ours."

The establishment of public worship in the synagogues, and expounding the Scriptures, after the Babylonish captivity, constituted a new era in the church of God. Before that period, idolatry was the prevailing sin of the Israelites; but, except in a few cases of apostacy, in the times of dreadful persecution, the whole people, down to the time of the advent of Christ, were most determinately set against that dreadfully criminal folly. Besides which, it became necessary for each synagogue to possess a copy of the Holy Scriptures: the frequent reading of them made the people familiar with their divine contents; and, considering how widely the Jews were dispersed, even among the Gentiles, and that their sacred books were translated into different languages for popular use, it appeared to be the most admirable means of preparing the way of the Lord, in making known his gospel of salvation to all nations. This great and useful peculiarity has been adopted as appropriate to Christianity; and the most precious privileges, which any people can possibly enjoy on earth, are ordinances of divine worship as prescribed in the New Testament, and the faithful preaching of the gospel of Jesus Christ. These are mercifully ordained to be enjoyed by all nations; and by these means "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

The Edict of Nantz having secured liberty to the Protestants of France, genuine piety flourished in some of their churches. Many of their pastors were men of eminent learning, orthodoxy, and personal religion; by which they were prepared to endure affliction for the sake of Christ, as well as to rejoice in his salvation. Not a few, however, were men of little acquaintance with experimental godliness. The distinguishing doctrines of the gospel, therefore, as held by the reformers, were slighted, or even denied; and a political worldly spirit was their distinguishing characteristic. The governors of the fortified towns, which the Calvinists were allowed to hold for their security, observing the sleepless malice of the crafty Jesuits, became active in taking measures for their own preservation. This vigilant precaution was magnified by their enemies, and represented as dangerous to the state; on which pretext cruel persecutions and destructive wars were carried on against them, and the barbarities of the sixteenth century were renewed against these Dissenters in France.

They were also characterized by an equal degree of perfidy. The atrocious cruelties exercised upon them, are supposed to have been to an equal or even to, a greater extent. In the former part of the century, under the direction of Cardinal Richlieu, prime minister of Louis XIII, a man of great talents, but an enemy to the reformers worthy of popery, the cautionary towns were taken from the Calvinists. One shameful invasion of their rights succeeded another during the administration of the cardinal: the most inhuman laws, which the blind rage of bigotry could frame, and the most oppressive measures which ingenious malice could devise, were employed to destroy these conscientious dissenters from idolatrous superstition, or to bring them by force under the papal yoke.

After the death of Cardinal Richlieu, the popish bishops, together with the Jesuits, had the principal influence in the cabinet of Louis XIV, and their characteristic zeal rather increased against the Calvinists. Finding their unwearied political intrigues insufficient, they prevailed on the king in 1685, contrary to the most solemn obligations which human or divine laws can frame, to revoke the "Irrevocable Edict of Nantz."

The consequences of the revocation of this celebrated Edict, corresponded to the wickedness of the act itself.

It was intended, by one grand effort, to extirpate the very remembrance of the Protestant profession in France. For this purpose, troops of soldiers were commissioned to accomplish by fire and sword this bloody work, which they proceeded to execute with every species of unheard-of brutality. M. Claude informs us, that they bound some before great fires, and let them go when they were half roasted! They hanged others with ropes under their arms, and plunged them repeatedly into wells of water to drown them! They bound mothers that gave suck to posts, and laid their helpless infants before them, languishing for days and nights, to perish in their sight! Amid hideous cries and blasphemies, they suspended men and women, stripped of their clothes, some by their hair, and others by their feet, and suffocated them with burning hay! After other indignities, they stuck the body with pins and needles from head to foot; and others, being naked, they rolled along the floors, covered with pieces of broken glass. Many, endeavouring to escape these horrid torments, were pursued by the soldiers into the fields and woods, where they were shot like beasts of prey! These scenes of freezing horror were witnessed by many of the popish clergy, who beheld them with sportive laughter and fiend-like exultation.

By these dreadful proceedings Calvinism was not indeed wholly exterminated in France, but the true church was reduced exceedingly low. The preachers and professors had fifteen days allowed them to leave the kingdom; in which time many, eminent for piety and learning, fled and found asylums in Protestant countries. Eight hundred thousand, who were artizans, escaped from the persecutions; many of whom, settling in Spitalfields, London, and in the county of York, contributed greatly by their factories to the wealth and prosperity of England[*].

Perhaps it would be impossible accurately to determine in what degree the manufactures of our country have been benefited through that political blunder of popish bigotry in France: but a remarkable coincidence at that period deserves our present notice. The silk manufacture had but a short period previously been introduced into England; probably by the persecuted French Protestants, who were mostly weavers. The printing of calicoes commenced in England in 1676, and soon after, looms for weaving them were brought over from Holland. But the crowds of French weavers, thus driven from their own country in 1685, finding an asylum in England, by their ingenuity, sobriety, and industry, gave a new impulse to our trade, whilst that of their native country was injured: and by their means, those amazingly extensive branches of English manufacture have contributed greatly to the elevation and opulence of Great Britain.

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. V.—THE MERCY OF GOD.

(Concluded from p. 194.)

3. THIS mercy is exercised through an all-sufficient propitiation. The Divinity of the Son of God seems to be indispensably necessary to the scheme of redemption, and to be proved by every part of it. It was not in the power of any human being, however high his attainments in virtue, to render himself acceptable in the sight of an infinitely holy God; and if no man could deliver his own guilty soul, surely argument is not needed to prove that he could not deliver that of his condemned brother, much less of unnumbered myriads; there must, therefore, have been a distinction between Christ and his brethren according to the flesh, which placed Him at an immeasurable distance above them. But, moreover, as it would not have been consistent with the justice of God himself to create a being fitted to accomplish an atonement, it follows of necessity, that before our Lord assumed the garb of mortality, He had existed from eternity in the glory of the Godhead. It was absolutely necessary that He who undertook to bear the guilt of a ruined world, should know precisely at what cost their redemption could be effected; and the language of our Saviour clearly implies, that He had received from God exact instructions as to what He must do and suffer, ere the rebels and wanderers could be received back to friendship. Now all this intelligence and these instructions, clearly demonstrate the pre-existence of our Saviour.

The immense importance of having correct views of the character of Christ, makes me anxious to set it forth in what I conceive to be its true light. There seem to be two essential qualities necessary to be possessed by our Surety, viz. 1. Ability to save; 2. Willingness to do so. On each of these I will make a few remarks.

(1.) Ability to effect the redemption of mankind must have been possessed by Jesus Christ. The divine law, both in theory and practice, had declared, that without shedding of blood there could be no remission of sin; and common sense could not fail to decide, that the blood of bulls and of goats could never effect this important object. It was, therefore, necessary that some mighty One should arise, who by His death should make atonement for transgressions. A creature could not accomplish this; for as every creature derives the whole of its existence, and every thing it enjoys, from the hand of God, the sacrifice of its life would be no offering to the Almighty, but simply a return to Him of what was His own. Neither do I conceive that any creature would be justified in laying down his life for another; for since God has bestowed it on him, he is bound to keep it until called upon to restore it to its original Giver. The conclusion, therefore, is forced upon us, that "as the Father hath life in Himself, even so the Son hath life in Himself," and that He has power to lay down His life as an offering for the sins of mankind.

(2.) Willingness also is a necessary part in the character of a Redeemer. Do away with this, and you do away with salvation altogether, and reduce the Saviour of mankind to a level with the children of men. Ample testimony, however, is afforded us of the readiness with which Christ became a curse for us, that He might redeem us from the curse of the law. St. Paul, when treating on the extent to which human pity will reach, supposes it to be just possible, that if the life of a benefactor of the world were in danger, some generous being might be found willing to lay down his own life as a rescue. How transcendantly then is the love of Christ exalted far above that of the children of men, when we behold Him bleeding and dying for His enemies. There was no exterior cause to induce Christ to die for us; and had not mercy been an attribute inherent in His nature, He would have spurned from His embrace the ungrateful descendants of Adam, and instead of healing their sickness and curing their diseases, would have blasted them with the withering breath of unmitigated vengeance. No shadow of respect was shown Him by his creatures, no tenderness of sympathy to call forth his mercy; but, on the contrary, the blackest ingratitude was stamped on every action, and written on every heart. Let us not, therefore, hesitate to confess, that his desire to save us must indeeed have been a great one, since nothing could induce Him to alter his purpose.

It is not in the power of human reason to comprehend the mystery of man's redemption, and to the remarks which I have already made it seems necessary only to add, that Scripture assures us, that a Person such as I have described did descend upon this earth: that in Him was united all that can be considered necessary for the accomplishment of the grand work He came to perform: that after a life of unexampled suffering and purity, He voluntarily submitted to the death of the cross: and that, in consequence of this, God has positively, distinctly, and repeatedly declared, that the sins of mankind are atoned for, and that He waits to be gracious to all who will accept His mercy. "Now in Christ Jesus, they who were sometime far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ." "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.

II. But before closing this subject, I consider it will be necessary to make the two following remarks.

1. Who are they that will obtain mercy? Since so mighty an atonement has been effected for the sins of men, I think it is quite clear that by no other means can man be accepted before God. Oh! we may be ure that the case of fallen man was far worse than ver our most vivid conceptions suppose it to be, and hat the hopelessness of his condition approached early to desperation, or the mighty efforts would ever have been made which have been made, to restore im to the favour and friendship of his Maker. It must herefore be quite apparent to every reasonable mind, hat no path can lead to the kingdom of heaven except hat which was pointed out by the Redeemer himself. nd what was that path? Sinners are first of all told hat they must believe in the efficacy of their Saviour's tonement; but the Deity, knowing how many and arious are the dispositions of men, has decided, that he criterion of faith shall not rest upon internal feelngs, but upon external actions; and every one who laims to be a believer in Christ must try himself by he only standard by which he can judge rightly: "If e love me, keep my commandments."—It seems, herefore, that those who are willing to love God supremely, or, which is the same thing, to renounce every course of conduct opposed to his will, are hereafter to be welcomed to mansions of blessedness, as the beloved children of the Most High God.

And if this be true, how sad will their state be, who suppose it possible to unite the profession of the gospel with the lusts and vanities of this wicked world! God can be merciful only to those to whom Christ asks Him to be merciful; and Christ will intercede for none but those who love Him and keep His commandments. Down, therefore, with the barriers between God and his creatures—make one bold effort to escape the delusions of Satan—cast down vain imaginations, and every thought that exalteth itself against the glory of God!—for I rejoice to declare—

2. That none need despair of obtaining mercy. There dwells not in the outspread regions of earth one being, whom the Deity is not desirous to save. Worldly honour and worldly renown may never have brought before the gaze of the populace many millions of immortal beings; but it is not poverty—it is not wretchedness—it is not sinfulness,—which can conceal them from the merciful eye of the Deity. He looks through the whole family of earth, contemplates the condition of each particular human being, and waits with intense anxiety to hear the first breathings of prayer, that He may bestow the first tokens of His merciful loving-kindness. It is a libel on the Divine character, and a perversion of the word of God, to suppose it possible that there can be a sinner for whom provision is not made by the death of Christ. Far might I make this subject extend, until I had brought you in imagination to that rest which remains for the children of God, and had made you fancy that you heard the harpings of the heavenly choir: but let it suffice to know, that the reward of the righteous does not consist in lofty imaginations and brilliant conceptions; but that it is something sure, certain, and real, which will in very deed be conferred upon us. Reminding you, therefore, of the immense importance of using all diligence to secure for yourselves a portion of the happiness of heaven, I add only my fervent prayer, that "God may be merciful unto us and bless us, and show us the light of His countenance, and be merciful unto us."

Preparation for Death.—"The late Dr. Grosvenor being at the funeral of Dr. Watts, a friend said to him, 'Well, Dr. Grosvenor, you have seen the end of Dr. Watts, and you will soon follow; what think you of death?' 'Think of it!' replied the Doctor, 'why, when death comes, I shall smile upon death, if God smiles upon me.'"

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXX.

3dly. Habituate him to read in a moderately loud tone. This will conduce to his health, as constituting an exercise to his lungs: it will compel him to attend to distinctness and propriety of pronunciation; indistinctness and impropriety being far less discernible in a low and muttering mode of reading. It will also contribute to that manly and frank address, which are the charm of innocence and youth.

5thly. Let the utmost care be taken with him, that his manner be entirely his own; by which I mean, that it is not borrowed by imitation of any one else: this may very possibly be the case. Nothing is more likely to present itself to the inexperienced mind of your child, that as every one wishes him to be a good reader, and every body agrees that this gentleman, or that clergyman, or that senator, is a good speaker or reader, an effectual method of making this attainment, is to imitate the persons in question.

Here, however, your own superior experience and knowledge must interfere. It may indeed be useful to him to hear good reading and speaking. If taught to consider the qualities of this good reading and speaking abstractedly from the manner of the person who performs them, he may certainly learn much from it. He may see what faults to avoid, and what excellencies to cultivate. But the instant he has caught the tone, the manner of the man himself, that instant be sure it is the time for you to be most active, and most decided. Your own eye and your own ear will recognize the artificial style. Even if you cannot tell who it is that he imitates, yet the strangeness of the tone and manner will assuredly convince you that he is imitating some one. Now be faithful to him and to yourself. Be assured that the capability on the part of your child thus to transform himself, is nearly allied to the capability of general deceit. It is a departure from a healthy honesty of mind and heart. Seriously but mildly state to him the various reasons which render it in itself ineligible that he should imitate the manner of any person, however excellent: that each person has a manner of his own, which, though different from that of another, is equally excellent: that if he admires the manner of another, others may admire his manner: that no assumed manner in any degree can be pleasing.

If you know the speaker whom he imitates, point out to him the qualities of his reading which it is allowable to imitate: such as his distinctness, his slowness, his seeming to enter into the writer's meaning, the close resemblance (being only somewhat more serious) which his manner of speaking in public bears to his mode of speaking in private.

Should these means fail, take him to hear different speakers who have attained excellence. If you can consistently with every other duty, let him hear them in sufficient numbers, and with sufficient frequency, to impair his associations with the one whom he so much admires.

Be resolute upon this point: it is connected with the honesty, and therefore with the self-respect, and consequently with the happiness and the success of your child. Never cease till you have eradicated the evil; and if it cannot be done without, adopt what I will venture to call the actual cautery in any system of education — do not spare to satirize him, kindly but thoroughly.

Lastly. Be careful lest you do too much to secure the accomplishment of good reading or speaking.

If the essential rules now propounded be sufficiently attended to, the adoption of greater pains will be generally found to retard the result. Especially, never let him take lessons in reading. Many a young person has had a good manner till it was utterly spoiled by such causes. One may generally tell when a person has learnt to read, by their mechanical, or pompous, or artificial airs and arts, which offend and disgust more than the worst natural manner could have done.

In a word, if your child, after due attention has been paid to these topics, does not read well, then be assured all further attempts to make him do so are useless. Rest contented that reading is not his forte: let it be sought in something else. Natural taste and aptitude are indispensable to success. No rules that have ever been devised can communicate these if they are absent; and the only valuable effect of good rules is, to direct and regulate these where they do exist.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

Clericus.

ON THE FOLLY AND DANGER OF USING IMPRECATIONS.

If men who are so prodigal in scattering imprecations and curses upon all they are displeased at, would take time to consider what they are about, they would certainly be ashamed of the folly of such a practice, because nobody is hurt by it but themselves; for curses, like arrows shot against heaven, fall upon the heads of those that aim them, but can never injure the persons or things at which they are levelled. Again, for men in common discourse to make imprecations on themselves in order to confirm the truth of their assertions, only affords their auditors grounds of suspicion; for good men will be credited without them, and scorn to use them; but profane men only disparage themselves by so frequently venting them, because by such bitter asseverations they seem to suspect their own reputations. It is also for want of consideration, and for too facile a compliance with such a vicious custom, that men of sense on other matters, upon very slight, and sometimes no occasion, expose themselves to the wrath of Heaven, by calling upon God to curse them if what they say be false, when at the same time they know it to be so. Alas! how deplorable would be their condition, if Heaven should say "Amen" to what they wish for.

On Degrees of Sin.

Curses proportion to the sin's degree;
Adam had one, Eve two, the serpent three.

CLERICAL LIBERALITY.

The following letter of the late excellent Mr. Gunn, was written in reply to one from a lady, who had been receiving the Lord's Supper at the church of that clergyman She was a dissenter, and usually attended the ministry of the late Rev. Rowland Hill, but sometimes that of the Rev. Mr. Gunn, whose preaching is known to have been peculiarly edifying. We are glad to insert the letter in the Christian's Penny Magazine, on account of its admirable reproofs of the trifling and unprofitable conversation of some Christians.

No. 1, King Street, Compton Street,
Clerkenwell.

Dear Madam,

Your letter which I yesterday received, demands an answer from me; though I have so many engagements of various kinds upon my hands, that I have no time to reply to half the papers continually sent me. With respect to the conversation you had on leaving Surrey Chapel, I do most sincerely wish that the professors of our most holy faith had something better to talk of when they come from a gospel sermon, than merely gossiping about different ministers. I certainly could not have refused the sacrament to a person that I am totally unacquainted with; and this is the case with yourself. But had I known you, I should never have thought of asking you, had you come to the sacred table, a single question respecting the place of worship you attended, provided the gospel was preached in it. I most certainly am a friend to the Church of England, and I love gospel order. Other people have a right to think for themselves. I have several times seen Dissenters and Baptists at the table where I have been present: they received the symbols of the Lord's body and blood from my hands with pleasure, and I gave it them with equal pleasure. However, I do most certainly prefer our established church. This, I imagine, is a sufficient answer to your Letter.

With respect to the latter part of it, I rejoice with you if the Lord has in any degree blessed my poor ministry to your soul; the praise is His, and not mine. May He encourage you to persevere in his good way, and at last receive you to his glory. Let me advise you to have as little to do as possible, either with disputes or disputers: "The kingdom of heaven is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost."

With Christian respects to your husband, I remain,

Your friend in the blessed Jesus,

Wm. Alphonsus Gunn.

CHRIST'S BURDEN LIGHT.

Christ's burden doth unburden all other burdens. This may seem strange to you, that the taking of a new burden should ease one of the former: if a man be carrying wood or coals, the taking of a new burden would not ease him of the former; but the burden of Christ is of another nature. Austin distinguishes them; there is a burden burdening, and a burden supporting: he expresses it thus; the feathers that a bird is clothed with, they have a weight in them; yet notwithstanding they bear up the burden of the body. So now it is here; the burden of Jesus Christ, it makes all other burdens to go away lighter. Faith, true saving faith, is the grace that takes up the burden of Christ in the soul, and so thereby all other burdens are made the lighter, and difficulties and discouragements are overcome.

SCRIPTURE GAZETTEER.

Askelon, a city in the land of the Philistines, situated between Azoth and Gaza, upon the coast of the Mediterranean sea, about 520 furlongs from Jerusalem. It is said to have been of great note among the Gentiles for a temple dedicated to Derceto, the mother of Semiramis, here worshipped in the form of a mermaid: and for another of Apollo, where Herod, the father of Antipater, and grandfather of Herod the Great, served as priest, and from his being born in this city, was called Herod the Askelonite. It had, in the first times of Christianity, an episcopal see; and in the course of the holy wars it was beautified with a new wall, and many fair buildings, by our Richard the First. It is, however, at this day, a very inconsiderable place. There is much mention of the wine of Askelon, and the cypress tree, a shrub that was very much esteemed, and was very common in this place.—See Calmet's Dictionary.

Asphaltus Lake, so called on account of the great quantity of asphaltus or bitumen found in it. It is enclosed on the east and west with exceeding high mountains; on the north it is bounded by the plain of Jericho, on which side also it receives the waters of Jordan; on the south it lies open, and extends beyond the reach of the eye. It is said to be twenty-four leagues long, and six or seven broad. It is supposed to be called the Dead Sea, because no animal can live in it, though Mr. Maundrel seems to suspect the truth of this; having observed among the pebbles of the shore, two or three shells of fish, resembling oyster shells. The water of the lake is very limpid, and salt to the highest degree; and not only salt, but also extremely bitter and nauseous. Mr. Maundrel being willing to make an experiment of its strength, went into it, and found it bore up his body in swimming with an uncommon force; but as for that relation of some authors, that men wandering into it were buoyed up to the top, as soon as they go as deep as the navel, he found upon experiment not true. This lake receives all the waters of the river Jordan, of the brooks Arnon and Jabbok, and other waters which descend from all the neighbouring mountains; and notwithstanding it has no visible outlet, it does not overflow, for what it gains in water, it loses in vapour, and by that means the equilibrium betwixt the expanse of vapour and the supply from the rivers is constantly kept up.

Assos (approaching to), a seaport town, situated on the south-west part of the province of Troas, and over against the island of Lesbos. St. Luke, and others of St. Paul's companions, in his voyage (Acts xx, 13), went by sea from Troas to Assos; but St. Paul went by land thither, and meeting them at Assos, they all went together to Mitylene.

Atad's Threshing-Floor, the place where the sons of Jacob, and the Egyptians who accompanied them, mourned for this patriarch, and which was afterwards called Abel-mizraim. St. Jerome fixes this place between Jericho and Jordan, three miles from the city, and two from the river.

Athens, so called from Athene, or Athenaia, Minerva, a celebrated city of Greece, formerly a most powerful and flourishing commonwealth, which eminently distinguished itself in war, but was still more illustrious by the glory it acquired from the learning, eloquence, and politeness of its inhabitants. As it would be inconsistent with our purpose to enter upon an historical detail of this once famous republic, we shall only observe in this place, that St. Paul coming thither in the year of Christ 52, found the inhabitants plunged deep in idolatry, and much divided in their opinions concerning the true religion and the supreme happiness. The Apostle therefore having taken an opportunity to preach Jesus Christ, was carried before the Areopagus, the supreme court of the commonwealth, and there converted Dionysius, one of its members, who was afterwards ordained the first bishop of Athens, and who, it is believed, ended his life there by an honourable martyrdom.

Attalia (that increases or sends), a seaport of Pamphylia, formerly the chief residence of the prefect. It is said to take its name from King Attalus, its founder, which it still retains with a small variation, being now called Settalia. It stands on a very fine bay, and is commodiously seated for trade, having a good haven; which probably has been the occasion of its being preserved from ruin by the Turks, who even at this day are said to be very careful to keep its fortifications and castle in repair. The city is supposed to stand at present nearer to the sea than it did formerly.

Avims, people descended from Hevæus, the son of Canaan. This people dwelt at first in the country which was afterwards possessed by the Caphtorims, or Philistines. The Scripture says expressly, that the Caphtorims drove out the Avims, who dwelt in Hazerim, even unto Azzah, Deut. ii, 23. There were also Avims, or Hivites, at Shechem or Gibeon, and consequently in the centre of the promised land (Josh. xi, 19), for the inhabitants of Shechem and the Gibeonites were Hivites. Lastly, there were some of them beyond Jordan, at the foot of Mount Hermon. Bochart thinks that Cadmus, who conducted a colony of Phœnicians into Greece, was a Hivite. His name Cadmus comes from the Hebrew Kedem, the east, because he came from the eastern parts of the land of Canaan. The name of his wife Hermione was taken from Mount Hermon, at the foot whereof the Hivites dwelt. The metamorphosis of Cadmus's companions into serpents, is founded upon the signification of the name Hivites, which in the Phœnician language signifies serpents.

Azotus, see Ashdod.

B.

Babel, a term which in the original import of the word signifies confusion, and therefore was used for the name of the city and province, wherein the famous tower of that name was building, when God confounded the language of those men who were employed about this edifice, so that they could no longer understand one another. Gen xi, 9.

MORTIFICATION OF SIN BY THE CROSS.

Work your hearts to an hatred of sin by the consideration of its being the cause of Christ's death. If a man had killed your friend, or father, or mother, how would you hate him! you would not endure the sight of him, but would follow the law upon him; as in the old law they did, if they fled not to the city of refuge. Send out the avenger of blood with a hue and cry after thy sin: bring it before God's judgment seat: arraign it, accuse it, spit on it, condemn it, and thyself for it. Have it to the cross; nail it there; if it cry "I thirst," give it vinegar. Stretch the body of sins upon his cross; stretch every vein of it; make the heart-strings crack. And then, when it hangs there, triumph over the dying of it. Shew it no pity: laugh at its destruction. Say, thou hast been a bloody husband to me; hang there and rot. And when thou art tempted to it, and art very thirsty after the pleasure of it, say of that opportunity to enjoy it, as David said of the water of Bethlehem, It is the price of Christ's blood; and pour it upon the ground.—Goodwin.

"I DIE DAILY." — 1 COR. XV, 31.

Great God! thy energy impart,
And write this lesson on my heart:
Rouse every solemn thought, that I
May ponder what it is to die.

To die! and quit this house of clay,
And unembody'd pass away
From all things mortal, and have done
With all concerns beneath the sun!

When all my days shall be fulfill'd,
My character and state be seal'd,
My naked spirit borne to God,
And sentenc'd to its long abode.

My change is sure, and may be soon;
Each hast'ning minute leads it on.
The shafts of Death around me fly,
And every day I live — I die.

This, this my state, to die, I'd learn,
And make it every day's concern:
Then let which will be last (this may),
I'm not unpractis'd in the way.

O may I daily live above
This flesh, this world, and wean my love,
And every day abstract my cares
From mortals, and their mean affairs!

Spend every day as if 'twere last,
And time redeem e'er time is past,
And all its precious portions o'er,
Redeemable, alas! no more.

Examine oft the state I'm in,
Whether a state of grace or sin.
If Christ has mark'd me for his own,
He'll meet me at his Father's throne.

Rejoice, my soul, in such a stay,
Jesus, the life, the truth, the way;
And trace the footsteps of thy Head,
Up where thy heav'nly hopes are laid.

He'll guide me to my dying day,
And bless it with a cheerful ray;
Then to my soul a mansion give,
Where bright immortals ever live.

HYMN OF A FRENCH REFORMED PROTESTANT CHURCH.

O Lord! thy heav'nly grace impart,
And fix my frail, inconstant heart;
Henceforth my chief desire shall be,
To dedicate myself to Thee;
To Thee, my God, to Thee.

Whate'er pursuits my time employ,
One thought shall fill my soul with joy;
That silent, secret thought shall be,
That all my hopes are fix'd on Thee;
On Thee, my God, on Thee.

Thy glorious eye pervadeth space,
Thou'rt present, Lord, in every place;
And wheresoe'er my lot shall be,
Still shall my spirit cleave to Thee;
To Thee, my God, to Thee.

Renouncing every worldly thing,
Safe 'neath the covert of thy wing,
My sweetest thought henceforth shall be,
That all I want, I find in Thee;
In Thee, my God, in Thee.

LIFE LIKE A RIVER.

Life may not unaptly be compared to a river. It resembles a river in its rise: as the river rises pure and fresh, animating with its luxuriating influence every thing within its reach, so it is with life: it opens in innocency, and is at once the delight and the cheerer of all around it.

Life resembles a river in its course. As the river rushes on with irresistible force, unretarded by any obstacle, so it is with life. Man is precipitately carried down its vale, and every effort to impede its course is vain and useless. And as the river now runs smooth and gentle, and now again, by reason of wind and storm, becomes rough, agitated, and impetuous; so is life. Things run smoothly for a time; then comes the day of adversity, then come vexations and crosses; the passions are roused, and the bosom of man becomes as the surface of a troubled water. Again: as every prudent mariner provides himself with a pilot, lest he strike on the sands and make shipwreck of his vessel; so must it be in life. Man must look to Jesus to be his pilot, he must take him for his guide, or he will most assuredly strike, to his utter destruction.

Lastly, life resembles a river in its termination. As the river flows onward, expanding more and more until it enters the vast and boundless ocean; so does life glide on, with daily widening view, till at length it issues in the ocean of immortality!

INTEGRITY OF SIR MATTHEW HALE.

So sacred a virtue is justice, and of such vast importance to the Public, that it is the great concern of governments to trust the administration thereof to no persons but such as fear God and abhor covetousness.

When Judge Hale was holding a certain assizes in England, a gentleman who was to have a cause tried before him that assize, sent him a buck. The cause being called on, and the judge taking notice of the name, asked if it was not the same person who had made him the present; and, finding that was the fact, said he could not suffer the trial to go on till he had paid him for his buck. To which the gentleman answered, that he never sold his venison, and that he had done no more to him than what he had always done to every judge that came that circuit. But all this would not prevail on Sir Matthew, nor would he suffer the trial to proceed till he had paid for the venison; whereupon the gentleman withdrew his action.

SALE OF BRITISH CHILDREN IN THE SLAVE MARKET AT ROME.

BRITISH ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

No. VII.—The mission of Augustin to the Anglo-Saxons.

"The Slave Trade," however execrable, as the most atrocious of crimes whose guilt can stain the human conscience, is an enormity of ancient date. "Britons never shall be Slaves," is a well known Bacchanalian chorus: but the faithful records of history declare that Britons have been slaves; and that the traffic in the "souls of men" was carried on to a considerable extent between Britain and Rome, the metropolis of the world.

Slaves are mentioned by Strabo, who flourished in the reign of Augustus and Tiberius, as articles of commerce between Britain and Rome; and this criminal branch of trade was carried on for six centuries at least, till three hundred years after Christianity was established in the imperial metropolis. Slave-dealing, however, in the Roman market, occasioned one of the most eventful Christian missions whose details are recorded in the annals of our country, the particulars of which will illustrate our engraving.

Pope Gregory is said, while archdeacon of Rome, about A. D. 587, to have projected a mission to Britain through the following circumstance. Walking one day through the market place at Rome, his attention was caught by some beautiful youths, offered for sale as slaves. This horrid traffic in human beings was carried on to some extent in that metropolis of Christendom, and by individuals among the Saxons. Gregory learnt that they were pagans, and that their countrymen were called Angli, the Latin word for the Angles. "Alas!" he exclaimed, "that the prince of darkness should possess countenances so luminous, and that faces so fair should carry minds destitute of eternal grace." On being told that they were natives of Deira, the province of Northumberland, "These people," said he, "should be delivered de Dei irâ" [from the wrath of God]. On being informed that their king was named Ella, "Alleluia to God," said he, still playing upon the sounds, "should be sung in those regions."

Gregory felt, or affected to feel, a desire to declare the gospel to so interesting a people, and offered himself to undertake a mission for that purpose. Permission having been obtained of Pope Pelagius, he set out on his journey; but the people and clergy of Rome were so much attached to Gregory, that at their request he was recalled. Seven years after this he was elevated to the dignity of pope; when application being made, as appears, by Bertha, who had been more than twenty years married to Ethelbert, diffusing in some good measure the knowledge of Christianity by her religious example and by her ministers, a mission was determined on by Gregory. His pupil Augustin, then abbot of St. Gregory's monastery at Rome, with forty monks, was appointed to this work. Christian simplicity, faith, and zeal, the fruits of the Spirit, and of love to their Saviour, were, however, not among the chief qualities possessed by these missionaries. Hearing in France representations of the difficulties and dangers awaiting them in Britain, their hearts failed them, and Augustin returned to Rome, soliciting to be discharged from the arduous service. The pope, however, prevailed on him, and wrote to encourage his companions to proceed in their enterprize. He gave Augustin letters also to the French king, and to Etherius, bishop of Arles, to obtain their assistance; and thus encouraged, and furnished with interpreters, the party proceeded, and arrived in Britain, A.D. 597.

Augustin, on landing in the isle of Thanet, sent to inform King Ethelbert of his arrival with other missionaries, and to declare the object of their mission. The king appointed an early day to visit them, and an interview was granted in an open field, as Bede says, lest any power of evil spirits should be employed by them against him. Augustin, far from apostolical simplicity, arranged his followers in the order of a procession; raised aloft a silver cross, and displayed a banner, on which was a painting of the Saviour; and thus with affected pomp, and chanting litanies, they moved towards the royal presence. Ethelbert listened to their propositions, which Augustin made by means of interpreters; and though we have no part of the discourse of the missionary, doubtless he offered to the king, eternal life and salvation in the kingdom of God, through the mediation of Jesus Christ: for the king is said to have replied to this effect:—"Your proposals are noble, and your promises inviting: but I cannot abandon the religion of my ancestors. However, since you have come so far on purpose to impart what you deem most valuable, you shall have satisfaction. I will take care for your protection, and supply you with all things necessary for your support. And if any of my subjects are willing to embrace your religion, I shall offer no objection."

Ethelbert granted permission for Augustin and his companions to settle at Canterbury, ordering suitable accommodations to be provided. "But whether these favours were the effect of God's blessing upon the discourse and design of Augustin, whether they were the effect of the persuasions of the queen and the Gallican king, the relation and ally of Ethelbert, or whether they were owing to the desire and disposition of the English themselves to receive the gospel, it is impossible for us, at this distance of time, and would be invidious, to determine."

Augustin had recourse again to parade in entering the royal city, to make an impression on the minds of the pagans. "Carrying before them," says Bede, "as was their custom, the holy cross, and image of the Great King, our Lord Jesus Christ, they sang in concert this litany, 'We beseech thee, O Lord, in all thy mercy, that thy wrath and indignation may be taken away from this city, and from this thy holy house, for we have sinned. Alleluia.'" Having taken possession of the mansion granted them, "they began," says Bede, "to imitate the apostolical life of the primitive church, exercising themselves in constant prayers, watchings, and fastings, preaching the word of God to whom they were able, despising all things of this world, as not belonging to them, and receiving all necessary things according to the doctrines which they taught, being prepared to suffer, or even to die for that truth which they had preached. The consequence was, some believed and were baptized, admiring the simplicity of their innocent life, and the sweetness of their doctrine."

Miracles, if Bede's account is to be believed, confirmed the preaching of Augustin; and the king, observing these things, and what he deemed the innocent lives of the missionaries, delighted with the precious promises of the gospel, professed his faith in Christ, renounced his idols, and was baptized. The queen's chapel was no longer sufficient to contain the increasing number of the converts; a heathen temple was therefore consecrated to their use, and dedicated, it is said, to St. Pancras. Ethelbert declared that he would compel no man to become a Christian; but on making known his purpose to show favour to those who embraced Christianity, many followed the example of the king. Ten thousand converts are said to have been baptized in one day at a small river, near the mouth of the Medway.

Most readers will probably doubt concerning the spiritual and intelligent character of Augustin's converts, especially since the principal instruction afforded to the ignorant Saxons was through interpreters, and accompanied with superstitious ceremonies and service in Latin. Fuller remarks, in words that imply much, "This conversion was done without persecution, yea or any considerable opposition, costing some pains, no torture, some sweat, no blood; not even a martyr being made in the whole managing thereof."

Gregory had consecrated Augustin bishop of Kent, before he left Rome. But seeing the fruit of his mission so abundant, to secure his authority, Augustin hastened to France, and procured from the archbishop of Arles, consecration, as archbishop of England. In this procedure the ambition of Augustin is manifest, and the difference between his policy and the conduct of the apostles of Christ. His new dignity, he was aware, would increase his priestly influence; and, according to his expectations, Ethelbert immediately loaded the archbishop with every mark of royal favour, making Canterbury the metropolitan see.

Augustin now dispatched Laurentius, a presbyter, and Peter, a monk, with two others, to inform Pope Gregory of his successes, his miracles, and his consecration; and to solicit answers to several questions relating to his future policy in the forming an ecclesiastical system for England. Some of the queries give us but a mean idea of Augustin's attainments in scriptural knowledge: while others show the prevalence of his superstition, vanity, and ambition. Gregory's answers, also, are some of them too trifling, and others besides too indelicate to be presented to our readers. Still the letter from the pope is interesting, so far as it proves, that though Gregory was lofty in his pretensions as the occupier of the supposed chair of St. Peter, he had not assumed that exorbitant and blasphemous authority claimed by his pontifical successors.

The first question of Augustin was, "How are bishops to behave with respect to their clergy?—Into how many portions are the offerings at the altar divided?—And how ought a bishop to act in the church? For satisfaction in the first point, the Pope refers him to St. Paul's Epistle to Timothy. To the second, he answers, that it was the custom of the church to divide the offerings into four parts—one for the bishop; another for the support of the clergy; the third for the poor; and the fourth for the repairs of the churches.

As to the last article, Gregory observes, that Austin, being a monk, ought not to live apart from the rest of the clergy: but if any were not ordained, and wished to marry, they might receive their stipends at their own houses. Augustin's second question related to the rites and ceremonies which he should establish in England, as he found those observed in Gaul differed from those used at Rome. Gregory, with much moderation, answered, that as he had known the church of Rome from his youth, whether in that or any French church he might see any thing apparently more fit for the service of God, that might be chosen. "For," as Fox translates it, "things are not to be beloved for the place sake, but the place is to be beloved for the things that be good: wherefore such things as be good, godly, and religious, those choose out of all churches, and introduce to your people, that they may take root in the minds of Englishmen."

In the seventh question, Augustin asks how he ought to manage with the bishops of France; to which the pope replies, that he allows him no manner of jurisdiction over them, because he did not design to deprive the archbishop of Arles of that authority which he already possessed. The letter of Austin, and the verbal reports of his messengers, inspired Gregory with lofty notions concerning the progress of this mission; and he sent back Mellitus, Paulinus, and other new missionaries, to strengthen his hands. By these the pope sent to Augustin a pall, an entire and magnificent habit, contrived to adorn a metropolitan, and without which no archbishop is recognized by the Romish church, or allowed to consecrate a bishop. Anticipating increasing success, Gregory gave directions to Augustin to ordain twelve bishops, and an archbishop of York, with twelve suffragans under him. An archbishop was to be consecrated for London; but Augustin's authority was to be supreme; as Gregory says —"You shall be endued with authority, not only over those bishops that you constitute, and over those constituted by the bishop of York, but also you shall have all other priests of whole Britain subject unto our Lord Jesus Christ." In this Gregory acted in the true spirit of antichrist, who had now nearly reached the summit of his pernicious claims, and it suited the domineering temper of Augustin.

Miracles were reported to have been wrought by Augustin, whom Gregory admonished not to be elated by such marks of the Divine favour; but, as the Saviour admonished his disciples, rather to rejoice that his "name was written in heaven."

Gregory wrote also to King Ethelbert, congratulating him on his conversion to the faith of Christ; commending Augustin as eminently qualified for his station, and remarkable for his knowledge of the Scriptures, and exhorting him to attend to Augustin's instructions, cooperating with him in converting the idolaters. To excite his attention more effectually, Gregory informed the king that the world was nearly at an end, and that the reign of the saints was soon about to commence, of which he would be assured by various signs. He addressed a letter at the same time to Queen Bertha, to quicken her zeal in confirming the king in this belief of Christianity, and in urging him forward in promoting the objects of the mission. That these endeavours were effectual is abundantly evident in the honours heaped upon Augustin, and the influence exerted in his favour.

BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

On Wednesday, June 19, the Anniversary of the Baptist Missionary Society commenced by a Sermon, in the morning, at the Poultry Chapel, London, from the Rev. W. Knibb, Missionary from Jamaica, on Psalm lxvii, 1, 2. In the evening, at Surrey Chapel, a Sermon was delivered by the Rev. J. Smith of Ilford, on Phil. i, 12.

On Thursday morning the business meeting of the Society was held at Spa Fields Chapel. Prayer having been offered by the Rev. W. Groser, of Maidstone, the chair was taken by J. C. Gotch, Esq. of Kettering. The Rev. J. Dyer, Secretary, read the Report, which gave an encouraging detail of the Society's operations, except with respect to Jamaica. "The last accounts which arrived from Montego Bay, stated that Messrs. Nichols and Abbot, together with the Wesleyan Missionary, had been again committed to prison for the offence of preaching, but were admitted to bail by order of the Chief Justice. Notwithstanding all the persecution, upwards of two hundred individuals had been baptized, and added to the churches at Kingston, Spanish Town, and St. Thomas in the Vale. T. F. Buxton, Esq., M. P. gave a most heart-rending picture of slavery in the West Indies, and communicated many interesting particulars relating to the present aspect of affairs in favour of the oppressed negro. Government, he assured the meeting, intended a most liberal policy towards the missionaries in Jamaica, and the religious privileges of the slaves, by which a vastly extended field would be opened for the labours of the Society.

The Rev. T. Price, of London; the Rev. J. Penny, from Calcutta; the Rev. Dr. Cox, of London; J. Cropper, Esq. of Liverpool; the Rev. Eustace Carey, from the East Indies; the Rev. C. Thompson; W. B. Gurney, Esq.; the Rev. W. Knibb; the Rev. J. Dyer; and the Rev. C. Stovell, addressed the Meeting.

The Rev. J. Dyer read the cash accounts for the past year,—12,722*l*. 9*s*. 8*d*.—about 400*l*. more than the preceding year: but still the Society was 1000*l*. in debt. Two anonymous donations were anounced, one of 100*l*., and another of 250*l*.; and one of 200*l*. from J. Cropper, Esq., of Liverpool, a member of the Society of Friends.

BAPTIST IRISH SOCIETY.

On Friday, June 21, the nineteenth Anniversary of this Society was held, after a public breakfast, at the City of London Tavern, W. B. Gurney, Esq. in the chair.

After singing and prayer, the Rev. G. Pritchard read the Report of the past year, which gave a most encouraging view of the Society's operations. The Meeting was then addressed by the Rev. T. Green, of Thrapstone; J. Payne, Esq. Barrister; the Rev. C. Stovell, of London; Mr. C. W. Carr; the Rev. S. Davis, of Ireland, but recently returned from America, where he had been making collections for the relief of his countrymen; the Rev. J. Morris, of Portsea; the Rev. J. Hoby, of Birmingham; the Rev. Dr. Cox, of Hackney; the Rev. J. Phillippo; and the Rev. J. Davis, of Walworth.

COLLECTIONS FOR THE RELIEF OF IRELAND, MADE IN AMERICA.

The Rev. S. Davis, the principal agent of the Baptist Irish Society, has just returned from a tour to the United States of America, in behalf of the Society. He travelled upwards of 4,000 miles in those States, and succeeded in collecting 1,004*l*. 10*s*. From the time of his leaving England to his return, a few days since, his whole expenses amounted to 119*l*. 10*s*.—Patriot.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

NOAH.

BORN A. M. 1056. DIED A. M. 2006, AGED 950 YEARS.

The Parentage of Noah.

NOAH, the third in descent from Enoch, was born only sixty-nine years after the translation of his great grandfather. Methuselah, the son of Enoch, enjoyed the advantage of his father's ministry and example for a period of three hundred years. Lamech, the son of Methuselah, was born in the one hundred and eighty-seventh year of his father's age; so that he was privileged to live with holy Enoch for one hundred and thirteen years before his removal to glory.

Methuselah and Lamech seem to have been good men; but infidelity and wickedness prodigiously increased. The souls of these devout believers would, therefore, be shocked and grieved at the growing impiety, and the numerous apostasies from among "the sons of God." The natural fruits of ungodliness, oppression and barbarous outrage, committed by the violent "sons of men," alarmed and distressed the decreasing ranks of the pious; and those who faithfully served God would sigh for deliverance and repose, which it is probable that Enoch had clearly predicted.

While Lamech was lamenting the aboundings of iniquity, and labouring in the toilsome cultivation of his land, invaded from time to time by the lawless bands of infidels, he was blessed with the birth of a son. As it was in the case of Moses, whose parents saw that "he was a goodly, a proper child" (Exod. ii, 2; Heb. xi, 23), Lamech entertained great expectations of relief and satisfaction by his means: he therefore gave him the name of Noah, which signifies Rest, or Comfort. The inspired penman says, "And he called his name Noah, saying, This same shall comfort us concerning the work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the LORD hath cursed." Gen. v, 29. Many think that Lamech supposed this child was the promised "seed of the woman,"—the Messiah.

From "the prophecies that went before" concerning him, treasured in the memory of his father, and probably some new intimations of the Divine will, it was foreseen that Noah would be, not only a comfort to his parents, but a public blessing to the church of God, and even an eminent type of Messiah, the true Comforter of the church, and their everlasting Saviour.

The Religious Character of Noah.

The extraordinary character of Noah is mentioned in connection with that of Job and of Daniel in the book of the prophet Ezekiel. There the holiness of his life is spoken of in terms of the highest approbation. No language could more accurately and comprehensively express the religious character of Noah, than that which is employed by the sacred historian. In describing the universal corruption, he observes, "But Noah found grace in the eyes of the LORD. Noah was a just man and perfect in his generation, and Noah walked with God." Gen. vi, 8, 9. This testimony of truth, in strict agreement with the whole Scriptures, whilst it properly magnifies the grace of God, does equal honour to that eminently holy man. It ascribes nothing to the inherent purity of his nature: but exhibiting him as a fallen child of Adam, it directs us to regard his distinguished excellencies as wholly derived from God.

"Noah found grace in the eyes of the LORD." He was a monument of sovereign grace. He was dedicated to God by his pious parents even from the day of his birth; but we are not informed at what period he received into his heart the doctrine of heavenly wisdom; though we have reason to believe he embraced it from the ministry of his venerable father, and that he gave himself to the LORD in his youth. Yet he would doubtless cherish and express the sentiments of the holy apostle, the uniform acknowledgment of the whole church of God, "By the grace of God, I am what I am." 1 Cor. xv, 10.

"Noah was a just man;" an admirable illustration of the doctrine of free justification by faith in the promised Messiah. Thus have all believers in every age been justified in the sight of God: not only Paul and Peter, and readers of the New Testament, but David, and Abraham, and Abel.

"Noah was perfect in his generation;" in the times in which he lived: not indeed absolutely free from the sinful infirmities of a fallen nature, but a man of pious integrity. He was a worthy example of consistent godliness; persevering in his course of faith and holiness, when all around him was infidelity and atheism, intemperance and debauchery, riotous violence and savage confusion. Noah was "a lily among thorns, diffusing its sweetness in the wilderness: a light burning and shining in the blackness of darkness. Therefore was he the favourite of Heaven, and the delight of the Most High, who was pleased to constitute him the representative, deliverer, and restorer of the human race."

"Noah walked with God;" he was an excellent pattern of active religion. He lived not to himself, but to God, and to benefit and save his fellow-creatures. Like his honoured ancestor Enoch, Noah walked with God in his secret retirements for meditation and prayer in private, in the bosom of his well-instructed family, and before the eyes of all men in public; magnifying his profession as a believer, trusting in the promises of a covenant God, and expecting, in due time, the satisfactions of a blissful immortality.

O reader! is such your character? Are you walking with God, doing honour to your profession as a Christian, and rendering yourself a blessing to mankind? Above all things, let your consciences testify the sincerity of your faith in Christ, and of your obedience to his delightful commands.

LORD CRAVEN AND HIS NEGRO SERVANT.

LORD CRAVEN lived in London when that sad calamity the Plague raged. His house was in that part of the town, since called (from the circumstance of Craven House being situated there), Craven Buildings. On the plague growing epidemic, his Lordship, to avoid the danger, resolved to go to his seat in the country. His coach and six were accordingly at the door, his baggage put up, and all things in readiness for the journey. As he was walking through the hall, with his hat on, his cane under his arm, and putting on his gloves, in order to step into his carriage, he overheard his Negro servant, who served him as postillion, saying to another servant, "I suppose, by my Lord's quitting London to avoid the Plague, that his God lives in the country, and not in town." The poor Negro said this in the simplicity of his heart, he really believing in a plurality of gods. The speech, however, struck Lord Craven very sensibly, and made him pause. "My God," thought he, "lives everywhere, and can preserve me in the town as well as in the country. I'll e'en stay where I am; the ignorance of that Negro has reproved me; Lord, pardon that unbelief, and that distrust of thy providence, which would make me think of running away from thy hand."

He immediately ordered his horses to be taken off from the coach, and his luggage to be brought in. He continued in London, was remarkably useful among his sick neighbours, and never caught the infection.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXXI.

On learning Music.

Dear Madam,

Whatever may be the destination of your son, whether to trade or science, I have now proposed to treat upon an accomplishment, which will be no burden or hindrance, but a source of real relaxation. Let him then be initiated into the use and knowledge of some one musical instrument early in life. The acquisition of this knowledge will be easy, and more extensive if it be begun at about seven years of age.

In the choice of an instrument, it seems desirable to select those which are portable, and not of the most expensive kind, at least to begin with. The next qualification of the instrument should be its admitting of the union of the voice along with its music.

The extent to which the acquisition of music should be carried, need not be a matter of much concern at the beginning. If your child receives his first lessons from a good player, it will soon be discoverable whether he has much taste for the acquirement. This will be indicated by his own voluntarily practising the tunes he is acquainted with, and trying to learn others. Should you discover that he possesses a decided genius for music, you may then provide for its cultivation by affording to him additional lessons. The extent however to which music should be carried is soon arrived at. If he can play and sing common tunes and pieces without much difficulty, so as to have it within his own power to perfect himself in the knowledge of them by subsequent efforts, he has learned sufficient.

The qualities of singing and playing which he should be taught to emulate, should be those of simplicity. There is a natural sweetness in the human voice, which cultivation often obliterates. If you hear some celebrated fashionable singer, and then listen to some child or girl, who simply "warbles her wood notes wild," I think you will need only to consult your own emotions to decide which style you would wish your son to cultivate. I have heard many persons sing, possessed of every degree of scientific cultivation; but the tones I remember after all, and delight to recal to memory, were those of a young farmer's man, who sang bass to a fine old church tune, and those of a girl in a village choir, in a church in which I on a single occasion officiated. The same faults attend the modern style, as it is called, both of singing and playing. In both, the effort seems to be to produce admiration at the supposed difficulty of the performance. Accordingly, you hear a public singer stay upon a note longer than ever you had imagined the lungs of a man could have supported it; and then, while you are expecting that he must come to a close, he swells out the note much longer; which, however, is not "lost in middle air," as you then imagine and even begin to hope it will be, he adds various flourishes, and after all, loudly and boldly finishes by a prolonged note. The applause which follows is usually proportioned to the admiration excited by this feat. But in all this there is no music: it is the power of the man's chest which is so admirable. The same may be said of playing: the admiration of the music is lost in the admiration at the inconceivable rapidity of the performance, or the multitude of involved half notes. Still this is not music. Some of the most affecting pieces which we hear in the psalmody of the church or elsewhere, consist of but few notes, and are devoid of scientific ornament.

"When unadorn'd, adorn'd the most."

Of such a nature are the tunes called St. Ann's, Canterbury, the 104th Psalm, the Old Hundredth, &c. &c. and certain Scotch and Irish tunes. These are some of the best adapted vehicles of piety. Let the performer feel the melody, and he can scarcely fail to play or sing effectively.

It is observed by Dr. Knox, in one of his essays upon Music (into some of the sentiments of which I find myself to have unconsciously slid while attempting to utter my own), that the lyre of Orpheus, and other early musicians, by which such wonderful effects are said to have been produced, appears to have been a very simple instrument as to its construction, and to have admitted but of a small variety of tones.

In the same essay, he justly reprobates modern taste in music. He predicts, that the day will come when he will be pronounced the greatest musician that ever was heard, that can make his pipe squeak five minutes longer than any other man in the country. Such, however, is the prevalence of this false taste, that I have lately read the remark in a well-conducted publication, that except a young lady can play in this fashionable manner, her performance would, in any genteel society, be hardly listened to; and hence has arisen that dearth of this simple and interesting amusement in families, it being considered presumptuous for any but the best players, as they are called, to play before others.

The cultivation of music, simple, effective, genuine music, tends to provide an exquisite relaxation for the intervals of care and business. It enables the possessor to soothe many a solitary hour. It brings the full tide of early associations upon the memory, and softens the heart under the united influence of sympathy and affection. It appeals to the feelings by a natural adaptation to them, which has been confessed by mankind in every age and in every clime. It tends to divert the anguish of a burthened heart, and to cultivate those sensibilities, upon whose liveliness the exercise of virtue itself is dependent.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

Clericus.

BLESSEDNESS OF HOPE.

Hope is defined to be a gentle and sweet effusion or expansion of the soul towards some expected good; so that when we are full of hope, we feel a certain excitement both within and without, together with a glowing but pleasant heat from the blood and spirits universally diffused: and when hope by this means is strong enough to produce courage, it stands ready to encounter every difficulty, bids defiance to danger, and conquers all before it. Hence some call it the manna from heaven, that comforts us in all extremities; others the pleasant and honest flatterer, for nothing but hope will caress the unhappy, in expectation of happiness in the bosom of futurity. When all other things fail us, hope will stand by us to the last. It gives freedom to the captive, health to the sick, victory to the defeated, and wealth to the beggar.

"How blest the man, supremely blest,
Who midst the varied scenes of life,
Of Hope, heart-cheering Hope possest,
Yields not a prey to care and strife.

Should dire calamities befal,
And wav'ring fortune on him frown,
Yet cheerly he'll outbrave them all,
And with a smile on fate look down.

Death, too, that stern, relentless king,
To him would be nor fear nor pain;
Hope's soothing voice would blunt his sting,
And render all his terrors vain.

Cheer'd at the thought of heaven in view,
No pang would then his bosom move;
To weeping friends he'd bid adieu,
Steadfast in hope to meet above."

BENEFITS AND PLEASURE OF EARLY RISING.

A SUBJECT which refers to the right use of our time, and the appropriate and rational employment of those talents which are given to us by the Great Creator, to whom we are accountable for them, must be confessedly important. Such a subject is EARLY RISING; and when once the benefits derivable from it, and the evils which attend its neglect, are impartially considered by any reflecting mind, they will scarcely fail to produce a determination to adopt the practice.

There are three things which may powerfully excite us to the practice of Early Rising.

1st. The necessity of it.

Health is so valuable a blessing, that it is the duty of every one who possesses it to adopt all possible means for its permanent continuance; and early rising will be found most eminently to conduce to its enjoyment. But can it be secured in giving nature more sleep than she requires? Can it be by torpidly lying in a close atmosphere, after the sun has risen in his glory upon the bright face of creation? A judicious writer has remarked, — "Nothing can be more prejudicial to tender constitutions, or studious and contemplative persons, than lying long in bed, lolling and soaking in sheets, after any one is distinctly awake. It necessarily thickens the juices, enervates the solids, and weakens the constitution."

To let the precious moments of the beautiful morning flee from us, or be spent in the indulgence of habits which not only keep both the physical and mental powers in a state of inactivity, but turn that to our sad disadvantage which was given for our lasting good, is surely unwise, if it be not criminal. It is not for the enjoyment of such a one that the sun begins his course with unclouded brightness, that nature puts forth her most inviting charms, or displays an host

> "Innumerable as the stars of night,
> Or stars of morning dew-drops, which the sun
> Impearls on every leaf and every flower."

2. The benefits of Early Rising.

No time is more appropriate for holding intercourse with the Great Father of our spirits — for reflection on the things which are unseen, and the study of that volume which leads to glory and immortality, — than the early hour of the morning; before the din of traffic breaks the holy silence — before any sound meets our ear, save the inviting warbling of the grove — and before the cares of day rush upon us, and discompose the solemn train of our thoughts.

There is something in the morning, which, instead of distracting our meditation, gives to us those calmer energies, enabling us to profit from our devotions, instilling into us that peace of mind, and endowing us with that holy fortitude, which best qualify us for the engagements of the day, and best prepare us for all its contemplated and unlooked-for troubles. The reason of our spirituality being so often cold and lifeless, arises in a great degree from an inattention to the proper season of devotion, and this being postponed to that time when the affairs of the world call for our service, and forbid us the closet. And besides these considerations, there is no time in which our mental powers are capable of study with that clearness and discernment which are possessed in the early morning.

Not only does devotion claim the morning as her most acceptable time, but there are other concerns, which, if not attended to before our daily avocations commence, an inconvenience will inevitably be felt, which it will not then be in our power to obviate; and thus we shall be incapacitated for the successful and happy discharge of those duties which God and man require.

Other benefits resulting from early rising are indeed important and numerous. There is no one who has accustomed himself to this healthy and delightful practice, but can attest that the sluggard is a miserable stranger to inestimable blessings which he might otherwise enjoy.

3. The pleasures of it.

The sluggard may acknowledge the necessity of early rising, but he is ignorant of its delights. Could he imagine the reality of its pleasures, this would hardly fail of accomplishing conversion from an evil habit; for he who can find no satisfaction in the objects which the morning beautifully presents, and the subjects which it affords for contemplation exclusively its own, must possess a sterile mind, and be destitute of a happy taste.

When the beauties of the morning are viewed and surveyed by one who traces the works of nature "up to nature's God," they enrich and exalt the mind, and afford it that pure joy which amusements of the world could not produce.

> "He sees with other eyes than theirs; where they > Discern a sun, he spies a Deity;
> What makes another smile, makes him adore."

How powerfully is the greatness and goodness of God manifested in the dawn of morning; — by the rising of the sun, by the Divine ordination diffusing joy and gladness all around, and like a herald announcing to a slumbering world that another day is born; — in the unfolding of the landscape, presenting in such rich variety its glowing foliage; — and in the lark soaring to hymn his praise, whilst a thousand other songsters of the grove join to swell the chorus of the anthem! How suitable is the silence which pervades nature at that time for contemplation on the objects she presents, unbroken save by the footsteps of the husbandman "going forth to his labour until the evening," or the nimble movements of the joyous cattle!

What more majestic sight — more enrapturing scene — can there be to entice the sleeper from his bed, to inspire him with reverence, and touch him with gratitude to the Great Ruler of the universe, for works so glorious and blessings so unbounded! Have we not statesmen, divines, and philosophers of the greatest eminence, as examples of early rising? Their names are too numerous to mention: suffice it to remark, that it is to this habit we are indebted to Dr. Doddridge and Mr. Wesley for nearly all their imperishable works.

But, above all, let the shortness of life, and the fleeting nature of all sublunary things, awaken in our breasts a due concern to redeem the time, and to employ it to the best purpose, remembering the true and solemn lines of the poet: —

> "Catch, then, oh! catch the transient hour,
> Improve each moment as it flies:
> Life's a short summer; man a flower;
> He dies — alas! how soon he dies!"

ORIENS.

AMERICAN INDIANS' NOTION OF THE SOUL.

PETER MARTYR, a contemporary of Columbus, mentions the idea of the Indians on this subject.

"They confess the soul to be immortal; and having put off the bodily clothing, they imagine it goeth forth to the woods and the mountains, and that it liveth there perpetually in caves: nor do they exempt it from eating and drinking, but that it should be fed there. The answering voices heard from caves and hollows, which we call echoes, they suppose to be the souls of the departed, wandering through those places."

PARTICULARS OF THE WILL OF THE LATE REV. ROWLAND HILL.

Evangelical Biography.—Memoirs of the Rev. Rowland Hill, A. M. Second Edition, with corrections and additions. London, Simpkin and Marshall.

Thousands of those who knew that venerable and apostolic minister of Christ, will certainly purchase this interesting "Memoir," which we take this opportunity of recommending to our readers, as it contains much valuable information concerning the life and death of that lamented philanthropist. Its cheapness will render it adapted to the means of the poorest, and besides its literary worth, it contains a portrait of Mr. Hill, and an internal view of Surrey Chapel. The following particulars of his "Will," may not only be gratifying to our readers, but probably afford them some profitable hints for their practice.

"Mr. Hill refers in his Will to a settlement for his family and his servants; to whom he mentions having disposed the greater part of his estate in his life-time. The particulars of this provision do not of course appear. The bequest of a few articles of plate, &c. however, show the continuance of his esteem to all his family.

"The bulk of his property, which is termed in the Will 'the residue,' is bequeathed 'to the Treasurer for the time being of the Society or Institution called The Village Itinerancy, or Evangelical Association for the progress of the Gospel, the Managing Committee of which, from time to time, meet in Old Broad Street, London. Such residue to be appropriated for the pious and benevolent uses and purposes of that Association.'

"The following bequests are very characteristic:—

"'I give and bequeath to the congregation at Mill Street Chapel, Leamington, Warwickshire, two hundred of my Hymn Books in sheets, one hundred of the larger, and one hundred of the smaller editions, for the use of the congregation; to be sold by the Managers for the time being, and the produce arising therefrom to be applied for the benefit of the Redeemer's cause in the said Chapel.

"'I also give and bequeath for the use of the congregation at Wotton-Underedge, at the Tabernacle, two hundred of my Hymn Books in sheets; one hundred of the large, and one hundred of the small editions; to be sold for the benefit of the Redeemer's cause at Wotton-Underedge.

"'To my coachman, Daniel Church, my carriage and horses. If he wishes to part with them, I request he will sell them to those who will use them well.

"'To Charles Goring, my silver marrow spoon, sugar shovel, all my mourning rings, seven silver table spoons, four salt spoons, my gold watch and appendages, my 'scrutoire in the parlour at Surrey Chapel, and fifty of each edition of my Hymn Books.

"'To Susannah Ash, seven table spoons, my metal watch, and my largest chest of drawers in the front bedroom at Wotton-Underedge.'

"These bequests are in addition to a provision for the servants.

"The remainder of the Hymn Books are bequeathed to the Trustees of Surrey Chapel, for the benefit of the Redeemer's cause there.

"The Testator further directs, that the farm at Wotton-Underedge shall be continued; to assist which, he gives his third horse for the use of the farm. 'I bequeath the whole to the Managers of the Tabernacle at Wotton-Underedge, to apply the produce for the use of the said place of worship.'

"The following specific legacies may not be uninteresting.

"To Rev. Theophilus Jones, nineteen guineas for mourning.

"Elisha Newth, reader of Surrey Chapel, his wife and children, nineteen guineas each.

"To his Executors—John Broadly Wilson, of Upper Clapham, Esq., Joseph Green, Upper Thames Street, Esq., William James, Wotton-Underedge, and Samuel Long, Charfield, Gloucestershire; nineteen guineas each, and several articles of plate.

"To each of the trustees of Surrey Chapel, he has bequeathed mourning rings of three guineas value.

"Various articles of plate and ornamental furniture are given to relatives and friends; among whom are Lord Hill, Sir Robert Hill, Colonel Clement Hill, and the Rev. Edwin Sydney.

"To the poor women at the Surrey Alms-houses, five pounds for mourning.

"The Testator is described as of Wotton-Underedge, Gloucestershire, and of Surrey Chapel, Clerk, and Master of Arts. The property sworn to at the Stamp Office, is under 18,000*l*. and probate of the will was granted on the 30th day of April, 1833."

Anecdote of the late Rev. Rowland Hill.

"The following account, by the Rev. John Griffin of Portsea, in his admirable funeral sermon for his venerable friend, will be read with interest.

"Mr. Hill, when I was with him at Bristol Tabernacle, related to me in his pleasant manner a fact, which occurred in his youth between his father, Sir Rowland Hill, his brother Richard, and himself. The father was not pleased with what he considered the irregular conduct of his sons, in descending so low as to preach in the villages and in the fields. One fine summer evening, our deceased friend was preaching by the side of his father's park, at Hawkestone, in Shropshire. His powerful voice, exerted in a zealous degree, was sufficiently strong for the sound occasionally, while he was preaching, to reach the ears of his father, then sitting in his drawing-room, confined by indisposition. He sent a servant to Richard to require his presence, and, on his arrival, he inquired whose voice it was that he heard. 'It is Rowland, I suppose, Sir, preaching to the people in the neighbourhood.' 'Go, and tell him to come to me immediately,' was the command of the father. Richard obeyed, and went to Rowland, and whispered to him that he must go directly to his father. Rowland said, 'What shall I do with the congregation? I cannot go, unless you come up and finish my discourse.' Richard immediately began to preach, and Rowland went to his father, and received a lecture for his irregular conduct. While receiving this lecture, Sir Rowland said to him, 'I hear some other person preaching now—who is that?' 'I suppose it is Richard finishing my sermon, Sir,' said Rowland. 'Go immediately,' said his father, 'and tell him I command him to come at once to me, and do you come with him.' Rowland immediately obeyed, but when he came to Richard, he had finished the discourse, and dismissed the people. They both went to their father, who severely reprimanded them for so degrading themselves. They both used some affectionate and respectful language to him, and employed some witticisms, and told some risible anecdotes about the grateful expressions of the poor elderly women, which made the father, in spite of his anger and his gout, to smile,—for the Baronet was of course pleased that the people in the neighbourhood of his mansion should be kept in good humour. When his sons perceived that his anger was abated, they bowed and retired: and so the matter ended."

CHRIST EXPOUNDING THE LAW.

The voice of God was mighty, when it brake
Through the deep stillness of chaotic night,
Uttering the potent words, Let there be light!
And light was kindled as th' Eternal spake;
While hosts seraphic hymn'd the wondrous plan,
Which form'd heaven, earth, sun, sea, and crown'd the work with man.

The voice of God was mighty, when it came
From Sinai's summit, wrapp'd in midnight gloom,
When ceaseless thunders told the sinner's doom,
And answering lightnings flash'd devouring flame;
Till prostrate Israel breath'd th' imploring cry,
"Veil, Lord, thy terrors; cease thy thunders, or we die!"

The voice of God was mighty, when alone
Elijah stood on Horeb, and the blast
Rent the huge mountains as Jehovah pass'd,
And the earth quak'd beneath the Holy One;
When ceas'd the storm, the blast, the lightning glare—
And but the "still, small voice" was heard, yet God was there.

Yet not alone in thunder or in storm
The voice of God was mighty, as it came
From the red mountain, or the car of flame:
When stoop'd the Godhead to a mortal form,
When Jesus came to work his Father's will,
His was the voice of God, and it was mighty still.

He chid the billows, and the heaving sea
Lay hush'd—the warring winds obey'd his word;
The conscious demons knew and own'd their Lord,
And at his bidding set the captive free:
But is not hatred strong as wave or wind?
And are the hosts of hell more stubborn than mankind?

These too he vanquish'd: when the holy law
From his pure lips like mountain honey flow'd,
Still as he spake the haughty heart was bow'd,
Passion was calm, and malice couch'd in awe.
The Scribe, perversely blind, began to see,
And mute conviction held the humbled Pharisee.

"Man never spake like this man," was their cry;
And yet he spake, and yet they heard, in vain:
Even as their sires to idols turn'd again,
When Sinai's thunders shook no more the sky;
So these went back to bend at Mammon's shrine,
And heard that voice no more, yet felt it was divine!

THE FIFTH BIRTHDAY VERSES.

BY A FATHER FOR HIS LITTLE BOY.

The rolling months have brought the day
On which my life begun:
How shall I tread my future way,
In peace my course to run?

I'll ask my Father: he can tell,
How I had best pursue
My path of life to end it well,
By keeping heav'n in view.

I know he'll say, "The Bible read;
And daily seek by prayer,
Wisdom from God his paths to tread,
And shun the wicked's snare."

His good advice I'll surely take,
And learn the Saviour's ways;
That I may certain progress make
In wisdom and his grace.

STORMS AND CALMS AT SEA.

"Sunset this evening was truly a splendid sight: the colours of the sky were more various than any I had ever before observed: the clouds too assumed a form, a tinge, and a magnitude in their masses, that excited the admiration of all on board. No sooner had the sun in a dazzling blaze sunk beneath the sea, than the moon shone forth with a brilliancy quite unusual to us of northern climes. Our ship, with all sail set, was gliding silently over the rippled surface of the ocean, when, in a few minutes, all was changed. The wide expanse of burnished gold which replaced the setting sun faded suddenly away; the moon withdrew her trembling beams; and the clouds, forming into one dense black mantle, overspread the firmament, and enveloped the whole horizon in darkness. A flash of lightning in an instant attracted all eyes towards the east, just over the barren coast of Africa. The breeze died away to a perfect calm, and the sails hung loosely against the mast. Thunder followed at a distance: scarcely had its awful hollow murmurings ceased, when the winds came sweeping along the deep, sudden as the lightning which accompanied it. Our ship, not unlike a sea-bird frightened from repose, rushed through the foaming wave, with an unusually tremulous rapidity, at once astonishing and alarming. The seaman's skill was instantly requisite for the prevention of threatened danger. The orders to furl the sails were given and accomplished within a few minutes; and in a short time the squall, accompanied with heavy rain, had passed beyond us. A light breeze succeeded, scarcely sufficient to raise a gentle curl upon the waves; all sail was again set; the moon, surrounded by the resplendent host of heaven, burst with augmented lustre from her concealment, and the overcharged clouds dispersed into various forms, of different shades and hues, leaving the atmosphere around so serene and beautiful as to excite our greater astonishment at the extraordinary suddenness of the change; a circumstance by no means unfrequent between the tropics, sometimes occurring several times in the course of one night."

"If the minister's tongue be like the pen of a ready writer, and the hearers' hearts like oiled paper, the word will make no impression."

"Lo! here is a plurality, a whole chain of blessings. Pardon of sin draws the silver link of grace, and the golden link of glory, after it. You may name it "Gad, a troop cometh." Watson.

TEMPLE OF DIANA, AT EPHESUS.

EPHESUS AND ITS TEMPLE

Have been celebrated, not only by the pens of classic authors, but by the writings of inspired apostles "The temple of the great goddess Diana"—"and her magnificence"—"whom all Asia and the world worshippeth"—"and the image which fell down from Jupiter," as mentioned, with many particulars, Acts xix, will, we doubt not, be interesting to our readers,—especially as the wicked craft of that system of "abominable idolatry" was subverted by the preaching of the gospel—and as that city was favoured with the ministry of St. Paul during three years (Acts xx, 31). A moral revolution more complete and holy, probably, never took place in any city; and among all the apostolic churches, it seems none were more distinguished for their spiritual attainments and personal virtues as disciples of Christ, than the Ephesian believers. John, the beloved disciple of Christ, passed some of his latter days with the people of God in this city; and died at Ephesus, as is believed, about A. D. 100.

Diana's temple at Ephesus, was reckoned by the ancients as one of the "Seven Wonders of the World." The former temple was astonishingly magnificent; and Eratostratus, an Ephesian, set it on fire, B. C. 35. The wretched man confessed, when on the rack, that he was induced to perpetrate that crime, by the desire for his name to be carried down to posterity, if by no other means, yet by the commission of that atrocious incendiarism. Eratostratus has secured that infamous notoriety; though the council of Asia made a decree that no man should mention his name: but his madness or folly was noticed by most historians.

It has been remarked, that on the same night on which this event transpired, Alexander the Great was born. Ambition and vanity were the ruling passions of that scourge of the world; and it is said, that the mighty conqueror of the nations, prompted by his love of fame, offered to build the temple at his own expense, provided the Ephesians would allow his name to be inscribed on its front. The citizens declined the proposal; but fearing to provoke the resentment of that dread prince, they informed him that "it was not proper for one god to build a temple to another." This in a measure satisfied Alexander.

Superstition impelled the idolaters to restore the wondrous fabric, and in a style even more glorious

The pillars and other materials, that had been saved out of the flames, were sold, with the jewels of the Ephesian women, who on that occasion willingly parted with them; and the sum raised by this means served to enable them to proceed with the work. Other contributions were forwarded from "all Asia," to an immense amount, so that the new temple was said to have been built at the common charge of all the Grecian States. Cheiromocrates, who superintended the building of Alexandria, and offered to form Mount Athos into a statue of Alexander, was the architect of this edifice for the goddess.

Pliny says, that to secure the foundations of the conduits or sewers, which were to sustain a building of such a prodigious weight, they laid beds of charcoal, well rammed, and upon them others of wood. He says also, that it was four hundred years in the erection by all Asia: others say only two hundred and twenty. It was four hundred and twenty-five feet in length, two hundred feet in breadth, and supported by one hundred and twenty-seven Parian marble pillars, seventy feet high, twenty-seven of which were most curiously carved, and the rest polished. These pillars were the works, it is said, of so many kings, and the bas-reliefs of one were done by Scopas, the most famous sculptor of antiquity; the altar was almost wholly the work of Praxiteles.

This temple of Diana was esteemed so sacred, that it was an asylum for the guilty: at first this privilege extended a furlong, it was afterwards enlarged by Mithridates to a bow-shot, and doubled by Mark Antony, so that it took in part of the city: but Tiberius, the Roman emperor, to put a stop to the many abuses and disorders that attend such privileges, revoked them all, and declared, that no man guilty of any wicked or dishonest action should escape justice, although he might flee even to the altar of the divinity.

"The image which fell down from Jupiter," was a small statue of ebony, carved by one Canitia, though believed by the superstitious to have been sent down from heaven by their god. The extent of the priestcraft which was practised at Ephesus, may be partly estimated by the contents of the nineteenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles; but language would fail to describe the scenes of iniquity and impurity which were exhibited in that most magnificent monument of idolatrous grandeur. This splendid building is supposed to have been destroyed in the reign of Constantine the Great, pursuant to the edict of that emperor, commanding all the temples of the heathens to be demolished. Of this wonderful structure, there is nothing at present remaining but some ruins, and a few broken pillars, forty feet long and seven in diameter.

Christianity flourished at Ephesus for many years; and the inspired Epistle of Paul remains an invaluable treasure of divine truth for our edification. At the close of the first century, religion had somewhat declined, as intimated by the apostle John, in his letter to the church at Ephesus, Rev. ii, 4, 5: "Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love. Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do the first works; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place, except thou repent." Their "candlestick is removed out of its place," and the great city of Ephesus is no more. The remains of its magnificent theatre, Acts xix, 31, which would contain twenty thousand persons conveniently seated, consist only of some heaps of stone and rubbish. "We heard," says Dr. Chandler, "the partridge call in the arena of the theatre and the stadium. The glorious pomp of its heathen worship is no longer remembered; and Christianity, which was here nursed by apostles, and fostered by general councils, until it increased to fulness of stature, barely lingers on in an existence hardly visible." "I was at Ephesus," says Mr. Arundel, "in January 1824; the desolation was then complete: a Turk, whose shed we occupied, his Arab servant, and a single Greek, composed the entire population; some Turcomans excepted, whose black tents were pitched among the ruins. The Greek revolution, and the predatory excursions of the Samiotes, in great measure accounted for this total desertion. There is still, however, a village near, probably the same which Chishull and Van Egmont mentioned, having four hundred Greek houses."

We beg our readers to refer to the verses which we have quoted from the letter dictated by the Son of God to John, and sent by him to the Ephesian church, and make their own reflections upon the ruin of this once celebrated city, and the extinction of the knowledge of Christ, which are illustrated by its present condition.

ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY.

THIRD CENTURY.

32. ORIGEN. This distinguished confessor of Christ was a native of Alexandria. Leonidas, his father, was a monk of rank and learning: but he was more, he was a Christian, and a martyr for the doctrine of his Redeemer. Origen was born A.D. 185. Leonidas educated his son with pious solicitude, instructing him in the various branches of human learning: but especially, and from a child, he directed his constant studies in the Holy Scriptures. These advantages were improved with diligence, and his progress in the several departments of knowledge, was surprising even to his friends; and his inquisitiveness as to the meaning of passages of Scripture, delighted those who were pious. Origen finished his academical studies under Clemens, at that time the catechist, or professor of Christian theology, at Alexandria. He also attended the lectures of Ammonius, a great philosopher, but of sceptical notions as to religion; and from him Origen became familiarly acquainted with the opinions of Plato, Pythagoras, and the Stoics.

Persecution arising at Alexandria, in its dreadful rage he lost his excellent father, when he was only seventeen years of age. Multitudes fell a sacrifice to pagan malignity; and Origen himself thirsted for the honour of a martyr for Christ. His discreet mother, to prevent the fatal effects of his imprudent zeal, was obliged sometimes to secrete his clothes, that shame might influence him to remain at home. Permission not being granted to him to visit his father in prison before his execution, he sent him a letter worthy of his character. "Father," says he, "faint not, and be not discouraged on our account;" and at the same time encouraging his confidence in the grace and glory of his Saviour.

Leonidas, being beheaded as a criminal, could not bequeath his property to his family: his estate was confiscated. But Origen found a friend in an affluent lady of Alexandria; and being enabled to establish a school, by his great abilities, though but a youth, he was enabled to exhibit a noble example of filial piety, by providing for his widowed mother and her other children.

Clemens being driven from his station at Alexandria, by the violence of persecution, Origen, when only eighteen years of age, was thought the best qualified person to become his successor, as master of the catechetical school, A.D. 203. Thousands attended his lectures, so great was his celebrity; and many, by his instructions, were converted to Christianity; some of whom sealed its doctrines with their blood. Origen, in many instances, accompanied the martyrs to the place of execution; and it has been regarded as extraordinary, that Divine Providence should have preserved him amidst such frequent and threatening dangers.

Zephyrinus, bishop of Rome, and those under his pastoral care, being celebrated for their piety, Origen made a short visit to the Christians of the imperial city, about A. D. 212, and returned to his scholastic duties, taking Heraclas for an assistant, directing his own attention chiefly to the more advanced pupils. With this relief, Origen applied himself more diligently to the study of the Holy Scriptures, and learned the Hebrew language under Huillus, the Jewish patriarch of Alexandria. Convinced that every branch of learning was advantageous to the Christian, as the means of better understanding the Scriptures, he urged upon all his pupils the value of philosophical and mathematical studies. Heretics and heathens, therefore, flocked to attend his lectures, by which many were converted to the faith of Christ. Ambrosius, a nobleman, who had been led away by the errors of Marcion and Valentinus, became reclaimed by this means, and ever after was one of his most powerful friends at Alexandria.

Origen acquired immortal honour by completing, A. D. 214, his celebrated work called "Tetrapla:" This was the Old Testament in four Greek translations. By this work, which was arranged in four columns, the reader might see how far there was an agreement between the Septuagint, and the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and the new one of Theodotion. His fame was extensively spread; and the governor of Arabia sent to Demetrius, bishop of the Christians at Alexandria, and to the prefect of Egypt, desiring that Origen might speedily be sent to instruct him in the doctrine of Christ. Origen went; and having performed the welcome duty, returned to his studies. But the barbarous Caracalla, coming to Alexandria with an army, to revenge himself for some sarcastic expression against him for the murder of his brother, Origen escaped his murderous sword, and withdrew to Cæsarea, in Palestine. Here he opened an academy; but presuming, at the request of the bishops of those parts, to expound the Scriptures, and to preach in the church, he not having been ordained by the bishop of Alexandria, that prelate, Demetrius, was incensed against him, and ordered him to return to Alexandria. The bishops of Palestine apologized to Demetrius, assuring him that Origen had done only that which was customary: but the haughty prelate was not satisfied.

Origen then went to Antioch, at the request of Mancea, mother of the emperor Alexander, and a friend to the Christians. She found in his excellent spirit and piety the reason of the veneration cherished for Origen: he soon returned to Egypt.

Commentaries on different parts of the Holy Scriptures now occupied much of the time of Origen, being prompted and encouraged by his generous friend Ambrosius; who not only allowed him a maintenance, but provided him several amanuenses. Demetrius sent Origen, A. D. 228, into Greece, for the purpose of suppressing some heresies, by which the churches were disturbed. Making the circuit of Palestine in his journey, having letters of recommendation from his bishop, and being forty-three years of age, the bishops of Jerusalem and Cæsarea ordained him presbyter. Demetrius was extremely offended with this procedure, as a reflection upon his own authority; and envying the splendour of Origen's reputation, charged him with a matter which had occurred in early life, as a grievous crime, on account of which he had before commended him as one of the greatest examples of exalted virtue. (Matt. xix, 12). He even assembled a synod in Egypt, in which he procured his condemnation, and a decree that he should be banished from Alexandria.

Origen, thus an exile, devoted himself still to his beloved work of diffusing scriptural knowledge, and laboured to perfect an edition of the Old Testament from the several translations. He now composed his "Hexapla," in six versions. This contained the Hebrew text in one column, in Hebrew letters, and the same in Greek letters in another column, together with the four columns of his "Tetrapla." To this great work he afterwards made an addition of two other versions, one which he found at Jericho, and another found by one of his pupils at Nicopolis: this was called "Octapla."

Such were some of the labours of this extraordinary man; and from this account, our less learned readers will perceive an example of the care and talents which have been employed in preserving and circulating the Holy Scriptures. St. Jerome, of the next century, by whom the Latin version of the Bible was made, which is the standard of the Roman Catholic church, and who was esteemed the greatest biblical scholar of that age, was used to say of Origen, that he "could be well content to endure all the load of envy that was heaped upon him, provided he possessed the same acquaintance with the Divine oracles."

Origen was almost worn out with labours and cares, when the emperor Decius assumed the purple. Persecution raged under this tyrant, and Origen suffered dreadfully. Eusebius refers to his letters for a relation of his troubles; and says, "The devil with all his forces enviously setting himself against this man, and fighting against him with all his subtilty and power, assailing him particularly above all those who were set upon at that time. Many and great things he also suffered for the doctrine of Christ, as bonds, bodily torments, the punishment of the iron-chain in the inmost recesses of the prison. He was put upon the rack, his feet for several days being stretched so wide as to the distance of four holes. He valiantly sustained the menaces of fire, and all other tortures inflicted by his enemies: the judge with his utmost power earnestly endeavouring that he might not soon be slain. Yet his expressions left behind are comfortable to the helpless."

Decius dying, Origen was released; and he spent the remainder of his life in doing good to the sick, the poor, and suffering. He is truly said to have had "a mighty regard to the glory of God, and the good of souls, whose happiness he studied by all ways to promote, and thought nothing hard, nothing servile, that he might advance them." He was supported by an allowance of five pence a day, from the purchaser of his library; and died A. D. 253, at Tyre, "the envy of his own, and the wonder of succeeding ages."

Except a few fragments, all the astonishing works of Origen have perished, by the ravages of martial barbarians

COVETOUSNESS.

The lion doth refresh himself with the prey that he taketh; but the covetous man layeth by his money as a sick man sits by his meat, and hath no power to taste it. Thus the covetous man maketh a fool of himself. He coveteth to covet: he gathereth to gather: he laboureth to labour: he careth to care: as though his office were to fill a coffer full of gold, and then to die; like an ass which carrieth treasures on his back all day, and at night they are taken from him, which did no good but to load him. How happy were some, if they knew not gold from lead!—Smith.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

NOAH.

The State of the World in the Age of Noah.

The religious character of Noah will appear to shine with additional lustre, when we reflect upon the corrupt state of the world at the time in which he lived. Virtue is always lovely and noble: but it never appears to so great advantage, as when surrounded with increasing difficulties, and exposed to powerful temptations. In the case of Noah, these were as numerous, and as mighty, as the depravity of man could make them. Men had exceedingly multiplied upon the earth, and they had increased in wickedness in full proportion to their number. Iniquity had now arrived at its utmost enormity, and loudly called for some terrible manifestation of the Divine indignation.

Long before the birth of Noah, the marriages of the apostate sons of Seth, with the fair, but profane daughters of the Cainites, had produced a race of men, giants in bodily stature, and monsters in works of evil. But in the time of this patriarch, the earth was wholly overspread with corruption; every kind of violence prevailed, and virtuous principles seemed eradicated from the hearts of the whole human race. The sacred historian says, "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. And it repented the Lord that he had made man upon the earth, and it grieved him at his heart." Gen. vi, 5, 6. The age advanced; and it is added, "The earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was full of violence. And God looked upon the earth, and behold it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth." Ver. 11, 12.

Here we learn, from the testimony of God himself, that the principles of the antediluvians were utterly depraved: their crimes had become so enormous, that it seemed to no purpose to afford them religious instruction. External reproofs were useless, and internal checks of conscience were scarcely ever felt.

"Self-polluted, lost, debased,
Every noble trait defaced,
To rapine, lust, and murder given,
Denying God! defying heaven!
Spoilers of the shrine and hearth,
Behold the impious sons of earth!"

"And the Lord said, My spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh: yet his days shall be a hundred and twenty years." Gen. vi, 3. The wickedness of men having become irremediable, the awful period was hastened, when the evil nature of sin should be made manifest in the sight of all intelligent beings, by its dreadful consequences upon the earth, and upon all its living inhabitants. In the counsels of heaven their total destruction was determined. "The end of all flesh," says God, "is come before me. I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth; both man, and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air." Gen. vi, 7.

These expressions indicate the righteous displeasure of the Lord against sin and sinners: sin is unspeakably offensive to his holiness, and his justice requires that he should punish transgressors. His awful threatenings and his executed vengeance should serve as an effectual lesson to us, that with true humility of heart we may prize that propitiation, through which God can be "just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." Rom. iii, 26. May all our young readers reflect upon the threatened indignation of a righteous God, and "flee youthful lusts, following after righteousness, and lay hold on eternal life in Christ Jesus."

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXXII.

The extent to which Education should be carried.

Dear Madam,

We are now arrived, if I mistake not, at a point in our correspondence, which must be decided before proceeding further; namely, — the extent to which education should be conducted.

It will not be imagined, I presume, that every body is under the necessity of becoming thoroughly acquainted with every thing. Neither do I fear that you are one of those persons who inconsiderately and ignorantly say, "Learn every thing within your reach, for you do not know what you may need before you go out of the world." This maxim proceeds upon an equal measure of wisdom with that other relating to housewifery,— "Buy every thing that is offered you for sale, that when you need any thing you may not have to go and purchase it." You will, I doubt not, admit with me, that life is too short, the cares of subsistence too numerous, and the human faculties too imperfect, to admit of time and attention being bestowed upon acquirements, which there is no present likelihood will ever become useful. Nor do I much doubt your acquiescence in another maxim, which is, that genuine excellence can only be obtained by giving our entire, or at least our chief attention, to one particular pursuit or subject of study. The justice of these principles will, I believe, be intuitively perceived by every person possessed of a sound understanding. They also furnish us with a few desirable rules for the conduct of education in general.

The first of these is, that the kind and degree of education given to any individual, ought to be regulated by the profession, art, or trade, to which he is to be expected to devote his time during the remainder of his life.

The question is, what is likely to be really of service to your son as a member of society? — what is he likely to need? You will reply, that before you could answer this inquiry, you would require to know to what particular art or trade or profession he may be devoted for the rest of his life, when he shall come to act his part in the great concerns of human life.

I hope in my next Letter to offer you some observations upon the choice of a profession; but my observations at present being of a general nature, will equally apply to him in any art or trade or profession which he may select.

In the first place, it appears plain to me, that the parent should never attempt to communicate to his son an education, which either as to the length of time or the sum of money it may require, may tend in any material degree to shorten the comforts of his own home, or to diminish the advantages of his other children. Yet how often do you hear inconsiderate parents declare, that their son, or their daughter, naming some particular child, shall at all events be a scholar, shall have a first-rate education. Accordingly this child is sent to a school, the terms of which distress the parent to comply with, and by the consternation and anxiety they occasion him, diffuse a cloud during several years over the domestic circle. The lad, in the mean time, is often sent to a school where he mingles with boys whose manners and habits make him feel his inferiority: to them he becomes a sycophant, or is neglected and despised by them, or when he returns home finds the manners of his own household very different from those of his companions; whence he learns to be disgusted with it, and alienated from it; and not unfrequently the ignorant parent, upon the first domestic storm, will vent his displeasure upon the unfortunate lad, by telling him what amazing sacrifices he has made and is making to continue his education. Then, in the pride and tyranny of his heart, he will expatiate upon the extent of gratitude his son ought to evince, and the implicit and zealous obedience which he ought to render. Unhappy parent! your grey hairs ought to be the crown of wisdom; your experience of the world and of your own heart should long ago have led you to discover the pride and vanity of your own self-will, or your own thoughtlessness, which, rather than any peculiar wish for the welfare of your child, prompted you to engage in the ruinous scheme of sending him to a school so expensive. Blame not your child, blame yourself; and learn, if you can, that in this as in every other instance of human life, the reason why your plans are attended with inconvenience, is because they were not laid and conducted in reason and forethought.

Another rule which appears to me of invaluable importance is, that the course of education should be conducted scrupulously with a view to his future profession. I have already intimated my intention of offering you some remarks respecting this topic in a future Letter; but I may now say, that in this respect many parents are ill advised in their system. Thus the son who is to be a farmer must learn book-keeping; or though he is to be a linendraper, he must learn Latin, and even begin Greek also. They would also deem it a matter of regret, and even a cause of shame, if he came away from school without some knowledge of French. If they have a girl at school, the father and mother, who are daily occupied in the farm, would think it a grievous neglect if she did not learn music and drawing. In a short time the lad comes home from school, with a deficient knowledge of the things he ought to be acquainted with, and a still more defective knowledge of the useless things he has been attending to. He writes a worse hand than he would have done, he is less advanced and expert in arithmetic than he would have been, had it not been for the wretched and worthless commencement of Latin, into which he has been whipped. He has learnt a few rules, which he does not understand; he has been crammed with the knowledge of a few pages of some inferior Latin author. He can, however, confound his parents with admiration. Their vanity is gratified, though their money is squandered, and his time wasted.

Through the doses of adulation they administer to him, he may perchance actually think himself a scholar, and spurn the degrading pursuits of trade. Hence he will sigh over the ledger in remembrance of poetry, and perhaps fancy himself another Henry Kirke White, a genius obscured by the hard fortune of being condemned to earn his daily bread by a mechanical employment. Let but this notion gain possession of him, and he will become discontented, unhappy, idle, unsuccessful, and perhaps dissolute.

Should he, however, have sufficient strength of moral constitution to withstand the praises of ignorant parents, he will find that all the Latin lessons, which cost him so many hours intense study, so many tears, and so many floggings, are absolutely worse than useless. He forgets them all as soon as he can; and within a twelvemonth the linendraper's apprentice retains no recollection of his classical acquirements. The same may be said of his acquirements in the French language. The time, the money, were equally thrown away which were spent for the acquirement of a few sounds, which certainly never were heard in France, and never would be understood by any human being in all the Gallic dominions. How much better had it been, if this lad, whose future destination the parent could easily have foreseen, had been made thoroughly acquainted with those qualifications which he would assuredly need.

The specimen selected is certainly from one particular class of life, but the principle of these remarks will hold good with regard to every other. There is as much propriety, that is to say, impropriety, in the case of a boy whose talents, station, parents, or means, entitle him to look forward to become a member of a learned profession, learning to plough or sow, or keep sheep, as there is for a lad who is to be a driver of oxen, or a measurer of cloth, to learn heraldry, or chemistry, or geology, or the Latin language, or any other branch of knowledge which his circumstances will not allow him to learn perfectly, and which would be useless, or rather an incumbrance to himself, if they did. In all this, however, we may see the necessity of strong good sense on the part of the parent. To such persons the communication of useless knowledge to their offspring, that is, of knowledge which they are not likely hereafter to need, will seem as absurd a proposal as to load a man, who is about to run a race, with needless garments and ornaments.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.
CLERICUS.

LECTURE I.

"OUR FATHER WHICH ART IN HEAVEN."

What two things do these words teach us? — 1. That we may pray to God without fear, because he is our Father: 2. That nevertheless we must pray to him with reverence, because he is in heaven.

How is God our Father? — Because he acts the part of a father.

What do our fathers do for us? — They love us.

What does that love lead them to do for us? — It leads them to take care of us, and to give us those things of which we are in need.

What does God do for us? — God loves us.

What has that love led God to do for us? — It led him to pity us, and to open to us a way by which we may escape from that destruction and misery into which sin has brought us.

How has God saved us? — He saved us by sending Jesus Christ into the world to die for us; who, by dying for us, bore the punishment of our sins, and obtained the Holy Spirit, to make us free from sin, and fit for heaven.

What return can we make to our parents for their kindness towards us? — We can do what they tell us to do, and try to please them.

What return can we make to God for his goodness towards us? — We may obey God's commandments.

What are God's commandments? — Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself.

What is the meaning of God's being in heaven? — It means that God is able to do all things, that he knows all things, that he rules over all things, and that he is surrounded by angels who do what he tells them to do.

Is God in heaven now? — Yes.

Is God on earth now? — Yes.

Can God be in two places at the same time? — Yes, God is everywhere at the same time.

If then God is so great and glorious, that he can do all things, and see all things, and that he knows all things, when we pray to him, in what manner ought we to pray? And how ought we to behave ourselves, whether we are at his house, or at play, or at work, or whatever we are doing? — When we offer to God our prayers, or are at his house, we ought to be very serious, and to think about what we are doing; and when we are at play, we should never say wicked words, or do wicked things, because God has told us not to do so.

Will God be angry with you, if you say wicked words, and do wicked things? — Yes.

How do you know that he will be angry? — Because it is said that "God is angry with the wicked every day."

What has he said respecting future punishment? — "The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the people that forget God."

Teacher. Then how careful we ought always to be, to do what God tells us to do, and never to do what he tells us not to do. We ought never to forget that God sees us, whether we are in his house, or at play, or walking in the fields: we ought never to forget that God sees us, or forget his commandments, because he is so kind to us, has done so much for us, sent his Son to die for us, and is willing when we die, if we pray to him, to take away our sins and to take us to heaven; but he has told us, that he will turn into hell, into everlasting misery, the wicked, all those who forget God's commandments, and that he always sees them.

Babylon, the capital of Chaldea, built by Nimrod, in the place where the tower of Babel was begun. Babylon being the capital of Nimrod's empire, its antiquity is not to be questioned; and indeed profane authors themselves, who know nothing of the Scriptures, make the son of Belus, whom they will have to be the founder of Babylon, to have lived two thousand years before Semiramis. Marsham brings down the foundation of this city so late as the time of Nabonassar; but the opinion most generally followed, and best grounded, is, that Nimrod founded it, Belus enlarged it, and Semiramis added so many great works and otherwise adorned it, that she might not improperly be called the foundress of it: but Nebuchadnezzar was the person who put the finishing hand to it, and made it one of the great wonders of the world. Herodotus has described it nearly in the following words: "The whole city," says he, "which stood on a large plain, consisted properly of two parts, which were divided by the river Euphrates. The walls were every way prodigious: they were in thickness 87 feet, in height 350, and in compass 480 furlongs. These walls were drawn round the city in form of an exact square; they were surrounded on the outside with a vast ditch full of water, and lined with bricks on both sides. In every side of this great square were twenty-five gates, that is, an hundred in all, which were made of solid brass; between every two gates there were three towers, and four men at the four corners, and three between each of these corners and the next gate on either side; so that the whole number of streets was 50, each fifteen miles long, whereof twenty-five went one way, and twenty-five the other, directly crossing each other at right angles; besides these there were also four half streets, which had houses only on one side, and the wall on the other: these went round the four sides of the city next the walls, and were each of them 200 feet broad, and the rest about 150. By these streets thus crossing each other, the whole city was cut into 676 squares, each of which was four furlongs and a half on every side. Round these squares, on every side towards the streets, stood the houses. The space within the middle of each square was all void ground, employed for yards, gardens, and other uses. A branch of the river Euphrates run across the city from the north to the south side. On each side of the river was a quay, and a high wall of the same thickness with those of the city. In these walls, over against every street that led to the river, were gates of brass, and from them descents by steps to the river. The bridge was not inferior to any of the other buildings, either in beauty or magnificence: and before it was begun to be built, they turned the course of the river Euphrates, and laid its channel dry, as well for the purpose of laying the foundation more conveniently, as to raise artificial banks on both sides the river, to secure the country from those annual inundations, whereby it overflowed its banks, in like manner as the Nile does in Egypt. The river being turned out of its course to facilitate these works was received into a prodigious artificial lake, dug for that purpose to the west of Babylon. The lake was fifty-two miles square, and fifty-five feet deep, according to Herodotus, seventy-five according to Megasthenes. Into this lake was the whole river turned by an artificial canal, till all the work was finished. But that the Euphrates might not overflow the city through the gates on its side, this lake, with the canal from the river, was still preserved. At the two ends of the bridge were two palaces, which had a communication with each other by a vault built under the channel of the river: the old palace, which stood on the east side of the river, was thirty furlongs in circumference; and the new palace, which stood on the other side of the river, was sixty furlongs in circumference. It was surrounded with three walls, one within another, with some considerable space between them. These walls, as also those of the other palace, were embellished with an infinite variety of sculptures, representing all kinds of animals to the life. In this last palace were the hanging gardens, so much celebrated in history: these were of a square form, every side of which was four hundred feet long; they were carried up in the air in the manner of several large terraces, one above another, till the height equalled that of the walls of the city. The ascent was from terrace to terrace, by stairs ten feet wide; and the whole pile was sustained by vast arches raised upon other arches, one above another, and strengthened by a wall surrounding it on every side, twenty-two feet thick. On the top of these arches were laid large flat stones, sixteen feet long, and four broad: these were lined with bricks, closely cemented together with plaster, and that covered with sheets of lead, upon which lay the mould of the garden. Another of the great works of Babylon was the temple of Belus, supposed to be the tower of Babel, built there at the confusion of languages. The richness of this temple, in statues, tables, censers, cups, and other sacred vessels, all of massy gold, was immense: among other images, there was one of forty feet high, which weighed one thousand Babylonish talents of gold*."

Such were the chief works, which rendered Babylon so famous; most of which are, by profane authors, ascribed to Semiramis. From the Assyrians this great and noble city came into the hands of the Persians, and from them into the hands of the Macedonians; and here it was that Alexander the Great died. But not long after his death the city began to decline apace, by the building of Seleucia, about forty miles above it, by Seleucus Nicanor, who is said to have erected this city in hatred to the Babylonians, and to have drawn out of Babylon five hundred thousand persons to people it; so that the ancient city was in the time of Curtius the historian lessened one-fourth part; in the time of Pliny, reduced to desolation; in the days of St. Jerome, turned into parks, wherein the kings of Persia were accustomed to hunt; and, according to the relation of some late travellers, only one tower remains to mark the place of this vast and splendid city. See Isa. xiii, 17.

Death-Bed Testimonies.

COLLECTED BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM BUTTON.

No. VII.

REV. THOMAS COLE, M.A.

He was brought up at Westminster school, and thence elected student of Christ-church, Oxford. In 1656, he became Principal of St. Mary's Hall, where he was tutor to Mr. West, and many more divines of the church of England, as well as of other eminent scholars, particularly of the great Mr. Locke.

At the time that the controversy was so warmly agitated respecting what is called the Neonomian doctrine, he was one of those who vigorously opposed it; and his opposition seems to have been made in the integrity of his heart, and from a firm persuasion of the truth and importance of the doctrine he espoused. Mr. Trail, who visited him upon his death-bed, desired him then to deliver his thoughts upon that subject. He answered, "With all my heart: I have enough to say of that. One thing I am convinced of, that it is a foolish thing to seek for the justification of a sinner without satisfaction to the justice of God, which nothing can make but the righteousness of Christ imputed to him." Mr. Trail then asked him if he had no kind of repenting for having given occasion for the contention there had been about this doctrine. "Repenting! No, I repent I have been no more vigorous in defending those truths in the confidence whereof I die. If I desire to live, it is that I may be more serviceable to Christ in defending his name in the pulpit. But he can defend his truths when his poor creatures are laid in the dust." Mr. Trail then said, "We desire, Sir, to know the peace and comfort you have from these truths, as to your eternal state." He replied, "They are my only ground of comfort. Death would be terrible indeed, if it were not for the comfortable assurance faith gives me of eternal life in Christ, and of the abundant flowing in of that life: not what I bring to Christ, but derive from Christ; having received some beginning of it, which I see springing up to eternal life."

The frame of his mind with regard to his approaching end, was the most happy imaginable, which he expressed to several persons at different times, in such words as these. "I wait for a peaceable dismission. I long to see his salvation. I would not live always. I long to be with Christ. It is a pleasant thing to die: but God's time is my time; my work is done when His is." To one who visited him a little before his death, he said, "You are come to hear my last dying groans; but know, when you hear them, it is the sweetest breath I ever drew since I knew Christ. I have a promise I shall be for ever with the Lord. I long to be released; but not my will, but thine be done. I long for death, as a weary traveller doth for rest. Nothing troubles me but life, and nothing will relieve me but death; but let God do what he will with me; all he does is best." Upon a friend saying, "You seem to be sleepy, Sir;" he replied, "I shall sleep quickly, and awake in everlasting day. Ere long, my days and nights will be all one. The apprehension that faith gives me of a better life is my consolation. As for my going, God can make it no loss to you. He can set on and take off his workmen as he pleases."

There having been a public meeting for prayer on his account, he said to Mr. Griffith, who had attended it, "I thank you for your prayers, but I am a subject too low for such a public solemnity; only that little corner of God's vineyard in which I laboured, should have been thus engaged." Being asked what he would have the church pray for, he answered, "Nothing for me, but a strong faith in Jesus Christ; I desire nothing more." His friend replying, "But your life is for service;" he said, "God is the best judge of that: pray that God would glorify himself in my life or death: I submit." Having inquired what time it was, he said, "Time passeth into eternity. We live but dying lives in the body, till death is swallowed up of life. I long to be immortal."

This eminent saint entered into the joy of his Lord on Thursday, Sept. 16, 1697, in the 70th year of his age. From Lime Street, where he had resided, his remains were removed to Draper's Hall, and from thence for interment to the upper ground in Bunhill Fields.

DR. THOMAS GOODWIN.

Died, Feb. 1679; in the 80th year of his age.

In Feb. 1679, a fever seized him, which in a few days put an end to his life. In all the violence of it, he discoursed with that strength of faith, and assurance of the love of Christ, with that holy admiration of free grace, with that joy in believing, and such thanksgivings and praises, as extremely affected all that heard him. He rejoiced in the thoughts that he was dying, and going to have a full and uninterrupted communion with God. "I am going," said he, "to the Three Persons, with whom I have had communion: they have taken me, I did not take them. I shall be changed in the twinkling of an eye: all my lusts and corruptions I shall be rid of, which I could not be here." Mentioning those great examples of faith in Heb. xi, "All these," said he, "died in faith. I could not have imagined I should ever have had such a measure of faith in this hour: no, truly I could never have imagined it. My bow abides in strength. Is Christ divided? No:—I have the whole of his righteousness; I am found in him, not in my own righteousness, which is of the law, but in the righteousness which is of God, which is by faith of Jesus Christ, who loved me and gave himself for me. Christ cannot love me better than he doth; and I think I cannot love Christ better than I do. I am swallowed up in God. Now I shall be ever with the Lord." With this assurance of faith and fulness of joy, his soul left this world, and went to see and enjoy that blessed state of glory, which in a discourse on that subject he had so well described. He was interred in Bunhill Fields, where, upon a low altar tomb, there is a long Latin inscription. S. J. B**.

ON THE EXCELLENCY OF THE SCRIPTURES.

Read the Bible daily, nay, even night and day; for all arts and sciences are contained in the book of God. This one book is a library. Here you may confer with the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and ancient saints. Here is a looking glass to show you your spots (James i, 23), and a laver to wash them off (Eph. v, 26.) See, here is a garden full of flowers: here is a casket full of jewels: here is a heaven full of stars; here is a book full of God.—Cheynell.

CONVERSION OF SAUL.

Did not Christ show himself in this act to be a God of judgment? He sat watching in heaven for the season to turn Paul with the greatest advantage. His wisdom answers many ends at once. He struck dead at one blow Paul's sin, his people's fears, the high priest's expectations, and the devil's hopes. He triumphs over his enemies, secures his friends, saves Paul's soul, and promotes his interest by him: he disappoints the devil of his expectations, and hell of her longing.—Charnock.

THE SABBATH.

HAIL, peaceful morn! thy dawn I hail!
How do thy hours my mind regale
With feasts of heavenly joy!
Nor can I half thy blessings name,
Which kindle in my soul a flame,
And all my powers employ.

Thou hallow'd season of repose!
Thou balm to soothe the throbbing woes
Of this care-stricken breast!
Thy sacred hours I'll ever greet,
And with the faithful will I meet
To taste thy holy rest.

How shall I best improve thy hours?
Lord, on me shed, in copious showers,
Thy Spirit and thy grace!
That when thy sacred courts I tread,
My soul may eat the heavenly bread,
And sing Jehovah's praise!

May every sermon, like the dew,
Gently distil, refresh, renew,
And consolate the mind;
Receiv'd with meekness, truth, and love,
Engrafted, fruitful may it prove,
And leave its joy behind.

Then to my chamber I'll repair,
With awe to talk with God in prayer,
And all my griefs to tell:
His kind compassion will relieve,
His bounteous hand will mercies give;
With mourners he will dwell.

Thus may my Sabbath pass away—
My best, my holiest, happiest day—
The sweetest of the seven:
But yet a rest for saints remains,
A Sabbath free from cares and pains,
Eternal, and in heaven!

Ranelagh. R. H. SHEPHERD.

CHRIST IN THE GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE.

A wreath of glory circles still his head;
And yet he kneels—and yet he seems to be
Convuls'd with more than human agony.
On his pale brow the drops are large and red,
As victim's blood at votive altar shed.
His hands are clasp'd, his eyes are rais'd in prayer.
Alas! and is there strife HE cannot bear,
Who calm'd the tempest, and who rais'd the dead?

There is! there is! for now the powers of hell
Are struggling for the mastery: 'tis the hour
When Death exerts his last permitted power:
When the dread weight of sin, since Adam fell,
Is visited on Him, who deign'd to dwell
A man with men, that He might bear the stroke
Of wrath divine, and burst the captive's yoke;—
But, oh! of that dread strife what words can tell!

Those, only those, which broke with many a groan
From his full heart—"Oh! Father, take away
The cup of vengeance I must drink to-day:—
Yet, Father, not my will, but thine be done!"
It could not pass away: for He alone
Was mighty to endure, and strong to save;
Nor would Jehovah leave Him in the grave,
Nor could corruption taint his Holy One.

MISSIONARY RECORDS.—NORTH AMERICA.

One vol. 18mo. cloth, pp. 434. Tract Society.

THE history of our holy religion is a history of missions, recording the most benevolent, philanthropic, and godlike efforts to glorify God and promote the happiness of mankind.

Missionary labours by Protestants are by many supposed to have originated with the London, or Baptist Societies; or at least with the efforts of Dr. Coke and the Methodists, or the apostolic Moravians. This most interesting volume will show that such divine undertakings date at least a century earlier than the Moravian missions. We sincerely rejoice to see such a compilation as this work exhibits, published by the Religious Tract Society. Its "Records" have been collected with much industry and judgment, and it deserves to be read by every young person who is engaged or invited to contribute to the furtherance of the Missionary cause. The details of the labours of Eliot, the "Apostle of the Indians," of the Mayhews, and Brainerd especially, will be read with the deepest interest, particularly as their successes were so remarkable in establishing "towns of praying Indians." We shall have pleasure in referring again to this most instructive volume.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF TUAM AND THE BAPTIST IRISH SOCIETY.

INFIDELITY, crime, and ignorance, never will be destroyed in the British Isles, until the ministers of Christ of every denomination shall cordially co-operate as Christian brethren. This being our conviction, we rejoice to find the following in the report of the "Baptist Irish Society."

"The Rev. Josiah Wilson, one of its agents, having died during the past year, the archbishop of Tuam bore testimony to his excellent character, in a letter to a clergyman, in the following terms. 'I sincerely mourned over the death of that valuable and godly man, Mr. Wilson. I must ever remember him with reverence and respect. And, during his agency under the Society, I most heartily encouraged the co-operation of the clergy of the Established Church with the Society, in the good work of moral and religious education. And I have the satisfaction of hearing that all went on in Christian brotherly harmony, having a single eye to the glory of God, the exaltation of the Saviour, and the promotion of his kingdom upon earth.'"

DETACHED THOUGHTS.

IF we are taught of the Spirit to see the depth of iniquity which lies within our hearts, and the tendency of our disposition towards carnal security, we shall see the absolute necessity of strong cries to Jehovah for restraining and preventing grace. To adorn the doctrines of God the Saviour in all things, is no less the duty of the Christian than to believe in his atonement and righteousness for justification and salvation; and it is the happy harmony of those two principles which constitutes that "beauty of holiness" with which the church is adorned. Whilst we grow in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus, and are able to comprehend more of the lengths and breadths and depths and heights of his love, may we be assiduous to demonstrate to the world that heavenly-mindedness and cautious walk and conversation, which are the necessary fruits of being in union with Christ. ARABIAN BANDITTI IN PURSUIT OF A CARAVAN.

HISTORIC NOTICES AND MANNERS OF THE ARABIANS.

Our engraving will receive its most edifying illustration from the history of the fulfilment of a divine prophecy. The Arabs, as most of our readers know, claim relation to the patriarch Abraham, as their worthy progenitor; and they trace their descent from his son Ishmael. Concerning that remarkable son of Abraham, the angel of the Lord declared to his mother, before his birth, "I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude. And the angel of the Lord said unto her, Behold, thou art with child, and shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ishmael (God who hears); because the Lord hath heard thy affliction. And he will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren." Gen. xvi, 10—12.

Divine providence concerning Ishmael has been truly wonderful through all generations to the present day. His family so increased, that in the second generation afterwards they were among the principal merchants of the East. Hence we read of "Ishmaelites trading into Egypt." Gen. xxxvii. His posterity became exceedingly multiplied in the people of several famous clans in Arabia. Some of these clans were denominated Hagarenes, probably from Hagar his mother; others were called Nabatheans, from his eldest son Nebaioth; and others Itureans, from his son Itur. These people increased amazingly; and in the middle ages, under the terrible name of Saracens, overspread a third part of the earth, conquering many powerful countries, not only in Asia, but in Africa and Europe.

Ishmael himself subsisted by rapine in the wilderness; and his posterity, in every succeeding age, rendered Arabia dreadful to their neighbours by their predatory incursions. There are almost innumerable clans of the Arabs; and every petty chief, in his own district, considers himself a sovereign: but though seemingly divided, they are all united in a sort of league, which has been manifested in a remarkable manner in cases of the invasion of their country. They have lived in a state of continual war with the rest of mankind, generally robbers by land and pirates by sea. And as they have been such enemies to the rest of the world, it can excite no surprise, that, in return, mankind have always been enemies to them. On this account, travellers, in every age, have been obliged to traverse their country in caravans, or large companies, with arms for their protection; and to defend themselves from the assaults of freebooters, to march with their sentinels, and to keep watch like an army. Thus, according to the literal meaning of the prediction, has been fulfilled the declaration of the angel—"His hand shall be against every man."

Mohammed, the famous Arabian impostor, was one of this people. His system of religion corresponded with the depraved character of his countrymen; and after his escape from Mecca to Medina, he assumed the command of his followers as their martial chief. Every year after his flight was marked by battles and assassinations. In the nine following years of his life, he commanded his army in eight general engagements, and undertook, by himself or his lieutenants, fifty military enterprizes.

The death of Mohammed, A. D. 632, threw a temporary gloom over his cause, and the disunion of his followers threatened its extinction. Any other empire placed in the same circumstances would have crumbled to pieces: but the Arabs felt their power; they revered their founder as the chosen prophet of God; and their ardent temperament, animated by a religious enthusiasm, gave an earnest of future success, and encouraged the zeal or the ambition of their leaders. The succession, after some bloodshed, was settled, and unnumbered hordes of barbarians were ready to carry into execution the sanguinary dictates of their prophet, and with "The Koran, tribute, or death," as their motto, to invade the countries of the infidels. During the whole of the succeeding century, their rapid career was unchecked; the disciplined armies of the Greeks and Romans were unable to stand against them; the Christian churches of Asia and Africa were annihilated; and from India to the Atlantic, through Persia, Arabia, Syria, Palestine, Asia Minor, Egypt, with the whole of northern Africa, Spain, and part of France, the impostor was acknowledged. Constantinople was besieged, Rome itself was plundered; and nothing less than the destruction of the whole Christian world was meditated on the one hand, and tremblingly expected on the other.

All this was wonderful; but the avenging justice of God, and the sure word of prophecy, relieve our astonishment. It was to punish an apostate race, that the Saracen locusts (see Rev. ix) were let loose upon the earth; and the countries which they were permitted to ravage were those in which the pure light of revelation had been most abused. The Eastern church was sunk in gross idolatry; vice and wickedness prevailed in their worst forms; and those who still called themselves Christians, trusted more to images, relics, altars, austerities, and pilgrimages, than to a crucified Saviour.

"About a hundred and eighty years from the foundation of Bagdad, during which period the power of the Saracens had gradually declined, a dreadful reaction took place in the conquered countries. The Persians on the east, and the Greeks on the west, were simultaneously roused from their long thraldom, and assisted by the Turks, who, issuing from the plains of Tartary, now for the first time made their appearance in the east, extinguished the power of the caliphate, and virtually put an end to the Arabian monarchy, A. D. 936. A succession of nominal caliphs continued to A. D. 1258, but the provinces were lost; their power was confined to the walls of their capital; and they were in real subjection to the Turks and the Persians until the above year, when Mostacem, the last of the Abbasides, was dethroned and murdered by Holagou, or Huluka, the Tartar, the grandson of Zingis. This event, although it terminated the foreign dominion of the Arabians, left their native independence untouched. They were no longer, indeed, the masters of the finest parts of the three great divisions of the ancient world: their work was finished; and, returning to the state in which Mohammed found them three centuries before, with the exception of the change of their religion, they remained, and still remain, the unconquered rovers of the desert."

As to that part of the prediction which declares, "He shall dwell in the presence of his brethren," it has been most remarkably fulfilled. The country of Ishmael is situated in that part of the globe where society originated, and the first kingdoms were formed. The greatest empires of the world arose and fell around them. They have not been secluded from correspondence with foreign nations, and thus through ignorance and prejudice remained attached to simple and primitive manners. In the early period of their history, they were united as allies to the most powerful monarchs of the East; and their conquests extended over the most considerable kingdoms of the earth. Through successive ages the caravans of the merchant, and the companies of the Mohammedan pilgrims, have passed regularly over their deserts; even their patriarchal religion has undergone several total changes. Yet all these circumstances, which it might be supposed would have subdued the most inveterate habits, produced no effect upon the Arabs: they still preserve, unimpaired, a most exact resemblance to the first descendants of Ishmael.

The Arabians are the only people in the world who have preserved their descent, their independence, their language, and their manners and customs, from the earliest ages to the present time; and it is amongst them that we are to look for examples of patriarchal life and manners. Sir Robert Ker Porter has given a very lively sketch of this mode of life, in the person and tribe of an Arab sheik, whom he visited in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates: He says, "I had met this warrior at the house of the British resident at Bagdad; and came, according to his repeated wish, to see him in a place more consonant with his habits, the tented field; and, as he expressed it, 'at the head of his children.' As soon as we arrived in sight of his camp, we were met by crowds of its inhabitants, who, with a wild and hurrying delight, led us towards the tent of their chief. The venerable old man came forth to the door, attended by his subjects of all sizes and descriptions, and greeted us with a countenance beaming kindness; while his words, which our interpreter explained, were demonstrative of patriarchal welcome. One of my Hindoo troopers spoke Arabic; hence the substance of our succeeding discourse was not lost on each other. Having entered, I sat down by my host; and the whole of the persons present, to far beyond the boundaries of the tent (the sides of which were open), seated themselves also, without any regard to those civilized ceremonies of subjection, the crouching of slaves, or the standing of vassalage. These persons, in rows beyond rows, appeared just as he had described, the offspring of his house, the descendants of his fathers, from age to age; and like brethren, whether holding the highest or the lowest rank, they seemed to gather round their common parent. I thought I had never before seen so complete an assemblage of fine and animated countenances, both old and young; nor could I suppose a better specimen of the still existing state of the true Arab; nor a more lively picture of the scene which must have presented itself, ages ago, in the field of Haran, when Terah sat in his tent-door, surrounded by his sons, and his sons' sons, and the people born in his house. The venerable Arabian sheik was seated on the ground, with a piece of carpet spread under him; and, like the ancient Chaldean ancestor, turned to the one side and the other, graciously answering or questioning the groups around him, with an interest in them all which clearly showed the abiding simplicity of his government, and their obedience. On the smallest computation, such must have been the manners of these people for more than three thousand years; thus, in all things, verifying the prediction given of Ishmael at his birth, that he, in his posterity, should "be a wild man," and always continue to be so, though "he should dwell for ever in the presence of his brethren." And that an acute and active people, surrounded for ages by polished and luxurious nations, should from their earliest to their latest times, be still found a wild people, dwelling in the presence of all their brethren (as we may call these nations) unsubdued and unchangeable, is indeed a standing miracle; one of those mysterious facts which establish the truth of prophecy."

Arabian religion, we again remark, has changed. Originally it was the patriarchal, as was that of Abraham, embracing the only living and true God, and the tradition of Christ as the Redeemer of a guilty world: it became corrupted to idolatry, from which it was partially reformed by the imposture of Mohammed. Arabians were among the first converts to Christianity on the day of Pentecost, Acts ii, and the apostle preached the gospel in Arabia, Gal. i, 17. Patriarchal simplicity in their manners may still be retained by the Arabs, but they are included in "the fulness of the Gentiles," who are ordained to be brought into the Church of Christ. Rom. xi, 25.

BRITISH ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

No. VII.—The mission of Augustin to the Anglo-Saxons.

Confirmed in his dignity by the authoritative grant of the pope, and in favour with the king, Augustin adopted various plans for the promotion of his ambition. Gregory had charged the king to destroy the idols and demolish their temples; but he afterwards sent instructions by Mellitus to pursue a different course, a policy adopted universally in that age. He directs Augustin to convert the idol temples into churches, "consecrating them by sprinkling holy water, and placing under their altars some sacred relics of saints," of which he sent an abundant supply from Rome. As to the idolatrous festivals, he gives him these directions. "Whereas they were accustomed to kill many oxen in their sacrifices to devils, you may persuade them to make this change in that solemnity, that on the anniversary day of the dedication of their churches in honour of the saints whose names they bear, or whose relics are deposited in them, they may raise tents or booths about the same, and celebrate the solemnity with merry feasting; at which time they must not sacrifice their beasts to the devil, but kill them for meat to be eaten to the praise of God, their giver. By this means, while we allow them a continuance of their former jollities, their minds will more easily be brought to relish spiritual joys! For it will not be possible at once to draw such rude untractable minds from all their former customs; they will not be brought to perfection by sudden leaps, but leisurely by steps and degrees."

Augustin acted according to the criminal policy of Gregory in relation to the Saxon heathen festivals; and hence arose those shocking and immoral customs, of wakes, revels, and fairs, which are still held at the anniversaries of the dedication of churches in many parts of England. How far this mode of proceeding differs from the practice of the apostles, may be judged from the direction of Paul to the Corinthians, "What concord hath Christ with Belial, and what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? Wherefore, come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing." 2 Cor. vi.

"Meantime the poor Christian Britons, living peaceably at home, there enjoyed God, the gospel, and their mountains; little skilful in, and less caring for the ceremonies a la mode, brought over by Augustin: and indeed their poverty could not go to the cost of Augustin's silver cross, which made them worship the God of their fathers after their own homely, but hearty fashion; not willing to disturb Augustin and his followers in their new rites, but that he had a mind to disquiet them in their old service."

Augustin being thus confirmed by the pope in his new dignity as primate of all England, claimed jurisdiction over the ancient British Churches. These were considered schismatics: because, as Bede states, they did not keep the feast of the Passover on the same day with the Romans, "but observed many other things contrary to the unity of the church." By the assistance of King Ethelbert, Augustin summoned the British bishops to meet him in a synod, on the borders of the West Saxons, as is supposed on the boundaries of Herefordshire and Worcestershire. Augustin informed them of his archiepiscopal authority, constituted by Pope Gregory, and made four propositions for their acceptance: First, To observe the Roman time of the Passover. Second, To adopt the Roman baptism and ceremonies. Third, To co-operate with him as the primate, and with the Roman clergy, in converting the Saxons. Fourth, To acknowledge the jurisdiction of the pope.

Much time was vainly spent in arguing: for the British were unwilling to believe that their religious customs were improper, or that the pope had any authority over them. Bede seems to intimate that the latter point was most strenuously urged: but they could not be moved, either by threats or promises. Augustin is said, therefore, to have proposed that the dispute should be decided by a miracle. A blind Saxon was introduced to the assembly; and when the Britons tried in vain to cure him, Augustin restored his sight by his prayers. "But whether the miracle admitted of some dispute, because the blind man was a Saxon; or Bede, who lived long after the fact, was wrongly informed, the Britons stood out against this evidence." All that Augustin could obtain on this occasion was a promise that they would meet again, and determine the matter in a more numerous assembly.

This second synod having been appointed, seven British bishops attended, from Hereford, Llandaff, St. Paterns, Bangor, Clwyd, Worcester, and Morgan, with Dinoth, abbot of Bangor, and several monks. Previously to the meeting they consulted an aged hermit, famed for wisdom and sanctity, how they should determine in this affair. He expressed his opinion that it was unreasonable to make alterations in divine service merely at the request of a stranger: but as the essence of religion consisted in union of heart, in charity, it would not be wrong in some degree to comply with Augustin, if he were a holy man, and really a messenger from God. The bishops desired to be informed how this could be ascertained: he replied, that they might know this by the most certain mark of a true Christian—humility; reminding them of the words of Jesus, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart." They would see, he added, whether Augustin was endued with this virtue, by his respectfully rising to salute them on their entrance into the place of meeting; for if he should not show them such courtesy, it would be a certain proof of his pride and irreligion. Agreeably to this counsel, they contrived to enter after Augustin was seated; when he allowed them to come in without any expression of civility, and thus their prejudices were confirmed.

In the synod, no arguments or entreaties could prevail on the British bishops to comply with the wishes of Augustin, either to adopt the Romish rites, or to receive him for their archbishop. Mortified pride appears to have urged the ambitious prelate to press his claims with increasing warmth, and to insist upon their submission to the pope; when Dinoth replied to this effect: "Be it known unto you, that we all are, and every one of us, obedient and subject to the church of God, to the pope of Rome, and to every godly Christian, to love every one in his degree in perfect charity, and to help every one of them, by word and deed, to be the children of God: and other obedience than this I do not know due to him whom you name to be Pope, nor to be Father of the Fathers, to be claimed and to be demanded. And this obedience we are ready to give, and to pay to him, and to every Christian continually. Besides, we are under the government of the bishop of Caerlion upon Uske, who is to oversee us, to cause us to keep the way spiritual."

Augustin, it is said, despairing to overcome their firmness, terminated the long dispute by an indignant threatening: "Since you refuse peace with your brethren, you shall have war with your enemies; and since you will not unite with us in preaching the word of eternal life to your neighbours, you shall have death at their hands."

Dinoth's reply has been charged with undue warmth, and a spirit of obstinacy; and perhaps it does not display all the meekness and gentleness of Christ: but what shall be said of Augustin? It seems clearly manifest that Augustin gave serious provocation by his whole behaviour, and exhibited the vindictive haughtiness of the papal antichrist. Writers of the greatest judgment have been divided in opinion respecting the prophecy of Augustin, and to what degree he was concerned in its dreadful fulfilment as regards the monastery of Bangor: for Bede remarks, "Events came to pass as Augustin had predicted." The fact is, that shortly afterwards Ethelfrid, king of Northumberland, invaded North Wales with a great army; when the ecclesiastics sought protection from their king Brochmail. The Northumbrians had advanced to Chester, where they cut off the little army of the Welsh prince, who fell with his soldiers. Ethelfrid, provoked by hearing that a company of the monks of Bangor had assembled to pray for the success of their countrymen, threatened them as equally his enemies, endeavouring to engage their God against him. They retreated to their monastery, and Dinoth sent two hundred to Ethelfrid, entreating him to spare their establishment, and allow them in peace to serve and praise God, at the same time offering him all their property. But having heard their proposition, the savage pagan ordered the defenceless messengers to be immediately massacred; and advancing to Bangor, he reduced the monastery to a heap of ruins, and appointed above a thousand more to be put to death, very few of its pious inmates escaping his murderous sword

British writers charge that ambitious prelate with having persuaded Ethelbert to procure, or at least to promote, that invasion, out of enmity to the principles of that learned establishment; while others assert that the massacre was not perpetrated till after his decease. Others again assert, that Augustin was personally engaged in encouraging this enormous cruelty. But even if he were dead before this bloody affair, yet the invasion, with its consequent calamities, might have originated with his recommendation. Bishop Jewell, however, considers the evidence against Augustin as conclusive; and having referred to many ancient writers on the subject, he says, "Hereby it appeareth that this Augustin not only enkindled this cruel war, but also was alive and present in the army."

To what lengths of vindictiveness prelatic ambition may lead, we find illustrated in the whole history of the papal wars; and had this affair of Augustin been faithfully reported to Pope Gregory, it would still seem doubtful whether he would have censured him, while we recollect his own unprincipled conduct towards that usurper and murderer, the emperor Phocas!

Augustin died, according to Bede, A. D. 604, having appointed Laurentius to succeed him. "He trode in the steps of his predecessor," Milner remarks, "and laboured to promote the best interests of the English, by frequent preaching of the word, and by a diligent and useful example. I doubt not the sincerity of this prelate; though, seduced by the charms of a nominal unity, he laboured, as the first missionary had done, to bring the British churches to a conformity with the church of Rome. He was actuated by the same spirit of selfish ambition, of which even the best of men in all ages have not been void."

Charity would lead us to hope some good both of Augustin and of Laurentius; but Mr. Milner gives no evidence of this prelate's "frequent preaching of the word;" and as the services of religion were almost entirely the reading of Latin forms, and the performance of certain ceremonies, we have reason to doubt the good effects of his ministry in the bringing of souls to Christ. Of the "selfish ambition" of Laurentius, we have abundant proof. Pope Boniface being A. D. 606 declared Universal Bishop by the emperor Phocas, Laurentius was more determined in his policy, and wrote pressing letters to prevail on the "Scots who inhabited Ireland," to conform to the English church. He bitterly complained of Dagham, a Scotch bishop, who, passing through Canterbury, refused to eat with him, on account of their difference in ceremonies. But his letters were fruitless. The British churches remained in Bede's time still distinguished from the English.

Ethelbert died A. D. 612, when his son Edbald abandoned the profession of Christianity; and Sebert, king of Essex, dying A. D. 616, his sons having relapsed to idolatry, forbade the return of Mellitus bishop of London, who had been long absent at Rome, receiving counsel from Pope Boniface. Laurentius, however, received him at Canterbury, and also Justus bishop of Rochester, as the ill-instructed people of Essex and Kent had given up their profession of Christianity. After consultation, these three prelates resolved on leaving the reprobate Saxons, and retiring to France: Laurentius remaining behind, contrived to impose upon the king, by pretending that St. Peter had appeared to him in the night, and had severely whipped him for purposing to desert his station. The vision itself may justly be doubted: but Laurentius showed wounds on his body to Edbald. The king, touched with those appeals, returned to the profession of his former faith, and recalled Justus and Mellitus. The Londoners, however, refusing to allow Mellitus again to reside among them, he returned to Canterbury, and, A. D. 624, succeeded Laurentius as archbishop. On his death, about A. D. 634, this dignity was sustained by Justus. Honorius and Deusdedit are mentioned as successively archbishops of Canterbury, but we know nothing of their labours to evangelize the people, or to diffuse the pure doctrines of salvation by Jesus Christ.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

NOAH.

The Ministry of Noah.

The book of Genesis commends Noah to our admiration, chiefly as an example of uprightness and holiness: but it seems also to suggest, that this was not the whole of his character. The New Testament affords us additional information. That which was omitted by Moses, has been supplied by the apostles Paul and Peter. The Holy Spirit by Peter, styles Noah "the eighth preacher of righteousness." 2 Pet. ii, 5. The righteousness which Noah preached, was certainly that which he had obtained by faith for his own justification before God, and that which he practised in his holy life. He believed "with the heart unto righteousness," with "faith which worketh by love."

Noah received a divine commission to preach "repentance and remission of sins:" and influenced by the purest benevolence towards his fellow-sinners, he was not content to enjoy, alone, salvation from the just indignation of an offended God; but laboured zealously to save the souls of others, by testifying against their iniquities, and declaring the judgments of God ready to fall upon them, if they remained impenitent. He called them to break off from sin, and fly to the revealed mercy of the Lord by faith in the promised Messiah.

A considerable part of Noah's life was thus consecrated to God, in seeking the salvation of sinners; in which we are called to admire the Divine long-suffering and mercy to the guilty: but the ministry of Noah was disregarded, few or none embracing the doctrine of pardon and life eternal, and the world of transgressors "filled up the measure of their iniquities," to their destruction. The awful purpose of God was not immediately carried into execution; and Noah and Methuselah continued their ministry of mercy in favour of guilty men; for the Lord said, "Yet his days shall be a hundred and twenty years." Gen. vi, 3.

It was not only by threatening admonitions and merciful invitations, that Noah exercised his ministry towards those around him: he preached in a manner altogether extraordinary by means of his works—a constant sermon, visible to all the inhabitants of the earth. The Lord gave a new commission to Noah. Having made known his purpose to destroy the whole race of transgressors, except the family of his servant, he commanded the patriarch to prepare the wondrous means of their salvation. "And God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and behold, I will destroy them with the earth. Make thee an ark of gopher-wood: rooms shalt thou make in the ark, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch. And this is the fashion which thou shalt make it of: The length of the ark shall be three hundred cubits, the breadth of it fifty cubits, and the height of it thirty cubits. A window shalt thou make to the ark, and in a cubit shalt thou finish it above; and the door of the ark shalt thou set in the side thereof; with lower, second, and third stories shalt thou make it. And behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven; and every thing that is in the earth shall die. But with thee will I establish my covenant; and thou shalt come into the ark, thou, and thy sons, and thy wife, and thy sons' wives with thee. And of every living thing of all flesh, two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark, to keep them alive with thee; they shall be male and female. Of fowls after their kind, and of cattle after their kind, of every creeping thing of the earth after his kind, two of every sort shalt come unto thee, to keep them alive. And take thou unto thee of all food that is eaten, and thou shalt gather it to thee; and it shall be food for thee and for them." Gen. vi, 13—21.

Prompt obedience distinguished Noah in relation to this difficult, and apparently impossible command. He had never seen such a prodigious vessel, and he could not fail to reflect upon the care and labour inseparable from the undertaking. Noah too was a philosopher, and he would consider what was necessary to procure the vast materials, and construct the capacious vessel, to collect the various animals and govern them, to prepare their suitable provisions, and to endure confinement with such company for a long period. But Noah was also a devout believer; and the Divine command contained an assurance of all needful assistance; therefore, he staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was "strong in faith, giving glory to God." "By faith," says the apostle, "Noah, being warned by God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house." Heb. xi, 7.

Vigorous in confidence and hope, Noah commenced the amazing work, under the Divine direction: but his faith must have been put to a severe test, in the prospect of taunts and sneers from a world of atheistical unbelievers. The report of his proceedings soon spread far and wide, affording an admirable occasion to the profane to make him the butt of their reproach and ridicule. Considering the number of years in which it was building, the story of the marvellous work would be carried into all lands. That all the tribes of the earth were acquainted with the fact, seems to be intimated by the apostle, when he speaks of the work, "by which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith." Heb. xi, 7. The testimony which this procedure of Noah gave to the world, was public and notorious, demanding their serious attention: no plea of ignorance can, therefore, be made at the last day, when it shall arise in judgment against their infidel criminality.

Crowds of the daring and trifling free-thinkers would flock around to see how the work advanced. Absurd and provoking questions would be proposed by them, to the diligent prophet; who, while they were laughing at his conduct, pursued his holy purpose, still inviting them to seek the Lord while they might obtain his offered mercy. Some would call him simpleton and fool. Others, pretending to superior wisdom and discernment, would affect to pity him as a well-meaning enthusiast, deluded by the dreams of a contemptible superstition, and declare that "too much holiness had made him mad." Others again would jeer him, expressing their anxiety to see how he would manage the lions and tigers, while he sailed on the dry land over hills and mountains! His friends, and perhaps even some of his own family, would pity his extravagance, and recommend him to renounce his laborious enterprize, as preposterous, irrational, and ruinous.

> "Alas! how fatally opposed,
> The heart of guilty man is closed
> Against that warning, and he deems
> The Prophet's counsels idle dreams,
> And laughs to hear the Preacher rave
> Of bursting cloud and whelming grave."

Finding their remonstrances utterly ineffectual, and their ridicule lost and in vain, they would turn away from him as a weak old dotard, leaving him to what they would denominate "Noah's folly," and plunge into all the criminal excesses of their licentious associates. But fixed in his resolution, and guarded by the power of God, Noah persevered with his novel architecture, and completed the amazing vessel, agreeably to the Divine injunction. "According to all that God commanded him, so did he." Gen. vi, 22.

In all this Noah stands proposed in the sacred records as an example to us, of determined, persevering, and cheerful obedience in the path of duty. O that we may be followers of him in the way of God's commands, and as he and others have done, find that in keeping them there is a sweet satisfaction, a "great reward."

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXXIII.

On the Choice of a Profession.

Dear Madam,

Your son must, at a proper time, which at the latest should be sixteen years of age, choose the profession, or art, or trade, in the exercise of which he will procure his maintenance, augment his worldly possessions, support his family, and render that share of his services, which is due from him to society.

This is usually considered a serious question in a family; and well it may be, since upon the right settlement of it will depend much of your child's future happiness and your own.

It appears to me, that the selection of a profession, or art, or trade, for your son, should, under your own guidance, be his own act. It seems but fair that he should have a voice in a question in which he is to be so much interested to the end of his days. Besides, it will rarely be found that he will heartily engage and really prosper in any pursuit which he may not have selected for himself as the object of his own inclination.

If, then, by the time that he is fifteen or sixteen years old, you have properly educated him, if you have given sufficient scope to his powers of observation, by showing and explaining to him the different arts, trades, and professions, you will find that he has spontaneously, and in a way for which he himself can give no account, fixed upon some one of them as his future pursuit. Should he not have done this at the time that you think it right to put to him the question, which you will do without any needless solemnity, you need not be disconcerted. Entirely drop the subject for half a year longer, should he not in the interim himself voluntarily declare that he has become decided. At the same time do not, even if you approve of his determination, too hastily consider his choice as final. You will find your son, even under the best intentions on his part, and the best management on your own, frequently perhaps wavering and uncertain, as to his future profession. It is the settled wish which continues for several months together, and which you perceive to be permanent, and even becoming stronger, to which you are to attend. The parents must nevertheless exert all their natural and acquired ability to judge of the propriety of the choice. They know their child, both as to his mind and body, better than he himself does, or any other person in the world. Happy would it be if parents could view this subject through the clear, unsophisticated medium of good common sense!

Were such the case, they could easily discriminate whether their child is under the influence of momentary impulse derived from novelty, from the example of a schoolfellow or companion, or from the perusal of any book. I have known children influenced by each of these circumstances. A lad has been taken to hear an eminent clergyman preach, or counsellor plead, and for days and months he has been consumed by the mania of becoming a preacher or barrister. One of his schoolfellows has become apprenticed to an apothecary; and then nothing would serve but that he, like his schoolfellow, must compound medicines, surrounded by jars and phials; or he has read an entertaining voyage or travel, and his determination was as strong to go to sea. The watchful parent will ascertain to what these sudden impulses are to be ascribed. He will not violently or with contemptuous language or manner oppose them: he will discover by the vehemence of the impulse, that it is likely to be of short duration. Should it last longer than is convenient, and should it be directed towards an object which is in itself ineligible, he will seek to abate, by dividing the impression: he will skilfully submit a variety of other different pursuits to the mind of his child, when the attraction of some new object will probably diminish the attachment.

The chief points, in which the parent's superintendence of his son's choice of a profession is concerned, are such as the following: —

First, that the art, trade, or profession, should be such as will not require more time and money to acquire it than will be consistent with the general happiness of the parents, and justice to the welfare of the remaining members of his family. There must have been an injurious error in management, when you find a parent distracted how to raise money to keep his son at college, or the hospitals, or in chambers at an inn of court, &c.; and when you hear him declare, or see it likely that the other sons or daughters must be deprived of some advantages, because the eldest son or daughter has been so highly educated. I have seen this, and have heard parents confessing the delusion, that they hoped and expected the son or daughter in question would, in consideration of what had been done for him or her, behave the better to the parents themselves, or take care of their brothers and sisters, or when they came home from school or college, become the instructors of the remaining members of the household.

I believe it is common to hear such persons declare, that they have educated the eldest son or daughter, that he or she may teach the others. I have also heard them urge this motive as an excuse for the extraordinary pains and expense bestowed for this purpose!

The human mind always seeks for some show of reason for its conduct; but it is amazing with what sophisticated excuses it can palliate its own indolence and vanity, and soothe its own consciousness of misjudging.

Next to the preceding considerations, I believe it is important that the parent should consider whether his son has chosen an art, or trade, or profession, to which the natural properties of his constitution, both of body or of mind, are adapted. This estimate, however, is to be formed with a due consideration of the extent to which the nature of man has ever been found, when accustomed to an employment, to put forth unexpected capabilities. Still, if the choice made by your son is really and widely different from his natural qualifications, or from what his acquired qualifications may, under all circumstances, be expected to become, it should seem to be your imperative duty to divert, by skilful management, the propensities of your child into another channel, lest haply you fulfil the counterpart of the fable, wherein the cock was sent to be a sailor, and the swan to be a soldier.

It should also be another regulation of prudence observed by the parent, that the choice made by his son is of an art or profession that is likely to furnish an adequate and permanent supply for the necessities of human life.

Supposing him to be destined to be a tradesman, I should advise, that in preference to all others he should choose a trade which was founded upon the real, indispensable, and universal necessities of mankind. Let him choose to learn a useful trade, rather than what is called a fancy business. I would sooner that he should be a carpenter, with the prospect of moderate success, than a designer, for instance, of botanical drawings. People will always want chairs and tables, but the botanical artist is dependent upon the caprice of public taste.

Some of the most unhappy people I have ever known, have been those whose trade was liable to the caprice of fancy and fashion. I have often been reminded by such instances of the story of the tailor and the conjurer in a besieged town. The conjurer was the first to feel the famine. In vain he pretended to swallow pins and expectorate fire. While the tailor, though poorly paid, had work to the last, for the people always needed raiment.

Whenever a movement takes place in the popular caprice, it reduces the families of persons devoted to the fancy trades to the ebb of distress. For instance, the queen appears at a levee in Brussels lace: the nobility and gentry follow the example, and hundreds of Buckinghamshire lacemakers have nothing to do. She appears in a bonnet of Leghorn straw at the next drawing-room, and the staple manufacture of Bedfordshire undergoes a similar depression. Avoid, by all means, that your child should be devoted to a pursuit which is liable to such fluctuations. Equally oppose his choice of a pursuit in which success must depend almost entirely upon his own peculiar ingenuity.

DESIGNS OF THE SACRED HISTORY.

The following observations by Sharon Turner, are as impressive as they are beautiful. "We are on this earth solely from our Creator's special appointment; neither we nor our ancestors have constructed it for our habitation. It has been provided for our present existence before our race began, and continues for the reception and residence of others when we disappear. We find every thing in it most artificial and specifically made, and all independently of us. The whole of it has been framed in every part by some other and superior power, who has formed it on his own plan, and for his own purposes. Our term of existence in it is that which he has been pleased to fix, and to which he has limited our enjoyment of it. This special fabrication of all things which now surrounds us, leads the mind to infer and believe, that our next state and mode of existence will be as elaborately and attentively provided. In all periods of our being, our Creator must be our disposing governor, so far as he shall choose to be: and it therefore becomes an object at all times of the deepest interest to us, to ascertain, if possible, his intentions and wishes as to our present and future destinies. What he has imparted to us of his will and expectations—what commands he has imposed—what information he has condescended to convey—and what intercourse he has been pleased to hold with our progenitors in the anterior ages of our history; the more we know of these important subjects, and the more just our notions of them, the more clearly shall we discern how we ought to direct and regulate both our conduct and our reasoning speculations, for the improvement of our intellectual nature, and the preservation and increase of our personal happiness. These topics are comprised in the sacred history of the world. We can know nothing of the thoughts and purposes of the Divine mind, but from its own revelations, of which we possess a record, and the only authoritative memorial, in the Jewish and Christian Scriptures."

Sunday School Lectures.

LECTURE II.

"HALLOWED BE THY NAME."

What is the meaning of "hallowed?"—To honour, or reverence.

When we say "Hallowed be thy name," what is it that we ask for?—We pray God to lead ourselves and all men to honour and reverence him.

How do we dishonour God?—By breaking his commandments.

What is the eighth commandment?—"Thou shalt not steal."

Do we dishonour God when we steal?—Yes.

Why by stealing do we dishonour God?—Because by so doing we break his commandments.

What is the third commandment?—"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain."

What is the meaning of taking God's name in vain?—Swearing, speaking bad words, crying out in play O Lord! or O God!

Do you dishonour God when you say bad words?—Yes.

Why?—Because we break his commandments.

Teacher. Then do not let us ever swear, or use bad words.

What is the fourth commandment?—"Remember to keep holy the Sabbath day.

What day is the Sabbath day?—Sunday.

Do we dishonour God when we play on the Sunday, and do not go to church or to school?—Yes.

Why do we dishonour God by so doing?—Because we break his commandments.

T. Then let us always take care to keep the Sunday as we ought.

How else may we dishonour God?—By talking at church, and behaving ill at church; by saying our prayers with our lips, and not with our hearts; by quarrelling and fighting, and telling stories.

How may we honour God?—By keeping his commandments, and by reproving those who do not keep them.

Will God take to heaven those that honour him?—Yes.

Why will he?—Because he has said, "Those that honour me, I will honour."

Will God punish those that dishonour him?—Yes.

Why will he?—Because God has said, that "those who dishonour him, he will lightly esteem, or punish."

T. Let us then pray to God to give us strength, that we may keep his commandments; let us strive always to obey them; let us always keep holy the Sabbath, never talk at the house of God, nor say wicked words, nor say our prayers with our lips only, without our hearts; and let us never be ashamed to confess that we are the servants of Christ. Let us strive to love God daily more and more. C. R. A.

CONTENTMENT.

Such a commander is Contentment, that wheresoever she setteth foot, an hundred blessings wait upon her: in every disease she is physician, in every strife she is a lawyer, in every doubt she is a preacher, in every grief she is a comforter; like a sweet perfume which taketh away the evil scent, and leaveth a pleasant smell for it. As the unicorn's horn, dipped in the fountain, makes the waters which were corrupt and noisome, clear and wholesome on a sudden, so whatsoever estate godliness comes unto, it saith like the apostles, Peace be to this house, Peace be to this heart, Peace be to this man.—Smith.

THE DEATH OF ANANIAS.

Suggested by viewing one of the Cartoons.

When we turn over History's page,
When we survey the works of old,
Those sumptuous piles from age to age
Which bent beneath their loads of gold,
The proud abodes of mighty kings,
What interest such description brings!

But here we trace no stately throne
Inlaid with ivory and gold,
With purple drapery round it drawn,—
A mean abode we here behold;
But more renown'd, more truly great,
Than e'er was monarch's dome of state.

Some short time since a sound was heard,
"Like rushing of a Mighty Wind;"
And such a Guest as then appear'd,
In no rich palace can we find;
That Holy, that Immortal Dove,
Proceeding from the God of Love.

He came in cloven tongues of flame,
And sat upon the head of each,
To glorify a Saviour's name,
And send his servants forth to preach,
That He should come, the Lord declar'd!
And in his might He soon appear'd.

To those within such gifts He brought,
As never princes yet receiv'd:
A few poor Fishermen, who wrought
For daily bread, but who believ'd
In Him who had been crucified,—
They had the boon to kings denied—

His power to speak in foreign tongues,
So that each stranger hears his own,
From whatsoever clime he comes,
From Egypt, Lybia, mighty Rome!
And with an eloquence and grace,
Denied to every former race;—

To heal the sick, to raise the dead,
To cast out devils in His name;
All that He promis'd ere He bled,
They had when this His Spirit came;
They could approve, absolve, condemn,
All they could need was granted them.

They with an energy divine
Had just been praying for His aid;
He deign'd on many hearts to shine,
Who listen'd to the words they said;
And richest offerings hence were brought,
By those the Holy Ghost had taught.

Who had receiv'd, they freely give,
United still in heart and mind;
Rich with the poor in common live,
What some may need, the rest will find;
Nor house, nor lands, nor gold they claim,
To form a church their only aim.

But not on earth a perfect one
Was it permitted them to raise;
A hypocrite was found among
Those who compos'd it in those days.
Behold him! See his fearful end!
Death comes! but comes not as his friend.

Behold that stern, that piercing eye,
And that uprais'd, extended hand!
"How couldst thou to the Spirit lie?
He wanted not thy house nor land!
Man doth not claim thy forfeit blood,
But thou must fall before thy God!

"That Saviour in whose name we preach!
That Spirit by whose power we act!
He can alone the guilty reach,
He hath surpris'd thee in that fact!"
Behold the agony of death!
Behold him yield his latest breath!

THE OFFICIAL GLORY OF THE SON OF GOD;

Or, a Treatise on the Universal Headship of Christ. By John Jefferson. 12mo. cloth, pp. 278. Westley and Davis, London.

Correct views of the Person and Offices of Jesus Christ are essential to the peace and edification of the Christian. Dr. Owen was worthily impressed with this conviction, when he wrote his "Declaration of the Glorious Mystery of the Person of Christ," and his "Discourses on the Glory of Christ." Those excellent volumes have been read by thousands with spiritual profit and delight, and they will continue to be prized by the church of God. Mr. Jefferson's volume, though not precisely on the same plan as either of those celebrated works, contains much of the substance of the two, and we are persuaded that it will be highly prized in proportion as it is known.

The judicious author remarks, "The following outline of this great subject may be presented:—

"The Lord Jesus Christ is here to be viewed as,

"The ordained medium for making known the Divine glory.—John i, 18; Rev. xix, 13.

"The Head and Lord of the Elect Angels.—Eph. i, 9, 10; 1 Pet. iii, 22.

"The Conqueror and Ruler of the Fallen Angels.—Eph. iv, 8; Col. ii, 15.

"The Mediator and Governor of Men.—1 Tim. ii, 5; John xvii, 2.

"The Saviour and Head of the Church.—Eph. v, 23; and,

"The Supreme Lord of Wicked Men.—Psal. cx, 2; 1 Cor. xv, 25.

"Besides these several relationships, his official glory is also to be traced in the universality of his spiritual reign on earth for a thousand years; Psal. lxxii, 8, 17; Rev. xx, 1—6;—in the union of all holy creatures which is effected in him; Eph. i, 9, 10; Col. i, 16—20;—in the glorious exaltation which he now enjoys, and the dominion which he exercises over the invisible state; Rom. xiv, 9; Eph. i, 20, 21; Rev. i, 17, 18;—and in the last acts of time, when he shall raise the dead, judge the world, settle all things in their final condition, and deliver up the kingdom, that God may be all in all; John v, 28, 29; 2 Cor. v, 10; Matt. xxv, 31; 2 Thess. i, 7—10; 1 Cor. xv, 24—28."

These several divisions of the author's plan are filled up in a manner which will not only secure respect for him as a sound divine, but contribute to promote the improvement of his readers, in growing in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

SAMUEL FORETELLING THE DOWNFAL OF ELI'S HOUSE.

SAMUEL, THE FOUNDER OF SCHOOLS IN ISRAEL.

"Venerable Samuel" is presented to our contemplation by the inspired pages, as one of the most excellent and worthy characters of the Hebrew nation. Samuel was in a special manner the child of prayer, and Hannah, his pious mother, gave him his expressive name, which signifies Asked of God, as a living memorial of the Divine condescension to her requests.

Every stage of Samuel's eventful life, affords much valuable instruction to the readers of the Holy Scriptures. His early dedication to God—his infantile education, by his devoted mother—his presentation to the Lord under the care of Eli the priest, while yet a child—his call of the Lord—his establishment as a prophet—the defeat of the Philistines at his prayers—his labours as a judge of the nation—his anointing of Saul to be king of Israel—his anointing of David on Saul's rejection by God—his conduct towards Saul—and his death and general character, would each furnish an important subject of meditation. On a future occasion we intend to notice each of these particulars, in our "Scripture Biography:" but our present remarks will refer chiefly to the institution of Schools by the patriotic prophet.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXXIII.

The final establishment of your son in his art, trade, or profession, should equally be a matter of prospective contrivance.

It is not enough that you can support him through an apprenticeship; you should so apportion matters, as that you can not only do this, but set him up in business, and give him a fair start afterwards. It is not enough that you can support him through his clerkship to an attorney, you ought not to do this unless you can furnish him with a few hundreds for his support till he can get into practice. You must consider whether, when you apprentice him to an apothecary, and purpose that he shall attend the hospitals, you shall be able to furnish his shop, and to give him the means of subsistence for a year or two, till he makes a connection. If he must be a clergyman, you ought to have a reasonable prospect that you shall be able to support him through school and college, and to give him the ability to maintain himself for a year or two afterwards, till he gets a title to a curacy; and even then to furnish him with the books needful to his studies, and with all other expenses, till he can float upon the salary of the assistant minister. And he is not a skilful parent, who does not consider all these things; and who, if he has not the rational prospect of being able to do all this, in any given case, does not lower his plans to a case in which he has. He is also an unwise, an unkind parent, and will lose the respect of his child, who, having conducted him to the verge of his profession, then begins to complain that he neither can nor ought to go any further. Why did he not foresee this point of difficulty? and why did not his forethought lead him to prevent his child and himself ever being exposed to it? If he now shrink and complain, let him know that his child now being come to years of reflection, will never excuse his parent for a want of sagacity and prudence.

I must also add an additional caution, that you do not exactly destine your child, before you can have an opportunity of judging of his capability, to this or that profession, and before your child is also capable of forming and expressing his own inclination. Be assured, that should you adopt this proceeding, your own determination, however you may promise yourself it shall be kept secret, and shall not influence your child, will inevitably operate in all your conduct towards him.

I believe many a mother, and many a father have destined their child while in the cradle to be a clergyman. The mother especially, perhaps with really good motives, has felt like the mother of Luther, what an honour it would be if her child should be a minister of Jesus Christ! An honour it is indeed, far greater than that of kings or emperors; but then it should be an honour really and manifestly conduced to by circumstances as they develop themselves in after-life. The mother, however — excuse me if faithful dealing seem harsh — the mother has set her heart on her son's being a clergyman. While rocking his cradle, her mind has woven its reverie; and there, amid future circumstances, she delights to trace him to school, and from school to college, and from college to the pulpit, and her heart beats high with the anticipated gladness of hearing him declare and explain to mankind the love of God in the gospel. In some such reverie, she settles the school in which he shal be brought up, and the college he shall go to. She resolves, indeed, that she will never do any thing to influence him to this determination; "yet, oh! if it should be the will of Providence, it would be the consummation of her earthly wishes, for herself and her offspring." Kind and amiable parent! your feelings are honourable: may they be gratified; but do not dream, I beseech you, but that entertaining so fond and fervent a wish in your own bosom, will influence your conduct towards your child, and will influence his determination. Oh! yes, many an expression of maternal tenderness, many a suggestion little observed by yourself, will assuredly conduce to this result; and if you should awake to the momentary regret that you are saying and doing too much, yet be assured, when that emotion of regret is past away and forgotten, your child will retain the impression, and is already, under the repetition of such instances, being moulded insensibly into the future divine. Yet how unlikely is it that he will be all that he ought to be — all that is required for this office! Cease, then, your wishes: forbear, for his sake and your own: recal the blissful emotion, and submit the amiable ambition to the development of future years.

Amid these observations, I must however crave room for a provision for the extraordinary case, in which a lad most evidently exhibits peculiar adaptation to the pursuit of some particular art, or science, or profession. Suppose, for instance, some able and honest tutor or schoolmaster, upon whose fidelity and judgment you can rely, should give it as his firm conviction, that the child in question would succeed admirably in the pursuits of either university, for instance; then to devote the lad, having eminent talents for classics or mathematics, to a trade, would seem an unlawful opposition to the apparent will of Providence respecting him.

In this, or in any other similar case, it might be proper for the family and friends of the youth to make those efforts and sacrifices, with a view to his education, which in ordinary instances would be very unjustifiable. This, however, would be a case requiring the greatest caution. The parents themselves should not be the judges. Their partiality for their offspring, and desires for his highest welfare, will infallibly prejudice their opinion. Even the recommendation of the tutor or the schoolmaster should, if possible, be attended with the concurrence of some other person capable of forming a judgment to this effect, and less likely to be influenced by partiality, &c. But the case, although possible, is comparatively rare. In offering you observations upon the topic, such a supposition ought to be barely provided for. Advice respecting it ought to proceed upon the expectation, which is immensely more likely to be fulfilled, that your offspring will exhibit no qualities, which could warrant his being devoted to an art, or trade, or profession, which, in point of the money and time it would require, the sphere of society in which it would require him to move, or the estimation in which it is generally held in the world, is at all above the reach of the parents, or superior to their own station.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

AN OAK CHAPEL.—The Oak of Allenville, in Normandy, known as Chene Chapelle, was a century and a quarter since converted into a place of worship; its trunk was at that time hollow, and its head in part destroyed. This living cavern was then paved and roofed, and divided by a floor into two apartments. The lower was fitted up by the Abbé du Detroit as a chapel, and the upper as a dwelling for the officiating priest. — Professor Burnett's Lecture.

LECTURE III.

"THY KINGDOM COME."

Whose kingdom is it, that we pray may come?—God's.

What is the meaning of a kingdom?—A ruling over some country; England is a country over which a king rules, therefore it is a kingdom.

What is the meaning of God's kingdom coming?—Suppose a king was driven from his country by rebellious wicked men, and after a long time was to return; his ruling over a loyal people would make the country a kingdom: and when the king was seated on his throne, and his subjects around him, his kingdom would be come.

When we pray to God "thy kingdom come," what do we ask for?—We pray that God would quickly come and rule over this world; that He would make men to love him, and be willing to obey him; that he would overthrow Satan, and convert wicked men.

But does not God already rule over every place?—Yes.

How then, if God already rules everywhere, can we pray that his kingdom may soon come?—A king may rule over a country, but nevertheless he may have enemies amongst his people. For instance, suppose the French were come, and had burnt down London; King William nevertheless may reign, because they may not have slain him, nor have placed another king in his stead: so God does rule over the world, but he has enemies in it.

Who are God's enemies in the world?—Satan and wicked men.

But we are going to speak of a kingdom that is within us, over which God does not yet altogether rule. What is the kingdom that is within us?—The ruling of God in our hearts.

Does God rule over our hearts?—Yes, if we are godly.

Are there any enemies in our hearts against God?—Yes.

Who are they?—Satan, and our natural sinfulness.

What do we ask God to do for our hearts and wickedness, when we say "Thy kingdom come?"—We pray that the Holy Spirit would himself come and dwell in our hearts, overthrow Satan, take away the sinfulness of our hearts, and give us holiness.

Teacher. From the whole we learn, that we must pray that God would cast Satan out of our hearts, and take away our sinfulness, and give us holiness; and we must also never indulge any bad thoughts, but always endeavour to drive them out of our mind; we should also try to think more of God, of his kindness and love to us, and of his sending Jesus Christ to die for us, that we may be able to go to heaven. May God enable us so to do, to think more of Christ, and to strive against all evil thoughts and tempers: if we do we shall certainly have that prayer answered, "Thy kingdom come," and then we shall go to heaven, and be for ever with our God in happiness. If we do not, we shall certainly always be ruled by Satan, who will make us miserable now, and hereafter make us miserable in hell, where he dwells with all his wicked angels, and with wicked men. May God enable us all, never to indulge in wicked thoughts or actions, but to think more of Jesus Christ and heaven. May we all with all our hearts, and with all our understanding, cry "Thy kingdom come;" and may the God of heaven grant us our requests, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

A SPECIMEN OF WELSH ELOQUENCE.

"If I were to represent in a figure, the condition of man as a sinner, and his recovery by the cross of Christ, I would attempt it somewhat in this way: Suppose a large grave-yard surrounded by high walls, with only one entrance by a large iron gate fast bolted: within these walls are thousands and tens of thousands of human beings, of all ages and of all classes, by one epidemic disease bending to the grave; the grave yearns to swallow them up, and they must all perish. This is the condition of man as a sinner, 'The soul that sinneth it shall die.' Whilst man was in this deplorable condition, Mercy, the darling attribute of Deity, came down and stood at the gate, looked at the scene, and weeping over it, exclaimed, Oh! that I might enter: I would bind up their wounds—I would relieve their sorrows—I would save their souls. While Mercy stood at the gate weeping, an embassy of angels, commissioned from the courts of heaven to some other world, passing over, paused at the sight (Heaven forgave the pause); and seeing Mercy standing there, they said, Mercy! Mercy! can you not enter? Can you look on the scene, and not pity? Can you pity, and not relieve? Mercy replied, I can see (and in tears added), I can pity, but I cannot relieve. Why cannot you enter? Oh! said Mercy, Justice has barred the gate against me, and I cannot, I must not unbar it. At this moment Justice himself appeared, as if it were to watch the gate. The angels inquired of him, why he would not let Mercy enter? Justice replied, My law is broken, and it must be honoured. Die they or Justice must. At this time there appeared among the angels, a form like unto the Son of God, who, addressing himself to Justice, said, What are thy demands? Justice replied, My terms are stern and rigid: I must have sickness for their health—I must have ignominy for their honour—I must have death for their life—'Without shedding of blood, there is no remission.' Justice, said the Son of God, I accept thy terms: on me be this wrong: let Mercy enter. When, said Justice, will you perform this promise? Jesus replied, Four thousand years hence, upon the hill of Calvary, without the gates of Jerusalem, I will perform it in my own person. The deed was prepared and signed in the presence of the angels of God! Justice was satisfied, and Mercy entered, preaching salvation in the name of Jesus; and as time rolled on, the deed was committed to the patriarchs—by them to the kings of Israel and to the prophets—by them it was preserved till Daniel's seventy weeks were accomplished;—then, at the appointed time, Justice appeared on the Hill of Calvary, and Mercy presented to him the important deed. Where, said Justice, is the Son of God? Behold him, replied Mercy, at the bottom of the hill, bearing his own cross! She then departed and stood aloof. At the hour of trial Jesus ascended the hill, whilst in his train followed his weeping church. Justice immediately presented to him the deed, saying, This is the day when the bond is to be executed. When Jesus received it, did he tear it to pieces, and give it to the winds of heaven? No! no! He nailed it to the cross, exclaiming, 'It is finished.' Justice called down holy fire, to consume the sacrifice. Holy fire descended; it swallowed his humanity; but when it touched his Deity, it expired; and there was darkness over the whole heavens;—but, glory to God in the highest; there was 'peace for earth, and everlasting good-will to man.'"

Divisions are Satan's powder plots, to blow up religion.—Watson.

SCRIPTURE GAZETTEER.

BASHAN (in the tooth, or ivory—or in the sleep), one of the most fertile cantons of Canaan, which was bounded on the east by the river Jordan, on the west by the mountains of Gilead, on the south by the brook Jabbok, on the north by the land of Geshur. The whole kingdom took its name from the hill of Bashan, which is situated in the middle of it, and has since been called Batanea. It had no less than sixty walled towns in it, besides villages. It afforded an excellent breed of cattle, and stately oaks, and was a plentiful and populous country.

BATH-ZACHARIAS, a place situated in the neighbourhood of Bethsura, celebrated for the battle fought between Antiochus Eupator and Judas Maccabeus. 1 Mac. vi, 32, 33.

BEER-SHEBA (the well of an oath, or the well of seven), so called because Abraham made here an alliance with Abimelech, king of Gerar, and gave him seven ewe lambs to serve as a monument of that covenant which they had sworn to. It was situated twenty miles from Hebron towards the south. The limits of the Holy Land are often expressed from Dan even to Beer-sheba, 2 Sam. xvii, 11. Dan was the northern, and Beer-sheba the southern extremity of the land.

BERÆA (weighty), a great and populous city of Macedonia, lying to the south, in the neighbourhood of Athens. Here was a synagogue of the Jews, into which St. Paul went, and preached with great success; insomuch that the apostle has bestowed a peculiar eulogium on the Beræans, telling us that they were more noble and ingenuous than those of Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, and diligently searched the scriptures, whether the things they had heard of Paul concerning the Messias were so or not.—See Acts. xvii, 11.

BESOR (glad news), a brook that falls into the Mediteranean between Gaza and Rhinocorura. This is the brook of the wilderness (mentioned Amos vi, 14), which many have unadvisedly taken for the brook or river of Egypt, which is spoken of in some places of Scripture, as Josh. xv, 4, 47, &c., and is no other than the Nile, or the most eastern branch of it.

BETHANY (the house of the grace of the Lord), a considerable place, situated at the foot of the Mount of Olives, about fifteen furlongs eastward of Jerusalem. Here it was that Martha and Mary lived with their brother Lazarus, whom Jesus raised from the dead; and it was here that Mary poured the perfume on our Saviour's head. Bethany at present is a very small village. One of our modern travellers acquaints us, that at the entrance into it there is an old ruin, called Lazarus's Castle, supposed to have been the mansion house where he and his sisters lived. At the bottom of a descent, not far from the castle, you see his sepulchre, which the Turks hold in great veneration, and use it for an oratory, or place of prayer. Here going down by twenty steps, you come at first into a small square room, and from thence creep into another that is less, about a yard and a half deep, in which the body is said to have lain. About a bow-shot from hence, you pass by the place, which they say was Mary Magdalen's house; and thence descending a steep hill, you come to the fountain of the apostles, which is so called, because, as the tradition goes, these holy persons were wont to refresh themselves here between Jerusalem and Jericho, as it is very probable they might, because the fountain is open to the road side, and is very inviting to the thirsty traveller.—See Maundrel's Journey, p. 79.

BETHESDA (the house of effusion, or mercy), in the Vulgate Latin Piscina Probatica, because, according to some, the sheep were washed in it which were appointed for sacrifices, was the Hebrew name for a pool or public bath, which had five porticos, piazzas, or covered walks around it. This bath for its singular usefulness was called Bethesda, the house of mercy, because, as Pool observes in his Annotations, the erecting of baths was an act of great kindness to the common people, whose indispositions in hot countries required frequent bathing; though the generality of expositors think that it had this name rather from God's great goodness shown to his people in giving such healing virtues to waters as this pool had; for at a certain season, probably at the Passover, an angel went down into the pool, and moved it in so sensible a manner, that whosoever stept first into the pool, after the troubling of the water, was made whole of whatever disease he possessed. See John v, 2, 3.

BETHLEHEM (the house of bread), a city of the tribe of Judah, different from another of the same name, in the tribe of Zebulon. (Josh xix, 15.) It is likewise called Ephrath (Gen. xlvii, 15), or Ephratah (Micah v, 2), and its inhabitants Ephratites (Ruth i, 2); and 1 Sam. xvii, 12. This city was not at all considerable for its extent or riches, but was infinitely so on account of the Messiah's birth. Bethlehem was situated upon the declivity of a hill, about two leagues from Jerusalem. It is generally visited by pilgrims, and at present is not only furnished with a convent of Latins, but also with one of the Greeks, and another of the Armenians. Here are shown you the very place where our Saviour was born, the manger in which he was laid, and the cave or grot in which the blessed Virgin hid herself and her divine babe, from the malice of Herod, for some time before their departure from Egypt. The grot is hollowed in a chalky rock, but this whiteness is said not to be natural, but occasioned by some miraculous drops of the blessed Virgin's milk, which fell from her breast when she was suckling the holy infant; and so much are the inhabitants of Bethlehem possessed with that opinion, that they believe the chalk of this grotto to have a miraculous virtue for increasing women's milk: and it is taken very frequently for that purpose. Here are shown likewise the chapel of St. Joseph, the supposed father of our Lord; the chapel of the Innocents, and also those of St. Jerome, St. Paula, and Eustochium. About half a mile eastward from the town you see the field where the shepherds were watching their flocks when they received the glad tidings of the birth of Christ.

BETH-PHAGE (the house of the mouth, or of early figs), a small city of the priests, situated on Mount Olivet, about fifteen furlongs from Jerusalem.

BETHSAIDA (the house of fruits), a city, whereof there is no mention in the Old Testament, though it frequently occurs in the New; the reason whereof is, that it was but a village, as Josephus tells us, till Philip, the Tetrarch, built it up to a magnificent city, and gave it the name of Julius, out of respect to Julia, the daughter of Augustus Cæsar. Its original name in Hebrew imports a place of fishing and hunting, and for both those exercises it was commodiously situated. In and near this city our Saviour performed many wonderful miracles. Luke x, 19.

BITHYNIA (violent precipitation), a country in Asia, adjoining to Mysia and Phrygia on the north and north-east; and stretching along the sea which lies between the European and Asiatic continents, quite up to Pontus Euxinus. This country has been made famous since the times of the New Testament for the first general council held at Nice, a city thereof, against the Arian heresy, by command of Constantine the Great. St. Paul proposed to visit this city, but did not fulfil his intention, the Spirit not suffering him. Acts xvi, 7.

Bochim (the place of weeping), the place of weepers. "And an angel of the Lord came from Gilgal to Bochim" (Judg. ii, 1.) There is mention of the same place in 2 Sam. v, 24. "When thou hearest the sound on the top of Bochim, thou shalt bestir thyself." Lastly, the Psalmist (lxxxiv, 6) seems to speak of the same place when he says, "Who going through the vale of Baca, or misery."—Others translate the Hebrew Bochim, mulberry trees, or tear trees; and, instead of the vale or place of tears, read the vale or place of mulberry trees. The difficulty consists in fixing the situation of Bochim, whether we understand by it mulberry trees or weepers. Some fix it at Shiloh, because they sacrificed to the Lord when the angel found them. Now it was not lawful to sacrifice anywhere but at the tabernacle, which was then at Shiloh. Others place Bochim near Jerusalem. It is certain that the battle between David and the Philistines in the valley of Bochim (2 Sam. v, 24) was fought near Jerusalem; wherefore, unless two places are distinguished by the name of Bochim, it must be allowed that this was near Jerusalem.

ROWLAND HILL PREACHING TO SAILORS.

In the early period of his ministry, Mr Griffin states, "that when visiting one of our seaport towns, where he attempted to preach in the open air, he was so interrupted by noise and missiles, that it was impossible, for a time, to proceed. He was on horseback, and his footman with him. Instead of attempting to preach, he had recourse to an innocent stratagem. Addressing himself to the people, he said, 'My lads, I have no right over you; if you do not choose to hear me, I have no authority to force your attention; but I have travelled some miles for the sake of doing or receiving good; I have, therefore, a proposal to make to you. I always did admire British sailors. I see here some able-bodied seamen: some of you no doubt have seen a great deal of service, and been in many a storm, and some in dangerous shipwrecks. Now, as I am very fond of hearing the adventures of seamen, my proposal is, that some of you, and as many as you please in turn, shall stand up and tell us what you have seen and suffered, and what dangers you have escaped; and I will sit and hear you out, upon this condition,—that you agree to hear me afterwards.' This proposal made many of them laugh heartily, and they said one to another, 'Do you stand up and give us a lecture.' One called upon a talkative sailor by name, 'I say, Harry, do you give him a lecture,' which produced a loud burst of laughter through the whole crowd; and Mr. Hill, to keep them in good humour, laughed with them. After waiting some time, Mr. Hill said, 'Will none of you take my proposal?' None being disposed to do so, he said, 'I am a clergyman—I came, not long since, from the University of Cambridge. If you had heard me, I should have told you nothing but what is in the Bible or Prayer Book. I will tell you what I intended to say to you, if you had heard me quietly.' And then beginning with a declaration of the grace and compassion of Christ in dying to save all penitent sinners, he led them to the consideration of the thief on the cross; and then to the character and circumstances of the prodigal son, and the compassion of his father. His description of what he meant to have said was so interesting and affecting, that he rivetted their attention, and produced an evident change in their disposition towards him. While he was speaking they drew gradually nearer, hanging, as is the practice of sailors when standing in a crowd, upon each other's shoulders. In this position they listened, with almost death-like silence, till he had finished telling them what he should have said, if they had been willing to hear him. He then took off his hat, made them a bow, and thanked them for their civilities. Most of them took off their hats, and gave him three cheers: several vociferated, 'When will you come again, Sir?' And one man, who seemed like the champion of the whole, approached Mr. Hill, and said, 'If you will come again, Sir, I say no one shall hurt a hair of your head, if I am on shore.' Mr. Hill promised that he would visit them again, as soon as other engagements would permit. There are now, in that town and neighbourhood, several places of worship; and it is as quiet and orderly a seaport as any in the kingdom."

VANITY OF HUMAN REASONING INDEPENDENT OF DIVINITY.

It is the great error of many eminent philosophers, that they systematically exclude the Deity from all their reasonings on the formation and principles of things; and strive in vain to account for them rationally without Him. No failure seems to lead them to suppose that they are wandering in a bewildering darkness, from which they will never extricate either themselves or their subject. By this voluntary omission they impede the progress of human science, by depriving it of the benefit which would accrue from their active minds, if these were wisely directed into the actual path of truth and light. Turning out of this, they give us in their most elaborate efforts to supersede it, nothing but a succession of butterfly fancies, which amuse for a moment, and then expire and are forgotten. We have plenty of vague assertions and chimeras, but nothing to advance our knowledge or satisfy our judgment, or that lasts beyond the meteors of a day. This defect is continually spoiling many of the most lofty minds in other countries, and deprives them of that valuable reputation which is their dearest hope, and which their researches and talents would otherwise more certainly obtain. Nothing tends more to consign an author to oblivion, or to that depreciation which is far worse, than to depart from the grand truths of nature, and set up idols and fallacies instead. No one patronizes another's fantasies, however fondly he may cherish his own. And if the British empire keeps its reasoning mind firmly attached to the great Newtonian principle of the Divine causation of all things, its men of science will always be in the foremost ranks of intellect, honour, and celebrity.

A PHILOSOPHER'S ESTIMATE OF SACRED HISTORY.

As nature will never be properly understood, if its creation by the Deity be excluded from the thought; neither will human history appear a rational or connected system, nor be found in harmony with the science which characterizes the laws of the material universe, if the sacred history which has accompanied our earthly subsistence be omitted in our contemplation. It is this which gives purpose, order, process, intelligence, and benevolence to the other. At least, I never understood or duly appreciated the ancient history of mankind, until I viewed it with this association, and had traced such of their mutual relations as I was enabled to discern. New light and intelligibility then spread over the whole, and made that a pleasing and useful study, which had been before a dissatisfying and barren one.—Turner

WORSHIP.

God of glory! Source of blessing!
  Grant thy grace our hearts to raise:
We thy sacred truth possessing,
  Here unite to sound thy praise.
Cherubim in glorious beauty,
  Humbly bow before thy throne,
Chant thy greatness, pay their duty;
  Yet wilt Thou our offerings own.

Mortal, weak, and sinning creatures;
  O what poor returns we pay
Thee—the Author of our natures,
  Our Preserver night and day.
Guilty terror fills our spirits,
  While we view thy holy law;
But the great Redeemer's merits,
  Bid us joys eternal draw—

From the wells of thy salvation,
  Springing in thy sacred word;
Let us drink thy consolation,
  Haste to serve our rightful Lord.
Fill us with thy Holy Spirit:
  Give us wisdom—give us grace:
O prepare us to inherit
  Heavenly bliss before thy face.

IRISH SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

Gratitude to the gracious Author of all good, must arise in every pious mind on reviewing the progress of the Sunday School Society for Ireland. This invaluable institution, in common with all others of a kindred nature, has been singularly honoured of God, in promoting the happiness of men.

"During a period marked by circumstances peculiarly unfavourable to scriptural education, through the blessing of the Almighty, there have been added to its lists, during the past year, 31 schools, 4,564 scholars, and 496 teachers: thus the number of schools in its connection is 2,642, embracing 206,717 pupils, taught by 19,142 gratuitous teachers. Of the scholars, 112,256 are reported to be reading in the Bible and Testament, and 35,239 are reported to be adults above the age of fifteen. From the returns it appears that not one half of the scholars are receiving instruction in daily schools."

The remarkable and merciful preservation, both of teachers and scholars, during the dreadful ravages of the cholera, is thus adverted to in the last report of the Cork Auxiliary Society:—

"In the city of Cork, out of more than 400 teachers, one only has been called to his Redeemer's presence; and the number of scholars who have fallen victims to the disease, has not amounted to an average of one to each school; while throughout the county of Cork, the committee have reason to believe the teachers and scholars of Sabbath schools, have been equally the subjects of this marked providence of God."

Although the principal object of the "Sunday School Society for Ireland," is to communicate the blessings of religious instruction to the poorer classes, yet the children of many in the middle and higher ranks have derived important advantages from their attendance at Sunday schools. A valued correspondent, one of the earliest friends of the Society, has communicated the following very extraordinary information:—

"Fifteen boys who attended this school became ordained clergymen in the church of England! Three died in the faith, having proved eminently useful, and finished their course with joy. The remaining twelve are faithful preachers of the everlasting gospel!"

THE EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY

In their External Division; exhibited in a Course of Lectures delivered in Clinton Hall, in the winter of 1831-2, under the appointment of the University of the City of New York, by Charles P. M'Ilvaine, D.D. Bishop of Ohio, and President of Kenyon College. London, Fisher and Jackson, 12mo. cloth, pp. 424.

Dr. Olinthus Gregory has laid the church of God under lasting obligations to him for his numerous literary works, especially his invaluable "Letters on the Evidences of Christianity." An additional debt of gratitude is due to that eminent man for recommending and superintending this edition of Bishop M'Ilvaine's excellent Lectures on the "External Division" of that most important subject. "England is a Christian nation," is a favourite and a delightful sentiment: but there are not a few, who are otherwise well instructed, who are extremely ignorant of the grounds and reasons of their professing Christianity: we are of opinion that this should form a branch of education in every seminary, and in every Sunday school.

Bishop M'Ilvaine's Lectures will form a suitable present for young persons of a superior class, and on their account we beg to call the attention of parents and guardians of youth to this choice volume.

The Lectures are thirteen in number, with the following heads:—Introductory Observations—Authenticity of the New Testament—Authenticity and Integrity of the New Testament—Credibility of the Gospel History—Divine Authority of Christianity, from Miracles—Argument from Miracles continued—Divine Authority of Christianity, from Prophecy—Argument from Prophecy continued—Divine Authority of Christianity from its Propagation—Divine Authority of Christia[illegible] from its Fruits—Argument from the Fruits of C[illegible] anity continued—Summary and Application of [illegible] Argument—Inspiration and Divine Authority [illegible] Scriptures, with concluding Observations.

THE WHITE ELEPHANT OF SIAM.

A late traveller to the Court of Siam, in the [illegible] says, "The greatest curiosities to which our [illegible] was directed, were the white elephants, well [illegible] Europe to be objects of veneration, if not of [illegible] in all the countries where the religion of Buddha prevails. The present king has no less than six, a larger number than was ever possessed by any Siamese monarch, and this is considered peculiarly auspicious to his reign. Four of them were shown to us: they approached much nearer to a true white colour than I had expected, and were of ordinary stature, the smallest not less than six and a half feet high. The rareness of the white elephant, is no doubt the cause of the consideration in which it is held. The countries in which it is found, and where indeed the elephant exists in greatest perfection, are those in which the doctrine of the transmigration of souls is held: it became natural therefore to imagine, that the body of so rare an object as the white elephant, must be the temporary habitation of the soul of some mighty personage in its progress to perfection. This is the current belief now, and accordingly they each have the rank and title of a king, with an appropriate name expressive of this dignity, such as 'the pure king,' the 'wonderful king,' and so forth. Each of those we saw, had a separate stable, and no less than ten keepers to wait upon it. On the head they all had a gold chain net, and on the back a small embroidered velvet cushion."

ECCLESIASTICAL ESTABLISHMENTS IN INDIA.

Mr. Grant's Bill, for the Renewal of the East India Company's Charter, will, in all probability, be the means of an amazing alteration in our Indian Empire. Politically, commercially, and religiously considered, though it appears to have excited but comparatively little interest in the public mind, some regard it as one of the most important measures that ever was formed for the British Colonies. Many look up to it as embracing incomparably more momentous interests than the absorbing arrangements which are being made for the West Indies. We cannot but contemplate both the East and the West Indies as likely to be infinitely benefited by the projected changes, especially in relation to the spiritual interests of the myriads of immortals, now perishing for lack of knowledge, by the promulgation of pure Christianity.

Mr. Grant's Bill provides for an enlargement of the "Ecclesiastical Establishment," on the principles of the Church of England, in India, by the creation of "two new bishops, one for Madras, and the other for Bombay, at a salary of 24,000 sicca rupees, respectively to be paid of the revenues of those territories." The 89th clause in the Bill has passed in Committee, and there is every probability that it will become law in a few weeks. We can only pray that this appointment may be for the glory of the Lord, and the advancement of the kingdom of Christ.

How this measure is regarded by the "Court of Directors of the East India Company," may be judged of by some extracts from their letter to Mr. C. Grant, of the 10th of July. "The Court stated, that the principle upon which a Christian church in India, at the expense of the nation, had been instituted, was, that it was the duty of the government to provide for its civil and military functionaries the means and services of their religion. The Court were desirous the principle should be maintained; but the Court's conviction, at the same time, was strong and sincere, that both practice and policy demanded that the expense to the natives of India of a Church Establishment with which they had no community of feeling, should be limited to what is essentially necessary for the use of the servants of the State. The Court considered there was no necessity for the extension of the Episcopal Establishment in India. If it were extended, it would be impossible to resist the extension of the Scotch Establishment. The Court deeply lamented the mortality that had occurred since the establishment of the episcopal see of Calcutta, but were not ready to admit that the death of Bishop James, Dr. Middleton, Dr. Heber, or Dr. Turner, arose from the fatigues of the duty. Travelling in India, whether by sea or land, was an important means of preserving and restoring health. The Court called attention to the fact, that since the see of Calcutta was established, the expense had been augmented from 48,000*l*. to 100,000*l*.; and the clerical part of the pension list from 800*l*. per annum to 5,000*l*. a year. The Court contemplated the creation of two or more sees with apprehension as to the financial consequences; and they pressed on the King's Government, and the Lord Primate of England, to pause before they adopted measures involving on the people of India a certain, and possibly an unlimited addition to the financial burdens of India."

In a memorandum, Mr. Grant stated it was proposed to abolish the Archdeaconries of Madras and Bombay, and that a suffragan Bishop be appointed to each, on a salary of 2,500*l*. to be assisted by the senior Chaplains of the Presidencies, at a salary of 200*l*. or 250*l*. each, in addition to their salaries as chaplains.

"Besides the regular churches, there are numerous Romish missions established throughout Asia. But the zeal of conversion has not been much known during the last century. The missionaries are now generally stationary: respected by the natives for their learning and medical knowledge, and in general for their pure manners, they ensure to themselves a comfortable subsistence, and are enabled to show hospitality to strangers.

"On a general view of the Roman Catholic Church," Dr. Buchanan adds, "we must certainly acknowledge, that, besides its principal design in preserving the faith of its own members, it possesses a civilizing influence in Asia; and that notwithstanding its constitutional asperity, intolerant and repulsive, compared with the generous principles of the Protestant religion, it has dispelled much of the darkness of Paganism."—Memorial, chapter ii.

CHURCH OF CHUNAR, BELONGING TO THE CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Chunar is a town on the river Ganges, about 500 miles above the city of Calcutta, where the Church Missionary Society has a flourishing station. The origin and progress of the work of God in evangelizing the heathen in this dark portion of the earth, is truly interesting, and strikingly illustrative of the power of the gospel. "The Rev. Daniel Corrie, who was chaplain at Agra, a large city more than 300 miles above Chunar, when he left that place in 1814 to return for a time to England on account of his health, committed the congregation to the care of the Christian native, Abdool Messeeh, whose labours among his countrymen had been much blessed of God; upward of fifty adults having been baptized in the preceding sixteen months.

"Mr. W. Bowley, born in India, was appointed to labour with Abdool: but it was found best, after a while, that Mr. Bowley should remove to another station; and he was accordingly fixed, in 1815, at Chunar. Mr. Corrie had been chaplain at Chunar before he went to Agra: there were premises at Chunar belonging to him, which were made over to the Society; and in these Mr. Bowley took up his abode. Here he began to labour as a catechist and teacher, both among the native Christians of the place, and the Mahomedans and Heathens. Chunar being a station for invalid European soldiers, their wives and descendants form a considerable body of native Christians. A large school-room was erected in 1815, which served also for a place of worship.

On the return of Mr. Corrie to India in 1817, he was appointed to the chaplaincy at Benares, a very large city on the Ganges, a few miles below Chunar. In February and March 1818, he visited Chunar, and found the mission in so promising a state, that the room would not accommodate all who wished to attend. Having represented this to the Corresponding Committee of the Society at Calcutta, they requested him to adopt measures for the erection of a church or chapel, for the accommodation of the congregation. A paper was according circulated by him, in May 1818, stating the necessity of the case, and inviting contributions. The Marquis of Hastings, Governor-General of India, was pleased to begin the subscription, by giving a considerable sum in the money of India, equal to more than one hundred guineas. His Lordship was followed by many European gentlemen living in India; and the soldiers, native Christians, and even some Heathens, at Chunar, lent their aid: the remainder of the expense was supplied from the funds of the Society. Mr. Turnbull, the proprietor, presented a piece of ground for the church. The foundation-stone was laid on the 4th of August 1818; and the church was so far completed, in April 1820, as to admit of its being then opened for Divine worship.

In the Report of the Church Missionary Society for 1821-2, it is stated, "During the past year, the church, mentioned in the former Reports, has been finished; and is now conveniently fitted up, for the double purpose of English and Hindoostanee Worship. It is understood by the Committee, that the middle aisle is pewed for the accommodation of Europeans, and such native Christians as have adopted European manners; and that a considerable space round the pulpit is left open, and matted, to admit the natives sitting in the usual posture; while the side aisles are supplied with moveable seats."

Schools, and various institutions for the diffusion of evangelical truth, are attached to this church and station; and the instances of conversion to Christ, among the natives, of a most encouraging character, are reported in the Society's papers, to which we refer our readers.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

NOAH.

The Deluge.

Against the Mosaic account of the Deluge, some infidels have objected, from the supposed insufficiency of water: but such objections, like most others of that class of persons, arise from ignorance; as we are not able to ascertain the quantity of water which exists in the creation. From various experiments and calculations, made by scientific men, it has appeared, that water exists to an extent, far beyond the ordinary conceptions of the most intelligent minds; besides "the fountains of the great deep," in the bowels of the earth, whose diameter is nearly eight thousand miles, and which must necessarily be sufficient to deluge the globe, to the height of very many miles. And our young readers should further remember, that the inspired author, who relates the fact of the deluge, declares that it was carried on under the immediate direction of Almighty God; an event, which, from its very nature must have been out of the common course, and truly miraculous. It deserves also to be noticed here, that every nation of antiquity possesses some remarkable tradition of a universal deluge, at a remote period of their history: and unless we admit the Mosaic record, all the ingenuity of sceptical cavillers cannot account for this universal tradition in the Pagan world.

Of the reality of the deluge, the most abundant proofs still subsist in every country. The loftiest mountains upon the earth, are the Himalayan, in the north of India: they are about 27,000 feet, or rather more than five miles in perpendicular height above the level of the sea. Their summits, like all others of similar elevation, are covered with perpetual snow: but as far as human investigation has reached, the most striking evidence has been found of the truth of the Mosaic account of the deluge.

The Andes, the Alps, the Appenines, the Pyrenees, Libanus, Atlas, and Ararat, in short, all the mountains of every region under heaven, where search has been made, conspire in one uniform and universal proof that the sea has been spread over their highest summits; for they are found to contain shells, skeletons of fish, and marine animals of every kind. The bones of extinct animals have been found in America, at an elevation of 7,800 feet, and in the Cordilleras, at 7,000 feet above the level of the sea. The fossilized remains of the horse, deer, and bear species, have been brought to England from the Himalayan mountains, found at an elevation of more than 16,000 feet. Skeletons of the elephant and rhinoceros, natives of Africa and southern Asia, have been dug up on the steppes or table lands of Tartary and Siberia; and remains of elephants have been found in various parts of England. Crocodiles, chiefly of the Asiatic species, have been discovered in the earth, in various parts of Europe. Fossil remains of the elephant, and of the gigantic mammoth, an animal still larger, but not now known to exist, have been found in the northern parts of Russia, in North America, and in Ireland. The like remains of the hippopotamus, tiger, and hyæna, animals peculiar to Africa and the East, and the entire skeletons of whales, have been found in different parts of England!

To these facts it may be added, that trees of vast dimensions, with their roots and tops, and some with leaves and fruit, have been found at the bottom of mines, in regions where no such trees were ever known to grow. Indeed, the fact of the deluge has received the most satisfactory confirmation by the discoveries of the greatest students in geology.

"And God remembered Noah, and every living thing, and all the cattle that was with him in the ark: and God made a wind to pass over the earth, and the waters were assuaged. And the waters returned from off the earth continually; and after the end of the hundred and fifty days the waters were abated: and the ark rested in the seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month, upon the mountains of Ararat. And the waters decreased continually until the tenth month: in the tenth month, on the first day of the month, were the tops of the mountains seen. And it came to pass at the end of forty days, that Noah opened the window of the ark, and sent forth a raven, which went to and fro, until the waters were dried up from off the earth. Also he sent forth a dove from him, to see if the waters were abated from off the face of the ground; but the dove found no rest for the sole of her foot, and she returned to him into the ark, for the waters were upon the face of the whole earth: then he put forth his hand, and took her, and pulled her in unto him into the ark. And he stayed yet other seven days; and again he sent forth the dove out of the ark; and the dove came in unto him in the evening; and, lo, in her mouth was an olive leaf plucked off: so Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth. And he stayed yet other seven days; and sent forth the dove; which returned not again unto him any more. And in the second month, on the seven and twentieth day of the month, was the earth dried." Gen. viii, 1—14.

A whole year and ten days was Noah shut up, with his family and the living creatures in the ark; in which time a variety of reflections, both painful and profitable, must necessarily fill his mind. But his faith was vigorous, like that of other of the servants of God in their peculiar and fiery trials, affording to us a most instructive example, to "trust in the LORD for ever; for in the LORD Jehovah is everlasting strength." Isa. xxvi, 4.

Sunday School Lectures.

LECTURE IV.

"THY WILL BE DONE ON EARTH AS IT IS IN HEAVEN."

Whose will is it that we pray may be done?—God's.

What is the meaning of God's will being done?—That all God has commanded in the Bible may be obeyed.

What has God declared in the Bible to be his will, or commands?—That we should love God with all our hearts and souls and minds, and our neighbours as ourselves: and we should strive to obey these commandments.

We pray that God's will may be done on earth as it is in heaven; how does man naturally obey God's will?—Man naturally obeys God's will unwillingly, as if it were a great hardship and task.

Who do God's will in heaven?—The angels.

How do the angels obey God's will: in what spirit and temper?—They take delight and pleasure in doing God's will, and perform it cheerfully.

What then do we pray for, when we say, "Thy will be done?"—That man may take pleasure in doing God's will, as the angels do in heaven.

Can men, naturally disliking God's will, and thinking it a great hardship to obey his commands, cause themselves to love God's will, and willingly to obey his commands?—No.

If then a man must really love to do God's will, before he can go to heaven, and if he cannot make himself to love, instead of hating, God's will; by whose strength can he love God's will, and how may he obtain that strength?—Man can only love God's will, by God's giving him the strength and power so to do; and man may obtain God's strength, by praying for it.

How is it that man naturally hates God's will, instead of loving it?—Man hates God's will, because his heart is wicked: because his heart or "thoughts" (as Scripture says) "are only evil continually," and because God's will is altogether holy.

Who must change man's will from being sinful, to be holy, and what must man do to obtain this change?—God must change the heart of man: but he must pray to God for his Holy Spirit to sanctify his heart, to make it holy; and Jesus Christ purchased the Holy Spirit for us by his death.

Teacher. Since, then, man's will is just contrary to God's will, God's will being holy, and man's will being unholy—since man's will must be made like God's will before he can go to heaven, being made holy—since man cannot by his own strength make his heart holy, but only God—and since God has promised to change our hearts if we ask him to do so,—it follows that we must pray to God to give us his Holy Spirit to sanctify our hearts, and take away our sins, and to make us to love God, that we may keep his commandments. If we pray, God has promised to give us his Spirit, "Ask and ye shall receive, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you." If we do not pray to God, we cannot receive the Holy Spirit, but must remain for ever sinful and wicked; and a wicked person is not fit for heaven and God's company, but only for hell, and the devil's company, where he must for ever dwell in misery: but if we pray to God for his Spirit, our prayers will be answered, and we shall be made fit for God's company, and then we shall always dwell with him. Then let me say to you all, that you must pray or you will be condemned; you must pray, or you will go to hell; you must pray in real earnest to God to give you his Holy Spirit; you must pray in spirit and in truth, with all your heart, and really desiring to have what you ask for. If you pray merely as a task, kneeling down at night and morning, and saying your prayers without regarding what you say, and as a task, God will not answer your prayers, because while you are thus praying, you will be only sinning against him, and mocking God; you must pray in spirit and in truth, with all your hearts, desiring and feeling the need of what you pray for. Then let us all remember before we go to bed this night, to ask God for Christ's sake to give us his Holy Spirit; for if he does not change our hearts we must be condemned; but if he does, then we shall be saved, and live with him for ever in heaven, and with his holy angels, and with all the redeemed in his heavenly kingdom, and be for ever in that place, where there is everlasting joy for those who love Christ, and who have been made holy by the Holy Ghost, such joy as man's "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor has ever entered into the heart of man to conceive." May we all be made partakers of this joy for Christ's sake. Amen.

ON RECONCILIATION.

GOD was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, 2 Cor. v, 19. These words are small in bulk, but great in mystery; 'tis the heads of the Gospel in a nutshell; the most sparkling diamond in the whole golden ring of Scripture. It comprehends the counsels of eternity and the transactions of time. A wonder in heaven, God bringing forth a man-child to be a propitiation for sin, which was the Jews' stumbling-block, and the Gentiles scoff: but wherein the wisdom and grace of God's counsel in heaven, and the power of his actions on earth, clearly shine forth in the face of Jesus Christ. The Jacob's ladder, the upper part fixed in heaven, and the lower foot standing on the earth, angels descended on that; God descends to man by this in acts of wisdom and grace, and man ascends to God in acts of faith and love. How beautiful will this whole work appear when the whole methods of it come to be read in heaven in the original copy, when they shall be seen in the face, in the bosom of God, in fair and plainer characters. To conclude: if all the sparks that ever leaped out of any fire since the creation, and all the drops of rain that have fell upon the world, were so many angelical tongues, their praise would come short of the excess of this love. Let the praise of God for this, be not the business of a day, but the work of our lives, since eternity is too short to admire it.—Charnock.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXXIV.

On the question of Public or Private Education.

Dear Madam,

The opinion which I shall endeavour to recommend in this Letter is, that, in many important respects, the parent should prefer that his son should be sent to school, rather than to supply him even with the highest advantages of private tuition under his own roof.

In the first place, the system of private education is exceedingly apt to foster and to establish many habits of mind and body, which would be detrimental to the welfare of your son. Upon this supposition, your son, and one or two of his brothers perhaps, and the tutor, would form the school. Their acquaintance with boys of their own age would be exceedingly limited, it being the very principle of a private education, that the subjects of it should be kept by it from mingling with other boys, and thus preserved from the contagion of bad example. Accordingly, your children will only or principally be each other's companions. But we all know, that whatever may be the degree of affection and good arrangement in a family, boys will seldom engage with their own brothers from year to year in those sports and exercises, which in former Letters I have frequently recommended. Besides, it is almost an unavoidable evil in private education, that the elder children successively rule over each other, and the eldest son over the whole. Hence a habit of dominion very injurious to the governor and the governed is, I believe, universally in such cases established. Should your son alone be privately educated, the attendant evils are still more numerous and formidable. No boy will ever alone engage in the robust exercises needful to him for the development of his constitution and the establishment of his health. It is true that the tutor may walk out every day with him, but there will be little congeniality in their minds while thus engaged. The matured and contemplative mind of the tutor can scarcely, however he may endeavour, respond to all the gaiety and exhilaration natural to a healthy child.

The evils produced upon the mind next deserve attention. One of those which I believe to be nearly inseparable from the system is, that your child under such circumstances would have no one with whom to compare himself in the several stages of the process of education. Hence, when his tutor is satisfied (for I hold that no positive expression of praise ought ever to be heard in the course of education), your son would of course be led to think that he had attained so much as even to satisfy his tutor. Hence his vanity will be excited. In nothing, perhaps, is the system of private education so hurtful. It always makes the subject of it vain; that is, thinking more highly of himself than he ought to think. The cause is, he has no one with whom to compare himself: he knows of no one cleverer than himself, and he can only judge of what he does know. All these feelings will be fostered by the praises and commendations, or indirect tokens of complacency, which if you and his tutor properly abstain from giving, you cannot prevent him from receiving from other persons. Add to which, that his mind, by the continual contemplation of itself, acquires the tendency of becoming self-enamoured. All this, however, serves but to foment his vanity; and vanity is the bane of all persons who live and study much alone, and especially of those who are privately educated. At the same time no habit is so difficult to be eradicated in after-life. When your son comes to mingle with the world (and he must mingle with it), he will find mankind, apparently to himself, most insensible to his superior qualifications. Hence he will consider himself injured by mankind, and will learn to avoid, if not to hate them. Should he, which is very likely to be the case, meet with many persons equal or superior to himself, this discovery will but add to his chagrin. Vanity, the most selfish of all passions, abhors that its own excellencies should be shared by another. The vain man will indeed often be kind, but it will be to his inferiors in some decided respect; to his equals he will be distant: yet the great concerns of human life, the discharge even of the moral duties, calls upon us to mingle much with our equals. Virtue, too, is chiefly to be estimated by our conduct to such as are upon the same level of human life with ourselves.

Finding, however, the society of equals, from these and other causes, less pleasing, he will be in danger of delighting in low company, the invariable tendency of the vain mind; or he will be disposed to be servile towards his superiors, no person being capable of greater apparent humility than those whose predominant passion is vanity. It should also be remembered, that owing to the very circumstances selected by the vain man, this ill habit of mind can scarcely ever be corrected. Collision with society, the reciprocal conduct of man with man, is the cure, but this he shuns. The disease therefore takes possession of the heart, and at no distant period perhaps degenerates into a selfishness, whose least repulsive characteristic is misanthropy, pouring forth its querulous accusations upon the baseness, meanness, inconstancy, and wickedness of mankind. The other only alternative is the pursuit of ambition, to which vanity not unusually is directed. Under either result you will be aware of the vast mischief produced by this passion to your offspring, and to all those of his fellow-creatures standing to him in any relation of human life. Yet I believe that this habit, like most others, is implanted in childhood, and is derived from the early circumstances of education: it may be traced to the nursery.

The system of private education renders the subject of it peculiarly liable to this desolating passion. I believe that the morbid sensibility (another word for the consuming influence of vanity) which was the bane of the late Lord Byron, is to be attributed to this cause. This result is however precluded, if a boy be sent at a proper age to a good school, composed of not less than fifty boys, of different ages, and intended for different pursuits in future life. There your son will find himself surrounded by many who are his equals, and probably by many who are his superiors, in abilities and acquirements. He will find, that if he has any wish to shine, he can derive no gratification to his desire from the plaudits of friends and relatives. He must gain each succeeding elevation as the result of industry, merit, and good behaviour. Should he then be ambitious, by nature or by the influence of early circumstances, he will find that the indulgence of his wish occasions him to become diligent and accomplished. Though not the most desirable principle, perhaps, yet, under these circumstances, as far as acquirements are concerned, it is productive of the most desirable results.

On the other hand, should he, notwithstanding all your watchfulness, have acquired habits of vanity, during those years when his education was conducted under your own inspection, he will infallibly be cured of them if sent to school, provided that this remedy is applied early enough. His schoolfellows, from the very first hour, will perceive it: they will read it in his solemn countenance, his reserve, his distance, his disdain to mingle in their pursuits. And no sooner will they see these things, than they will begin the process.

Vanity is a weakness, and weakness invites insult. I sympathize with his feelings, writhing and indignant and helpless under the lash; but I sympathize with him as I should with the pangs of a patient under an operation which will save his life. After a few days or months of suffering, during which he will plainly be told the cause, and read it in their conduct, he will reflect and examine himself: he will compare his own condition with that of other boys: he will see them, notwithstanding their acknowledged ability and acquisitions, contented and happy. He will discover that the reason is, that they really do what he would wish others to think him capable of doing: they really are what he would fain rest contented (for no passion is so indolent as vanity) with their thinking him to be. He learns his mistake, applies himself diligently to his studies, and either gains the eminence he wishes upon proper and solid ground, or, finding his inability, gives up the vain and troublesome profession of it without the reality.

Should, however, he be sent to school or to college too late—should he be eighteen or nineteen years old before he mingles with the world—he will endure indeed all the process, for mankind will infallibly inflict it. Whenever the vain man, like the owl at noon-day, comes abroad, he will assuredly be recognized and tormented. But in vain: his habits are fixed: the period at which habits are changeable is gone by. It is scarcely possible for him to imagine the cause. Should it ever for a moment force itself upon his attention, he will dismiss it, unable to bear the humiliating thought, unable perhaps to endure the idea, that every person concerned in his education was mistaken. Self-love will present the barrier of pride to the supposition; and he will, on the contrary, lay all the blame upon an unrefined and sordid world, whom he will be prepared to desert, to despise, and hate.

EXPLANATION OF 1 COR. XI, 10.

"For this cause the woman ought to have power on her head, because of the angels."

"Sir,—The text, 1 Cor. xi, 10, has always appeared to me to have a deal of obscurity in it. Pray, Sir, can you explain what relations the angels have to the woman, that through them she should have power on her head? If you can spare room in your valuable little work to answer this, you will oblige, Sir, yours, &c.

A Constant Reader."

Many a "Constant Reader," even of the Holy Scriptures, has been perplexed, we have no doubt, by the passage under consideration. We ourselves were perplexed by it in early life, and considered it, as our Correspondent does, characterized by "a deal of obscurity." Dr. Doddridge remarks, in a Note on this verse, "Mr. Locke acknowledges, with a modesty which does him much honour, that he did not understand this text; and many seem to have darkened it by their attempts to explain it."

To understand this passage aright, it will be necessary to consider the design of the apostle. Dr. Doddridge, in a Note referring to verse 4, says, "It was certainly (as Dr. Whitby and others have proved) the custom among the Greeks and Romans, as well as the Jews, to appear in worshipping assemblies with the head covered; and it is certain the Jewish priests wore a kind of turban, when ministering in the Temple. But it seems that the Corinthian men wore a veil, out of regard to Pharisaical traditions, and in imitation of the custom prevailing in the synagogues, which therefore the apostle disapproved. The women seem to have worn their hair dishevelled, when praying by divine inspiration (which seems to have been the only case in which they could regularly pray in public); this made them resemble those pagan priestesses, who pretended to be actuated by their gods; the apostle therefore with great propriety discourages it."

The principal difficulty in the passage arises from the words "power on her head," and "angels."

Without troubling our readers with the different, contradictory, and, many of them, absurd expositions, which have been given of this text by learned commentators, supposing "angels" in this place necessarily to mean superior spirits, some interpreting it of the good, and others of the evil angels, we proceed to give that which appears to us the only rational and consistent, and, we believe, its true signification. "Power on her head," here manifestly refers to that subject, concerning which the apostle is discoursing in this long paragraph, from ver. 1 to 16—the propriety and decency of women appearing in the assemblies for public worship, or even praying and prophesying by inspiration, having a veil or "covering," ver. 5, 13, 15. Hence the marginal note to "covering," in ver. 15, is "veil"—and to the word "power," ver. 10, it is, "a covering, in sign that she is under the honour of her husband."

"Angels" properly signifies "messengers," sent for any purpose; and the holy spirits before the throne of God are so called, because of their being employed as "messengers," to execute his righteous commands. The messengers of John the Baptist, Luke vii, 24, were two of his disciples, see ver. 19: the "messengers," Luke ix, 52, whom Jesus sent, appear to have been two of his disciples: the "messengers," James ii, 25, whom Rahab received, were two men sent by Joshua to explore the city and country of Jericho. But in all these places the original is in the very same Greek words as the original of the text in question, 1 Cor. xi, 10.

The messengers received by Rahab, are properly called "spies" by the apostle, Heb. xi, 31; and such we believe to be intended by the Holy Spirit in the passage before us.

Now let our "Constant Reader" consider "what relation the angels have to the woman," the text being translated, as we think, correctly; bearing in mind another part of the apostle's argument, that "the head of every man is Christ; and the head of every woman is the man;" ver. 3. "On this account, the woman ought to have a veil (or covering) on her head, because of spies."

That there were "messengers" (in Greek "angels") sent by the idolatrous Corinthians to act as "spies," or observers, in the assemblies of the Christians, is certain from the apostle's directions concerning propriety in public worship, contained in this same letter to that church (see chap. xiv, 23), "If—there come in those that are unlearned or unbelievers," &c. We presume that our friend will find, on reading this chapter, that the translation here given renders the argument and reasoning of the apostle consistent, beautiful, and edifying; especially when he recollects the customs of the East in reference to women, and the design of the apostle in reference to the exercises of social worship in the primitive churches.

CASE OF CONSCIENCE.—HEB. X, 26.

Sir,—I hope you will excuse the liberty I have taken; but knowing that it is with pleasure you afford instruction on passages of Scripture, I have been induced to send you one which has been much upon my mind, as I cannot comprehend the meaning of it: Heb. x, 26, "If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins." I feel that I have in many points done according to the former part of the verse. I have not prized the word of God so much as I ought to have done: I have not practised secret prayer so much as I ought to do: I feel my heart prone to wander from God and from the things that make for my everlasting peace. These I know to be sinful; but whether these are amongst those that the apostle alludes to, I know not: but, Sir, if you please, give some thoughts on that passage, and I shall feel very thankful, as it has been of great discouragement to me. "The Bee that wanders, and sips from every flower, disposes what she has gathered into her cells."—SENECA.

REMARKABLE ANECDOTE OF REV. JOSEPH SHERWOOD.

SOON after his ejectment by the Bartholomew Act, he was cited to the Spiritual Court for not going to church. He appeared, and gave for a reason, that there was no preaching, and he could not with any satisfaction attend there merely to hear the clerk read the prayers; but promised to go the next Lord's day if there was a sermon. Finding upon inquiry there was no minister then, he did not go; so he was cited again, and gave the same answer. The Lord's day following, being informed by the churchwarden, who was his friend, that there would be no sermon, he determined to go to church, when great numbers out of curiosity followed him. He seated himself in the clerk's desk all the time of the prayers, and then went up into the pulpit, and preached from Lev. xxvi, 25, "I will bring a sword upon you that shall avenge the quarrel of my covenant." The rumour of this was soon spread abroad; but such was the affection of the people for Mr. Sherwood, that though there was a crowded congregation in a large church, his enemies could not get any one to lay an information against him; till by artifice, they got an acknowledgment from his friend the churchwarden, and by threats frightened him into a formal information. He was carried to a petty session of justices, where one Major Robinson, a member of parliament, sat as chairman, who bitterly reviled Mr. Sherwood, calling him a rebel, &c. This he bore very patiently, making only this reply, "That as he was a minister of the gospel, and at the church where there was so great an assembly, he could not but have compassion on the multitude, and give them a word of exhortation." Robinson. "But did ever man preach from such rebellious text?" Mr. Sherwood. "Sir, I know man is a rebel against his Creator, but I never knew that the Creator could be a rebel against his creature." On which, Robinson cried out, "Write his mittimus for Launceston jail;" and then turning to Mr. Sherwood, said, "I say, Sir, it was a rebellious text." Mr. Sherwood, looking him full in the face, addressed him in these words, "Sir, if you die the common death of all men, God never spake by me." He was sent to prison, but being favoured by the keeper, he had liberty to walk about the castle and town. Robinson returned home; and a few days after, walking in the fields, a bull that had been very tame, came up to a gate where he stood, and his maid servant before him, who had been milking; the creature turning her aside with his horns, ran directly upon Robinson, and tore out his bowels. The Major's sister, hearing of this disaster, came, and said, "Alas! brother, what a heavy judgment is this." He replied, "It is a heavy judgment indeed." He was carried home, and soon died.

This remarkable providence, brought to recollection what had passed at the sessions. In a little time, Mr. Sherwood was released and returned home; but was shortly afterwards sent for to Penzance, where some justices met. He immediately went, expecting to be sent back to jail. But when he came there, Mr. Godolphin came out, and taking him into another room, said, "Sir, I sent for you, to learn how you came to express yourself as you did when we committed you? You know, I suppose, Sir, what has since befallen Mr. Robinson." Mr. Sherwood replied, "Sir, I was far from bearing any malice against Mr. Robinson, and can give no other answer than that, 'When we are called before rulers for his name's sake,' whom we serve, 'it shall be given us in that very hour what we shall speak' (Matt. x, 19). To which Mr. Godolphin answered, "Well, Sir, for your sake, I will never more have a hand in persecuting Dissenters." And he was as good as his word. See this extraordinary story well attested in CALAMY, vol. iii, p. 215.

ADDRESS TO THE DEITY.

GREAT SPIRIT! whose creative breath,
  Quicken'd to being all we see,
Waken our slumb'ring minds from death,
  Lead us through all thy works to THEE.

The bleating sheep, the lowing herd,
  And insects humming as they flit,
The pebbly brook, the warbling bird,
  In harmony their hymns emit.

Shall man be mute, when all is praise!
  Great chieftain of the grateful throng!
Lofty his gifts—then let him raise
  Above them all the loftier song.

And if he seek the pensive grove,
  Or tread the smiling meadows green,
Or gaze on worlds that wheel above,
  Let him view GOD in every scene.

GREAT SPIRIT! when thy works we scan,
  Oh! teach us what we ought to be;
These wonders all were made for man,
  But man—vast thought!—was made for THEE!

THE DUTY OF SERIOUSNESS.

Ah, my friends! while we laugh, all things are serious around us. GOD is serious, who exerciseth patience towards us: CHRIST is serious, who shed his blood for us: the HOLY GHOST is serious, who striveth against the obstinacy of our hearts: the HOLY SCRIPTURES bring to our ears the most serious things in the world: the HOLY SACRAMENTS represent the most serious and awful matters: the whole creation is serious in serving God and us: all that are in heaven and hell are serious: how then can we be gay?

BONAVENTURE.

The devil tempting Bonaventure, suggested to him that he was a reprobate, and persuaded him to drink in the pleasures of this life, because he was excluded from the future joys with God in heaven. Bonaventure's graces being active, he answered, "No, not so, Satan; if I must not enjoy God after this life, let me enjoy him as much as I can in this life."—Brooks.

LINES IN MEMORY OF H. W.

Who died May 10, 1833, aged seventeen years.

How soon are the dawnings of Providence clouded!
How soon bends the flower with a withering breath!
So soon were her youth and her loveliness shrouded,
And the spark of her genius extinguish'd by death.

How rich were the gems that her young fancy scatter'd!
How pure were the first emanations of mind!
But the silver cord 's loos'd, and the golden bowl shatter'd,
The spell that enchanted no longer can bind.

When sinking to rest, there was glory around her;
'Twas joy to the soul on that brightness to gaze:
E'en the Angel of Death, as in fetters he bound her,
Could not tarnish its splendour, nor darken its rays.

Oh, no! 'twas a radiance reflected from heaven,
And it beam'd on the hearts that were mourning her loss:
'Twas the light (when the veil of the Temple was riven,
And the earth sunk in darkness) that shone on the Cross.

She lean'd on that Rock which no tempest could shiver:
She rested her hope on the pillar of Truth:
She drank of the waters that flow from that River,
Whose streams heal the soul, and give strength to our youth.

And the halo of mercy encircled her pillow;
A seraph hung over her fluttering breath;
And the voice that could calm ev'n the turbulent billow
Cheer'd her soul through the shade of the valley of death.

Now see her with minist'ring angels surrounding;
Hear the chorus of heaven as she reaches the skies;
Behold her pure form o'er a golden harp bending,
The raptures of holiness bright'ning her eyes.

Then why to these sorrowful scenes are we clinging;
We'll wipe from our eyelids the tears as they rise;
For see, from her beautiful corpse there is springing
The Angel of Hope, and she points to the skies.

SUBSTANTIAL PLEASURE.

ADDRESSED TO YOUTH.

I WOULD therefore exhort you earnestly — you who are yet unskilled in the ways of the world — to beware on what object you concentre your hopes. Pleasures may allure, pride or ambition may stimulate; but their fruits are hollow and deceitful, and they afford no sure, no solid satisfaction. You are placed on the earth in a state of probation: your continuance here will be, at the longest, a very short period; and when you are called from hence, you plunge into an eternity, the completion of which will be, in correspondence to your past life, unutterably happy or inconceivably miserable. Your fate will probably depend on your early pursuits: it will be these which will give the turn to your character and to your pleasures. I beseech you, therefore, with a meek and lowly spirit, to read the pages of that book, which the wisest and best of men have acknowledged to be the word of God. You will there find a rule of moral conduct, such as the world never had any idea of before its divulgation. If you covet earthly happiness, it is only to be found in the path you will find there laid down; and I can confidently promise you, in a life of simplicity and purity, a life passed in accordance with the Divine word, such substantial bliss, such unruffled peace, as is nowhere else to be found. All other schemes of earthly pleasure are fleeting and unsatisfactory. They all entail upon them repentance and bitterness of thought. This alone endureth for ever — this alone embraces equally the present and the future — this alone can arm a man against every calamity — can alone shed the balm of peace over that scene of life when pleasures have lost their zest, and the mind can no longer look forward to the dark and mysterious future. Above all, beware of the ignis fatuus of false philosophy: that must be a very defective system of ethics which will not bear a man through the most trying stage of his existence; and I know of none that will do it but the Christian. — H. K. WHITE.

THE SCRIPTURE TEACHER'S ASSISTANT,

With Explanations and Lessons. Designed for Sunday Schools and Families. By Henry Althans. London: Sunday School Union Depository. 18mo. pp. 140.

Sunday School Teachers and Families are indebted to Mr. Althans for other valuable works besides this "Assistant;" and this little work, so worthy of its title, will increase the obligation. It contains Fifty-two Subjects from the Gospel History of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, arranged according to Dr. Doddridge's Harmony. We think this an admirable guide to mothers and governesses, in their infinitely important work of Scripture instruction on the Lord's day; and in that view we especially recommend it to our Readers. Eleven interesting "Subjects for Bible Classes," are added in an Appendix.

KING GEORGE THE THIRD'S OPINION OF A SERMON.

The late Bishop F. of Salisbury having procured a young man of promising abilities to preach before the King; and the young man having, to his Lordship's apprehension, acquitted himself well, the Bishop, in conversation with the King afterwards, wishing to get the King's opinion, took the liberty to say, "Does not your Majesty think that the young man, who had the honour to preach before your Majesty, is likely to make a good clergyman, and has this morning delivered a very good sermon?" To which the King, in his blunt manner, hastily replied, "It might have been a good sermon, my Lord, for aught I know; but I consider no sermon good that has nothing of Christ in it."—Dr. A. Clarke's Commentary.

Death of W. Wilberforce, Esq.

THIS highly-distinguished and venerated Christian philanthropist finished his earthly course on Monday last at the house of Mrs. Smith, in Cadogan Place; having been permitted to see the great object of Negro Emancipation, to which the best energies of his mind had been so many years devoted, just on the eve of its accomplishment before his removal. The sorrow which must be produced by the loss of so bright a luminary in the Christian world, will, we trust, be tempered by gratitude that he has been spared so long, and enabled to accomplish so much; and by a sincere and ardent desire to emulate the example of his benevolent life on the same principle of a living faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. Mr. W. was in his 74th year; and we understand has directed that his body shall be interred in the grave of a relative at Stoke Newington, in a strictly private manner. We shall give a Memoir of this eminent man in an early Number.

BETHLEHEM OF JUDAH.

Excepting the "Holy City"—the "City of Gód"—Jerusalem, no place upon earth has been so deservedly celebrated as Bethlehem. Here, as is supposed, is aid the delightful scene of the beautiful narrative of Ruth. In this distinguished city, David, the royal psalmist, was born, and spent the early years of his life, under the tuition of the Holy Spirit, qualifying him to become "the sweet singer of Israel," and the niversal instructor of the Christian church. But its most transcendant honour is, that here was the first xhibition of God Incarnate! "without controversy he great mystery of godliness, God manifest in the esh," for the redemption of a ruined world!

Divine inspiration foretold this glory as appointed to est upon the favoured city. Micah, the holy seer, in is prophetic strains, sung, "And thou, Bethlehem phratah, though thou be little among the thousands of udah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me, hat is to be ruler in Israel, whose goings forth have een from of old, from everlasting." Mic. v, 2. Agreeably to this sublime prediction, on the memorable morning, the glorious spirits, the angels of God, proclaimed its fulfilment; and there appeared "a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men." Luke ii, 13, 14.

Bethlehem is situated on a rising ground, about two hours' distance, or six miles south from Jerusalem. It was called also Ephrath, Gen. xlviii, 7, and the inhabitants were called Ephrathites, Ruth i, 2; 1 Sam. xvii, 12. In the New Testament it is called Bethlehem of Judea, Matt. ii, 1; to distinguish it from Bethlehem of Zabulon, Josh. xix, 15.

Modern Bethlehem is described by travellers as at first view somewhat imposing in its appearance, covering the ridge of a hill on the southern side of a deep and extensive valley extending from east to west. The most conspicuous object is the monastery, which superstition has erected over the supposed "Cave of the Nativity," and its walls and battlements have the air of a strong fortress. From this point, the Dead Sea is seen on the east below, seemingly at but a short distance.

Bethlehem is said now to contain about three hundred inhabitants, the greater part of whom gain their livelihood by making beads, carving mother-of-pearl shells with sacred subjects, and manufacturing small tables and crucifixes, all which are eagerly purchased by the pilgrims.

Travellers who visit this celebrated spot, are shown several sacred places, rendered famous by fabulous tradition. Legendary story makes "the stable," in which our Lord was born, a grotto, "cut out of the rock," as Dr. Pococke states, "according to the eastern custom." But the Gospel narrative affords no countenance to the notion that the Virgin Mary took refuge in any cave of this description. On the contrary, it was evidently a manger belonging to the "inn," or caravanserai; the upper rooms being wholly occupied, the holy family were compelled to take up their abode in the court allotted to the mules, and horses, and camels. Superstition, rather than the New Testament, was the guide which Helena followed, in erecting the "Church of the Nativity." The present edifice is represented by Chateaubriand as of undoubtedly high antiquity; yet Doubdan, an old traveller, says that the monastery was destroyed in the year 1263 by the Moslems; and in its present state, at all events, it cannot lay claim to a higher date.

Greek, Roman, and Armenian Christians, divide the convent among them, to each of whom separate parts are assigned as places of worship and habitations for the monks; but on certain days, all may perform their devotions at the altars erected over the consecrated spots. The church is built in the form of a cross; the nave being adorned with forty-eight Corinthian columns in four rows, each column being two feet six inches in diameter, and eighteen feet high, including the base and the capital. The nave, which is in possession of the Armenians, is separated from the three other branches of the cross by a wall, so that the unity of the edifice is destroyed. The top of the cross is occupied by the choir, which belongs to the Greeks. Here is an altar dedicated to "the wise men of the east," at the foot of which is a marble star, corresponding, as the monks declare, to the point of the heavens where the miraculous meteor became stationary, and directly over the spot where the Saviour was born in the subterranean church! A flight of fifteen steps, and a long narrow passage, conduct to the sacred crypt or grotto of the nativity, which is thirty-seven feet six inches in length, by eleven feet three inches in breadth, and nine feet in height. It is lined and floored with marble, and provided on each side with five oratories, "answering," as the monks say, "precisely to the ten cribs or stalls for horses that the stable in which our Saviour was born contained!" The identical spot of the birthplace is marked by a glory in the floor, composed of marble and jasper encircled with silver, around which are inscribed these words, "Hic de Virgine Mariâ Jesus Christus natus est." Over it is a marble table or altar, which rests against the side of the rock, here cut into an arcade. The manger is at the distance of seven paces from the altar; it is in a low recess hewn out of the rock, to which you descend by two steps, and consists of a block of marble, raised about a foot and a half above the floor, and hollowed out in the form of a manger. Before it is the altar of the Magi. The chapel is illuminated by thirty-two lamps, presented by different princes of Christendom.

Chateaubriand has described the scene in his usual florid and imaginative style:—"Nothing can be more pleasing, or better calculated to excite devotional sentiments, than this subterraneous church. It is adorned with pictures of the Italian and Spanish schools, which represent the mysteries of the place. The usual ornaments of the manger are of blue satin, embroidered with silver. Incense is continually burning before the cradle of our Saviour. I have heard an organ, touched by no ordinary hand, play during mass, the sweetest and most tender tunes of the best Italian composers. These concerts charm the Christian Arab, who, leaving his camels to feed, repairs, like the shepherds of old, to Bethlehem, to adore the King of kings in the manger. I have seen this inhabitant of the desert communicate at the altar of the Magi, with a fervour, a piety, a devotion, unknown among the Christians of the West. The continual arrivals of caravans from all nations of Christendom, the public prayers, the prostrations, nay, even the richness of the presents sent here by the Christian princes, all together produce feelings in the soul, which it is much easier to conceive than to describe."

Such are the illusions which Roman superstition spreads over this extraordinary scene! But where, in the Holy Scriptures, shall we find these things commanded? Altars—incense—prostrations—lamps—pictures—with royal visitors and their rich presents, must naturally have great influence upon beholders: but while these shows and ceremonies affect the senses, and impose upon the imagination, they communicate but little light to the understanding; and the whole history of the Holy Land, since the glorious events commemorated, shows how little "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good-will towards men," have been promoted, by all this sumptuous will-worship.

THE CHARACTER OF ELI.

The history of many of those patriarchs, who in the first ages of the world were celebrated for their piety and devotedness to God, cannot fail to be deeply interesting to every Christian who loves to trace the providence and dispensations of the Almighty, from the commencement of the world down to the present time. There is nothing in the accounts recorded in the Scriptures, to lead us to suppose that they are fabulous and imaginary. No veil is drawn over the vices of the best and wisest among them; and every thing that we read confirms the fact, that they were weak and fallible men, as likely to fall into sin as we of the present generation; and the hand of God was always outstretched, when their iniquity rendered it necessary to visit them with fatherly correction.

These remarks are calculated to recal to our recollection the affecting account which is furnished us in the Bible of a man named Eli. He is introduced to our notice in the important character of high-priest, to which situation he had been called by the special appointment of God. We are also told that he had two sons, who did not walk in the steps of their pious father, but indulged in all those criminal excesses, which are but too apt to be eagerly followed by unthinking and unprincipled youth. They held the responsible offices of priests ministering in the Lord's house: but instead of that devotion and piety which should ever mark the character of such distinguished persons, their mode of conduct, with reference to the sacrifices, was so disgraceful and disgusting, that many of the Hebrews withheld their offerings. Now the grand fault of Eli's conduct, that which casts a shade over his brightest virtues, and sinks him in the estimation of all future generations, had reference to these ungodly young men. There were many reasons to induce him to restrain their licentiousness, and sufficient power lodged in his hands to check and punish their open and flagrant wickedness. As high-priest, it became him to keep all the other priests in strict obedience to the laws of God, that their conduct might furnish an example for the imitation of the tribes of Israel; as judge of Israel, it was his duty to defend the poor and fatherless, and save his people from the cruel and inhuman spoliation of those who had forgotten all duty and obedience; and as a father, it behoved him to check every appearance of vice in those children, those immortal beings, whom the Almighty had been pleased to commit to his keeping. Yet, notwithstanding all these unanswerable considerations, to his eternal disgrace it is recorded, that his sons "made themselves vile, and he restrained them not." He, whose deep penetrating gaze is over all his works, saw the sad and mournful spectacle, and his indignation was kindled at so much impiety and folly; and he sent a messenger to Eli to reprove him for his misconduct, and to tell him that the Creator could never sanction the creature to be preferred to him; and therefore that ruin and desolation should overwhelm his house, because he lacked that energy which duty and interest prompted him to put forth: that it should be his portion to behold his country invaded by foreign foes, the ark of the Lord taken, and his two sons slain in one day. These just and terrible threatenings speedily met their accomplishment. The Philistines invaded the country, defeated the Hebrews, and slew 4,000 of them. Supposing that the presence of the ark of God would ensure victory, they had the audacity to send for it, and made the very earth resound with shoutings when the sacred pile was brought into the camp. But how vain are the most distinguished outward means, when real and fervent piety to God is wanting. The ark came—but not to triumph. Israel was discomfited—Eli's sons slain—and the ark of the Lord carried away by the conquerors.

Now Eli was himself a pious man, and his affections were devotedly fixed on all that had reference to the service of God. He had so long ministered about the ark, and been connected with it, that his heart was quite twined around it. Knowing, therefore, that it had been taken to the battle, the old man groped his way (for he was blind) to the road side; and the sacred historian informs us of his condition, by saying, that when the messenger from the army passed by on his road to the city, "Lo, Eli sat by the way-side watching, for his heart trembled for the ark of God."

A voice of lamentation followed the announcement of the tidings, and the city resounded with the howl of its inhabitants. The heart of Eli beat yet more quickly, he thought of the denounced vengeance of the Almighty, and tremblingly inquired the cause of the tumult. The answer he received was this: "Israel is fled before the Philistines, and there hath been a great slaughter among the people, and thy two sons are slain, and the ark of God is taken. And it came to pass, that when he made mention of the ark of God, he fell from off the seat backward, and his neck brake, and he died." How affecting is this incident! As a patriot, he could hear, with resignation to the Divine will, that his countrymen had disgracefully fled before the Philistines. As a citizen, though he grieved at the death of so many of his fellow-countrymen, he was not overwhelmed. As a father, he could submit to the stroke which robbed him of two sons in one day. But when he made mention of the ark of God, all the tender and most devoted feelings of his mind received a paralyzing shock, a dim and confused picture of Israel's ruin floated in his brain, "and he fell backward, and died!"

A narrative of this description cannot fail to have much instruction conveyed by it, and I think it will be well to ground on it an address to Children and to Parents.

To Children it utters a warning voice: Too many of the youth of our country are apt to forget the duty which they owe to their parents, and seem to imagine that submission to the will of those whom God has been graciously pleased to place over them as guardians, savours too much of weakness and childish simplicity. If such a child should cast his eyes upon this, I would bid him to remember, that, unhappily for him, his opinions are not founded on the word of God. That sacred volume contains many an awful warning, and many a solemn injunction, requiring obedience to parents; and the examples which it furnishes are among the most appalling of the sad effects of slighting a parent's wishes and commands. Surrounded by the head men in Israel, backed by power, urged on by interest, and sanctioned by fools and scoffers, the wicked Absalom expected to wrest the crown from his father, and break the heart of the pious David with his monstrous ingratitude; but the hand of the Lord was against him, and in the midst of his youth, his power, and his wickedness, he was summoned to the bar of God, to render an account of all his actions. Nor is the example before us less striking: the good old Eli had often besought his sons to abandon their wickedness, to become virtuous and holy, and to act the part of rational and consistent men. But they rebelled, they would not hear reason, and in one day both of them were struck down in their disobedience. Where are they now? Oh! does not the disobedient child hear the solemn and sepulchral voices of Hophni and Phinehas calling to him from the gloomy caverns of the lost, and exclaiming, in accents of wild and withering despair, Repent, while there is time! Obey, while it is yet within your power to do so; lest that same hand, which justly sent us hither, should be uplifted against you, and hurl you down into these dreadful regions, where the disobedient children dwell, where the voice of unavailing penitence seeks but in vain to find another mother to obey, another father to honour!

To Parents I would with all becoming humility observe, that the character and death of Eli speak most powerfully of the immense obligations parents are under, to bring up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. When I look upon an assemblage of children, the solemn conviction strikes upon my mind, that these are to be the men and the women of the next generation, that to their hands are to be entrusted all the important and soul-stirring matters of life, and that they in their turns are to be guardians of another generation. I cannot, therefore, feel indifferent as to how their education is conducted, and what the principles are which are instilled into their minds. Do parents think of this? Do they seriously feel the solemn, the momentous duty which is entrusted to their charge? Do they know that eternal beings hang upon their instruction?—immortal souls are concerned in the education they are giving? Let the thoughtless parent pause; let him think of the numberless motives which on every side are to be found to induce and enforce immediate attention to the pressing wants of the rising generation. I plead for the helpless, the poor, the hapless children, who are not able to plead for themselves; and I urge you to be cautious how you trifle with souls, for whom the Saviour of the world was content to suffer.

Let these remarks suffice to arouse your attention; let there be a stir among the readers of the Christian's Penny Magazine; let a bold effort be made to reclaim lost and abandoned children from the grasp of the evil one, and cause the praises of the Saviour to resound from the mouths of babes and sucklings.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXXIV.

On the question of Public or Private Education, continued.

Secondly. Some persons would be surprised to hear that I recommend your son being sent to school, even for the sake of the moral influence connected with public education.

This at first sight, I am aware, would alarm those persons, whose chief reason for preferring a private education is to avoid the moral contagion they believe inseparable from a public education.

Before, however, I explain my meaning, permit me just to say, that I believe the immorality of schools, and even of the public schools, even of the largest, is often vastly overstated. It is the interest of some persons to exaggerate it, others are induced by party motives, and others join in the hue and cry without being able, or even desirous, to form a competent opinion as to the cause of it. That immorality exists in schools, is undeniable; but in what company of human beings is it not to be found? Still the vice of public schools can only be proportioned to the age and opportunities of the pupils. Then again I believe most observers of human nature will agree with me, that the question whether a boy will become depraved is not so much a question of circumstances as of the natural dispositions of the boy himself. Such persons will allow that there is a greater natural tendency in some boys, and in some men, towards dissipation than in others. With the same dispositions, I fear the same depravity will show itself under any circumstances. Then again, it is a serious question in my own mind, whether, as boys must unavoidably see depravity when they come to mingle with the world, which must be while they are comparatively young, whether its temptations have not less force, when a boy grows up habituated comparatively to their presence, so far as they do exist, than when, were it possible it should ever be the case, he is translated suddenly into the world, and every allurement tempting him with a fascination proportioned to its novelty.

Every person has heard of instances of such a nature, when the individual suddenly became depraved, and made up for the delay by the enormity of the excess. While, on the other hand, it cannot be denied, but that many boys exposed to all the temptations of a public school from their earliest years, have endured the trial comparatively unhurt. Sensuality is of course the object dreaded; but I fear that sensuality is the result of disposition rather than of circumstances. It is of course the business of education to discover and to regulate the native propensities. The masters of schools will allow that the degree of vice seldom rises above or sinks below a certain discount, if I may so speak, upon the number of the boys. The same may be said of order, virtue, and regularity.

But now I come to explain my meaning, when I recommend that your son should receive a public education, owing to the moral advantages connected with the system.

It is this. That your son, under such circumstances, will pass most of his time in the presence of his equals in all respects. Being of the same age, they will understand his real character better than his elders. They will see if he has a tendency to be dishonest, mean, cruel, idle, slanderous, injurious. He will find himself then under the all-dreaded inspection of society, and amenable to its laws, which Mr. Locke has justly asserted, exert a more powerful influence over our actions than even the dictates of conscience itself. He will find, that if he transgresses in any of these great departments of morality, there will be as many witnesses and avengers of his fault as there are boys in the school. Should he have any such tendency, it will be counterbalanced by fear, and the love of the good opinion of others native to the human heart; and then it will be prevented becoming a habit, till the time when reason and conscience and religion operate to make him relinquish the propensity as the decision of his own will. Compare the opportunities which a boy has, educated in private, for indulging in the violation of these departments of morality, in his conduct towards his brothers and sisters and servants, or even in the unfulfilled imaginations of his heart, and you will, if I mistake not, understand what I mean by the superior moral effects of a public education.

I may add, that the virtues opposite to these, as well as many others, will on the same principles be recognized whenever they exist in a boy. They will draw towards him boys of a kindred disposition. He will feel that they give him an influence with the others; and influence, in the absence of a higher motive, is a valuable and delightful reward of virtue. A school is a little world. What is condemned or applauded there, is viewed with the same feelings by mankind at large.

Is it not, then, most valuable that your child should become acquainted very early with the species of conduct approved by society, and the habit of performing it established in the beginning of his life? If he should be privately educated, he will upon coming into the world have to learn this lesson, for he cannot learn it in private in the same way as the habits of society will teach them. Hence, at the time he ought to be practising his principles, he will have, in a certain measure, yet to acquire them.

Further, the habits of social intercourse, which are essential to our mingling in society with ease and advantage to ourselves and others, can only be acquired by actual collision with that society. To be without the habits and manners of society, is for a man to feel like a foreigner amid his fellow-countrymen. Upon these little habits depends a great deal of the freedom, without which society cannot be enjoyed, nor its advantages shared. This freedom is equally essential to our doing good to mankind. Men in general are more disgusted and repelled by perceiving an ignorance of the forms of society and modes of intercourse, than they are by far greater blemishes of character. These habits indeed facilitate the intercourse of the world. These rules are like the rules for driving and walking in the streets of London, they secure safety and ease in passing from place to place. A man, however, who is ignorant of the forms of society, who knows nothing of the world, occasions a similar result wherever he comes, as a man would do who knows nothing of the rules of thoroughfare before alluded to; he impedes others, and gets well jostled himself. Yet how is your child to learn these modes of society, except by mingling with it? If, then, he passes the first fifteen, eighteen, or twenty years of his life a stranger to society, to the society of his equals, to varied society, in which there are no rules but the rules observed among equals, how can he learn those rules? He will, on the contrary, find himself unapt and bewildered when he comes into society of any kind. He will be bashful, discouraged, diffident, retiring, unhappy, useless. Or should his mind take a contrary direction, he will perhaps make a plunge and become impudent, setting all the forms of society at nought, and will remain for life one of those blunt and disagreeable people called a bore.

All these evils would be prevented, were your son to be gradually introduced into all the shifting scenes of society, and to all the actors of the many-coloured drama, as they naturally succeed one another. The manners and habits of each preceding stage of society, share considerably in those of that to follow; and thus, without difficulty to himself, and without impediment to others, he moves on in the procession of society, or takes his part in its various evolutions. The habits, behaviour, opinions, and sentiments of your son under this career, may not indeed resemble the habits of the hero of a romance, but they will resemble, what is indeed far more desirable to himself and others, those of (you know in what sense I use the term) a man of the world. After all, we must live and act in the world, and must, if we would discharge our duties, be brought into actual interchange of conduct with mankind. It is of the greatest importance that we should know how to deal with them. This can only be learnt by actual intercourse.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

NOAH.

God's Covenant with Noah.

"The first day of the first month, in the six hundred and first year of Noah's life," must have been one of the most memorable of that venerable patriarch. Then, with sentiments of awe profound, he "removed the covering of the ark, and looked, and behold, the face of the ground was dry." Gen. viii, 13.

What must have been the feelings of that holy man, when he beheld the uninhabited globe, purged from the corruptions of the infidel millions of his fellow-creatures, of those whom he had vainly endeavoured to bring to repentance, and who had been swept into eternity by the avenging hand of God! Whether the earth appeared newly created, to delight the venerable patriarch, in all its natural richness, beauty, and loveliness, we cannot tell: whether the widely-scattered fragments of ancient buildings, and the wretched remains of its ungodly inhabitants were visible, we are not able to know: but an immensely extended surface, noiseless and void, presented itself to his astonished view, leading him to reflect upon the awful vengeance of a righteous God, and to anticipate scenes and events of which we can form no conception.

The earth must be repeopled; generations, through successive ages, must spring from him: but what would be their principles, character, and final destiny, the new beginnings of time could not make manifest; nor could his privileged intercourse with God enable him to conjecture, without the special revelation of the inspiring Spirit. But the sensations of Noah, after so long a confinement, and his experience of a deliverance and preservation so wonderful, must have been peculiarly affecting and delightful.

Having entered the ark by the Divine appointment, he waited for special direction before he would venture to leave it; and at length he received the merciful command. Adoring the awful majesty of Jehovah, and contemplating him as "glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders," Noah joyfully obeyed the order of God to quit his marvellous asylum, which he no longer needed. "And Noah went forth, and his sons, and his wife, and his sons' wives with him." Gen. viii, 18.

Penetrated with reverence, filled with gratitude, and strong in faith, the first care of this servant of God, on his deliverance from confinement, was to provide the means of renewing the appointed ordinances of divine worship. "And Noah builded an altar unto the Lord," He well knew the only means of access to God, by sacrifice for sin, as all believers had observed before the flood; and he "took of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt offerings on the altar." Ver. 20. The obedience of faith is peculiarly pleasing to God; and like the sacrifice of Abel, the offerings of Noah were accepted of him. "And the Lord smelled a sweet savour; and the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth; neither will I again smite any more every living thing, as I have done. While the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease." Ver. 21, 22.

With this gracious purpose in mind, the same day, God renewed the benediction bestowed upon Adam, and "blessed Noah and his sons, and said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth." Various instructions accompanied the blessing of God upon Noah, to whom animal food was now granted, with the limitation of not eating the blood with the flesh. In the case of Cain, God had interposed to prohibit any person from killing him: but now he gives permission to make inquisition for blood, and to avenge that crime by putting the murderer to death.

Still the dreadful deluge was present to the memory. But to prevent any fearful forebodings of such another overwhelming calamity upon mankind, a new manifestation of the Divine favour was granted to Noah, in the establishment of a covenant of safety with him, and in him with all mankind. "And God spake unto Noah, and to his sons with him, saying, And I, behold, I establish my covenant with you, and with your seed after you. And God said, This is the token of the covenant which I make between me and you and every living creature that is with you, for perpetual generations: I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth. And I will remember my covenant which is between me and you and every living creature of all flesh; and the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh." Gen. ix, 9, 12, 13, 15.

Without this merciful token, every time that the skies became obscured with clouds, the heart of Noah and his children would be ready to sink within them: but the recollection of God's covenant of safety, and the resplendent beauty of the rainbow, would inspire their anxious bosoms with unspeakable joy.

It deserves to be remarked, that the ancient heathens entertained a high degree of veneration for the rainbow. The Greeks and Romans considered it as a divine token. They even regarded it as a deity;—as the messenger of their imaginary gods!

The benefits of the covenant of safety, which was made with Noah, are enjoyed still by us; and while we behold the lovely grandeur of the rainbow, we should look upon it as a token of the Divine faithfulness, and be reminded of the covenant of eternal salvation made with Christ, through whom we are expecting new heavens and a new earth, and the possession of immortal glory!

CONSCIENCE.

Poor wretched sinner, travel where thou wilt,
Thy travel shall be burden'd with thy guilt.
Climb tops of hills, that prospects may delight thee,
There will thy sins like wolves and bears affright thee:
Fly to the valleys, that those frights may shun thee,
And there like mountains they will fall upon thee:
Or to the raging seas with Jonah go,
There will thy sins like stormy billows flow.
Poor shiftless man! what shall become of thee,
Where'er thou fliest, thy griping sins will flee.

PRODUCE OF THE EAST AND WEST INDIES, WITH THEIR EXPORTS AND IMPORTS.

East Indies	313,200,000	6,218,284	4,100,264

On this an able writer in the Eclectic Review remarks, "Thus it would seem, that while the annual produce of the East Indies is fourteen times that of the West Indies, this country imports only two-thirds as much in value from her Indian possessions, that she does from her sugar colonies in the Western hemisphere. If this circumstance may be thought, on the one hand, to prove the importance of the West India trade, it shows at the same time, how much the prosperity of India has been sacrificed to it." What interests, therefore, have been sacrificed in upholding Negro Slavery! Justice, reason, and religion, however, thanks to the gracious providence of God, are beginning to prevail.

* The population of the allied or subject states in India, amounts to above 40,000,000: so that the population of the British empire may be stated as exceeding 150,000,000! See Christian's Penny Magazine, No. 4, vol. i, p. 27; and No. 44, vol. ii, p. 114.

"Such are the astonishing effects of the wealth, talent, industry, and intelligence concentrated in this extraordinary country: such is the immense capital, and such are the amazing productive powers of this little isle — this 'precious stone set in the silver sea,' as the poet calls it. But even his portentous imagination was far from conceiving the power which 'that little world,' — 'that fortress built by nature' — would one day reach: he could not even have fancied, that thousands of tons of goods would be conveyed with a speed greater than that of the messenger pigeons of Aleppo and Antwerp: he could not have imagined, that, by the combined aid of steam and capital, the productive powers of each of that 'happy breed of men' would be rendered equal to the simple exertions of several hundred individuals!

"From all this may be easily concluded, how imperfect have been the statements of those who have calculated the productive powers of Great Britain, and compared them with those of France and other countries: this important inquiry and comparison is reserved for another opportunity; while sufficient facts and data are here stated to give the mind of the reader more just and correct ideas of the real productive powers and capital of this country; a country, however, only to be considered as the mighty heart, which diffuses strength and vigour throughout all the limbs of that gigantic body, the British Empire; while they, by a strong and reciprocal motion, return and increase its vitality, action, and power.

"In the parts more immediately connected with England, and in all her dependencies in Europe, there is supposed to exist a capital of 27,115,094*l.*; and the produce annually raised is valued at 2,146,198*l.*

"The seven important North American possessions, as may be seen by the Table, have a capital of 62,100,466*l.* and raise annually produce and property worth 17,620,629*l.*

"The West India Colonies, with a capital of 131,052,424*l.*, raise every year produce valued at 22,496,672*l.*

"The whole British capital in Africa amounts to only 6,444,398*l.*; and these settlements, unproductive like the country itself, yield an annual produce of only 1,066,065*l.*

"To compensate for this, there is in the two fertile islands in the Indian Ocean a capital of 27,509,781*l.*; and the value of the produce annually raised is 4,291,332*l.*

"While the new, but rapidly improving settlements in Australia, already possess a capital of 2,685,000*l.*; and raise a produce amounting to 520,000*l.*

"It is almost impossible to obtain sufficient data and facts, on which to make a sound calculation of the immense and diversified productions raised in the vast territories of British India; peopled by such numerous races, all differing from ourselves in habits, religion, customs, and manner of living. However, by the help of a multitude of official documents, and such statistical information as could be collected from the numerous works relating to that region, the total capital of the British empire in India has been estimated at 1,611,077,354*l.* and the produce and property annually raised at the sum of 313,200,000*l.*!

"Thus, the total aggregate capital existing in all the extent of the British empire in Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and Australia, will amount to 5,547,484,517*l.*; and the aggregate value of all produce and property annually raised and created by the combination of that capital, with all animate and inanimate power, to 876,175,755*l.*; the total population to 116,969,978; and the total extent of territory to 4,457,598 square miles; with a superior navy of 27,000 men, and a regular standing army of 96,419 men in Europe, and 223,461 men in India."

Sunday School Lectures.

LECTURE V.

"GIVE US THIS DAY OUR DAILY BREAD."

What is the meaning of the word "bread" here?— Every thing that is necessary for our bodies.

Our parents give us our daily food, they give us clothes; but who gives these things to our parents?— God: he makes the corn to grow, by sending the rain and making the sun to shine; God gives us life and strength and health; without God we could not live; "in God we live, and move, and have our being."

What is the meaning of "daily?"—Every day.

Teacher. God gives us day by day bread, or daily those things of which we have need; this shows us that we are entirely dependent upon God for every thing, that we could not live a moment without God; to-day we may be all very happy people, walking about and very cheerful; but to-night God might send his angel and destroy us all, as he did the first-born of the Egyptians; therefore we have need of God's mercies every day: if he was for a moment to take away his mercy and blessings from us, we should all die, and be worse, far more so, worse than nothing; therefore God's mercies are daily; they are bestowed on us every day, every hour, every moment: what a merciful God then we have!

Though we pray to God every day to give us those things which we want, nevertheless we call them our own; how can those things of which we are in constant want, be called our own?—It is called our own because we are to labour for it, because we are to get our bread by honestly working for it.

Teacher. This shows us that God does not intend that man should be idle; but it shows us this truth, "That if a man will not work, neither shall he eat."

It says, "Give us this day," &c.; what are we to learn from these two words being added?—It shows us that we are to pray for our daily bread every day, every morning when we get up.

It says, "Give us this day," &c.; what does this word "give" show us?—That it is a free gift from God; that we do not deserve it.

Teacher. We must use the means to procure what we need. Suppose we are farmers, we must plant and sow, or we shall certainly have no wheat or bread; nevertheless, all our labour, sowing and planting, will be of no use, unless God gives the increase, by making the sun to shine on our labours, and the rain to come down from heaven. But if God were not to give us rain and fine weather, and thus cause that there should be a famine in the land, we should have no right to complain, because God would be only dealing with us justly; we deserve punishment, and not blessings; and therefore we should be thankful to God for his goodness to us; and as we ask of God, in the morning to give us our daily bread, so in the evening we should never forget to thank him for his blessings.

What do we pray for when we say, "give us this day our daily bread?"—That God would always give us those things which are necessary for us, through Jesus Christ.

Teacher. Though God gives us all those things which we want, we must not forget that we do not deserve one of these blessings, for we all have sinned, and offended against God, and we deserve only punishment and death: and we must remember, that it is only through Jesus Christ, that we do now, as it is, receive them; only for Jesus Christ's sake, who shed his blood for sinners, died on the cross for us, that by his death we might live. What a merciful God then ours is, to give us all those things which we want, when we deserve to be treated in an exactly contrary manner! What a powerful God ours is, to be able to give us all things that we want! What a just and holy God ours is, to keep so to what he has declared, for God said, "the soul that sinneth it shall die," and therefore he can give us these blessings only through Christ, who died instead of us upon the cross, that God might be just, and yet receive and forgive the sinner. If then God is so holy and just, how foolish must all those be who hope to be saved through their own good works, falsely so called, and not trust only in Christ, who will give them the Holy Spirit to take away their sins, and his own righteousness, which is pure and spotless; and who at last will make them just, place them in a holier state than Adam and Eve were before they sinned, and thus receive them into everlasting habitations, the mansions prepared for all those who love Christ! If God, too, is so powerful, how we should fear to offend him! If so merciful, how we should love him! May God open sinners' eyes to see their danger, make us love him, and make us fear to offend him.—C. R. A.

MERCY AN "ATTRIBUTE OF GOD."

(In reply to a Correspondent, U. B.)

Edification, not controversy, is the grand object of the "Christian's Penny Magazine." Conscious, however, of our fallibility, we dare not presume to affirm that we never shall insert or allow a mistaken proposition in its pages. Our respected Correspondent U. B. must nevertheless permit us to justify the propriety of calling "Mercy an Attribute of God." We believe he is sincere in stating his "conclusion somewhat differing," and in being "induced to solicit" information concerning "better means to judge of the propriety or impropriety of his formed conclusion."

Dr. Dick's opinion we highly respect, and consider the country under great obligation to that excellent writer for his learned and edifying writings, especially his "Christian Philosopher," "Philosophy of Religion," and "Philosophy of a Future State." His "Improvement of Society by the Diffusion of Knowledge," we have not yet seen. But we are not disposed to admit any statement of that superior author as authority for excluding "Mercy" from the list of the "Divine Attributes." U. B.'s quotation from the Doctor's "Philosophy of Religion," declaring "Goodness is the genus and Mercy the species," we disapprove, as not adapted to promote edification; and we would say, in the language of Dr. Dick himself, in speaking (in another work) of terms used to denote the attributes of Deity—"But these, and other expressions of a similar kind, are mere technical terms, which convey no adequate, nor even tolerable notion of what they import." —Christian Philosopher, p. 42.

Dr. Johnson, in his Dictionary, calls "Attribute, the thing attributed to another, as Perfection to God." Surely our respected Correspondent will admit that Mercy is attributed to God; and therefore it must be a Divine Attribute: especially when he reads the awful and glorious proclamation of the Divine name by Jehovah himself: "And the Lord passed by before him, and proclaimed, The Lord, The Lord God, merciful and gracious, longsuffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty; visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and to the fourth generation." Exod. xxxiv, 6, 7.

Buck, in his "Theological Dictionary," says, "Mercy of God, is his readiness to relieve the miserable, and to pardon the guilty. 1. It is essential to his nature. Exod. xxxiv, 6, 7."

Jones, in his "Biblical Cyclopædia," calls "Mercy an essential attribute of Deity; for the discovery of which we are indebted wholly to Divine revelation."

Calmet, in his "Dictionary of the Bible," says, "Mercy is one of the noblest attributes of Deity."

Dr. Dwight, in his valuable "System of Theology," treats of the "Attributes of God," in the following order, in several Sermons: 1. Eternity. 2. Immutability. 3. Omnipresence. 4. Omniscience. 5. Omnipotence. 6. Independence. 7. Benevolence. 8. Justice. 9. Truth. 10. Mercy. 11. Wisdom.

Dr. Owen, who has been pronounced "The Prince of Theologians," in his "Greater Catechism," writes as follows:—

"What are the attributes of God?—His infinite perfections, in being and working. Rev. iv. 8—11.

"What are the chief attributes of his being?—Eternity, infiniteness, simplicity, or purity, all-sufficiency, perfectness, immutability, life, will, understanding.

"What are the attributes which usually are ascribed to him in his works, or the acts of his will?—Goodness, power, justice, mercy, holiness, wisdom, and the like, which he delighteth to exercise towards his creatures, for the praise of his glory." Works, vol. v, p. 11, 12.

Dr. Dick, however, we presume, as our correspondent has quoted him for authority, will be regarded with the greatest deference; and therefore we will give his judgment on this most interesting question. In his very instructive "Christian Philosopher," he says—

"By the natural or essential attributes of God, we understand such perfections as the following: his eternity, omnipresence, infinite knowledge, infinite wisdom, omnipotence, and boundless beneficence. These are the characters and attributes of Deity, which, we must suppose, form the chief subject of contemplation to angels, and to all other pure intelligences; and in investigating the displays of which, the sons of Adam would have been chiefly employed, had they continued in primeval innocence. These attributes form the groundwork of all those gracious relations in which the God of salvation stands to his redeemed people in the economy of redemption—they lie at the foundation of the whole Christian superstructure—and were they not recognized as the corner-stone of that sacred edifice, the whole system of the Scripture Revelation would remain a baseless fabric. The full display of these perfections will be exhibited in the future world—and the contemplation of this display will form one of the sublime employments of 'the saints in light'—and to prepare us for engaging in such noble exercises, is one of the chief designs of the salvation proclaimed in the Gospel.

"The Christian revelation ought not to be considered as superseding the religion of nature, but as carrying it forward to perfection. It introduces the Deity to us under new relations, corresponding to the degraded state into which we have fallen. It is superadded to our natural relations to God, and takes it for granted that these natural relations must for ever subsist. It is true, indeed, that the essential attributes of God, and the principles of natural religion, cannot be fully discovered without the light of revelation, as appears from the past experience of mankind in every generation; but it is equally true, that, when discovered by the aid of this celestial light, they are of the utmost importance in the Christian system, and are as essentially connected with it, as the foundation of a building is with the superstructure.—But, unless we make such topics a distinct subject of attention, and endeavour to acquire clear and comprehensive conceptions of our natural relations to God, we can never form a clear conception of those new and interesting relations into which we have been brought by the mediation of Jesus Christ.

"It appears highly unreasonable, and indicates a selfish disposition of mind, to magnify one class of the Divine attributes at the expense of another; to extol, for example, the Mercy of God, and neglect to celebrate his Power and Wisdom—those glorious perfections, the display of which, at the formation of our globe, excited the rapture and admiration of angels, and of innocent man. All the attributes of God are equal, because all of them are infinite; and therefore to talk of darling attributes in the Divine nature, as some have done, is inconsistent with reason, unwarranted by Scripture, and tends to exhibit a distorted view of the Divine character. The Divine Mercy ought to be celebrated with rapture by every individual of our fallen race; but with no less rapture should we extol the Divine Omnipotence; for the designs of Mercy cannot be accomplished without the intervention of Infinite Power. All that we hope for, in consequence of the promises of God, and of the redemption accomplished by Jesus Christ, must be founded on the conception we form of the operations of Omnipotence."—Christian Philosopher, p. 31, 32, 34, 35.

"From such considerations, we learn, even from the system of nature, that Mercy is an attribute of the Deity; for, if mercy consists in bestowing favours on those who are unworthy, or who merit punishment, the greatest sinners in all ages have shared in it, and every individual of the human race, now existing, enjoys a certain portion of those comforts which flow from the benevolent arrangements which the Creator has established." Dr. Dick sums up the whole of his beautiful reasoning thus: "If mercy were not an essential attribute of the Deity, he would have cut them down in the midst of their transgressions, shattered to pieces the globe on which they dwelt, and buried them in eternal oblivion. But whether Divine mercy will extend to the final forgiveness of sin, and the communication of eternal happiness to such beings, can be learned only from the discoveries of revelation."—Ibid. 172, 173.

U. B. we trust will be satisfied by these observations, that there is propriety in denominating "Mercy a Divine Attribute," and at the same time be prepared to rejoice in "God who is rich in mercy, for the great love wherewith he hath loved us," Eph. ii, 5; and especially, that through the new covenant by Jesus Christ, "the mercy of the LORD is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him." Psalm ciii, 17.

A GUIDE TO PRAYER,

Or, A Free and Rational Account of the Gift, Grace, and Spirit of Prayer; with plain Directions how to attain them. By I. Watts, D.D. London, Book Society.

Watts's Guide to Prayer is an invaluable treatise. We wish it were universally known, especially to heads of Christian families, and those who are accustomed to lead the devotions of others at prayer-meetings. Sunday school teachers and young persons, who feel the desirableness of the gift of prayer, will find the wisest rules here laid down by one of the wisest of men; and that which renders the whole so valuable, is the importance which is given to "the grace and spirit of prayer." The Committee of the Book Society have rendered a great service to the church, by the republication of this seasonable and inestimable little work in this cheap form.

JESSAMINE COTTAGE;

Being a Domestic Narrative of the Happy Death of a Mother and Four Children, who died of Consumption. By a Young Minister. 32mo. cloth, pp. 96. Hamilton, London.

"A Domestic Narrative of the Happy Death of a Mother and Four Children," three daughters and one son, removed to glory within a short period, must be unusually interesting. The series of incidents which are here narrated, with much feeling and peculiar pathos, are all of a domestic nature, appealing to the hearts of all in the several relations of life. The melancholy scenes which are here exhibited, beautifully illustrate the sanctifying and consoling nature of genuine religion; and the various lessons of improvement which are drawn from the several parts of the narrative, remind us of the Dairyman's Daughter, and are not unworthy of the pen of Legh Richmond.

CELEBRATION OF THE FEAST OF TRUMPETS.

SACRED JEWISH FESTIVALS.

EASTS and Festivals, as observed by the ancient He- rews, are necessary to be known familiarly by every telligent reader of the Bible, on account of the fre- ient mention of them in the Holy Scriptures. We iall here, therefore, give an account of the four inual festivals of the Jews, three of which were ecially appointed to be observed by them as God's eculiar people, and the fourth was to be regarded ith gratitude and joyfulness, as the anniversary of the eation of the world.

I. The Feast of Trumpets.

This was the anniversary of the creation. Probably it ad been observed with some circumstances of solem- ty from the beginning, by those who feared the Lord. was not peculiar to the Hebrews; but now it was ade sacred to the Israelites, a direct command being ven to regard it as a sacred festival: "And the Lord ake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of rael, saying, In the seventh month, in the first day the month, shall ye have a Sabbath,—a memorial of owing of trumpets—a holy convocation. Ye shall do no servile work therein; but ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord." Lev. xxiii, 23—25. Dr. Gill remarks on this passage, "As this was New Year's day, this ceremony seems to have been appointed to express joy for all the mercies and blessings of the last year; and the rather, as at this time of the year all the fruits of the earth were gathered in, not only the barley and the wheat, but the oil and the wine, and under such grateful acknowledgments, to expect the Divine blessing to attend them the following year. And besides, at this time of the year, it was generally thought by the Jews, and by others, that the world was created; and this blowing of trumpets might be in memory of that, and as an emblem of the shoutings of the sons of God, the angels, the morning stars, who sang for joy when the foundations of the earth were laid. Job xxxviii, 6, 7. To which it may be added, this seventh month was very memorable for holy solemnities, as the day of atonement on the tenth, and the feast of tabernacles, which began on the fifteenth, and therefore was ushered in with blowing of trumpets to make it the more significant, and particularly to put the people in mind to prepare for the day of atonement. Ainsworth thinks, that this was a figure of the ministry of John the Baptist preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins; but rather it seems to be an emblem of the gospel and the ministry of it, in the acceptable year of the Lord, or the gospel dispensation, which is sometimes signified by the blowing of the great trumpet (Isa. xxvii, 13), and by ministers lifting up their voice like a trumpet (Isa. lviii, 1), by which sinners are roused and awakened to a sense of their sin and danger, and to hear a joyful sound of love, grace, mercy, peace, pardon, righteousness, and salvation through Christ."

Many of the more pious Jews observe this festival in holy exercises to this day: for after they return home from attendance at the blowing of the trumpets in their synagogues, they sit down to meat with joyfulness, and spend the rest of the day in religious services.

This memorial of blowing of trumpets, is called the seventh month: it answered to our September; and was originally the first month, in memory of the creation, and it so continued to be the first month of the civil year. But after the wondrous redemption of Israel from Egypt, the seventh month, Abib, formed a new era in the history of the church of God, and in memory of that marvellous event, "the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the land of Egypt, saying, This month shall be unto you the beginning of months: it shall be the first month of the year unto you." Exod. xii, 1, 2. "Observe the month Abib, and keep the passover unto the Lord thy God: for in the month of Abib the Lord thy God brought thee forth out of Egypt by night." Deut. xvi, 1. Abib, called also Nisan (Esth. iii, 7), answered to the latter part of our March and the former part of April.

II. The Passover, or Feast of Unleavened Bread,

Was the first annual festival peculiarly appointed for the Israelites. It was observed in commemoration of the Divine favour to the Hebrews, in emancipating them from cruel slavery. On the night of their deliverance, when the angel of vengeance smote the first-born of every Egyptian, he passed over the houses of the Israelites, whose door-posts had been sprinkled, in faith, with the blood of the lamb which had been sacrificed in the evening, at the command of God, Exod. xii. It is remarkable, that the night of the institution of the Passover, was the termination of the four hundred and thirty years sojourning of the Hebrews, from the time of Abraham. Gen. xv, 13, 14; Exod. xii, 41, 42.

Intelligent readers of the Scriptures will find, that the Israelites' Passover was emblematical of our eternal redemption by Christ. For this reason the apostle was inspired to write, "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us." 1 Cor. v, 7. His spotless holiness in heart and life was prefigured by the paschal lamb being without blemish. Therefore another apostle has written of Christians being "redeemed, not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot." 1 Pet. i, 18, 19. Like as the Israelites, therefore, were passed over and delivered by the shedding of the blood, and feeding upon the flesh of the paschal lamb,—so the redemption and salvation of Christians are now enjoyed by feeding, in faith, upon the flesh and blood of Christ, especially in the ordinance of the Lord's Supper. John vi, 52—62; 1 Cor. xi, 23—29.

III. The Feast of Weeks,

Was observed seven weeks, or fifty days after the Passover. Lev. xxiii, 15—17. This festival is sometimes called Pentecost in the New Testament (Acts ii, 1), that being a Greek word signifying the fiftieth. This festival was ordained to commemorate the giving of the Divine law at Mount Sinai, fifty days after the deliverance of Israel from Egypt. Pentecost was also called The Feast of Harvest, because it was held at the close of the wheat harvest, the first fruits of which, in two loaves of fine flour, were presented to the Lord, with sacrifices, thanksgiving, and rejoicings.

Pentecost, it will be remarked, happened on the Lord's day of the Christians; and when the apostles were assembled at the early prayer-meeting on that morning, they were miraculously endowed with the gifts of the Holy Spirit. These communications were necessary to qualify them to fulfil their extraordinary ministry in establishing the kingdom of Christ upon the earth, by preaching the gospel in languages which they had never learned. Their first effort on opening their evangelical commission was a kind of pledge of the grace of God, as by his blessing three thousand souls were added to the church on that memorable day. Acts ii.

IV. The Feast of Tabernacles,

Held at the close of the whole harvest and vintage (Deut. xvi, 13), was appointed as the season for acknowledging the bounties of God, in crowning the year with his general blessings. At the same time it was designed to commemorate the Divine goodness in protecting the Israelites during their forty years' wandering in the desert of Arabia. For this purpose, as their forefathers had dwelt in tents while sojourning in the wilderness, they were required to dwell in booths formed of the boughs of trees during the seven days of this festival.

In many respects the Feast of Tabernacles was the most joyful festival of the Israelitish nation. They were seasons anticipated with unfeigned delight by the pious servants of God. And as all the male inhabitants were required on these occasions to go up to the place were the Tabernacle of Jehovah was placed, when that sacred building was erected at Jerusalem, the females being permitted to accompany them, the joyful concourse was very great. In these national festivals, the people dressed themselves in their best attire, anticipating the pleasure of seeing their friends and relations; and when assembled in the holy city, they unanimously joined in the prayers and sacrifices, which were accompanied with bands of music and thanksgiving. Pious Israelites might naturally rejoice at the contemplation of these delightful solemnities, when in troops, they went "from strength to strength"—"every one of them in Zion appearing before God." The inspired Psalmist describes them as supremely happy on earth, who spent their lives in these delightful services, and the consideration of these is needful to enter into the meaning of Psalms lxxxiv and cxxii. A reference to these happy seasons, will be necessary to realize the lamentations of the servant of God, as they are expressed in Psalms xlii and xliii.

ON WORSHIPPING GOD.

Worship that's moulded in tradition's schools,
Is but the sensual sacrifice of fools.
Be wisely careful what thy lips impart;
Bring thy soft tongue acquainted with thy heart.
Be slow to speak, and be as quick to hear:
Heaven loves a single tongue, a double ear.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

NOAH.

The Dispersion of Noah's Family.

"The mountains of Ararat," on which the ark rested, are in Armenia; and in the country adjoining, Noah appears to have settled. "And the sons of Noah that went forth of the ark, were Shem, and Ham, and Japheth; and Ham is the father of Canaan. These are the three sons of Noah: and of them was the whole earth overspread." Gen. ix, 18, 19.

For some years Noah seems to have enjoyed considerable domestic tranquillity, and his family was greatly increased. But in the time of his grandsons, probably about fifty years after the deluge, a circumstance occurred by which his domestic peace was broken. With the simplicity peculiar to the sacred historian, he says, "And Noah began to be a husbandman, and he planted a vineyard; and he drank of the wine, and was drunken; and he was uncovered in his tent. And Ham, the father of Canaan, saw the nakedness of his father, and told it to his two brethren without. And Shem and Japheth took a garment, and laid it upon their shoulders, and went backward, and covered the nakedness of their father, and their faces were backward, and they saw not their father's nakedness." Gen. ix, 20—24.

It is difficult to imagine that Noah was ignorant of the intoxicating quality of the prepared liquor. Nor does the inspired record allow us to suppose that he was inclined to habitual drunkenness. It was a solitary instance. Most likely, after the fatiguing labour of a sultry day, Noah, in refreshment, drank too eagerly of the welcome beverage; and becoming weary, lay down inconsiderately in the shade for repose. Canaan first perceived his aged grandsire in that condition, and making himself merry with the discovery, brought his father to behold the sight. Instead of reproving his son, Ham joined with him in making sport of the infirmity of his aged, pious, and venerable father, and exposed it to his brethren Shem and Japheth. They were properly affected towards their reverend parent, and that which Ham had published with ridicule, they piously concealed.

That Ham and Canaan were worthless characters, seems intimated by Moses, when he says, "Ham is the father of Canaan." It is therefore probable, that they would rejoice to find the pious prophet in so unbecoming a condition, that they might make retaliation for the reproofs he had addressed to them on account of their wickedness.

In the whole narrative we cannot but observe the perfect impartiality of the inspired historian. Such a statement is peculiar to the Holy Scriptures; and it is designed to evince the frailty and imperfection of human nature; and that the best of men cannot stand upright, unless they are constantly depending upon divine grace, and upheld by the power of God: nor appear in the judgment, without an interest in God's pardoning mercy, and faith in the Redeemer, "the Lord our Righteousness."

"Honour thy father and mother," is the law of God, and he requires us to observe it with special care. This precept was finely illustrated by the modesty and tenderness of Shem and Japheth: but the conduct of Ham was both an insult to a parent, and a reflection upon religion. It was highly displeasing to God; so that when the patriarch arose, and was made acquainted with the different behaviour of his sons, the spirit of prophecy fell upon him, by which he pronounced a divine sentence upon each, regarding their present character and the future condition of themselves and their families.

"And Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him. And he said, Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren. And he said, Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant." Gen. ix, 24—27.

A few observations will show how exactly these predictions have been fulfilled through all generations, down to our times.

Ham signifies "burnt" or "black;" and this name was strikingly significant of the regions which were peopled by his family. The descendants of Cush occupied the hot southern regions of Asia. The sons of Canaan chose Palestine, Canaan, and Syria; and the sons of Mizraim, Egypt and Lybia, in Africa. The corrupted nations which God destroyed before Israel, were descended from Canaan: and so were the Phœnicians and the Carthaginians, who were subjugated with dreadful destruction by the Greeks and Romans; and the wretched Negroes, who have been bought and sold like cattle, were his posterity.

Japheth denotes "enlargement;" and how wonderfully have his boundaries been enlarged! Not only Europe, but Asia Minor, the whole of the vast regions of Asia north of mount Taurus, and probably America, were peopled by his descendants.

Shem signifies "name," or "renown;" and his renown and name were great, both in a temporal and spiritual sense. The finest regions of Upper and Middle Asia were the portion of his family. But his chief renown consisted in his being destined to be the lineal ancestor of the promised Seed of the woman, to which Noah might allude in his pious ejaculation.

In the purity of religion, God dwelt in his favoured tents: and happy for us, by his merciful providence, we of the enlarged tribes of Japheth, have embraced the gospel, and thus dwell in the tents of Shem.

The tenth chapter of Genesis is one of the most valuable records of antiquity; and any person of very limited information will readily perceive that the Assyrians, Elamites, Lydians, Medes, Ionians, and Thracians, had Asshur, Elam, Lud, Madai, Javan, and Tiras, grandsons of Noah, for their founders; and thus from profane history we find an evidence of the divinity of the Bible, which alone can teach us the true origin of nations. And though man is white in Europe, black in Africa, yellow in Asia, and red in America, yet, as Buffon, an infidel naturalist, acknowledges, he is still the same animal, tinged only with the colour of the climate.

It was the purpose of God that the increasing family of Noah should separate, and form different nations in distant lands. But in opposition to the counsel of their father, about a hundred years after the deluge, the majority resolved on a prodigious work, as a centre of union among them. "And the whole earth was of one language and of one speech. And it came to pass as they journeyed from the east they found a plain in the land of Shinar; and they dwelt there. And they said one to another, Go to, let us make brick, and burn them throughly. And they had brick for stone, and slime for mortar. And they said, Go to, let us build us a city and tower, whose top shall reach unto heaven; and let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth. And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower which the children of men builded. And the Lord said, Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another's speech.

So the Lord scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth: and they left off to build the city. Therefore is the name of it called Babel; because the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth." Gen. xi, 1—9. By this means, the prediction of Noah began to be fulfilled, and hence the origin of the different languages among mankind, of which the Bible alone gives us information.

How far Noah consented to the vain project, we have no means of ascertaining, and who was the chief director of that work we know not: but Nimrod, a grandson of Ham, "a mighty hunter," took possession of it, and laid the foundation of the Babylonian empire, of which he was the first monarch, Gen. x, 8—10. Babel was the beginning of the Tower of Babylon, so famous in the time of Nebuchadnezzar.

Noah lived, after this confusion, above two hundred years, and beheld, doubtless with the bitterest grief, wickedness abounding among his descendants, and multitudes of them become apostates from true religion to practise abominable idolatry!

THE BEAUTIES OF CHRISTIANITY.

Abridged from the Visc. Chateaubriand.

[This work possesses uncommon interest, not only from its intrinsic excellence, but from the fact of its noble author having been in his young days a professed infidel of the French Republican school, and being awakened to light and immortality by the death-bed letter of an affectionate mother, whose last prayer was, that her son might be again brought to believe the faith he had renounced. The author's aim is not to treat on the Internal Evidences of Christianity, but to show its various excellencies, and its indisputable superiority over all other systems.]

Since the first publication of Christianity to the world, it has been continually attacked by three kinds of enemies, heretics, sophists, and those frivolous characters who use the shafts of ridicule. Numerous writers have given successful answers to subtleties and falsehoods, but they have not been so successful against derision. It thus became necessary to prove, that the Christian religion is the most humane, the most favourable to liberty; that the modern world is indebted to it for every improvement; that nothing is more divine than its morality, and more lovely and sublime than its doctrines; that it developes virtuous passions, imparts energy to the ideas, corrects the taste, and that there is no disgrace in being believers with Newton and Bossuet;—in a word, it was necessary to summon all the charms of the imagination and the interests of the heart, to the assistance of that religion against which they had been set in array.

But, it may be asked, may there not be some danger in considering religion in a merely human point of view? To this we answer: Our religion shrinks not from the light; and one great proof of its divine origin is, that it will bear the severest scrutiny. Christianity will not be less true for appearing more beautiful. We can no longer say, "Believe without inquiring:" people will inquire:—and will it not be found sublime in the antiquity of its recollections, which go back to the creation of the world; ineffable in its mysteries; adorable in its sacraments; interesting in its history; celestial in its morality; attractive in its ceremonies; and fraught with every species of beauty?

To illustrate our work, we have divided the subject into four parts: the first treats of the tenets and doctrine; the second and third, of the connection of Christianity with literature and the arts; the fourth, of the worship and ceremonies of the church.

Having thus stated the general plan, let us enter on the first part of the subject; and as a preliminary step to the consideration of the Christian mysteries, let us inquire into the nature of mysteries in general. The most wonderful sentiments are those which produce impressions difficult to be explained. This is the case with regard to virtues: the most angelic are those, which, like charity, emanating immediately from God, studiously conceal themselves, like their source, from mortal view. The early inhabitants of Asia conversed only by symbols. There is nothing in the universe but what is hidden and unknown. Is not man himself an inexplicable mystery? Considering then the natural partiality of mankind for mysteries, it cannot appear surprising that the religions of all nations should have had their impenetrable secrets. God himself is the great secret of nature. The Divinity was represented veiled in Egypt, and the Sphinx was seated on the threshold of their temples. In regard, however, to mysteries, Christianity has a great advantage over the religions of antiquity. Their mysteries afforded, at the utmost, a subject for reflection to the philosopher, or for song to the poet: ours comprehend the secrets of our existence. It is a pitiful mode of reasoning to reject whatever we cannot comprehend. Were we to begin with the most simple things in life, it were easy to prove that we know nothing; and shall we then pretend to penetrate the depths of divine wisdom? The Trinity was known to the Egyptians. Heraclides records a celebrated oracle—"In the beginning was God, then the Word and the Spirit." Plato is supposed to have had some idea of the Trinity. The doctrine of the Trinity is known in the East Indies and Thibet. Our missionaries to Otaheite have found some traces of it among the religious notions of the natives. Some obscure tradition of it may also be discovered in the fables of polytheism. The philosophers too divided the moral man into three parts; and the fathers have imagined they discovered the image of the spiritual Trinity in the human soul. To delineate the divine Son of God, we need only borrow the words of St. John, who beheld him in his glorified state. "He was seated on the throne: his face shone like the sun in his strength, and his feet like fine brass melted in a furnace. His eyes were as a flame of fire, and out of his mouth went a two-edged sword. In his right hand he held seven stars; and in his left, a book sealed with seven seals. His voice was as the sound of many waters. The seven spirits of God burned before him like seven lamps; and he went forth from his throne attended by lightnings and voices and thunders." There is a sublimity in these images, unequalled by any human composition.

MR. WHITFIELD'S PREACHING.

During one of Mr. Whitfield's excursions in Yorkshire, he preached in a field near Sheffield, to a large audience, a very affecting sermon, on the Sufferings of Christ. A poor woman, who was driving some asses laden with bricks, arrested by the energetic manner of the preacher, stopped for some time to hear him. When he mentioned the circumstance of our blessed Lord having suffered for sinners, without the gates of Jerusalem, upwards of seventeen hundred years ago, the woman, addressing herself to one of the asses, and goading it, said, with the utmost simplicity, "Go, Robin! as it is so long since, I hope it is not true!"

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXXIV.

On the question of Public or Private Education, concluded.

Another argument for public education is derived from the fact, that much of our safety and success in life depends upon our being able to form a judgment of the character of those individuals with whom we have to deal. Our Creator has afforded ample means of forming a judgment of the characters of mankind from their manners, countenance, tones, gestures, &c. &c. A knowledge of men by these means is indispensable to our dealing with them safely to ourselves. Unless we possess it we shall be liable to every form of ruin which the unprincipled and base part of mankind may inflict upon us: we shall be literally at the mercy of all with whom we come into contact. Every man has ample means of learning the character of mankind by these modes, at least of learning the character of that class of them with whom he is likely to come into collision; and all men who have been bred up in the intercourse with persons of their own class, do actually get habits of penetration into human character as far as they need them. The villager, whose simplicity towards things beyond his own sphere is so amusing, has very little of this simplicity among persons of his own class. And persons of his own class, as indeed with us all, constitute that sphere of society in which he is to do and to obtain good. Your son however can never know mankind should he be privately educated. His simplicity as to their wickedness, as well as to their virtues, will lay him open to be deceived and wronged by them at their pleasure. The vile and abandoned will mark him out for their prey, and devour and distress him, even with a determination proportioned to his unsuspectingness or inability to deal with them. He will be unfit as an infant to cope with mankind, unless he has been habituated to them. Fatal is the acquirement — detrimental the knowledge to his own peace—despicable the experience of the modes of human wickedness! Yet while he is in a fallen world, he must mingle with it: and he cannot mingle with it, and escape a vast proportion of misery, unless he knows how to take care of himself. For this purpose he ought to be acquainted with the workings of human nature, from the earliest period of human life, by actual community with mankind. Nor is this knowledge incompatible with rectitude, and even innocence of heart. In a certain sense, his knowledge of the wickedness of mankind renders the path of virtue more distinct to his own mind. His adherence to it has more of the personal selection, which is essential to the consistency of virtue. A man may and ought to unite in himself the qualities recommended by the Redeemer to his apostles, and exhibited in supreme perfection by himself, the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove.

Still further. It is obvious that although virtue must be founded in principle, yet that a readiness in the application of the principle must depend upon practice. Habits of virtue, as habits of every other kind, are gained by practice. The greater practice we have, the greater readiness we acquire, both of knowing what ought to be done, and also of doing it.

But the practice from which excellent results are to be expected, can only be obtained from circumstances which present a great number of various cases. It is also plain, that the habit of virtuous speaking and acting, ought, like every other, to be commenced and established early. But the system of private education excludes this advantage. However carefully the principles of virtue may be grounded in the mind of a boy, yet it is plain that if he is not brought into circumstances wherein he is required to act, his practical acquaintance with virtue can be but limited. Besides, when he comes to take his part in the great business of life, it will be found that there is a slowness about his decisions, as to what is proper or improper, little indeed consistent with the speed required by most of the petty transactions of human life. On the other hand, the boy brought up in the world, and who has been exercised by a great number of cases, brings his experience to bear upon each practical question as it comes before him. He has already seen most of such cases, or most varieties of them: he acts therefore, not from calculation so much as from precedent. He acts quickly therefore, on the same principle as the accomplished advocate giving you his opinion upon a case which has been proposed to him a thousand times over. He will also have a chance of acting more correctly than if he were slower in his determination. Virtue is oftener associated with the spontaneous and ready action of the man of the world, than of the calculating moralist. The one has no time, or gives himself no time, to speculate; the other reasons, and balances opposite arguments, and generally reasons himself into an error. The moral senses, like the bodily, when acting in highest perfection, act without reasoning.

All this readiness is, however, to be referred to habit, and habit to experience, and experience to a time when principles were first communicated, and when the child was taught to act from a consideration of principle. But as the experienced physician does not refer to his books when an every-day case comes before him, yet with whatever facility he comprehends it and prescribes for it, really acts upon a facility acquired in the first instance from these very books; so the ready action of virtue required by our worldly concerns, ought to be indeed derived in the first instance from principle, but afterwards from habit.

Still I acknowledge there may be a supposed case, and one which I would wish may never happen to yourself, in which a private education would be preferable. It is when some very peculiar and incurable defect or infirmity, especially of mind, would absolutely incapacitate your son from sharing in the routine of the employments of a school. It would have been better that the poet Cowper should have been educated at home, on account of his well known and early developed tendency to mental depression. Still it is not every defect which should be allowed to preclude a boy from the inestimable advantages of an education in the society of his schoolfellows. His schoolfellows soon get used to his defect, and it passes without notice. Whenever it is remembered, it is generally as a motive of kindness; and there is much real kindness to one another among boys at school, much readiness to help the weak and to protect the defenceless. I have seen the cripple leap along upon his crutch in the race with as much delight as the foremost runner. A boy with a defect is far less apt to be rendered unhappy by it when mingling with his companions, whom he will soon find cease even to notice it; or if they do, it is good-humouredly; whereas the same boy would brood upon it, and gain settled habits of mental suffering, if he were brought up in solitude, that nurse of all imaginary evils. Still, whenever the supposed case really occurs, I should still advise a private education. It may be proper to put this tender plant under the protection of a glass cover; but let the oakling be planted amid the trees of the forest, that he may with them gather vigour from every breeze, every shower, every sunbeam of the open sky.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

Clericus.

ILLUSTRATION OF ISAIAH LX, 5.

"The abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee."

"Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God," (Psalm lxxxvii, 3) said the prophetic psalmist, when contemplating the future prosperity of the Christian church. Part of that glory has already been realized; so that an intelligent survey of the world at the present day, contrasted with the wide-spreading heathen darkness and corruption of the period when the prophet wrote, must lead every devout mind to exclaim, with grateful admiration, "What hath God wrought!" But who can conceive the moral splendour of that day, when "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea?" Isa. xi, 9; — when "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ?" Rev. xi, 15; — when "all shall know the Lord, from the least even to the greatest?" — when the astonishing predictions of the inspired prophets, especially of the sixtieth chapter of Isaiah, shall be completely fulfilled?

Were the resources of a mighty nation employed wholly to glorify God for his mercy in the diffusion of his gospel throughout the world, by missionaries, schools, and the Holy Scriptures, what might not be soon effected, if approved by the Almighty Sovereign, and blessed by his Holy Spirit? Truth would shine with celestial brightness in every nation, holiness would soon characterize their inhabitants, and Paradise would be restored even upon earth! And this shall be reality in God's appointed time.

Such were some of our reflections when we met with Pebrer's "Resources of the British Empire." His estimate of the aggregate of the wealth, capital, and power of Great Britain, led us to the declaration of the prophet, "The abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee;" and we contemplated the blessings arising from these amazing "resources" being "converted" from purposes of selfishness to the honour of God and the advancement of human happiness. Perhaps a review of our national resources, as given by that intelligent writer, will serve as an occasion to animate the hopes of our readers in their anticipations of the times in which their children and their children's children are to live; especially as "the signs of the times," notwithstanding many things are calculated to awaken gloomy apprehensions, certainly indicate the fulfilment of many of God's merciful purposes to our world.

Pebrer says, "It appears that, according to the moderate calculation adopted in these estimates, there exists in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, a capital, public and private, of 3,679,500,000*l.*

"The greatest part of this enormous capital is beneficially employed in creating substantial property, and in promoting industry and enterprise in the multifarious pursuits and occupations by which the necessaries, the comforts, and the luxuries of life are raised and provided. The most useful and important of these is Agriculture, which raises, in all its branches, annual produce to the value of 246,000,000*l.*; or fifty-two millions and a half more than the total produce of this branch in France, considered to be the first agricultural country in Europe. The value of the produce of the Mines and Minerals in the United Kingdom, is 21,400,000*l.* The produce and profits of the numerous classes engaged in Inland Trade, amount to the large sum of 48,425,000*l.* And of those important branches to all maritime nations, the Coasting Trade and the Fisheries, the former yields 3,550,600*l.* and the latter 3,400,000*l.* The annual gains of all those engaged in Shipping and Foreign Trade amount to 34,398,059*l.* The profits of Bankers may be stated at 4,500,000*l.*; and the income derived from property invested in Foreign Securities, including the sum annually remitted from India, is estimated at 4,500,000*l.* Lastly, the capital, labour, and machinery employed in all the numerous and expensive branches of Manufactures, annually raise produce valued at the enormous sum of 148,050,000*l.*

"Thus the grand result of the combination of the prodigious capital above stated, with all animate and inanimate power, is the annual creation of produce and property to the amount of 514,823,059*l.*!!"

LETTER FROM THE LATE REV. A. FULLER,

Addressed to a Young Lady in Exeter, who had been greatly impressed by a Sermon which he preached, in passing through that city, on John xxi, 17, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?"

Kettering, May, 1801.

My dear young Friend,

I received yours just as I was going a journey. There needs no apology for your writing to me, though perhaps my answer may be short, owing to other numerous engagements. It gives me pleasure to learn that any thing I delivered was of use to you, especially in endearing to you the name of the Lord Jesus. This is the tendency of true religion. If Jesus be precious to us in his true character, we are believers in him, and interested in his salvation. Jesus is the friend and Saviour of sinners; and we cannot discern his glory, or properly love his name, but as we are made sensible of our sinful state. It is in the character of sinners, even the chief of sinners, that we must come to him: for the whole need not a physician, but those that are sick. "You never was permitted to give into the excesses which most young people are." Perhaps you may have valued yourself a little on this account, and cherished a hope that you should be more likely to obtain mercy; but the truth is, you have been a much greater sinner than you are aware of. The difference between one sinner and another is but small, in comparison of that wherein they are alike. We have all transgressed God's holy law, and all possess a heart averse to him, and every thing that is truly good; and, therefore, are all exposed to his eternal displeasure. And had not God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son to die for us, we must all have perished without hope. As it is, our hope is only in him: for his sake alone, and not for our own good deeds, our prayers, and tears, we are accepted. His righteousness must be our plea, for in him God is well pleased. The grand proof of the truth of our religion is, that we be of the same mind as God with respect to Christ. Hence he that is chosen of God and precious, is said to be precious to them that believe, 1 Pet. ii, 7. Now Christ is precious to God on several accounts: he is the Son of God, and as such dear to him: and is he not as such dear to us, as being our great high-priest, and able to save to the uttermost? He is also the Son of man, and as such dear to him, John v, 27. And for this sake also he is dear to true believers; for being flesh of our flesh, he can feel for our infirmities. He is beloved of the Father, because he laid down his life, John x, 17; and surely for this we also must love him. Finally, the Father loves him, because of his regard to righteousness. "He loveth righteousness and hateth iniquity, therefore God hath anointed him with the oil of gladness above his fellows." In becoming our Mediator and Saviour he has shown himself the enemy of sin, while he saves the sinner. And if we be true believers we shall love him on the same account. If we love him only because we hope to escape hell by means of his death, and not on account of his saving us from our sins, this is merely self-love, and has no true religion in it. I may add, if you love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, you will love him supremely: while you will be dutiful to your parent, you will love Christ before him, and before any person or thing in the world.

I wish you could read, if you could procure it, a little book containing accounts of the trials and experiences of several eminent Christians about one hundred and thirty years ago, one of whom was a young woman of the name of Agnes Beaumont. It was published some years ago by Mr. James of Hitchen. I cannot recollect the title, but I have often read and wept over the trials of poor Agnes, whose father was for a long time set against her religion, but at last died under an acknowledgement of his great sin in opposing her. It was by a kind, obliging, obedient behaviour in all civil matters that his heart was moved.

Though I cannot engage to correspond with any person for a continuance, yet if you have any particular exercises on which you would wish for my advice, or counsel to ask respecting your spiritual welfare, write to me with freedom, and I will at any time answer you. I remain, in our dear Lord Jesus,

Affectionately yours,
A. Fuller.

THE LATE REV. JOHN REES,

OF CROWN STREET CHAPEL, LONDON.

We have been repeatedly requested to insert in the Christian's Penny Magazine, the "Dying Testimony of the late Rev. John Rees," as peculiarly adapted to promote the edification of our readers. It affords us pleasure to be able to gratify our friends in this respect from an interesting Memoir of that useful servant of Christ, by the Rev. Henry Heap, dedicated to the "Right Hon. the Earl of Roden." The following instructive extract from the "Diary" of that devoted minister may be regarded as His Living Testimony.

"Sabbath-day, April 20, 1828. Fifty-eight years this day I was born at Carmarthen, in South Wales. Thirty-eight years I have been a professor of religion, and thirty-five a preacher of the gospel of Jesus Christ. But, O my soul, what a chequered path hast thou walked! The prevailing and sincere feeling of my mind on this my birth-day is deep regret, that I have in all these years lived so little unto God; my exercises in religion, as to bodily labour, and the number of sermons, more than common; but what is bodily exercise? God seeks the heart in every duty; and in many duties he has found me like a silly dove without a heart, or a heart like the fool's eye, wandering from him. I have to regret the duties omitted, neglected, or formally fulfilled, and the sins committed in thought and deed, for which I would humble myself in deep abasement before the footstool of mercy, and pray for grace, that I may, as the chief of sinners, come this day to the blood of sprinkling, that fountain which is open for sin and uncleanness. This is my only refuge after my prayers, and after my preaching, and after my Sabbaths; for I stand in need of being sprinkled with it, and washed from all the stains of my sin and the imperfections of my services. O thou Lamb of God, wash me in thy cleansing and soul-purifying blood! O cover me in thy soul-justifying righteousness, and sanctify me with thy sanctifying Spirit, that I may be more devoted to thy service! While I have every reason to complain of myself, I have more reason to extol and magnify the grace, mercy, and compassion of God in his dealing towards me; they have indeed been marked with great mercy. My preservation in bodily health, without a day of real illness for thirty-six years. His patience towards me in bearing with me so long; his kindness in blessing my labours as a preacher to the conversion and edification of so many hundreds of my fellow-creatures — some are now ministers of Christ — in supporting me in many troubles, and in bringing me to my present place in a wonderful and mysterious way, and for enabling me to give myself for eternity to the Lord Jesus Christ, who is my hope, my refuge, my hiding-place, my shield, and the tower of my defence. 'Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless his holy name! Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits!' Let this be my motto through the year, should my life be so long spared; and if not spared, may the Lord Jesus receive me into the arms of his rich grace. 'O to grace how great a debtor!' shall be my song for ever. This is not only my birth-day, but the day appointed for the anniversary of my settlement as minister of Crown Street chapel. It appears to me singular that both should be on the same day, without the least intention or design, either in me or my brethren; but, O thou Ruler of all circumstances and events, not without thy knowledge and design. Let it be, gracious God, a time of refreshing from thy presence, and let some great good be done this day to the souls of men. I would, O Lord, erect my Ebenezer, and to thy praise acknowledge that hitherto the Lord hath helped me."

His Dying Testimony,

Is thus given, in a letter from the Rev. J. Leifchild to the biographer, and will be read with deep interest by all.

"On my last visit, I saw that he was going, and forbore to trouble him much. But I put it to him seriously, in the full prospect of death, to give me the exact state of his mind. 'Mr. R., I may survive you; I may have to tell whether Christianity was able to surport you in these moments: let me know, exactly, what you feel; for these moments are too solemn for hesitation, vagueness, or reserve: tell me, my dear Sir, all, as briefly as possible, and I will disturb you no more." I saw him touched: his full form was shrunken by his long-continued malady and confinement, his swollen limbs (punctured to prevent inflammation) gave him great pain; blanched was his cheek, and sunken his eye: but this appeal to the honour of his religion roused him. It freshened his dying lamp; his colour returned, his eye was lit up with animation; and, raising himself, he looked me full in the face, and, with great deliberation, energy, and dignity, uttered the following words: — "Christ in his person, Christ in his offices, Christ in the love of his heart, and Christ in the power of his arm, is the rock on which I rest; and now (reclining his head gently on the pillow), Death! strike!' These words were not lost in air; they entered the tablet of my memory, and have remained fixed. I have no other wish than that they may express my sentiments and feelings in similar moments. 'So may it happen to me to die!'

"If it were right, I could say much on the affection of his widow, and on the numerous instances I witnessed of all that should exist between two such parties. I fear her claims to attention and kindness are not fully understood, or at least duly appreciated. But all this is far better in your hands than in mine; and I sincerely wish that your expectations in the projected publication may be realized to the utmost extent.

Your sincere friend and brother,

Rev. Henry Heap. J. Leifchild."

NIGHT AND DAY.

All sleeps! — for drowsy darkness reigns,
And deals his potion round,
With which, as adamantine chains,
He holds existence bound.

No light illumes the cheerless scene,
Save Luna's faintest gleam,
That clouds reflect, which sometimes 'tween
There steals a brighter beam.

No sound the list'ning ear doth seize,
The death-like stillness breaking,
Save the faint rustling of the breeze,
Or th' ocean's distant raking.

Night disappears! its gloomy train
Now vanishes away;
Mild beams of light illume the plain,
And speak th' approach of day.

See yonder, where the ocean lies,
Bright Phœbus lifts his head;
See him majestically rise,
And gild his wat'ry bed.

How chang'd the scene! Night's gloomy reign
Spread cheerless silence round;
But now all nature smiles again,
Her plains with joy are crown'd!

Thus doth a burst of heav'nly light
The Christian pilgrim greet,
Who wings his way from Earth's drear night
The bless'd above to meet.

Sweet truth, to Christian virtue join'd,
A light within displays,
That Heav'n revealing, doth the mind
Beyond Earth's midnight raise.

It is as 'twere the faintest break
Of morn's incipient beams:
But, oh! when saints immortal wake,
What glory o'er them reigns!

Then doth eternal summer crown
Their rich immortal rest,
Which ne'er shall know stern Winter's frown,
Nor be by care oppress'd.

O happy, happy they, who e'er
Such precious bliss shall know!
Bliss that but dimly can appear
In shadows here below.

ANSWER TO A CASE OF CONSCIENCE ON HEB. X, 26.

(See No. 61, p. 246.)

Our Correspondent W. has proposed for consideration a passage of Scripture, which has occasioned much alarm in the minds of many who have truly feared God; but it has also been the means of leading them to a prayerful course of studying the sacred volume. Mistakes of the meaning of this passage alone occasion perplexity to the sincere disciples of Christ; for, however terrible it may be in its aspect towards apostates, it has nothing really alarming to the pious.

Tenderness of conscience is essential to spiritual religion, and a most certain evidence of a healthful condition of the soul. No state of mind is more truly desirable; as it is the chief preventive from falling into a backsliding state, while it prompts to the seeking of every blessing, in habitual communion with God. Tenderness of conscience is peculiarly contemplated, in those passages of scripture, which speak of being "in the fear of the Lord all the day long" — "The fear of the Lord is to hate evil" — "Blessed is the man that feareth always" — "To this man will I look, who is poor, and of a contrite spirit."

Ignorance, however, of the grand scheme of Christianity, as contained in the Holy Scriptures, may be the occasion of much uneasiness to a tender conscience, and lead to serious mental distress. This may probably have been the case from reading the language of this text, without carefully examining its connection, or seriously considering its import. Dr. Doddridge's translation and paraphrase will assist the reader greatly in perceiving the true import of the verse: the italics are his translation. "For if we sin wilfully and presumptuously by apostatizing, after having received the knowledge of the truth with such incontestible evidence and power, there remaineth yet no more sacrifice for sin; nor is it possible to find any atonement that shall be efficacious, after having thus ungratefully and wickedly disowned that which God has appointed."

Sinning wilfully imports a course of sinning — not only willingly, which some conscientious persons seem to confound with wilfully — but deliberately, resolvedly, obstinately, and against the clearest light and knowledge of the word of God. Persons guilty of such conduct can have no benefit from the sacrifice of Christ, whose blood cleanses from all sin in the case of every penitent believer. Infidelity and apostasy "trample under foot the Son of God, and count the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing, doing despite unto the Spirit of grace," ver. 29. Such, however, cannot be the state of mind described by our correspondent W. And let every anxious reader of these passages consider, that their design is to awaken the careless to seek salvation — to convict the impenitent of the guilt of their condition — to excite the established believer to gratitude for an interest in Christ — and to bring glory to the Redeemer, by the exhibition of his sacrifice as all-sufficient for every believer.

THE FAMILY BOOK.

18mo. cloth, pp. 338. Religious Tract Society.

It would be sufficient, in recommendation of this volume, to say, that it is worthy of its engaging title. Wisdom, prudence, and piety, are most ingeniously illustrated in it through sixty-three chapters, by the principles, character, and habits of "The Sutton Family." We can scarcely conceive any thing more admirably written as the means of conveying the most useful lessons to servants and young persons. Every kitchen library should be enriched with this instructive volume; and parents and heads of families may derive from it the most profitable maxims on every subject of daily occurrence in domestic government and practical life.

"The soul is a spark kindled by the Deity, which cannot be extinguished by the damps of this dark valley."

"There dwells in man a vital spark,
Lit up by power divine,
Which fleeting time can never dark,
Nor death's damp vale confine."

OMAN CATHOLIC MISSIONS TO THE EAST.

R engraving necessarily requires that we give some torical notices of Roman Catholic Missions to the st.

Christianity, it is well known, is pre-eminently mis-nary and proselyting in its spirit. But its genius is inely benevolent, breathing infinite love to mankind. Divine Founder gave his last command to his chosen ciples, "Go into all the world, and preach the gospel every creature." Ecclesiastical history shows, that, every age of the world, as genuine Christianity has en possessed, the servants of Christ have endeavoured disseminate their principles, and to diffuse the blessings of salvation among all nations by the Holy Scriptures.

Popery also is peculiarly missionary in its spirit: but, concealing the word of God, and not allowing its heavenly light to shine among the nations, its early efforts to proselyte the heathen, have left some of the deepest stains upon the Christian name. Dr. Mosheim remarks, "The Spaniards and Portuguese, if we may give credit to their historians, exerted themselves with the greatest vigour and success in the propagation of the gospel among the darkened nations. And it must indeed be confessed, that they communicated some notions, such as they were, of the Christian religion to the inhabitants of America, to those parts of Africa where they carried their arms, and to the islands and maritime provinces of Asia, which they reduced under their dominion. It is also true, that considerable numbers of these savage people, who had hitherto lived, either under the bondage of the most extravagant superstitions, or in a total ignorance of any object of religious worship, embraced, at least in outward appearance, the doctrines of the gospel. But when we consider the methods of conversion that were employed by the Spanish missionaries among these wretched nations, the barbarous laws and inhuman tortures that were used to force them into the profession of Christianity; when it is considered, farther, that the denomination of Christians was conferred upon such of these poor wretches as discovered a blind and excessive veneration for their stupid instructors, and were able, by certain gestures, and the repetition of a little jargon, to perform a few superstitious rites and ceremonies; then, instead of rejoicing at, we shall be tempted to lament, such a propagation of the gospel, and to behold the labours of such miserable apostles with indignation and contempt. Such is the judgment passed upon these missionaries, not only by those whom the church of Rome places in the list of heretics, but also by many of the most pious and eminent of her own doctors, in France, Germany, Spain, and Italy.

"When the Roman pontiffs saw their ambition checked by the progress of the Reformation, which deprived them of a great part of their spiritual dominion in Europe, they turned their lordly views towards the other parts of the globe, and became more solicitous than ever about the propagation of the gospel among the nations that lay yet involved in the darkness of paganism. This they considered as the best method of making amends for the loss they had sustained in Europe, and the most specious pretext for assuming to themselves, with some appearance of justice, the title of heads or parents of the universal church. The famous society, which, in the year 1540, took the denomination of Jesuits, or the Company of Jesus, seemed every way proper to assist the court of Rome in the execution of this extensive design. And accordingly, from their first rise, this peculiar charge was given them, that their missionaries should be at the absolute disposal of the Roman pontiff, and always ready, at a moment's warning, to repair to whatever part of the world he should fix for the exercise of their ministry. The many histories and relations which mention the labours, perils, and exploits of that prodigious multitude of Jesuits, who were employed in the conversion of the African, American, and Indian infidels, abundantly show, with what fidelity and zeal the members of this society executed the orders of the Roman pontiffs. And their labours would undoubtedly have crowned them with immortal glory, had it not appeared evident, from the most authentic records, that the greatest part of these new apostles had more in view the promoting of the ambitious views of Rome, and the advancing of the interests of their own society, than the propagation of the Christian religion, or the honour of its Divine Author. It may also be affirmed, from records of the highest credit and authority, that the Inquisition erected by the Jesuits at Goa, and the penal laws, whose terrors they employed, contributed much more than their arguments and exhortations to engage the Indians to embrace Christianity. The converting zeal of the Franciscans and Dominicans, which had for a long time been not only cooled, but almost totally extinguished, was animated anew by the example of the Jesuits."

But of all the Jesuits who distinguished themselves by their zealous and laborious attempts to extend the limits of the church, none acquired a more shining reputation than Francis Xavier, who is commonly called "The Apostle of the Indies," and by Pope Benedict XIV, "The Protector of the Indies."

St. Francis Xavier was a native of Navarre, in Spain, born in 1497: he was educated at Paris, and became an eminent professor in that university, where he formed an intimacy with Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the Jesuits. Inflamed with similar zeal, he bound himself to attempt the conversion of the heathen. "An undaunted resolution," says Mosheim, "and no small degree of genius and sagacity, rendered this famous missionary one of the properest persons that could be employed in such an arduous task. Accordingly, in the year 1522, he set sail for the Portuguese settlement in India, and, in a short space of time, spread the knowledge of the Christian, or, to speak more properly, of the popish religion, over a great part of the continent, and in several of the islands of that remote region."

Xavier was honoured, on entering on his missionary work, with the dignity of Apostolical Nuncio in the East, and during the voyage, and also in the Indies, he was called "holy father." It is said to have "cost him no less pains to reclaim the Portuguese, debauched with the riches of Asia, than to convert infidels." He converted the king of the island of Ceylon; and thence, after several times traversing the Indian islands, and some parts of the continent, he proceeded to Japan, where he succeeded in an extraordinary manner, assisted by other Jesuits and friars from Goa, Macao, and the Manillas. At first, the undertaking advanced with the most rapid success. Many houses, especially seventy-three of splendid appearance, with several churches and seminaries, were possessed by the Jesuits, besides what were in the possession of the Augustins and Dominicans. Their converts are said to have amounted to 600,000 persons; and they were in such favour at court, that an embassy, with rich presents, was sent to Pope Gregory XIII. The conduct of the missionaries, however, convinced the government that they had other views beyond the conversion of the people to God; and as they began to preach boldly the supremacy of the pope, it was believed they were conspiring against the state. A persecution commenced against them; and an affront which was offered to a Japanese prince by a Portuguese prelate, produced an order, that all Christians who did not leave the empire immediately should be put to death. From 1596 to 1640, persecution raged dreadfully; as the Jesuit fathers did interfere in the business of the state. Their hardships and sufferings were great: many of their members were martyred. A general massacre took place, when, it is said, that besides multitudes of private persons, no less than 40,000 Roman Catholic soldiers were sacrificed to the fury of the pagan Japanese. In 1640, the Portuguese were expelled the country, and no man was suffered to be a Christian.

Millar, in the second volume of his "History of the Propagation of Christianity," remarks, "The persecution of missionaries continues to this day in Japan; for I find in the public news from Madrid, Jan. 30, 1720, the following paragraph: "We have received letters from Madraspatam in the East Indies, of the 25th of December, 1718, that advice was come to that place, that the Abbot, Baptist Lidotti, a Sicilian, died in the country of Japan, in the torments he suffered for the Christian faith. His zeal for the conversion of infidels induced him to go into that country, notwithstanding the severe laws of that government, whereby all Europeans in general, and most particularly missionaries, are forbid coming there. He was no sooner arrived, but he was taken up, and condemned to die; he was sent to the governor of the province, and after some small liberty allowed him, it being discovered he had converted some of the people of Japan to the Christian faith, a very extraordinary punishment was inflicted upon him; for the infidels immured him with his hands tied between two walls, built so close that he could not stir himself, allowing him no other food than a little rice and water every evening. This torment soon put an end to his life: he died about the beginning of the year 1714."

After the lapse of more than a century, Japan continues in the same state of heathen darkness: but we trust the time is not far distant, in which the word of God, which is being translated into the language of that country, will be circulated through the land, to bless its teeming population with the true knowledge of salvation by Jesus Christ.

Japanese Contempt for Roman Catholic Images.

Christianity, as exhibited in the Holy Scriptures, commends itself to the reason of every intelligent man. Infidels may dislike the spirituality of its doctrines, and reject its claims without an examination of its true nature: but however they may refuse to humble themselves before the throne of the heavenly grace, to implore that wisdom and those blessings which it promises, none, even of the most acute and learned, have ever been able to discover that there is any thing in its institutions irrational, or unworthy of God. Multitudes of that class, having been induced to consider it in the sacred volume, have been converted from their infidelity, by means of a candid examination of its doctrines and precepts, and have been constrained to pronounce it the expression of infinite benevolence, in which "God has abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence."

Popery, in all its essential peculiarities, is not Christian, and therefore offensive to the reason of man: hence the prevailing infidelity in Roman Catholic countries. Prayers in a tongue unknown to the people —Transubstantiation of the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper—and image-worship,—are an insult to the sound dictates of reason, and equally repugnant to the oracles of God. Hence the generally prevailing ignorance of the population in countries professing that form of religion, and its rejection in proportion as the people become enlightened by scriptural knowledge.

Contempt for the corruptions of Christianity, was probably never more strikingly exhibited, than it is still done in Japan, by their annual ceremony of Trampling on the Images of the Virgin Mary with her Child, and the Crucifix. This horrid ceremony takes place at the beginning of the year, in commemoration of the expulsion of the Jesuits. The images are of copper, about a foot in height. Observing this custom is intended to impress every individual with hatred of the Christian religion and name, and to discover whether there is any remnant of it left in the country. It is performed in the places where the Christians chiefly resided. In Nagasaki it continues four days; the images are conveyed to the circumjacent places, and afterwards laid aside till the next anniversary. They are so scrupulously inquisitive, that every person, except the governor and his attendants, even the youngest child, is expected to be present. Some have said that the Dutch factors are obliged to trample on the cross, but this is not true. Still, how serious is this stumbling-block in the way of the extension of pure, divine Christianity!

Immoral and corrupt professors of the gospel incur an awful accumulation of guilt, in giving such false and shameful examples to the heathen. To such it is that the apostle addresses himself, Rom. ii, 24, "For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you, as it is written." Should this fall into the hands of any who have brought scandal upon the Saviour's cause by immorality of life, let them read Ezek. xxxvi, 20—23, and humble themselves at the throne of grace, in seeking reconciliation with God.

THE BEAUTIES OF CHRISTIANITY.

Of Redemption.

As the Trinity comprehends secrets of the metaphysical kind, so Redemption contains the wonderful history of man's heart and destination. The one overwhelms our senses with its glory; but the affecting mystery of the other, while it fills our eyes with tears, prevents them from being too much dazzled, and allows us to fix them for a moment on the cross. We behold, in the first place, the doctrine of original sin, which explains the whole nature of man. Without this, how shall we account for the vicious propensity of our nature? Without a primitive fall, how shall we explain that sweat which fertilizes the rugged soil, the sorrows and misfortunes of the righteous, the triumphs, the unpunished success of the wicked? To be convinced of the fatal truth, whence springs the mystery of redemption, need we any other proof than the malediction pronounced on Eve, a malediction of daily accomplishment? But a God of clemency, knowing that we should all have perished in consequence of this fall, has interposed to save us. Let us, who are all frail and guilty, ask not our understandings but our hearts, how a God can die. A universal tradition teaches us, that man was created in a more perfect state than the present; if man was created, he was created for some end or other; and being created perfect, the end for which he was destined could not be otherwise than perfect. But the final cause of man has not been changed by his fall, since he has not been created anew; he is therefore, though mortal and imperfect through sin, still destined for immortal and perfect ends. But how are these ends to be attained in this state of imperfection? Thus we perceive the necessity of succour, or redemption. But in order to adjust a redemption, the ransom must be at least equivalent to the object to be redeemed; and how could man make a satisfaction, as well for his own guilt as for the rest of the human race? Heaven seems purposely to have allowed four thousand years to elapse, to allow men to judge how very inadequate were their degraded virtues for such a sacrifice. It is clear, then, that Redemption could only have proceeded from a being superior to man. Let us examine if it could have been accomplished by any intermediate being between us and God.

"Say, heavenly powers, where shall we find such love?
Which of ye will be mortal to redeem
Man's mortal crime? and just, the unjust to save?
Dwells in all heaven charity so dear?"

It was a beautiful idea of Milton, to represent the Almighty announcing the fall to the astonished heavens, and asking if any of the celestial powers was willing to devote himself for the salvation of mankind. All the divine hierarchy was mute! What indeed should have inspired the angels with that unbounded love to man which the mystery of the cross pre-supposes? Nor could any angelic being, from the weakness of its nature, have taken on itself those sufferings, which, in the language of Massillon, accumulated upon the head of Christ, all the physical torments that might be supposed to attend the punishment of all the sins committed since the beginning of time, and all the moral anguish and remorse which the same sins must have occasioned. If the Son of God himself found the cup bitter, how could an angel have raised it to his lips? Oh, no! he never could have drunk up the dregs, and the sacrifice could not have been consummated. We could then have no other Redeemer than the Son of God. He alone was capable of reconciling God with man. He was born of a virgin, a victim without spot and blemish: he received life in a stable, in the lowest of human conditions, because we had fallen through pride. Here commences the depth of the mystery: man feels an awful emotion, and the scene closes!

Christianity is not made up of those things which the sarcasms of infidelity would fain lead us to imagine. To the poor in spirit the gospel has been preached, and by the poor in spirit it has been heard. It is the plainest book that exists: its doctrine has not its seat in the head, but the heart: it teaches not the art of disputation, but the way to lead a virtuous life. Such, moreover, are its truths, that the admission of one single point compels you to admit all the rest: the moment you acknowledge a God, our holy religion makes its way with all its doctrines.

Of the Sacraments.

If the mysteries overwhelm the mind by their greatness, we experience a different kind of astonishment, but perhaps not less profound, when we contemplate the sacraments of the church; the intimate knowledge of man which we discover in these institutions, proves that he who has thus penetrated into the recesses of the human heart, can be no other than its Creator.

Baptism is the first of the sacraments which religion confers on man, and which clothes him with Jesus Christ. Who can avoid being struck with the solemnity and affecting nature of the ceremony which consecrates the life of a Christian! It reminds us of the corruption in which we were born, of the tribulations which await us in the world, and that our sins will recoil upon our children. Considered as a type of the mystery of our redemption, baptism is a bath which restores to the soul its primeval vigour.

The holy communion presents to us characters still more sublime. It originated in the last supper of which Christ partook with his disciples, and embraces three grand essential points. First. In the material bread and wine we behold the consecration of the food of man which we receive from the bounty of God. Were there nothing more in the communion than the offering of the productions of the earth to him who dispenses them, that alone would render it equal to the most excellent religious customs of Greece. Secondly. The eucharist reminds us of the passover of the Israelites; it announces the abolition of bloody sacrifices; it is also the image of the calling of Abraham, and of the first covenant between God and man. Thirdly. It announces the union of mankind into one great family, it inculcates the end of animosities, and the commencement of a new law, which makes no distinction of Jew or Gentile, but invites all the children of Adam to the same table. When the Almighty had created man in his own image, he made a covenant with him; Adam and his Creator conversed together in the solitude of the garden. This covenant was of necessity broken on the fall of Adam. Now between two things of different properties, there cannot be a point of union except by means of a third agent. The first effort which divine love made to draw us nearer to itself was in the calling of Abraham, and the institution of sacrifices, types of the coming of Messias. The Saviour, by the redemption, reinstated us in our privileges, and the highest of those privileges was to communicate with our Maker. But this intercourse could not be direct, because the body, an heir of death, is too weak to survive a direct communication with God. A medium was therefore required, and this the Son has furnished. He hath given himself to us in the eucharist. He hath become the sublime way by which we are spiritually united with him in whom we live, move, and breathe. On the one hand, he is united to the Father by his spirituality, and on the other, to us by his humanity. He is, therefore, the required medium of approximation between the guilty child and the forgiving Parent.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

NOAH.

Noah's Salvation Typical.

It is allowed by all that Noah was a typical character. In several respects he may be compared or contrasted with Adam; and he, as well as Adam, was a distinguished type of Christ.

As Adam was the father of the first, Noah was the father of the second world. To these two alone, was the whole world granted as a possession. For the sin of Adam, the ground was cursed: but through the sacrifice of Noah, the earth was blessed.

The name of Noah was significant, denoting rest and consolation; and such in reality is our blessed Lord and Saviour. He is the Rest of his people, and the never-failing Consolation of all the Israel of God. Noah was the great prophet, and priest, and "preacher of righteousness" to the old world: such, with unspeakable eminence, is our divine Redeemer, "the Apostle and High Priest of our profession." Through the sacrifice of Noah, the Lord gave the covenant of safety to the world: through the sacrifice of Christ, the better covenant of eternal salvation was ratified and published. Noah was saved in the ark by the destroying deluge; so, as Peter teaches, "the like figure whereunto, even baptism, doth also now save us (not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God), by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." 1 Pet. iii, 21.

Dreadful as was the overwhelming deluge, whose waters were required to wash away the corruptions of the earth, there is a still more dreadful revolution in prospect, when "the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burnt up. Nevertheless, we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." 2 Pet. iii, 12, 13. In the anticipation of that most fearful event, let every sincere believer repose upon the promise of God, ratified by his most solemn oath. "For this is as the waters of Noah unto me: for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah shall no more go over the earth, so have I sworn that I will not be wroth with thee. For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on thee." Isa. liv, 9, 10.

DEATH OF MR. THOMAS WILLIAMS.

The church on earth has lost a valuable member in the removal to the church in heaven of the late Mr. Thomas Williams. He died on the 12th inst. in the 78th year of his age, after a few hours' illness. This excellent man was the well-known editor of "The Cottage Bible," and the translator of "Solomon's Song," as well as author of several valuable theological works, the last published only a few months ago, entitled "The Private Life of Christ." Mr. Williams's character was in strict accordance with his pursuits, and he died, as he lived, a Christian, prepared and waiting for a happy immortality.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXXV.

On the Choice of a School.

Dear Madam,

SINCE, then, it seems expedient that your son should go to school, the next question to be considered is, what kind of a school shall he go to?

The answer to this question, though simply consisting of the suggestions of common sense, requires to be stated at large.

It appears to me advisable, that regard should be had in the choice of a school to the following points.

1st. Let him be sent to a school, where the general and principal plan of education is adapted to your expectations as to his future occupation in life.

If your own circumstances dictate that your son is to be a tradesman, send him to a good commercial school, as it is called, situate in the country, or in the neighbourhood of the metropolis. Let it, if possible, be a school where the learned languages are not even professed to be taught, nor even French, but where all that the master pretends to do, is to qualify his pupils for mercantile pursuits. In a school of this kind, let him be thoroughly instructed in all those branches of knowledge into which I have presumed that you will initiate him. To these of course book-keeping will be added. Having such views with regard to your son, do not send him to a schoolmaster of whom you know nothing. A little inquiry among the more judicious of your friends will soon enable you to find a schoolmaster who professes nothing more than to communicate a commercial education, and whom they can recommend, upon a personal knowledge of his competency and fitness in all respects. Still, if you find any thing in his advertisements, or in his manner, tones, language, professions, statements, or references, which at all savours of boasting or parade, immediately resolve to have nothing to do with him. Make similar observations as to the mistress. Even should all other circumstances please you, and appear such as good sense, that comparatively rare but inestimable faculty, would seem to require, yet examine if the situation of the house be rural and airy, and if it has a play-ground of competent size. I advise, too, that your son should not go to any school where there are fewer than fifty pupils, or where there are likely to be as many very shortly. It will be requisite that you should personally survey the accommodations to which you commit your offspring, whether the school-room be large, lofty, and airy; above all things, minutely investigate whether the temper of the master and mistress be good. Choose a master not under thirty nor more than forty-five years of age. Similar observations should be made as to the arrangements of the household. Examine the sleeping-rooms, the beds, the provisions for washing hands and face. Consider whether the hours of rising and retiring to rest be sufficiently early. Thoroughly acquaint yourself with the number of meals allowed, and with the nature of the aliment used at each. You will not think these directions minute or unworthy of notice. Remember, that when you send your son to school, it ought to be to a school wherein your own plans will as much as possible be carried on and continued to perfection. If your own plans are valuable, surely the question whether they are likely to be continued or not by the schoolmaster cannot be unimportant.

Should you however resolve, upon a due and faithful consideration of all the circumstances adverted to in a former Letter, respecting the choice of a profession, or upon the advice of tried, disinterested, and judicious friends, that your son should be devoted to a learned profession, then indeed you must turn your view to some one of those numerous public grammar-schools for which we are indebted to the piety and munificence of our forefathers. You will find a full account of the chief of these in a book lately published, "A Father's Guide in the Choice of a School for his Son;" or in another book of the same nature, called "Liber Scholasticus." In these books you will find an account of all the principal grammar-schools in the kingdom. The chief things to be attended to are the following: the time at which your son should enter, in order to be permitted to become a candidate for all the advantages of the school — I mean exhibitions to college, scholarships, &c. From these and similar books (for there are many), you will also gain a knowledge of the various circumstances which entitle particular persons to the higher advantages of certain schools, such as founder's kin, the natives of particular districts, counties, cities, &c. &c. It may be well also to compare the information given in such books with that which you will find in the University Calendar of Cambridge and of Oxford, since some schools are more particularly connected with certain colleges of either university. Thus a boy from some particular schools may have the opportunity of being sent to college, if he stays long enough, and is sufficiently meritorious, upon an exhibition derived from his school.

I would recommend, on the supposition that he is to be a tradesman, that you should if possible send him to a school where the rest of the boys are as much upon a level with him as possible, in respect to circumstances and station in life. If he is to be educated for a profession, and is sent to any grammar-school upon the foundation, or by the interest of any particular person, you will scarcely have a choice, and in such a case it is not material. This direction, however, coincides with the very rare case in which your son is declared by competent judges to exhibit considerable promise of success in study, whereas your own circumstances would have dictated his being engaged in commercial pursuits.

On the supposition, that, all circumstances being considered, you devote him to a learned profession, and intend to pay his expenses at school, send him to a school where the society is nearly upon a level with his own rank in life. You will thus save him from the mortification, and the passions thus excited, of feeling himself vastly inferior to others in these respects. Among all the schools in question, I should prefer his being sent to one of the large public grammar-schools. It is always an ennobling association in the mind of a boy, that he was educated in the same room where poets and legislators and philosophers imbibed the rudiments of learning. In a school of this description, I should say that the society of schoolboys is generally in its highest perfection. Amid the great numbers, too, to be found in such schools, he will meet the opportunity of seeing the world, of having the ill tendency in his own character corrected, and the better tendencies elevated and confirmed. He will have a greater opportunity, also, of forming acquaintances and attachments; and after all, school acquaintances, not perhaps at the time of their formation, but in after-life, when the objects meet at college, or when they mingle in the senate, in the church, or at the bar, are some of the most durable, useful, and delightful. It is a great advantage to a boy to have had many of these. His heart will have been exercised by them; while, if he passes to the university and to the world without a school-friendship, with all his friends to seek, he will probably make but few friendships, and those of a slight and uncertain tenure.

I have always thought it an advantage, that a boy should have many relations, many families of relations, living in the neighbourhood where he is bred up. These objects of kindred attachment suit with his young affections. I think, upon the same principle, that a lad should have many school-friendships, that when he sits down in hall at college, he may see around him many a familiar countenance of schoolfellows gone thither before him. And be assured, that if your son is to be a member of any of the learned professions, his best career is from your own abode to one of the public grammar-schools, and from thence to one of the English universities.

It is true that at the grammar-school, and college also, his attention will be almost wholly absorbed by classics and mathematics; and that these studies seem to have little connection with law, divinity, or physic. It is true that the literal connection between them is scarcely discernible; but the abstract connection between them and any other science or profession is most valuable. In the thorough study of classics and mathematics, but especially of the latter, setting aside all pecuniary remuneration which may be obtained by eminence in them, such as fellowships, &c. there is this advantage, that they tend to establish those mental habits of minute discrimination and correct reasoning, which, when acquired, can be directed to any subject afterwards with the highest success. I would compare this habit, as Dr. Johnson compares genius, to the power of walking, which, when a man has it, he can walk either to east or west or north or south. So, when these mental habits are acquired, they can be directed to law or physic or divinity, and the possessor will make acquirements in them, which, both in point of extent and speed, will make up most amply for their having been so long delayed. Yet more, the self-same habits will enable him to practise these different sciences with supreme advantage to his fellow-creatures. Let no parent, then, begrudge the time and the money, merely on this account, required by the present routine of grammar-school and university education. The propriety of them is attested by the excellence of the result in thousands of qualified members of the learned professions: it is approved most by those whose mental acquirements and excellence best qualify them to give an opinion upon the question. May they be perpetual!

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

CLERICUS.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICE OF THE LATE W. WILBERFORCE, ESQ.

PATRIOTISM and piety must equally mourn over the tomb of William Wilberforce; for in the death of this lamented individual, "a great man has fallen" in our Israel. A brief memoir of this ornament of our nation and of the church of Christ will be regarded with a lively interest by every reader of the Christian's Penny Magazine.

William Wilberforce was born, Aug. 24, 1759, at Hull, in Yorkshire, where his ancestors had been for many years successfully engaged in trade. His great grandfather was one of the governors of Beverly, in 1670. His grandfather was greatly respected, and was twice mayor of Hull. His grandmother was of the Thornton family. Mr. Robert Wilberforce, his father, married Miss Elizabeth Bird, a relative of the present bishops of Chester and Winchester. By this lady he had one son, the subject of our Memoir, and two daughters: one died unmarried; the other was married to the Rev. Mr. Clarke, and after his decease to James Stephen, Esq. late Master in Chancery.

Mr. Wilberforce's father dying when he was very young, his early education devolved chiefly on his mother, by whom he was sent to the grammar-school under the care of the Rev. Mr. Milner. About the year 1774, he was entered as a fellow-commoner at St John's college, Cambridge, where he formed that intimacy with Mr. Pitt, which continued uninterrupted till the death of that great statesman, a period of more than thirty years.

Mr. Wilberforce did not study for literary honours, yet he was distinguished by his solid attainments and correct classical taste. During his residence at the university he cultivated the friendship of Mr. Isaac, afterwards Dr. Milner, the excellent editor of the "History of the Church of Christ," and brother of the pious author of that valuable work. Mr. Milner accompanied Mr. Wilberforce and Mr. Pitt on a tour to Nice; and to his intercourse with their reverend friend, Mr. W. is stated to have ascribed his first serious impressions of evangelical truth, an honour which that devoted clergyman will rejoice to acknowledge in the heavenly world, while he renders the glory of sanctifying efficiency to the Spirit and grace of God.

Scarcely had Mr. Wilberforce attained his majority, when he was chosen as the representative in parliament of his native town; and his name occurs in the parliamentary journals of the year 1781, as one of the commissioners for administering oaths to members of the House of Commons.

Passing over his exertions during the former years of his activity as a senator, we record, that in the year 1787, Mr. Wilberforce was first engaged, at the request of Mr. Clarkson, to bring forward in parliament the legislative abolition of the accursed SLAVE TRADE. Benevolence induced him to undertake that service; and in 1788 he gave notice of a motion on the subject: but indisposition prevented his following up his purpose, and the duty was undertaken by his friend Mr. Pitt. A resolution passed the House, to the effect, that it would proceed, in the next session, to consider the state of the Slave Trade, and the measures which it would be proper to adopt with respect to it. On the 12th of May, 1789, Mr. Wilberforce again brought this great question before the House, in a speech of powerful eloquence, worthy of the cause. On the 25th, the debate was renewed; and, ultimately, the further consideration of the subject was adjourned to the following session. In 1790, Mr. Wilberforce was at his post, and recalled the House to the discussion; but the delusive and dishonest clamour for evidence prevailed against him. In April, 1791, another splendid debate on the Abolition was opened by Mr. Wilberforce, who was ably supported in this cause of justice and humanity by the united forces of Pitt and Fox. Notwithstanding the giant powers of these auxiliaries, a majority of seventy-five was numbered against his motion, and it was lost. Again in the session of 1792, this inflexible and unwearied champion of the rights of humanity and of God, renewed his attack upon the accursed traffic in "the souls of men;" and though consistently opposed by all the sophistry and virulence of the West Indian advocates, he had the satisfaction of perceiving that some impression had been made upon the House by the force of public opinion, and his appeals to the laws of God: it was resolved therefore by a small majority, that the Slave Trade should be gradually abolished. We cannot in this place notice the successive efforts of this indefatigable advocate of the Negro: but after a twenty years' struggle against avarice, immorality, and daily "slave-murder," Mr. Wilberforce had the satisfaction of seeing his efforts crowned with success, by a Bill for the Abolition of the Slave Trade receiving the royal assent on the 25th of March 1807.

Mr. Wilberforce, however, was not satisfied with the abolition of the Trade in human beings; he was the steady and determined advocate of Negro Emancipation; and Providence mercifully spared his life to witness the whole nation roused to demand the extinction of this foul blot upon our character, and to hear the decision of the British legislature, that—SLAVERY SHALL CEASE THROUGHOUT THE EMPIRE!

Mr. Wilberforce was a Christian, as well as a Philanthropist; and he dared to be singular, and to declare his conviction, not only of the truth of Divine Revelation, but of the infinite importance of evangelical doctrine. About the time of his marriage, therefore, in 1797, he published his celebrated work, entitled, "A Practical View of the prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians, in the Higher and Middle Classes in this Country, contrasted with Real Christianity*." Under the peculiar circumstances of its author, and of the country, this work must be regarded as a noble testimony to the doctrines of the Protestant Reformation. It threw down the gauntlet, not only to infidelity, but to formalism; showing that even a Member of Parliament for the county of York, possessed moral courage sufficient to declare, "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ." Such a phenomenon excited the astonishment of the nation, and the volume was read by thousands. To the extensive circulation which this volume obtained among the higher classes of society, at a time when "piety was stigmatized in aristocratical circles with scarcely less reproach than in the days of Charles II," may be reasonably ascribed, in no small degree, the introduction of that leaven of better principles, which, in the present day, is seen so happily diffusing itself among even the polite and noble of the land.

Conscious of the peculiar responsibility which attached to him, from the station which he occupied, the great interests entrusted to his advocacy, and his known attachment to evangelical religion, he was alike assiduous and vigilant, beyond what his physical strength allowed, in the discharge of his parliamentary duties. Yet no man was more free from self-importance or arrogance. His evangelical piety, the main-spring of his benevolence, was, at the same time, the hidden source of that cheerfulness which he sought to impart to all around him. This "leader of the religious world," as he has been styled, was, in domestic life, the most amiable of men, playful and animated to a degree which few would have supposed, extremely fond of children, alike instructive and entertaining in conversation, a companion for all ages, equally qualified to compete with senators, to discourse with divines, to chat with his friends, to instruct the young, and to administer consolation to the poor, the suffering, and the afflicted.

Mr. Wilberforce, as might be expected, was the decided patron and supporter of the Bible Society, the Missionary Societies, and the other kindred institutions which adorn our age and bless all nations: and though an avowed member of the Established Church, he was a generous friend to the evangelical Dissenters, with many of whom he held the most friendly intercourse, and not unfrequently attended their places of worship, uniting with them even in participating of the Lord's Supper.

In 1797, Mr. W. married Miss Barbara Spooner, daughter of a banker at Birmingham. By that lady, who survives him, he has left four sons, William, the eldest, who resides on the Continent; two others, Samuel and Robert, are clergymen in the established church; and Henry. Two daughters, one of them unmarried, died some years ago. Mr. Wilberforce retired from Parliament to private life in 1825. He died in London, on the 29th of July last, and was interred, with great marks of honour by the public, in Westminster Abbey. The names of Wilberforce and Clarkson will go down to posterity with that of Howard, as the greatest benefactors of mankind.

MY SCRAP BOOK.

LEAF XI.

"The Bee that wanders, and sips from every flower, disposes what she has gathered into her cells."—SENECA.

Account of MRS. ELIZABETH GAUNT, a Baptist lady, who was burnt alive for having concealed, and kept from starving, one Burton, and his family, who had escaped from the Duke of Monmouth's army.

OF this remarkably pious and benevolent woman, Bishop Burnet says—"She spent a great part of her life in acts of charity, visiting the jails, and looking after the poor, of whatsoever persuasion they were. One of the rebels found her out; and she harboured him in her house, and was looking for an occasion of sending him out of the kingdom. He went about in the night, and came to hear what the King had said (which was, that he would sooner pardon the rebels, than those who harboured them); so he, by an unheard-of baseness, went and delivered himself up, and accused her that had harboured him. She was seized on, and tried. There was no witness to prove that she knew the person she harboured was a rebel, but himself: her maid-servant witnessed only, that he was entertained at her house. But, though the crime was her harbouring a traitor, and was proved only by this infamous witness, yet the judge charged the jury to bring her in guilty; pretending that the maid was a second witness, though she knew nothing of that which was the criminal part. She was condemned and burnt, as the law directs in the case of women convicted of treason. She died with a constancy, even to cheerfulness, that struck all that saw it. She said charity was a part of her religion as well as faith: this at worst was the feeding an enemy: so she hoped she had her reward with him for whose sake she did this service, how unworthy soever the person was, that made so ill a return for it. She rejoiced that God had honoured her to be the first that suffered by fire this reign; and that her suffering was a martyrdom for that religion which was all love. Penn, the Quaker, told me, he saw her die. She laid the straw about her for burning her speedily, and behaved herself in such a manner, that all the spectators melted into tears."

She was executed at Tyburn, Oct. 23, 1685, and delivered the following paper, written with her own hand, to Captain Richardson, then keeper of Newgate.

"Not knowing whether I shall be suffered, or able, because of weaknesses that are upon me, through my close imprisonment, to speak at the place of execution, I have written these few lines to signify, that I am reconciled to the ways of God towards me; though it be in ways I looked not for, and by terrible things, yet in righteousness: for having given me life, he ought to have the disposing of it, when and where he pleases to call for it; and I desire to offer up my all to him, it being but my reasonable service; and also the first terms Christ offers, that he that will be his disciple, 'must forsake all and follow him.' Therefore let none think it hard, or be discouraged at what hath happened unto me, for he doth nothing without cause, he being 'holy in all his ways and righteous in all his works;' and it is but my lot in common with poor desolate Zion at this day. Neither do I find in my heart the least regret for any thing I have done in the service of my Lord and Master Jesus Christ, in securing and succouring any of his poor sufferers that have shown favour, as I thought, to his righteous cause; which cause though it be now trampled on, yet may revive, and God may plead in it at another rate, more than ever he hath yet done, with all its opposers and malicious haters. Therefore let all that love and fear him, not omit the least duty that offers, knowing that now Christ has need of them, and expects they should serve him. And I desire to bless his holy name, that he hath made me useful in my generation, to the comfort and relief of many desolate ones; 'That the blessing of those that were ready to perish, hath come upon me;' and I have helped 'to make the heart of the widow to sing.' And I desire to bless his holy name, that in all this, together with what I was charged with, I can approve my heart to him, that I have done his will, though it doth cross man's. The Scriptures which satisfy me are, Isa. xvi, 3, 4, 'Hide the outcast; bewray not him that wandereth; be a covert to them from the face of the spoiler;' and Obad. xiv, 'Neither shouldest thou have delivered up those of his that did remain in the day of distress.' But men say you must give them up, or you shall die for it. Now, who to obey, judge ye. So that I have cause to rejoice in that I suffer for righteousness' sake; and that God hath accepted my service, which hath been done in sincerity, though mixed with manifold infirmities, which he hath been pleased, for Christ's sake, to cover and forgive. And now, concerning my crime, as it is called: alas! it was but a little one, and might well become a prince to forgive: but he that shows no mercy shall find none; and I may say of it, in the language of Jonathan, 'I did but taste a little honey, and lo! I must die for it.' I did but relieve an unworthy, poor, distressed family, and lo! I must die for it. Well, I desire, in the lamb-like nature of the gospel, to forgive those that are concerned, and to say, 'Lord, lay it not to their charge.' But I fear, nay, I believe, when he comes to make inquisition for blood, mine will be found at the door of the furious judge*, who, because I could not remember things, through my dauntedness at Burton's wife and daughter's witness, and my ignorance, took advantage thereat, and would not hear me when I called to mind that which I am sure would have invalidated their evidence. And though he granted something of the same kind to another, he denied it me. At that time my blood will also be found at the door of the unrighteous jury, who found me guilty upon the single oath of an outlawed man, for there was none but his oath about the money, who was no legal witness though he be pardoned, his outlawry not being reversed, the law requiring two witnesses in point of treason. And then about my going with him to the place mentioned, viz. the Hope; it was, according to his own evidence, before he could be outlawed, for it was about two months after his absconding; so that he was in proclamation, yet not high treason, as I am informed, whereby, I am clearly murdered. Also Mr. Atterbury, who hath so unsatiably hunted after my blood, and who left no stone unturned, as I have ground to believe, till he brought it to this, and showed favour to Burton, who ought to have died for his own fault, and not to have bought his life with mine. Also Capt. Richardson, who is cruel to all under my circumstances, and who did, without any mercy or pity, hasten my sentence, and held up my hand that it might be given: all which, together with the great one of all†, by whose power all these, and multitudes more cruelties are committed, I do heartily and freely forgive, as against me; but as it is done in an implacable mind against the Lord Christ, and his righteous cause and followers, I leave it to him who is the avenger of all such wrong, 'Who will tread upon princes as upon mortar, and be terrible to the kings of the earth.' And know this also, that though you are seemingly fixed, and because of the power in your hands, are weighing out your violence, and dealing with a spiteful mind, because of the old and new hatred, by impoverishing and every way distressing those under you; yet, unless you can secure Jesus Christ, and all his holy angels, your hand shall never accomplish your enterprizes; for he will be upon you ere you are aware; and therefore, that you may be wise, instructed, and learn, is the desire of her that finds no mercy from you.—Elizabeth Gaunt.

* Of this excellent work, a new edition is in the Press, to which will be prefixed a Life of the Author: it will be handsomely printed in demy 18mo. price 2s. 6d.

"P.S. Such as it is, you have from the hand of her who hath done as she could, and is sorry she can do no better; hopes you will pity and consider, and cover weaknesses, and any thing that is wanting, and begs that none may be weakened or stumble by my lowness of spirit, for God's design is to humble and abase, 'that he alone may be exalted in that day:' and I hope he will appear in the needful time and hour, and it may be, reserve the best wine till the last, as he hath done for some before me. 'None goes a warfare at his own charges,' and the Spirit blows not only where, but when it listeth: and it becomes me, who have so often grieved it, and quenched it, and resisted it, to wait for and upon its motions, and not to murmur; but I may mourn, because through the want of it, I honour not my God, nor his blessed cause, which I have so long loved, and delight to serve; and repent of nothing about it, but that I have served it and him no better."

The author of the "Display of Tyranny," begins his remarks upon the trial of this good woman thus: "Were my pen (says he) qualified to represent the due character of this excellent woman, it would be readily granted, that she stood most deservedly entitled to an eternal monument of honour, in the hearts of all sincere lovers of the reformed religion. All true Christians, though in some things differing in persuasion from her, found in her a universal charity, and sincere friendship, as is well known to many here, and also to a multitude of the Scotch nation, ministers and others, who for conscience sake were thrust into exile by prelatic rage. These found in her a most refreshing refuge. She dedicated herself with unwearied industry to provide for their supply and support; and therein I do incline to think, she outstripped every individual person (if not the whole body of Protestants) in this great city. Hereby she became exposed to the implacable fury of the bloody Papists, and those blind tools who co-operated to promote their accursed designs; and so there appeared little difficulty to procure a jury, as there were well-prepared judges, to make her a sacrifice as a traitor to holy church." Death of the Rev. Robert Winter, D.D.

This venerable servant of Christ terminated his useful labours in the church, on Friday, Aug. 9. After officiating as usual at his chapel in London, on Lord's day, Aug. 4, by preaching twice and administering the Lord's Supper, having taken an affectionate leave of his people, he left town for Tunbridge Wells on the Tuesday, and that place on Thursday for Hastings, where he arrived in the evening. Having taken some refreshment at an inn, he secured lodgings on the beach for himself, Mrs. Winter, and a friend, purposing to remain about two weeks at Hastings, and to proceed thence to Brighton, Gosport, and Romsey. The Doctor appeared to be in his usual health on the 9th: the sea air appeared to refresh his spirits, and a ride he took in the afternoon seemed very gratifying to him. In the evening he went out with the intention of taking a warm bath; but he was seized with a violent attack of disease as he entered the establishment. Medical assistance was immediately procured, but every means employed was inefficient and without avail: it was the messenger of God to call him to himself; and he entered into the joy of his Lord about ten minutes before nine o'clock. The Rev. W. Davis, the Dissenting minister at Hastings, hastened to his lodgings; but he was too late to meet the dying greetings of this faithful servant of Christ.

CONSTANTINOPLE FROM THE BOSPHORUS, WITH THE MOSQUE OF ST. SOPHIA.

ST. SOPHIA, AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

St. Sophia at Constantinople is one of the most magnificent structures in the world. For more than a thousand years Christian worship was celebrated upon this spot. but since the taking of the city by the Turks, A.D. 1453, it has been desecrated as a Turkish mosque. It is said to be capable of containing 100,000 persons, and it is held in the highest veneration by the Turks, so that the Sultan goes to it every Friday, the Sabbath of the Mohammedans.

Constantine the Great built two churches at Constantinople, one of which he named Irene, and the other he called The Apostles'. Socrates, a Greek historian of the fifth century, says, "The emperor (Constantine) built the Great Church, which is now called Sophia. It was joined to that church called Irene, which, being before a little one, the emperor's father (Constantine) had very much beautified and enlarged. And both of them are to be seen at this present time, encompassed within one and the same wall, and called by the name of one church."

St. Sophia was twice burnt down, but the present edifice was erected by Justinian: the description of which, we shall give in the words of Gibbon: "The principal church, which was dedicated by the founder of Constantinople to St. Sophia, or the Eternal Wisdom, had been twice destroyed by fire; after the exile of John Chrysostom, and during the Nika of the blue and green factions. No sooner did the tumult subside, than the Christian populace deplored their sacrilegious rashness; but they might have rejoiced in the calamity, had they foreseen the glory of the new temple, which, at the end of forty days, was strenuously undertaken by the piety of Justinian The ruins were cleared away, a more spacious plan was described, and as it required the consent of some proprietors of ground, they obtained the most exorbitant terms from the eager desires and timorous conscience of the monarch. Anthemius formed the design, and his genius directed the hands of ten thousand workmen, whose payment in pieces of fine silver was never delayed beyond the evening. The emperor himself, clad in a linen tunic, surveyed each day their rapid progress, and encouraged their diligence by his familiarity, his zeal, and his rewards. The new cathedral of St. Sophia was consecrated by the patriarch, five years eleven months and ten days from the first foundation; and in the midst of the solemn festival, Justinian exclaimed, with devout vanity, "Glory be to God, who hath thought me worthy to accomplish so great a work! I have vanquished thee, O Solomon!" But the pride of the Roman Solomon, before twenty years had elapsed, was humbled by an earthquake, which overthrew the eastern part of the dome. Its splendour was again restored by the perseverance of the same prince; and in the thirty-sixth year of his reign, Justinian celebrated the second dedication of a temple, which remains, after twelve centuries, a stately monument of his fame.

"The architecture of St. Sophia, which is now converted into the principal mosch, has been imitated by the Turkish Sultans; and that venerable pile continues to excite the fond admiration of the Greeks, and the more rational curiosity of European travellers. The eye of the spectator is disappointed by an irregular prospect of half domes and shelving roofs; the western front, the principal approach, is destitute of simplicity and magnificence; and the scale of dimensions has been much surpassed by several of the Latin cathedrals. But the architect, who first erected an aerial cupola, is entitled to the praise of bold design and skilful execution. The dome of St. Sophia, illuminated by four-and-twenty windows, is formed with so small a curve, that the depth is equal to only one-sixth of its diameter: the measure of that diameter is one hundred and fifteen feet, and the lofty centre, where a crescent has supplanted the cross, rises to the perpendicular height of one hundred and eighty feet above the pavement. The circle, which encompasses the dome, lightly reposes on four strong arches, and their weight is firmly supported by four massy piles, whose strength is assisted on the northern and southern sides by four columns of Egyptian granite. A Greek cross, inscribed in a quadrangle, represents the form of the edifice; the exact breadth is two hundred and forty-three feet; and two hundred and sixty-nine may be assigned for the extreme length, from the sanctuary in the east, to the nine western doors which open in the vestibule, and from thence into the narthex, or exterior portico. That portico was the humble station of the penitents. The nave or body of the church was filled by the congregation of the faithful; but the two sexes were prudently distinguished, and the upper and lower galleries were allotted for the more private devotion of the women. Beyond the northern and southern piles, a balustrade, terminated on either side by the thrones of the emperor and the patriarch, divided the nave from the choir: and the space, as far as the steps of the altar, was occupied by the clergy and singers. The altar itself was placed in the eastern recess, artificially built in the form of a demi-cylinder; and this sanctuary communicated by several doors with the sacristry, the vestry, the baptistry, and the contiguous buildings, subservient either to the pomp of worship, or the private use of the ecclesiastical ministers. The memory of past calamities inspired Justinian with a wise resolution, that no wood, except for the doors, should be admitted into the new edifice; and the choice of the materials was applied to the strength, the lightness, or the splendour of the respective parts. The solid piles, which sustained the cupola, were composed of huge blocks of freestone, hewn into squares and triangles, fortified by circles of iron, and firmly cemented by the infusion of lead and quick lime; but the weight of the cupola was diminished by the levity of its substance, which consists either of pumice-stone, that floats in the water, or of bricks from the isle of Rhodes, five time less ponderous than the ordinary sort. The whole frame of the edifice was constructed of brick; but those materials were concealed by a crust of marble; and the inside of St. Sophia, the cupola, the two larger, and the six smaller semi-domes, the walls, the hundred columns, and the pavement, delight even the eyes of barbarians with a rich and variegated picture. A poet, who beheld the primitive lustre of St. Sophia, enumerates the colours, the shades, and the spots of ten or twelve marbles, jaspers, and porphyries, which nature had profusely diversified, and which were blended and contrasted, as it were, by a skilful painter. The triumph of Christ was adorned with the last spoils of paganism; but the greater part of these costly stones was extracted from the quarries of Asia Minor, the isles and continent of Greece, Egypt, Africa, and Gaul. Eight columns of porphyry, which Aurelian had placed in the temple of the sun, were offered by the piety of a Roman matron; eight others of green marble were presented by the ambitious zeal of the magistrates of Ephesus; both are admirable by their size and beauty; but every order of architecture disclaims their fantastic capitals. A variety of ornaments and figures was curiously expressed in mosaic; and the images of Christ, of the Virgin, of saints, and of angels, which have been defaced by Turkish fanaticism, were dangerously exposed to the superstition of the Greeks. According to the sanctity of each object, the precious metals were distributed in their leaves or in solid masses. The balustrade of the choir, the capitals of the pillars, the ornaments of the doors and galleries, were of gilt bronze; the spectator was dazzled by the glittering aspect of the cupola; the sanctuary contained 40,000 pounds weight of silver; and the holy vases and vestments of the altar were of the purest gold, enriched with inestimable gems. Before the structure of the church had risen two cubits above the ground, 45,200*l.* were already consumed; and the whole expense amounted to 320,000*l.*; each reader, according to the measure of his belief, may estimate their value either in gold or silver; but the sum of 1,000,000*l.* sterling is the result of the lowest computation. A magnificent temple is a laudable monument of national taste and religion, and the enthusiast who entered the dome of St. Sophia, might be tempted to suppose that it was the residence or even the workmanship of the Deity. Yet how dull is the artifice, how insignificant is the labour, if it be compared with the formation of the vilest insect that crawls upon the surface of the temple!"

In Constantinople alone, and the adjacent suburbs, Justinian dedicated no less than twenty-five churches to the honour of Christ, the Virgin, and the saints; most of which were decorated with marble and gold; and their various situations were skilfully chosen in a populous square, or a pleasant grove; on the margin of the sea-shore, or on some lofty eminence which overlooked the continents of Europe and Asia. From these statements it will appear how generally Christianity was professed in the sixth century. But few of the ministers of these and other splendid buildings were distinguished by their evangelical purity of doctrine and apostolic zeal. John Chrysostom was by far the most eminent; but of that eloquent, pious, and zealous father we cannot here speak; we must reserve a place for his memoirs in our ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY.

WISDOM AND COURAGE.

THE difference between men of wisdom and heroes, is generally that between wisdom and courage. Wisdom prevents evil, courage removes it. The benefits of wisdom, though superior and more extensive, are often unperceived and without applause; while those of courage are palpable, and attended with glory, in proportion to the evils which the folly of that courage may perhaps have given birth to.

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. VI.—THE FAITHFULNESS OF GOD.

Self-Denial, though painful and difficult, is a duty which the Christian is called upon to put in practice every day. The history of the church, from its first ages, is the history of those who have been content to forego the enjoyments of sense and the pleasures which this world spreads invitingly before them, for the purpose of pleasing an Invisible Being, who has declared that such a course of conduct shall be rewarded in a future state of existence. When the Almighty revealed himself to Abraham, and informed him of the glorious inheritance which he had prepared for him, we find that self-denial stood prominent in the conditions required; insomuch that it could not have been his portion to enter the promised land, and become the father of the faithful, had he refused to forsake the land of his nativity, where his wealth had been amassed and his life spent, and become a wanderer on the earth, at that time of life when rest is needed and expected. How could Moses have been fit to hold the important station of ruler of the Jewish people, had he listened to the invitations of the Egyptian princess, and consented to be called her son, and the probable heir to the throne of Egypt? He willingly undertook to bear the reproach of God's people, and endure the privations and sorrows under which they were groaning, rather than purchase a glittering but specious happiness at the price of his integrity, and in violation of the duty which he owed to God and his people.

And as we advance nearer to our own times, and call to mind the doings of those holy men, who were commissioned by the Saviour to spread the knowledge of salvation, can we refuse to confess that they gave up all prospects of wealth, power, ease, or affluence in this world, and underwent sufferings and sorrows which beggar description and surpass imagination, that they might perform the commandment of their once despised but now glorified though unseen Master, by spreading the knowledge of his salvation through the benighted kingdoms of this earth? Neither was there less self-denial manifested in those pious men, who by God's help diffused the true light of revelation over our own land, having dispersed the gloomy clouds of a cruel and bigoted superstition, through whose influence darkness covered the land and gross darkness the people. They marched to the stake—they shrunk not from the fire—they retracted not their sayings, and proclaimed with their dying breath the truth of the doctrines for which they suffered.

And does not the very word faith imply self-denial? Does it not require those who march under its banner to lead a life of expectation?—to forego much that is beauteous and gay?—to endure many a smile and many a sneer, that they may enjoy a more glorious world, where the things long hoped for on earth, and sought after and prayed for, shall have become substance, and where the triumphant shout of the redeemed of the Lord shall fully prove that they did right in depending on the evidence of faith as to these once unseen but now present glories? And what is the motive which is strong enough to induce men to endure all these things? I think it is quite clear that nothing could occasion such a course of conduct, but a firm conviction that He that has promised is faithful, and also able to do it. According to the admonition of our Saviour, they are disposed to care but little for the puny threats and oppositions of him whose utmost force and violence cannot reach beyond this frail tenement of clay, while all fear and all honour are rendered to Him, who when the passing scenes of time shall be closed up for ever, will exert a power and influence over the soul, which the growing ages of eternity can neither weaken nor impair.

Having said thus much by way of introduction, it will be well, before I proceed further, to define the Scripture meaning of the Faithfulness of God. It consists in that infinite perfection of his nature, whereby he infallibly fulfils all his wise designs, according to the promises and declarations contained in his revealed word. There are two remarks concerning the Faithfulness of God, which may tend to illustrate it more fully.

1. He never changes his purpose. The grand object, as it seems to me, which the Almighty has ever had in view, is to punish wickedness and reward holiness. Who can read the chilling denouncements of the Mosaic law without perceiving, that while honour and happiness were promised to obedience, misery and wretchedness were to be the portion of disobedience? And therefore whenever the creatures of earth set at defiance the will of their Maker, he fails not to inflict on them the threatened chastisement. We shall find, I think, that all the plans of the Deity keep this one object in view; which is in fact what might have been expected from a moral Governor of the world, whose chief design must be to encourage obedience and suppress rebellion. A little consideration will show, that this view of the case affords a key to the comprehension of many things otherwise hard to be understood. God is sometimes said "to repent," "to turn again;" and the words seem to imply some change in the purposes of the Deity, or his mode of dispensation. If however we keep in view what has been just asserted, it will be quite manifest, that since the objects of threatened vengeance have changed their behaviour, the conduct of the Almighty towards them must also change, while at the same time he does but fulfil his original intention of frowning on sinfulness and smiling on virtue. The curse which went forth over Nineveh, and doomed its crowded population to sudden and dreadful destruction, was denounced against sinful Nineveh: but Nineveh repented, and therefore it was that the curse could not be inflicted, because the object of Divine displeasure had taken shelter under the promises of mercy held forth to the returning penitent. Now let us extend these remarks to ourselves; and how soon shall we put to flight all those vain and unfounded excuses, whereby we endeavour to defer the day of repentance, in consequence of some supposed or expected unknown decree of the Almighty, which we imagine will in due time force us to repent. Oh! away with a thought so unscriptural and so unnatural; and rest satisfied of this, that the Deity cannot be concerned in keeping you in sin, and that the sooner you return and repent, the more pleasing it will be in his sight. He has declared that mercy shall flow to the penitent; and though the bright luminary which affords light and heat to many a world were to be extinguished, and all that vast multitude of stars which adorn the arch of the skies were to fall from their spheres, and though darkness drear and interminable should shroud the once brilliant canopy of heaven, yet shall that promise of mercy be sure and unshaken.

2. He is quite independent of man. Ridicule and scorn are but idle weapons, when they are directed against the Deity; and all the machinations of mankind weak and unfounded when they are intended to overthrow the plans of the Omnipotent. There is a great degree of force in the words, "though hand join in hand, yet shall not the wicked be unpunished." They seem to treat with contempt all the impious efforts of the scorner, and shake to the ground his refuge of lies. The establishment of this point is one of no little moment. Men are apt to view things under the delusive aspect of present appearances; and because the smile of joy lights up the countenance of the ungodly, and prosperity attends his every project, are inclined to believe that God is unmindful of his people, or unable to overthrow his enemies. No sudden destruction seems to follow the sinner. His course through life appears calm and tranquil: and the conclusion but too frequently follows, that his passage to eternity will be marked with the same features of composure. Some such speculation as this was foreseen in apostolic days, and called forth the prophetic spirit of St. Peter. Scoffers, he predicted, should arise in the latter days, who, seeing that the face of nature wore the same lovely aspect that it did when first framed by the Almighty, and being unable to discern about it any marks of change or alteration, would rashly conclude that the conflagration so awfully predicted — the roaring of the sea and the darkening of the sun — were events not at all likely to come about. And some such a spirit of disbelief abounds in our own days. We should therefore be cautious lest we err in our decisions. What God has threatened, must come to pass; and however appearances may seem to oppose such a conclusion, the Christian is bound to receive it. Let us not, therefore, limit the Almighty to any time that we shall fix: let us not presume to suppose ourselves competent to decide under what circumstances it would be right for him to fulfil his long-expected threatenings. Be it rather ours humbly to acknowledge, that "He is faithful that hath promised."

THE BEAUTIES OF CHRISTIANITY.

Moral Virtues.

It is impossible to form a correct estimate of the excellence of objects which live, as it were, with us, unless we measure them by a standard of other times and manners.

Most of the ancient philosophers have marked the distinction between vices and virtues, but how far superior, in this respect, is the wisdom of religion to the wisdom of men! And what were the virtues so highly recommended by the sages of Greece? Fortitude, temperance, and prudence. None but Christ could teach the world that faith, hope, and charity, are the virtues alike adapted to the ignorance and the wants of man. Stupendous wisdom pointed out to us faith as the source of all the virtues: there is no power but in conviction; if a train of reasoning is strong, it is because we are convinced of its truth. Friendship, patriotism, love, all the generous sentiments, are likewise a species of faith. Shall we mention the martyrs, who, to use the words of St. Ambrose, "without armies, vanquished tyrants, tamed lions, took from the fire its vehemence, and from the sword its edge?" Considered in this point of view, faith is so formidable an instrument that it would convulse the world, were it applied to bad purposes: there is nothing that a man who is under the influence of a profound conviction is not capable of performing. This proves that the most eminent virtues, when separated from God, closely border on the greatest vices. Virtues are not virtues, unless they flow back towards their source. From faith, springs all the virtues of society; since it is the unanimous acknowledgment of all wise men, that the doctrine which commands the belief in a God who will reward and punish, is the main pillar both of morals and politics. Finally, if you employ faith for its genuine purpose, if you make it the intellectual eye, by which you discover the Creator and the wonders of spiritual existence, you will admit that the Scriptures have not too highly extolled this virtue, when speaking of the wonders it can perform.

Hope, the second theological virtue, is almost as powerful as faith. Desire is the parent of power. "Seek," says Jesus, "and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you;" in the same sense, Pythagoras, an ancient philosopher, observed, "Power dwelleth with necessity." Hope possesses that energy which produces, and that thirst which is never appeased. There is, however, an essential difference between faith and hope. Faith has its focus out of ourselves, it arises from an external object: hope, on the contrary, springs within us. The former is instilled into us; the latter is produced by our own desire; the one is obedience, the other love. But hope exhibits a peculiar characteristic in its connection with our sorrows. That religion which made a virtue of hope, was assuredly revealed by Heaven. This nurse of the unfortunate watches by his solitary pillow, and refreshes him with a beverage which soothes all his woes. Hope is a virtue rigorously required of the Christian; nay, more, he shall be rewarded for having hoped; or, in other words, for having made himself happy. The believer, whose life is a continual warfare, is treated by religion, in his defeat, like the vanquished Roman generals, who, notwithstanding their misfortunes, were received in triumph, because they had not despaired of the safety of the Commonwealth; and if the ancients ascribed something marvellous to the man who never despaired, what would they have thought of the Christian who talks of the practice of hope?

With respect to charity, it may be said, that religion, with a view to reform the human heart, has invented a new passion. In order to express it, she has not employed the word love, which is not grave enough; or friendship, which ceases at the tomb; or pity, which is too much akin to pride; but the word charity, which embraces all the three, and at the same time is allied to something celestial. By means of this, our inclinations are purified and directed towards heaven. By this we are taught the stupendous truth, that we should love one another. But if charity is a completely Christian virtue, it is also in close alliance with nature. It is in this continual harmony between heaven and earth, that we discover the character of true religion. The moral and political institutions of antiquity, are often in contradiction to the sentiments of the soul: Christianity, on the contrary, enjoins not solitary virtues, but such as are derived from our wants, and useful to mankind. Charity is an abundant fountain in the deserts of life: "it suffereth long and is kind, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil, beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things."

SUN-SET AT SEA.

This evening we were gratified with one of those magnificent scenes which attend the setting sun in the tropical latitudes. Such brilliancy and such variety of colours, such delicacy in the tints, such grandeur in the clouds, such majesty in the long heaving swell of the sea, such serenity in the sky, such softness in the gentle breeze, formed altogether a scene so truly sublime, that it was impossible to behold it without feelings of reverential admiration and delight; for such a scene

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXXVI.

On the Acquisition of Living Languages.

Dear Madam,

Upon the acquisition of Greek, Latin, arithmetic, and mathematics, I need not attempt to offer to you any directions. I have informed you where they may be acquired by the best mode and in the highest perfection. Still, however, you will perhaps do me the favour to accept some observations upon the acquisition of what are called the living languages, or the languages spoken at the present day by the different nations of the earth.

Of these, the languages spoken on the continent, and especially the French language, come most usually under the denomination.

It is generally deemed an indispensable portion of education that a child should know something of the latter. There is however more of fashion than of utility in this recommendation: yet utility ought surely to be the rule of conduct to any reasonable being. The plain question therefore is, of what use is it that your child should be taught the French language? No one will urge as a reason, merely that he may be able to use and to understand the few French words which have become current in our language. If he is to become a tradesman, such words as ennui, au desespoir, degagée, &c. &c. &c. will be perfectly ridiculous in his conversation; and if he is to become a scholar, he will not condescend to use them.

The most legitimate reason for desiring to understand French is, to become acquainted with the ideas comprised in the most celebrated writers of the French nation. The books, however, of French literature really worth reading have chiefly been translated. If your son is to be a tradesman, these will be quite sufficient for his use. With regard to those which it is desirable to the scholar to peruse in the original language, such as the mathematicians, &c. they may be read and understood by a person not able to pronounce French; and the question of attempting to learn the pronunciation, supposing some knowledge of the language to be needed, is what I have now chiefly in view. You will not urge the possibility that in one or other capacity your son may be called upon to travel. The business of education does not provide for such remote and faint possibilities. Besides, should he ever travel, he will find that there is not a town in Flanders, or in France, and perhaps Germany and Switzerland, in which the waiter of the hotel does not understand English. If he is to travel as a scholar, he will find that the waiter's English will be enough so far, and that the literati of France understand Latin and speak it with fluency; and that with the exception of the French pronunciation of Latin, which he may learn in half an hour, he already possesses a mode of communication with these persons, better than such a knowledge of the vernacular language as falls to the lot of most Englishmen could have supplied.

If, however, in consequence of remaining in France for any length of time, it may ever be needful to your son to study the language, he will there have the best opportunity. He will find in every part of the continent a well-educated Frenchman, who teaches his native language. By him, he will be directed as to the quantity of grammar it is needful for him to study; and by the aid of actual conversation with his preceptor and with the natives, he will acquire a greater knowledge of the language, than by whole years spent in the study of it under an Englishman, or even a Frenchman in England.

We know how imperfectly the foreigner, who has learned English under every advantage, is acquainted with our language: what then must be the imperfection of French learnt from an Englishman? Yet boys and girls at school are perpetually learning French by this method. If indeed some native of France is the teacher, yet how rarely is he a Parisian; and if not, since we know that there is as much difference in the pronunciation of French between the different provinces of France as there is between the English in London and English in Lancashire and Cornwall, what security have you that the French of the native teacher could be intelligible to Parisians; especially when to his own provincialisms of accent and pronunciation, there be added the native intractability of English organs to pronounce the French language, on the part of the pupil? Yet time and money are wasted as a matter of fashion upon this useless acquisition. I say useless, for when an Englishman instructed by these means sets his foot in France, he of course tries to turn his acquired stores of information to some account. Soon however he finds something indescribably different in a Parisian pronunciation even of the same words. He has been accustomed to hear the words pronounced slowly and distinctly by his French instructor; now he finds them pronounced with a freedom of the native organs, which gives the conversation of Frenchmen the appearance of peculiar rapidity. He is as much at a loss, nearly, as if he had never heard or seen a word of French in all his life. He then tries English, and finds that the waiter and the landlord of the inn speak better English than he can speak French. He then confesses, that the difference is little between the man who knows not one word of the language before coming to France, and the man who has thought that he had known something about it; that difference being on the side of the man who was clearly ignorant, in proportion as mere ignorance is better than ill habits and perversion. The case of the one is a sheet of white paper, upon which any thing may be written; that of the other a sheet preoccupied with stains and scrawls. The time and the money, then, paid for learning French may well be spared. In the case of the young tradesman, he will have more time to learn what will really be useful; and in the case of the boy who is intended for a learned profession, he will be able to pay, what is so valuable, an undivided attention to the studies of his school. Under the guidance of these principles, you must never be ashamed to confess that your son knows nothing of French; and instruct him, by precept and example, to be ready to make the same acknowledgment. Let him be acquainted with all the knowledge essential to his business or profession; and if to these he adds a knowledge of his religion, I have the high authority of Lord Bacon for saying that no man ought to be required to know more.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

ON KNOWLEDGE.

"That the soul be without knowledge is not good."

The influence of literature on the destiny of man is of unquestionable importance. Books are the best, the noblest monuments of all nations; and ages cannot transmit to ages any inheritance so valuable as the thoughts and productions of men of talent.

Knowledge is that which, next to virtue, truly and essentially raises one man above another: it finishes one half of the human soul: it makes existence pleasant to us, and administers a perpetual series of gratification. It gives ease to solitude, and grace to retirement.

LECTURE VI.

"GIVE US THIS DAY OUR DAILY BREAD."

Teacher. There is a great difference between the Bible and every other book; and indeed that cannot be wondered at, seeing that God is the author of the Bible, while man is the author of every other book in the world; therefore there must be a vast difference between the production or work of a finite being and an infinite being, between the work of God and the work of man.

Why may it be expected that there should be a vast difference between the Bible and every other book?—Because holy men, inspired of God, wrote the Bible; and men, by their imperfect wisdom, wrote every other book in the world.

Teacher. One great thing which may be remarked in the Bible is this, that the Bible often speaks of two things at once; it often speaks of the wants of the body and of the wants of the soul at the same time; and in the prophecies, it often foretels two things at the same time.

What peculiarity, or what great thing in particular may be remarked in the Bible?—That it often speaks of two things at once.

Teacher. Now this is the case with this part of the Lord's prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread;" it refers to the wants of the body, and also to the wants of the soul: I spoke last Sunday concerning the wants of the body, I shall therefore now speak concerning the wants of the soul.

What do we ask God to do for our souls, when we say, "Give us this day our daily bread?"—To give us the blessings of grace by the Holy Spirit.

Teacher. The soul wants food as well as the body; and as bread keeps alive the body, so does the grace of the Holy Spirit cherish, quicken, or keep alive the Christian's soul; inasmuch as the soul of man is naturally "dead in trespasses and sins."

What is the bread of the soul?—The grace of the Holy Spirit.

What does bread do for the body?—It keeps it alive, strengthens, and comforts it.

What does the grace of the Holy Spirit do for the soul?—It keeps it alive, overcomes its corruptions; it strengthens and comforts the soul in all its powers.

Teacher. The blessings and grace of the Holy Spirit, as the Scripture clearly states, may be possessed by all who choose to pray for them (Isa. lv, 1; Rev. xxii, 17), and we pray God, when we say, "Take not thy Holy Spirit from us," or, "Give us this day our daily bread," not on account of our sins to shut us up to condemnation, but still to allow us to come to the fountain of life, where we may be washed from our sins, and where we may obtain strength and comfort.

Who may obtain the Holy Spirit?—All.

How may we obtain the Holy Spirit?—By asking God to send him into our hearts through Christ.

Who obtained the Holy Spirit for us?—Jesus Christ.

In what words did Jesus promise the Holy Spirit to his disciples?—"And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever, even the Spirit of truth." John xiv, 16.

This promise was made by Christ to his disciples: how do we know that the Holy Spirit was obtained by Christ for us also?—Because it is declared to be for all persons, in all ages (Acts ii, 38, 39), "And ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost; for the promise is unto you and to your children, and to all that are afar off."

What is the Holy Ghost to do for us?—To take away the burthen of our sins and make us holy, to comfort those who feel their sins to be a burthen, and to strengthen us to fight against the world, the flesh, and the devil.

Teacher. Then if you wish to be saved from hell, you must pray to God to give you his Holy Spirit, who only can make you fit to live with a holy God in heaven. C. R. A.

AN ECCENTRIC CHARACTER.

"By their fruits ye shall know them."

"We last week recorded the death of Mr. Isaac Coverdale, of Hawsker, near Whitby, farmer, aged eighty-seven years. For the last fourteen or fifteen years, this remarkable individual had constantly lain in bed, not from any infirmity or weakness, but from choice. He was fond of reading, and amused himself with books and newspapers; visitors generally found his bed covered with these articles. Being of a cheerful, conversable disposition, he was frequently visited both by his neighbours and strangers, and was, consequently, better acquainted with the news of the day than most of those who made greater use of their powers of locomotion. At the late election for the borough of Whitby, he was prevailed upon to leave his bed, and was taken to the poll-booth in a carriage to give his vote."—Hull Advertiser.

A USEFUL CHARACTER.

"On the 5th instant (July), at Sunderland, died John White, Esq. aged sixty-nine. For eighteen years he enjoyed salvation by faith, and was possessed with an unusual interest in the distribution of tracts and other religious books suitable to the poor and the rising generation. At his own expense he had caused to be published seven or eight editions of suitable works, particularly one of 'Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul,' consisting of 10,000 copies. All these, besides an incalculable number of tracts, purchased at the depot in London, he gratuitously caused to be distributed. His end was not only peaceful, but triumphant, longing to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better."—Patriot.

Reflections of a most profitable kind will arise from reading the notices of the "Eccentric," as well as of the "Useful" character. How truly pitiable does an old man appear, seeking mere amusement on the borders of the grave! How unworthy "the reason of a man!" On the other hand, how truly admirable and exemplary the conduct of him, who, in the anticipation of immortal happiness through the mediation of Christ, labours, in his last days, to promote the temporal and eternal welfare of his fellow-men, by a portion of his property expended in diffusing among them the knowledge of the glorious gospel!

"Faith enables us to see love behind a cloud, and to own, that if there was mercy in the gift of prosperity, there is mercy also in its removal."

"Faith penetrates the cloud to see
God's kindness in prosperity;
Which, if in wisdom he removes,
Faith owns it mercy, and approves."

"The Bee that wanders, and sips from every flower, disposes what she has gathered into her cells."—SENECA.

ANECDOTE OF THE CELEBRATED RICHARD BAXTER.

GEORGE VILLIERS, Duke of Buckingham, an accomplished courtier, and companion of Charles II, was distinguished for his open infidelity, and the ridicule with which he treated the sacred writings. His friend, John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester, another fit companion of the same monarch, was equally remarkable for the dissoluteness of his manners, and for the pains he took to corrupt others. These two noblemen riding in the country, discovered Mr. Baxter at some distance riding towards them. The person and character of that holy man were well known to them, and they loved a joke too well to suffer the present occasion to pass without one, even though it should be at the expense of decency and good manners. Upon Mr. Baxter's approach, therefore, the peers halted, and taking off their hats with the common salutation, they very gravely inquired, 'Pray, Mr. Baxter, which is the nearest road to Hell?' The good man, though astonished and shocked at the abruptness and profanity of the question, immediately replied,

"ROCHESTER, some say,
But BUCKINGHAM'S the nearest way."

Upon receiving which answer, the two peers slunk away silenced and confounded.—Walter Wilson.

"There shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." Matt. xiii, 42. Oh! how do persons play with Scripture thunder! The Word printed, is like fire painted, which they can see and feel without fear. But could they stand at the gates of hell, and hear the damned howl, it would make their hair stand on end, and fill their hearts with horror. But what shall we say of an eternal being in that state of torment! The damnation of hell is beyond all definition; much harder to define than the Spanish Inquisition; which a painter despairing to do, did not picture one man with a knife in his throat, a second with a sword in his heart, a third with his arms torn off, but took a table and covered it all over with blood, crying out, BLOOD! BLOOD! So may a minister cry out, FIRE! FIRE! for a definition of damnation.—Waite.

Prayer.—Let prayer and endeavour be linked together. He that prays, and not endeavours, mocks God. He that endeavours, and not prays, mocks himself. Prayer is to be performed with much frequency, fervency, and solemnity.—Idem.

Take heed of praying to persons, instead of praying for them, i. e. by affected phrases, and tinkling tones. Hateful is that prayer to God, which is devised, formed, and phrased to please man: and no better are the prayers of some persons. The devil is such a chemist, he can extract evil out of good, and poison a person with his own prayers, by puffing him up with pride in them.—Idem.

Temptation.—As he that carrieth gunpowder about him had need keep far from fire; so he that carrieth corruption, had need keep far from temptation. As when children meet a horse, cart, or cow, they will (if timorous) run ten times farther out of the way than they need; so let men learn to flee from sin.—Idem.

Conformity to the World.—Beware of world-likeness. Likeness in Christians to the world in sin, causes likeness in sorrow. When the small pox, or plague rages, the reason why God puts so little difference between the Egyptians and Israel, is because Israel differs so little from Egypt. They live alike, and die alike. Some professors promise themselves safety in pestilence from this promise, viz. "A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand, but it shall not come nigh thee." Psalm xci, 7. BUT WHY? "Because thou hast made the Lord, the Most High, thy habitation." Ver. 9. That is, a dwelling in God by a holy life. It is a promise of preservation, with a condition; such as expect it without, why not salvation too, without believing?—Id.

AUSTIN, upon the answer of God to Moses, Exod. xxxiii, 20, "Thou canst not see my face and live," makes this quick and sweet reply, "Then, Lord, let me die, that I may see thy face."—Brooks.

Time.—Qu. Eliz. on her death-bed cried out, "Time! Time! a world of wealth for an inch of time."—Idem.

BISHOP ATTERBURY, in his advanced years, writes thus in a letter to Mr. Pope, "I, who squandered whole days heretofore, now husband hours, when the glass begins to run low, and care not to mispend them on trifles. At the end of the lottery of life, our last minutes, like tickets left in the wheel, rise in their valuation. They are not of so much worth perhaps in themselves, as those which preceded, but we are apt to prize them more, and with reason."

TIME is the season and opportunity of carrying on any work, and for that reason is one of the most valuable things; and yet nothing is more wastefully spent, and more prodigally squandered away by a great part of mankind than this, which, next to our immortal souls, is of all things most precious; because upon the right use or abuse of our time, our eternal happiness or misery does depend. Men have generally some guard upon themselves as to their money and estates, and will not with eyes open suffer others to rob and deprive them of them: but we will let any body almost rob us of our time, and are contented to expose this precious treasure to every body's rapine and extortion; and can quietly look on, while men thrust in their hands and take it out by whole handfuls, as if it were of no greater value than silver was in Solomon's days, no more than stones in the street. And yet, when it is gone, all the silver and gold in the world cannot purchase and fetch back the least moment of it, when perhaps we would give all the world for a very small part of that time, which we parted with upon such cheap and easy terms.—Tillotson.

Inscription on the Sepulchre of a man, who had lingered half a century in a Dungeon. Written by Mr. E. Button.

Ope, jealous portal! Ope thy cavern womb,
Thy pris'ner will not flee its close embrace;
He lived and moved too long within a tomb,
Beyond its narrow bounds to dream of space.

To eat his crust, and muse, unvarying lot,
Thus, like his beard, his life slow length'ning grew;
So long shut out, the world the wretch forgot,
His cell his universe, 'twas all he knew.

For MEMORY soon with roving pinions wheel'd
In circles less'ning each successive flight,
Her sickly wings at length enfeebled, yield,
Too weak to scale the walls that bound his sight.

But HOPE sat with him once, and cheer'd his day,
And rais'd his limbs, and kept his lamp alight;
Scared by his groans, at length she fled away,
Left him alone to spend one endless night.

What change to him, then, is this vault below,
From that where late the captive was confin'd?
But this,—a worm here feeds upon his brow,
While there, it gnawed its wasting tenant mind.

"ENOCH WALKED WITH GOD."

Guide me, O my Saviour, guide me,
In the path that Enoch trod:
From thy fulness grace provide me,
Enoch-like, to walk with God.

O the bliss of this employment!
Higher honour no man knows:
Sweetest, dearest, best enjoyment,
Flows from hence, for ever flows.

Lord! 'tis sweet to do thy pleasure:
Thy commands, how dear they be!
Dearer than the richest treasure
Is my Saviour's will to me.

Great reward and high enjoyment
Blend my duty with my zeal:
Love constrains; 'tis love's employment
Ever to obey his will.

But, though willing is my spirit,
Weak and frail this flesh I feel;
Evils many I inherit,
Hindrances to love and zeal.

Let thy grace prevail, my Saviour!
Love to God and man be mine;
Sanctify my whole behaviour;
All my heart and soul be thine!

Greater strength from Thee possessing,
Let me every moment prove
All my nature, through thy blessing,
Growing up to perfect love.

Thus the path with joy pursuing,
Saints in ages past have trod,
All my Father's pleasure doing,
Let me ever WALK WITH GOD.

HINTS ON THE PORTABLE EVIDENCE OF CHRISTIANITY,

By Joseph John Gurney. Second Edition, 18mo. cloth, pp. 194. London, Arch.

"Christianity," sceptics have said, "is not founded in argument." But if by that ambiguous phrase they mean to declare that Christianity cannot be justified in its claims to divinity by argument, it may be confidently replied, that every argument which can be applied to the subject will support it as true, and consequently divine. And no man has ever sat down to examine it seriously in the character of an unbeliever, but he has risen up convinced that it came from heaven, and that it is an unspeakable blessing from God. But no class of arguments for our holy religion are to be compared with that which is derived from experience: and this is what is intended by the title before us—The Portable Evidence of Christianity.

Mr. Gurney has rendered a new service to his countrymen by this valuable little volume, to which we give our warmest recommendation. "The subject," says our author in his preface, "naturally divides itself into two parts. In the first place, the Bible, considered alone, affords, in the purity, dignity, harmony, and practical importance, of its contents, sufficient evidences of its own divine origin. And, secondly, the accordance of the truths revealed in Scripture, with what we know in ourselves, and observe in the world around us, and more especially in the adaptation of the gospel of Christ to the condition of fallen man, supplies us with a further conclusive proof, that the Creator and moral Governor of the Universe, is the Author of the Bible."

CHRISTIAN BREATHINGS:

In a Series of Devotional Poems. By the late Mr. thaniel Biggs. 18mo. pp. 126. London.

How little can be known of that communion, w the soul of a real Christian is accustomed to hold God! Acting upon the precept of the Saviour, " thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, & to whom can he make known what his soul has t enjoyed? Nay, if it were possible, what lang could be used to describe that expansiveness of fe experienced by him who has "fellowship with Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ?" All such munications must be purely of a spiritual chara Yet it is delightful to trace the workings of a soul, w we know to have been often in the situation supp expressed in such strains as language admits. "Breathings" before us, evidently show how the of the departed author worked. The man ca traced by those who knew him, in the manner o "Breathing." He was possessed of a high to Christian feeling, and in these devotional poems feeling is carried out. We have selected one, a our readers have any relish for it, we assure them there are many more of the same character in the volume.

THE THORN IN THE FLESH. — 2 Cor. xii, 9.

What though a thorn my bosom bears,
And varied are the wants and cares
That mark my chequer'd way;
My God hath said, in whom I live,
My grace is thine, and strength I give
According to thy day.

'Tis prov'd, the glorious truth is prov'd,
Although the thorn be not remov'd,
And sufferings yet remain;
Needful they are, and wise, and good,
And if but darkly understood,
The future will explain.

Sufficient for the day the ill;
The bitter and the sweet shall still
Subserve my Lord's design:
His will be done, I love to pray;
And, chiding every doubt, I say,
O let His will be mine!

His promis'd grace and strength is given,
Let every murmuring thought be driven
For ever from my breast;
Sustain'd invisibly, but sure,
Let me the present ills endure,
And leave to Him the rest.

Enough for me that I have known
His grace and strength; — and 'tis my own,
My joy and triumph still!
From day to day my hidden meat,
And dear, and good, and passing sweet,
O'erpowering every ill.

If, then, the thorn must needs be mine,
O let me never dare repine,
Nor yet my fate deplore;
But let me bow and bless the rod,
Since Christ's own power, the power of God,
Shall rest on me the more.

INDIANS OF NORTH WEST AMERICA VISITED BY A MISSIONARY

AMERICAN INDIANS.

RISTIAN benevolence has demonstrated its heavenly
;in, by diffusing its inestimable benefits among the tched inhabitants of the most dreary regions of the :h. Greenland, Labrador, and Kamtschatka, and various tribes of the American Indians, have been ted by evangelical missionaries, with the imperishatidings of eternal salvation, and God has graciously vned their labours with success.

'ur engraving represents a missionary herald em-
:ing these degraded beings, and inviting their atten-
. to the doctrines of pardon, holiness, and everlasting by the mediation of Jesus Christ.

'orth of the boundaries of the United States, from th latitude 40° to the shores of the Frozen Sea in th latitude 70°, comprehending a space of more ı 2,000 miles, and from the Lake of the Woods in t longitude 94° to Vancouver's Island in west
;itude 126°, comprising an extent of nearly 1,500
:s, from east to west across the Rocky Mountains,
e are scattered innumerable tribes of Indians,
:ting in darkness and in the shadow of death."
Morse, an American divine, has endeavoured to enumerate them. He forms the Indian tribes into three grand divisions. I. East of the Mississippi, 120,625 persons. II. Between the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains, 179,592. III. West of the Rocky Mountains, 171,200. Total, 471,417. The whole number of tribes and branches dispersed over this vast country, he computes at 260, some of which are reduced to fifteen souls, and several are quite extinct: but others number thousands, and the Choctaws amount to 25,000. The Indian families average at five or six individuals, and their warriors are as one in three, or one in five. Besides the Choctaws, the most considerable of these Indian nations are Cherokees, Chicasaws, Chippaways, Creeks, Delawares, Mohawks, Manadans, Moskitoes, Oneidas, Osages, Ottawas, Senecas, Seminoles, Tuscaroras, &c.

The Indians have a remarkable similarity in their external appearance. Their bodies are slight, but well made: their eyes black, and their hair of the same colour, lank and straight. The cheek bones of the men are a little raised; the women have them still higher. The women are more inclined to be fat than the men, owing, it is believed, to their being less engaged in the chase. Their colour is that of copper; a colour, which, as has been frequently observed, is peculiar to the Americans. Some travellers assert that they generally have no beard: others, that this is entirely owing to the care they take to eradicate the hair from every part of their bodies except their heads. All the various tribes have a close resemblance in their dress, which, in their original state, consists entirely of furs and hides; one piece fastened round their waist, which reaches the middle of the thigh, and another larger piece thrown over the shoulders. Their stockings are of skins, fitted to the shape of the leg, the seams ornamented with porcupines' quills; their shoes of the skin of the deer, elk, or buffalo, dressed, for the most part, with the hair on: they are made to fasten about the ankles, where they have ornaments of brass or tin, about an inch long, hung by thongs. The women are all covered from the knees upwards. Their petticoats reach from their waists to the knees, and, like their shifts, are of leather. Their shoes and stockings are not different from those of the men.

Their tents or huts are composed of poles, extended below, and meeting in a point at the top: these are covered sometimes with skins, with bark, or with mats made of rushes. They are without windows, and have no chimneys but a small opening left at the top: so that, in rainy weather, the inhabitants must either be drenched in water, or almost suffocated with smoke. The same skins which by day serve them for seats, serve them for beds by night; and they are spread on the ground for that purpose, round the fire, which is in the centre.

Marriage is not unknown among the American Indians, but its sacredness is but little regarded. On the woman is devolved every domestic charge: she erects the tent, procures wood for the fire, manages the agricultural affairs, dresses the provisions, catches the fish, and makes traps for small animals; while the unfeeling husband employs himself only in the chase.

Some of the Indian tribes, we are told, however, as the Cherokees, Creeks, and Uchees, are becoming sensible of the inconveniences of savage life, and of the necessity of adopting agricultural habits, as the only means now left to prevent their total extirpation. The Cherokees especially have made great progress in the cultivation of their lands, and some of them have good plantations, and even Negro slaves; many of the women also spin and weave cotton stuff, and are improving in various respects.

Successful efforts have been made from time to time, to diffuse among these degraded beings the knowledge of Christ and the blessings of pure religion. John Eliot, deservedly called "The Apostle of the Indians," entered into a system of missionary labours to benefit these people, and continued in his work forty-four years, until the year 1690. He learned their language, and translated for them the whole Scriptures, besides several standard works of theology. Dr. Mather, in a letter dated 1687, says, "There are six churches of baptized Indians in New England, and eighteen assemblies of catechumens! Of the Indians, there are twenty-four who are preachers of the Word of God; and besides these there are four English ministers." A short time after the death of Mr. Eliot, the Doctor, in a sermon, says, "In this one province, Massachussetts, the Indians have mostly embraced the Christian religion. There are, I suppose, more than thirty congregations of Indians, and more than three thousand Indians in this one province, calling on God in Christ, and hearing his glorious word!"

The United Brethren have, from 1734, had Missionaries among the Indians in the back settlements of Philadelphia, North Carolina, Georgia, and among the Cherokees on the borders of Tenessee; but severe indeed were the trials they had to encounter here, chiefly through the wars of the Indians, as they severally took part either with the French or British. In one instance, ninety-six men, women, and children, were treacherously made prisoners by white banditti, and tomahawked in cold blood. In another instance, in 1755, eleven Missionaries, male and female, were burnt in their habitation by a troop of Indians in the French service. Several Missionaries have been sent among the Indians by "The American Board of Missions," "The American Foreign Missionary Society," "The New York Missionary Society," and "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel," in England.

"The Church Missionary Society" has undertaken a mission to the American Indians in the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company; two English clergymen in connection with the Society are stationed at the Red River, south of Lake Winnipeg. A few months after the first missionary had reached his station, he took a journey of above five hundred miles, drawn by dogs in a sledge over the snow, to visit the Indians. In this journey it was, that he had the interview represented in the engraving. He had particularly noticed a boy about seven years of age, and wished to have him as a scholar. Soon after he left the Indians, the father of the boy observed, that, as the missionary stood between the Great Spirit and the Indians,—that is, came to teach them the will of the Great Spirit—he could refuse him nothing: he accordingly sent him to the school.

The Church Missionary Report for 1831, says, "Two Indian boys, who had been brought by Governor Simpson, about four years ago, from the Rocky Mountains, and had been under the instruction of Mr. Cockran, went home on a visit to their parents. They have since returned, bringing with them five other boys: four of these are the sons of four different chieftains, the heads of four large tribes of Indians dwelling beyond the Rocky Mountains, and each of them speaking a different dialect from the others. They manifest a considerable desire to learn; and, should it please God, may become the instruments of guiding many of their countrymen to the knowledge of the true God."

Letter from an Esquimaux Indian,

Converted to Christ by the ministry of the Moravian Missionaries, by whom it was translated into the English language.

"In the presence of Jesus, I now write with pleasure to my dear brethren and sisters on the other side of the ocean.

"My dear Brethren and Sisters,

"I will now relate to you, how it is with me. I am not yet old: however, I am past youthful years; and from a child have belonged to this congregation. I there learnt to read the word of God well with my mouth, but did not understand it in my heart, and knew not Jesus. But now I know him, and his words are clear in my soul, and I experience his great love. I know that, for me, he came down from heaven; for me, he spoke saving words; for me, he prayed; and for me, sweat blood in his agony; for me, he bore his cross; for me, he suffered; for me, he died; for me, he lay in the grave; for me, he rose again; and for me, ascended into heaven, and thereby he took away my sins also. With astonishment I contemplate this his great love to my soul; and I am now determined, out of thankfulness to him, to live alone to his pleasure in this world."

THE BEAUTIES OF CHRISTIANITY.

Moral Laws.

It is a reflection, not a little mortifying to our pride, that all the maxims of human wisdom may be comprehended in a few pages, and those not free from errors. The world owes to Christianity the few good laws which it possesses. The sages of the Portico and the Academy, alternately published maxims so contradictory, that by the same writing we might infer, that the author did, and did not believe in the existence of a God. But with respect to the laws of God, as contained in the Ten Commandments, the first point which strikes us is their universality; they are the law of all nations, climates, and ages. Jehovah speaks to all mankind. In the next place, nothing can be more admirable than their simplicity and justice: with their internal energy too, is combined the majesty and the grace of forms. The Brachman slowly expresses the persons of the Deity: the name of Jehovah unites them in one—he was, he is, and he will be. Again: Israel's Sabbath is the Sabbath of God himself. The legislators of antiquity have marked their festivals; but what reference have they, like ours, to the God who created light, and marked out the course of the sun. The laws of God are as eternal as their Author: in vain do ages roll away, they are proof against the lapse of time, against persecution, and the corruption of nations. This religious legislation is an astonishing prodigy: whilst powers and forms of government pass away, a few Christians, amid all the changes of life, continue to submit to the same laws, without thinking themselves released from their ties by revolutions or adversities. What religion did not lose its influence with its priests and its sacrifices? Did not Baal fall with Babylon, and Apollo with Delphi? Christianity alone has beheld the demolition of its edifices, without being injured by their fall. Every place is the temple of the living God: both the catacomb and the cavern; but, above all, the heart of the righteous.

The Superiority of the Mosaic History.

There are truths which no person calls in question, though it is impossible to furnish any direct proofs of them. The rebellion and fall of Satan, the creation of the world, and the primitive happiness of man, are of this class. The annals of the Chinese and Scandinavians, the Negroes of Africa and the priests of India, all narrate the crimes of the evil deity, the short felicity of man, and the long calamities which followed his fall. Amid the various ancient accounts of the creation, the fables of the poets, and the groundless vagaries of philosophers, it is only in Genesis that we find the original of the different national traditions. What can be more magnificent and more consonant with reason, than the Creator descending into the realms of ancient night, and producing light by a word? The sun at his command takes his station in the heavens, man is made after the image of God, and all the angelic hosts strike their golden harps to celebrate this great work of creative love.

The Fall of Man.

Who can forbear contemplating the great truth, "man dying by reason of eating the fruit of life!" How affecting! how sublime! man undone, by having learned too well to appreciate good and evil! God placed knowledge within his reach: he could not refuse it him, since he was created intelligent and free; but he cautioned him against knowing too much, lest it should prove the death of him and his posterity. Pride borrows the voice of love to seduce him; and the prime mover of his fall was the serpent, the most subtle of all animals, that is, the one which most aptly represents Satan in his malice and artifice. Every thing is mysterious and astonishing in this incomprehensible reptile: his movements differ from all other animals; his colours, too, possess false splendour and deceitful variety; he moreover possesses the art of seducing innocence, his eyes fascinate the birds of the air: in hell he is represented arming the scourges of the furies, and eternity is typified by his spiral image.

It is a singular fact, that the appellation "man" was not given to our first parent by God, who merely called him Adam. It was not till after the fall, that Adam's posterity assumed the name of "enosh," or man (from a Hebrew word signifying "pain"), so perfectly adapted to their afflictions, and so strongly reminding them of their guilt and punishment.

In further illustration of the fall of man, and the doctrine of original sin, it has been observed, "that man is more inconceivable without this mystery, than this mystery is inconceivable to man."

LONGEVITY.

Longevity of a Married Pair.

"There is now living at Egshill-side, in the vale of Garrigill, near Alston, a venerable couple, of the names of John and Mary Martin, both in their hundred and second year, one being the senior of the other only by a few days. It is seventy-seven years since they were made 'one twain' in the holy bands of matrimony, in which time they have reared a large family of men and women. These patriarchs are both in the enjoyment of health, with their faculties unimpaired."—Newcastle Journal.

We trust this "venerable couple" are "fellow heirs of the grace of life," and their children also "joint heirs of Christ" with their exemplary parents.

Further Instances of Longevity.

From the "Patriot" Newspaper of July 31, whence we copied part of the above, we find other instances of longevity, which we transcribe for the edification of our readers.

On the 20th inst. in the ninety-second year of his age, Mr. Henry Brewerton, of East Keswick, near Harewood. He was a member of the Methodist Society for fifty-two years.

The Rev. John Bankhead, in his ninety-seventh year, having been sixty-eight years minister of Ballycarry, the eldest Presbyterian congregation in Ireland.

On the 16th inst. Christopher Barker, shoemaker, of Bedale, at the advanced age of a hundred and two. He lived a most exemplary life for sobriety and industry, and was esteemed by all who knew him.

At Brachead, parish of Methven, Janet Leslie, in the hundred and fifth year of her age. She was born at Blelock, in the parish of Auchtergarven, and lived as a servant-maid in the immediate neighbourhood.

At Blaries, frontiers of Belgium, at the advanced age of a hundred and five, M. Nicholas Collins. He carried on the trade of a brewer up to his sixtieth year, when he became a farmer, in which occupation he continued until his death.

Disquietude and perplexity of heart are worms that will certainly breed in the rust of unexercised gifts. —Owen.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXXVII.

On the Choice of Books.

Dear Madam,

Books are the instruments of education. Every quality, therefore, which we require in an instrument in general, we should also require in books: such as that they be adapted to the purpose, and the best in every respect that can be procured.

It was said by Dr. Watts, even in respect to his own time, when there were fewer books by many thousands than there are now, "more than half the books in the world are not worth reading." It was also said by the great Lord Bacon, that "there were but few books which deserved to be read through." Surely, then, the choice of books, out of the multitudes which are declared upon these high authorities to be unprofitable, must form no unimportant portion of education.

The great object seems to be, to select the best books upon any branch of study in which we are engaged. In every department there are, of course, some books, which are really the best in every respect. These best books comprise all that is valuable in perhaps most or all the inferior books upon the same subject that have ever been written: since the way books on science are written is, that by repeated improvements of one book upon another, the ultimate book is brought to a state of comparative perfection.

I believe, too, that it will be allowed, that a very few books indeed upon any branch of science, well chosen and thoroughly mastered, would render a person competently acquainted with that particular department. The question however is, how we are to know what these books are? It is perhaps comparatively in vain to resort to catalogues, &c. which profess to give an account of authors and their productions. The various interests of mankind often conduce to exaggerated and inaccurate statements of their merits. The plan which seems to promise most satisfaction is, to apply to some one of acknowledged acquirements in the particular art or science in question, and to request of him to write out a list of the best books upon the subject, sufficiently complete for the purpose of affording a complete acquaintance with it.

If, for instance, I wished to study the Spanish language, I should apply with this inquiry to some celebrated teacher of that language. If I wished to study medicine, I should apply for the same purpose to some accredited and eminent professor of that science. Having obtained information as to the list of the best books, and the order in which they should be read, I should deem myself in possession of all the means I needed, so far at least as the choice of books was concerned. Utterly neglecting all others, I should apply myself to the study of those which were thus recommended to me, and should feel certain that I had adopted the best means for procuring information. The same observations will hold with regard to whatever object of study we may choose to pursue. Indeed, half the value at least of a tutor in any art or science, is the assistance we derive from him in reference to the books which are required, and to the order in which they should be read.

Persons generally adopt a different course. They read whatever books may fall in their way, without considering whether they are worth reading; or they deem the recommendation of other persons respecting a book a sufficient reason for perusing it, without considering the qualifications for judging of it, possessed by the persons in question. These, however, are persons belonging to that numerous class, who pursue no object in their reading except amusement, or to kill the time, or to divert their recollections from other topics.

If, however, we really wish to become accomplished in any art or science, it is requisite that we select but few books, and make ourselves thoroughly acquainted with them. I have generally noticed, that the most eminent professors of any science have been able to quote at will nearly any part of their standard volumes. The ideas derived from such sources had a permanent dwelling in their minds; they could therefore habitually contemplate them, and perceive with unerring clearness their conformity to truth, and the relation of one to the other.

This is the true method of reading. It is desirable therefore that young persons generally, and indeed persons of any age who wish to make themselves acquainted with any branch of learning, that they should obtain a knowledge of the proper books, and then implicitly read them over, with such attention as almost to commit them to memory. After having been thus thoroughly accustomed to them for some months, they may expect to understand them, and the truths and arguments they thus imbibe will constitute the most solid and nutritious food to the understanding.

With regard to books generally, I presume that you will be most careful as to the true nature and character of those to which you give admission into your house. You will be quite as attentive to the books you admit, as to the articles of dress or food. You will especially be careful what books are subjected to the perusal of your offspring. You would no more think of allowing him to read books indiscriminately, than to eat any kind of viands without discrimination. Just as the quantity and quality of food need to be attended to, in order to secure health of body and activity of understanding; so the degree and the nature of the ideas submitted to the mind need to be regulated, in order to secure our progress in the acquisition of truth and wisdom.

I do not say this with reference so much to the moral as to the intellectual qualities of books. The latter are of equal importance with the former. A tedious, ill-written book, will tire and disgust the mind of your child, and will retard his improvement. A clear, well-written, complete, and concise treatise on any subject is of inestimable value.

In a word, you will make it a rule to have no inferior book upon any subject in your house; and in the selection of the best you will be guided by the advice of the ablest and most celebrated in the different branches of study.—I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

BEAUTY OF PERUVIAN SCENERY.

Feb. 1, we proceeded on a delightful summer's morning to visit an extensive grove of orange trees upon the sides of the beauteous mountains, that rise out of the fertile plains of Tucuman. The orange trees grow to a size unknown in Europe. In our ramble, we saw many full thirty feet high, and five or six feet in circumference, and laden at the same time with blossoms and fruit. Flocks of humming birds, attracted by the flowers, were to be seen displaying their exquisite plumage with infinite variety in the sun. We then wound our way through a charming wilderness, overrun with magnificent acacias: beautiful creepers in full flower, curious air-plants suspended from branches high above us, with many shrubs and flowers highly valued or unknown in other climes, here flourished disregarded in all the exuberance of nature. With truth it may be said of all this district,

> "Thy very weeds are beautiful! thy waste
> More rich than other climes' fertility."

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. VI.—THE FAITHFULNESS OF GOD.

It being my desire to render instruction as entertaining as possible, I shall now add some few cases in illustration of this attribute of God.

1. The promise of a Saviour. When our first parents rashly presumed to violate the commands imposed on them by their Maker, they brought into a once spotless world all the horrible defilements which have since darkened the pages of history and the characters of men. The Almighty, however, graciously determined, that this disobedience should not be finally ruinous, and promised the coming of a Saviour, who should more than compensate the ruins of the fall. Faint indeed were the glimmerings, and imperfect the knowledge which the first ages of mankind had of the promised Redeemer. Just enough light was preserved to point the antediluvians to the place of refuge, and many, it is hoped, fled for succour to "the hope set before them." However, the greater number apostatized from the service of the Almighty, and they at length became a world of infidels. Years of blasphemy rolled on, and the daring impiety of reckless and inconsiderate creatures seemed to invite the Lord to whet his glittering sword, and come to vengeance. And accordingly we find that at length the Divine command was given, for the waters to arise and sweep from the earth every vestige of its iniquitous inhabitants. Now it might have been thought, that in this universal deluge the promised Saviour would have been forgotten; and that He, who had so long endured the mockery of his creatures, would at length swear in his wrath that they should never enter into his rest. But no! the promise was sure, that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head; and that he, who then seemed to be lord of the ascendant, should ere long cringe beneath the irresistible power of the great Conqueror of sin and hell. The doings of mankind, even after this awful display of Divine indignation, were never such as to awaken in his heart any thing like tenderness or affection for his people. He, who ought to have been the object of each man's most ardent love, was never thought of; and every thing which creatures could do, to insult their Creator, united to induce him to leave mankind to themselves, to perish in their crimes. But nothing could alter a word gone forth from the lips of the Almighty; and in due time the Saviour came, and accomplished his mighty work: and as each Sabbath bell calls together from all parts of our land crowds of humble worshippers, it does but serve to confirm the truth of the Almighty, and establish the promises which "he has spoken by the mouths of his holy prophets, who have been since the world began."

2. The promise that the earth should not again be destroyed by water. Inattention robs many of the profit they would otherwise derive from the Scripture. A remarkable passage in them refers to the Almighty's promise, which he made to Noah when he came out of the ark. Now it is not the virtue of this second generation which has saved it from annihilation; for we, like our fathers, have sinned, we have gone astray and dealt wickedly; and the only assurance we have that the fountains of the great deep will no more be called to pour forth their mighty supply of waters, and the windows of the heavens be opened, is because the Lord has sworn that it shall not be so. O how fertile a subject is this for thankfulness and meditation! Who can pursue his evening walk, when the setting sun just casts over the earth a kind of calm and solemn light, and look around him on the landscape which spreads so richly on all sides, and hear the blithsome carol of the birds, without rejoicing in the gladness of nature, and feeling a thrill of delight in the conviction, that it will never be his lot to view this peaceful scene gradually disappearing beneath the torrent of waves, the flashings of lightning, and the pealing of thunder? Who can pass through a crowded city, and hear the hum of business, and see the intelligent faces and active movements of those who are playing their parts in the great drama of life, without lifting up a thankful tribute of praise to the Disposer of all, that he hath been pleased to assure us that these beings shall never struggle with the waves of a universal deluge, and perish amidst the shrieking and the groans of those who see the mighty waters rushing forwards to overwhelm them, but have no power of resistance or flight? O let us be glad, that the Lord who hath promised this is faithful!

3. To Abraham it was said, that his seed should be as the sand upon the sea-shore innumerable, and as the stars of heaven. Now it seemed but a small company that left the land of Haran, when the Lord commanded Abram to forsake his former connections, and trust to the protection of Jehovah. Who would have believed, as they saw the little company pass by, that one among them was the destined father of Israel, the great progenitor of a nation, which has alike been, in its glory and subjection, the wonder and astonishment of the world! Improbable, doubtless, the thing appeared, and yet it was so; for from that hour to the present moment the promise has been in course of fulfilment. The numbers had increased when Jacob came down with his sons into the land of Egypt, and seemed to be rapidly accomplishing when the leader of the Israelites marched out of Egypt at the head of six hundred thousand men: and at the present day the Jews are said to be more numerous than ever. But it is not in their number only that this faithfulness is to be traced. What can equal their triumphs and conquests, and the many signal defeats which their enemies (though by far the superiors in number) were made to endure, the marvellous accounts of which enrich the sacred records! And who can look at them in the present day, and compare the predictions of Moses with their present degraded condition, and not be struck with amazement at the remarkably correct manner in which every threatening has been fulfilled? Oh! when we look on Jerusalem, contemplate her former splendour, think on the magnificent day which she once saw, and the mighty men whose bones lie mouldering in her plains,—who shall blame us for weakness, if we imitate the Saviour, and drop a tear at the consideration of her fallen condition? The torrent of Almighty wrath was threatened: that threat was disregarded, and therefore all the lofty towers of the city are levelled with the dust; and like a country over which a mighty deluge has swept, Jerusalem may say to her unchangeable and faithful God, "All thy waves and thy storms have gone over me," and "Thou, O Lord, art righteous"

4. Christian experience will also confirm my feeble effort to proclaim the faithfulness of God. When the first dawnings of heavenly light beamed into our hearts, there was One there ready to assist it; and though the reed was bruised, he did not break it; and though the flax only just smoked, he did not quench it. And he has been with us all the days of our pilgrimage. We have found in him a constant and perpetual friend and protector: and though human friends may often have forsaken us, the eye of our Almighty Guard knows no drowsiness, and his love can never be extinguished. Why then should we doubt that he will complete his work? When our fellow-creatures confirm their testimony by an oath, we no longer dare disbelieve them: shall we then charge perjury on the Lord of Heaven, seeing that he hath sworn by himself that he will bless us? Cast away therefore all sorrow and fear: God is not a man; and if even human testimony is honoured and respected, let us beware how we trifle with the testimony of God.

5. Eternal glory will be bestowed on every true believer. It will be but a little while before we, who are now travelling on the rough and rugged road to Zion's hill, shall have reached that city of habitation. Why then should we not contemplate the pleasures which we shall enjoy on our arrival there? It is not a shadowy or an unsubstantial bliss which the people of God are destined to enjoy; and every care and anxiety as to the exact nature of our future habitations, may well be laid aside when we remember that our Saviour himself is gone to prepare them. The world which we now inhabit is admirably adapted to the supply of all our wants; and this world was the work of the Saviour. Surely then past success may well argue, that the future world will be no less adapted to the wants and dispositions of its inhabitants. What the splendours of that world shall be, it is not in the power of human reason to contemplate. The notices which the Scriptures give us concerning it, are all marked with ideas of grandeur and elevation; and in many places we are told, that the joy will be unspeakable and full of glory. Far removed from the world in which we now reside are the foundations of the Eternal City. This earth will be consumed with a mighty conflagration, and the heavens shall depart with the deepening blasts of the archangel's trumpet; and then shall appear the new heaven, the New Jerusalem, the city of the living God; and thither shall assemble innumerable multitudes from every quarter of the globe, and each shall be clothed in a snow-white robe, and each shall be crowned with a glorious coronet, and the music of golden harps shall awaken heavenly songs, while the Redeemer shall graciously smile on his ransomed and beloved people. Verily, this is the reward of the righteous.

What then can be more encouraging to a trembling mortal than such a view of the Faithfulness of God? Though our sins may have been many, and our iniquities more than the hairs of our head, yet they cannot have passed the boundary line of unlimited love, nor have gone beyond the provision made for the repentant by the death of Christ. The Saviour looks even now with the tender smile of unwearied beneficence on every rebellious child of Adam, and longs and labours to clasp him in his arms, and pour on him the blessings of his grace And if he who cannot lie has said, "Return unto me, for I have redeemed thee," who is he that will be cruel enough to cast a doubt on a subject which God has left free from doubt? Hark! the silver trumpet sounds in sweet and simple melody; and louder yet its strains become, till the whole earth is filled with the sound. What means it? It is the herald of the Lord. He brings glad tidings to the sons of men. He addresses the long-enslaved captives of sin with the heart-cheering announcement—

> "The year of jubilee is come,
> Return, ye ransom'd sinners, home."

POWER OF PRAYER.

Heaven is God's magazine, wherein he hath
Stor'd up his vials, both of love and wrath.
Prayer opens this great treasure: 'tis a key
Whose wards are faith and hope and charity.
Wouldst thou prevent a judgment due to sin?
Turn but the key, and thou mayst lock it in.
Or wouldst thou have a blessing fall upon thee?
Open the door, and it will shower on thee.—Quarles.

Sunday School Lectures.

LECTURE VII.

"GIVE US THIS DAY OUR DAILY BREAD."

Teacher. I told you last Sunday, that when we offered up this prayer, we asked of God not "to take his Holy Spirit from us,"—still to allow us to drink freely of the fountain of life. Now this is a subject which includes all that the Bible says concerning sin and salvation: it relates to the cause of Christ's dying on the tree, and of his being buried, and of his rising again the third day: it speaks of "sin," of the corruption of man's natural heart, because the office of the Holy Ghost is to cleanse us from sin by the blood of Jesus Christ.

What is the chief subject of the Bible?—Salvation from sin.

What caused Christ's death?—Sin.

What is the chief office of the Holy Spirit?—To sanctify us, or to wash away our sins in Jesus' blood, and prepare us for heaven.

Teacher. The wicked man has had much done for him already, and much also now remains to be done for him, and much for him to do. I would show you now,

1st. What has been done for all men, both sinners and believers.

2d. What has been done for believers only.

1st. What has been done for all men: and there are three things which have been done for all men:—

1st. All men have been redeemed, bought back from Satan, and power has been given to all men to return again to God.

What has God, first, done for all men?—He has redeemed all men.

What is the meaning of redemption?—A buying back.

Teacher. Suppose a man was to sell himself into the hands of a very cruel king, who was to chain him down so that he might not run away, and was to flog him every day, and to give him only bread and water to live upon. Then suppose that another very powerful, but kind and merciful king, was to see this poor prisoner, and was to pity him, and offer this cruel king 700*l.* if he would sell him the prisoner, that he might let him go free. And suppose that the price was agreed to by both kings, and the prisoner was allowed to go free. Now here is the cruel king from whom the prisoner is redeemed or bought back; there is the kind king who redeems the prisoner or buys him back; there is the prisoner who is redeemed, or bought back from the cruel king by the kind king; and there is the price with which the prisoner is redeemed or bought back. The cruel king, from whom the prisoner is redeemed, is Satan; the kind king, or the Redeemer, is Jesus Christ; the prisoner who is bought back, represents mankind; and the 700*l.* paid, denotes the death or blood of Christ. This is redemption. Now suppose the prisoner, when the kind king had redeemed him and procured him liberty, was to say to the king, "Though you have redeemed me, I will not go back to you, and serve you, but I will stop in the service of my present master, and will bear his ill treatment." You would, I dare say, think him a very foolish man, and out of his mind: but nevertheless, this is like the case of the wicked. Though Christ has redeemed them from Satan, who torments them now, and who will torment them hereafter in hell, they will not come to Christ, whose "yoke is easy, and whose burthen is light," but prefer Satan's bondage. But suppose the prisoner was to choose to serve the kind king, and to leave the cruel king; then you would think him a wise man for doing so. Now this represents the true believer, who determines to leave Satan, and to serve Christ: the end of the man who stays in Satan's bondage is eternal misery; the end of the man who turns to Christ's service and friendship, is eternal happiness: "Turn ye," then, "turn ye, why will ye die?"

Who is the Redeemer?—Jesus Christ.

Who are the redeemed?—All mankind.

From whom are we redeemed?—Satan.

What is the price with which we are redeemed?—Christ's blood.

Teacher. To show you how plainly the Scripture declares that the price of redemption has been paid even for the wicked, I will just refer to two remarkable texts: "Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died." Rom. xiv, 15. "Who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction." 2 Pet. ii, 1. No one will say that those who deny Christ, who bring in damnable heresies, and who are bringing on themselves swift destruction, can be saints; and saints only can be saved, and none else. Yet these men are spoken of as redeemed, who "bring on themselves swift destruction:" it is plainly in these two verses stated, that he may be destroyed for whom Christ died, and that even the wicked are redeemed.

At the present time I can go no further, but remember, my dear children, that each one of you is redeemed, and now, now you may go to Christ, escape from Satan, and enjoy everlasting salvation.

ANOTHER ANSWER TO W.'S INQUIRY,

ON HEB. X, 16.

"For if we sin wilfully, after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin."

In answer to W.'s inquiry (in No. 61), who wishes to know if his sin is of that nature mentioned by the apostle, and if there is remission for the same,—I beg leave to assure him, that the text has no reference whatever to him, or to any humble inquirer seeking the way of approach to God the Father by Jesus Christ; the class alluded to being the Jews, with others, no matter what their profession or creed may be, who are wilfully and habitually living in the practice of known sin, and rejecting the offers of salvation by Jesus Christ.

The apostle refers here to the Jews, who would not believe that Christ had come, that the great sacrifice once for all had been offered, but still waited for the Messiah's coming. He gives them to understand, that they, having received such evident proofs of Christ's mission, and before whose eyes he was sacrificed; also having been convinced by Christ himself; have now no cloak for their sin, but are sinning wilfully after having received the knowledge of the truth, by vainly expecting there yet remained a sacrifice to be offered, seeing Jesus Christ had already been sacrificed for us, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God; there being no other name under heaven whereby they could be saved, but that name which they already knew.

The apostle says, there remaineth no more [no other] sacrifice for sin; but he does not say there remaineth no more remission or pardon for those who have sinned wilfully after having received the knowledge of the truth; but all, both Jews and Gentiles, may, by sincere repentance and true faith, arise and go to their Father by Jesus Christ, and will in no wise be cast out, for

> "While th' lamp of life holds out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return."

Trusting these few remarks may remove W.'s fears, I offer them for your insertion. If not plainer than that which has already appeared (See No. 63.) it is at least in other words, and therefore may perhaps be more easily understood.

"MORE THAN EVER, PRAY."

A poor boy, who sold wood, passing down a street, was heard to say, "More than ever for a penny!" A friend who heard him observed to me, "More than ever pray for me." Perhaps a few observations may be drawn from this hint, which may be beneficial to the Christian.

Have you a favourite child, for whom you have long and earnestly prayed, and apparently without success, let me entreat you more than ever to pray for him. Depend upon it, praying breath has never, nor ever will be spent in vain. Thy prayer, O anxious parent, will be answered, and in such a manner as will exceed thy highest expectations, and upbraid thy little faith.

Christian, are you walking in darkness? To you I would say, "More than ever pray." Now is the especial time to pray. "Whoso walketh in darkness, and hath no light, let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay himself upon his God," runs the promise. Take therefore this assurance to the throne of grace, and pleading it in the name of Jesus, light shall break upon thy path, and joy shall beam upon thy disconsolate spirit.

Christian Minister, exclaiming with heartfelt sorrow, "I have laboured in vain, and spent my strength for nought," may I with great humility commend to you more than ever to pray. Oh, how often you have kindly urged your hearers to pray; do but try the efficacy of prayer in your own circumstances. Think you that God can forego his own promise? Has he not said, that "he who goeth forth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with joy, bringing his sheaves with him;" and will he not bless your efforts, and ultimately crown your labours with success?

Sabbath School Teacher, who may be cast down by witnessing the untractable dispositions of your charge, let me urge you, more than ever to pray. You have prayed, you answer. Yes, I know you have; and your prayers have not, cannot in truth be unanswered. Pray still: the blessing will come, though it may seem to our weak faith to tarry; and it will come, after all the apparent delays, to testify that your labours are not in vain in the Lord.

May every Christian derive a stimulus from these few hints, more than ever to pray.

TRANSLATION OF BEZA'S LATIN EPITAPH FOR LUTHER.

Rome rul'd the world; the Pope made Rome obey;
By strength she gain'd, by treachery he, the sway.
How far was Luther more than either great,
Whose single pen controll'd their double weight!
Grant Grecian fable its Alcides: still,
His ponderous club was nought to Luther's quill.

THE SATURDAY EVENING PRAYER MEETING.

Come, my Father's family,
Ye adopted heirs of grace,
From the toils of business free,
Let us seek our Saviour's face.
Worldly pleasure we disdain,
All its boasted mirth is vain.

At the throne of grace we meet,
Here the past week's sins we mourn.
Jesus, from his mercy-seat,
Kindly answers in return,
"Freely I your sins forgive;
Go, and to my glory live."

O what pleasure fills the room!
Love flows sweet through every breast:
Jesus in his Spirit's come,
With his presence we are blest.
Here's a happy company!
This is pure felicity.

Cease, ye worldlings, cease to boast,
All your pleasures end in pain;
When you quit this mortal coast,
You'll a mighty loss sustain,
Sinking deep in misery,
Through a long eternity.

But the pleasures we enjoy,
They shall never, never end;
Death will not our bliss destroy,
Death, indeed, will be our friend;
Death will let our spirits fly
To their better house on high.

Then, in sweet society,
With the glorified above,
There through all eternity
We shall sing redeeming love.
Brethren! raise your voices high,
Your redemption draweth nigh.

MEMORIALS OF FELIX NEFF,

The Alpine Pastor. By T. S. Ellerby. 12mo. cloth, pp. 334. Hamilton and Adams. 1833.

Neff was an extraordinary individual, and his "Memorials" contain a most interesting illustration of the character and labours of a "Home Missionary." Such was the lamented subject of this Memoir, stationed on the "Higher Alps," in the province of Dauphiny in France. His early religious history is peculiarly instructive, including various ministerial operations before his ordination, which took place in London, May 19, 1823, at the chapel of the Rev. John Clayton. From that period to the termination of his mortal course, April 12, 1829, he prosecuted his labours with astonishing zeal and success, establishing prayer-meetings throughout the various villages in his district, schools for the young, Bible and Tract societies, and preaching many times a week throughout his sphere of labour.

Neff was an agent of the English "Continental Society" formed to promote the advancement of Scriptural Christianity in the ignorant and formal churches through the continent of Europe; and we cannot but rejoice in the contemplation of the divine blessings diffused by means of such missionaries as the devoted Felix Neff.

The difficulties in the way of this servant of Christ may be conceived in a tolerable degree by a few extracts from this Memoir. "In many respects, the work of an evangelist upon the Alps bears a striking resemblance to that of a missionary amongst savages; for the very small degree of civilization existing in this elevated region is more calculated to retard than facilitate the progress of Divine truth.—Many of their cottages have no chimneys, and nearly all are without windows. Indeed, their habitations can only be described as dark and noisome hovels, seldom cleaned out more than once a year; and in which, during the eight months of winter, the whole family are accustomed to reside, in the midst of filth and smoke.—As is the case amongst barbarous nations, the women live in a state of degrading servitude, and are invariably treated with harshness and brutality. They are seldom allowed to sit; and when this privilege is granted, they are compelled to crawl on their knees to their seats. They dare not place themselves at the same table, nor partake of the same food, as the men. Their unfeeling masters hand them the allotted portion across the shoulder, never deigning to turn their heads; whilst the poor women are obliged to acknowledge this beneficence, by kissing the hand and making obeisance." P. 130—132.

In what manner Neff succeeded in elevating and evangelizing such a rude and degraded people, must be a subject of deep interest and inquiry, and in this volume will be found a most delightful record. "Such was the extent of his pastoral jurisdiction, and so difficult of access were many of the hamlets within its limits, that he was unable to spend more than two or three days in the course of each month, at his nominal residence at La Chalp. When issuing from this secluded glen, to prosecute his arduous and disinterested labours, the pastor of the Alps had to travel twelve miles to the west, sixty to the east, twenty to the south, and thirty-three to the north. The life of Neff, from this period, was one of almost constant migration; nor was it until his physical energies were completely exhausted, that he allowed himself a single day of relaxation and repose. From the commencement of his labours here, to his last illness, he never slept three nights in the same bed. No sooner had the time expired which he had allotted for the religious instruction of the inhabitants of one hamlet, than he was seen with his staff in his hand and his wallet on his back, vigorously scaling the mountain side, or winding his solitary course through deep and dreary defiles, leading to some other portion of his beloved parishioners. It was the whole aim of his existence to follow closely in the footsteps of his Divine Master, and to be constantly going about doing good." P. 127—129.

TEOCALLI, THE GREAT TEMPLE OF MEXICO.

ANCIENT MEXICO.

RICA, on several accounts, must be far more esting to Britons, than any other portion of the table globe. Colonized, in its most populous, in- gent, and religious division, by our own country- , and participating in common with us in the bless- of our language, literature, institutions, and divine stianity, with branches of numberless English lies settled there,—we cannot but take pleasure in y thing recorded of its advancement, improvement, prosperity. Our present view of that vast conti- relates to its condition before the period of its uest by the Spaniards.

"Mexico," in its pagan state, as Dr. Robertson remarks, "was the pride of the New World, and the noblest monument of the industry and art of man, while unacquainted with the use of iron, and destitute of aid from any domestic animal; and the Spaniards, who are most moderate in their computations, reckon that there were at least 60,000 inhabitants in the city."—History of America, vol. ii, p. 205.

"Ferdinand Cortes," and his "Conquest of Mexico," are familiar to many of our readers: but those who are not acquainted with the discovery and colonization of this "New World," including the West Indies, should at least read the History of America by Dr. Robertson.

Clavigero, a Mexican historian of reputation, remarks, "The city and kingdom of Mexico, was begun by the building of the temple of Huitzilopochtli, or rather Megitli, from whence the city took its name. This building at the commencement was only a poor cabin, but a new and magnificent temple was afterwards erected by the zeal of several successive sovereigns. Various and very different accounts have been given of the magnitude of this proud monument of superstition, but the most probable is the following:—

"This great temple occupied the centre of the city, and, together with other temples and other buildings annexed, covered a great portion of the present city of Mexico. The wall, by which it was surrounded, formed a square, and was so large as to be capable of containing a town of 500 houses. It was built of stone, eight feet high, of a proportionate thickness, and adorned at the top with representations of serpents. There were four gates pointing towards the four quarters of the heavens, and above each gate was a building abundantly supplied with every kind of arms, where in case of necessity the troops were accustomed to retire.

"The space within the exterior part of the wall was curiously paved with stones, that were so smooth and polished, as to cause the horses of the Spaniards to stumble and fall at every step. In the midst of this space there arose a vast oblong square building, all solid, and built with square bricks of equal dimensions. It consisted of five stories of an equal height, but unequal in the length and width. The first, or base of the building, was, from east to west, more than 300 feet, and nearly 258 feet from north to south: the second was six feet less, both in length and width, than the square below. The other stories continued diminishing in the same proportion, so that upon each story there was a space or open gallery turning round from the higher story, by which three and even four men could walk abreast.

"The steps, which were placed towards the south, were built of great stones, well wrought. There were in all 114 steps, each a foot high. It was not a single continued staircase, but there were as many flights of steps as there were stories in the building, as may be seen in the engraving; so that having arrived at the top of the first flight, it was necessary to go all round before ascending the second, and thus with the remaining portion.

"Upon the fifth and last story there was a platform, 240 feet long and 204 wide, which was as well paved as the square or open space below. In the eastern extremity of that space were erected two towers, 56 feet high; each of these towers consisted of three stories, the lower one being built of stone, and the other two of wood. The lower story or base was properly the sanctuary; where, upon a stone altar 5 feet high, were placed the tutelary idols. One of these sanctuaries was consecrated to Huitzilopochtli and the other gods of war, and the other to Tezcatlipoca, who was said to be the god of providence, the soul of the world, the creator of heaven and earth, and the lord of all things. The other two stories of these towers were used to preserve the necessary utensils for the worship of the idols, and the ashes of some kings and chiefs, who, from peculiar motives of devotion, were deposited there. The doors of these two sanctuaries were placed towards the west, and the two towers terminated with beautiful wooden cupolas; but of the interior decorations of these sanctuaries, as well as the dimensions of the towers, we are unable to form any idea, no author having left an account of them. But it may be asserted without fear of error, that the height of the building was not less than 114 feet, and to the top of the towers, about 168 feet. From this elevation might be seen the lake, the surrounding cities, and a great part of the valley, presenting, according to the testimony of those who had an opportunity of beholding it, an extensive view of incomparable beauty.

"On the upper platform was the altar for ordinary sacrifices, upon the open space below, that for the sacrifice of the gladiators. Before the two sanctuaries were two stone vessels, about the height of a man, in which the sacred fire was constantly preserved with the utmost care, for it was believed that the greatest calamities would occur if it should ever happen to be extinguished. In the other temples and sacred edifices, comprised within the precincts of the external wall, there were six hundred vessels of the same size and form, which at night, when the whole were kindled, presented a most beautiful spectacle."

Horrible in the extreme were the religious rites of the Mexicans, "formed," as Robertson remarks, "into a regular system, with its complete train of priests, temples, victims, and festivals."—"The aspect of superstition in Mexico was gloomy and atrocious. Its divinities were clothed with terror, and delighted in vengeance. They were exhibited to the people under detestable forms, which created horror; the figures of serpents, of tigers, and of other destructive animals, decorated their temples. Fear was the only principle which inspired their votaries. Fasts, mortifications, and penances, all rigid, and many of them excruciating to an extreme degree, were the means employed to appease the wrath of their gods, and the Mexicans never approached their altars without sprinkling them with blood drawn from their own bodies. But, of all offerings, HUMAN SACRIFICES were deemed the most acceptable. This religious belief mingling with the implacable spirit of vengeance, and adding new force to it, every captive taken in war was brought to the temple, was devoted as a victim to the deity, and sacrificed with rites no less solemn than cruel. The heart and head were the portion consecrated to the gods; the warrior, by whose prowess the prisoner had been seized, carried off the body to feast upon it with his friends! Under the impression of ideas so dreary and terrible, and accustomed daily to scenes of bloodshed rendered awful by religion, the heart of man must harden, and be steeled to every sentiment of humanity. The spirit of the Mexicans was accordingly unfeeling, and the genius of their religion so far counterbalanced the influence of policy and arts, that notwithstanding their progress in both, their manners, instead of softening, became more fierce."

Robertson adds, in a Note, "The exaggeration of the Spanish historians, with respect to the number of human victims sacrificed in Mexico, appears to have been very great. According to Gomara, there was no year in which 20,000 human victims were not offered to the Mexican divinities, and in some years they amounted to 50,000. The skulls of those unhappy persons were ranged in order, in a building erected for that purpose, and two of Cortes's officers who had counted them, informed Gomara, their number was 136,000! Herrera's account is still more incredible, that the number of victims was so great, that 5,000 have been sacrificed in one day; nay, on some occasions, no less than 20,000. Torquemada goes beyond both in extravagance, for he asserts, that 20,000 children, exclusive of other victims, were slaughtered annually. The most respectable authority in favour of such high numbers, is that of Zumurraga, the first bishop of Mexico, who, in a letter to the chapter-general of his order, A. D. 1631, asserts that the Mexicans sacrificed annually 20,000 victims!!

Human sacrifices were common in Mexico, however exaggerated these accounts may have been; and the horrible fact is full of instruction to us, in relation to the apostacy of man from God; especially while we reflect upon the happy circumstances of those who are blessed with the full light of the Christian Scriptures, and who have been favoured with the faithful ministry of "THE GLORIOUS GOSPEL OF THE BLESSED GOD."

The Mosaic Chronology.

SOME writers have maintained, that the world exhibits marks of too high an antiquity for the modern origin ascribed to it in the Bible. To begin with chronology. The ancient Roman year consisted, at first, of ten months; after that was the Julian year, of 365 days. The ancient Jewish year had but 354 days; sometimes 12 days, or a month of 30 days, were added, to form a solar year. The Syriac year also varies; the Turkish or Arabic year admits 11 extra months in 29 years. Besides these various modes of measuring time, all these years have not the same beginning, or the same divisions of days and hours; the first month of the Persian year corresponds with our June; and China and India begin from the first of March. We find days also of two kinds: the one commencing at sunrise, as among the ancient Babylonians, Syrians, and Persians; the other at sunset, as in China and in modern Italy, and of old among the Athenians, the Jews, and the barbarians of the North. The Arabs begin their days at noon; the French, English, and other European nations at midnight. Lastly, the very hours are not without their perplexities, being divided into three classes, of Babylonian, Italian, and astronomical; and were we to be still more particular, we should no longer reckon 60 minutes in an hour, but 1080 scruples, as the Chaldeans and Arabians. Is there one candid person who will refuse to admit, that so many arbitrary modes of calculating time are sufficient to make history a frightful chaos? The annals of the Jews, by the confession of scientific men themselves, are the only ones whose chronology is simple, regular, and clear. This, then, is a new evidence in favour of the Holy Scriptures.

Next to the chronological objections against the Bible, come those which are pretended to be deduced from historical facts. The traditions of the priests of Thebes, assigned to the kingdom of Egypt a duration of 18,000 years. But one who cannot be suspected of Christianity, Plutarch, says of them, "Their year at first consisted only of a single moon: it is thus that their origin appears extremely long; and though it was late before they settled in their country, they are reputed to be the most ancient of nations."

What necessity is there, after all, to lay so much stress on orthographical disputes, when we need but open the volumes of history, to convince ourselves of the modern origin of man? We ourselves are a striking instance of the rapidity with which nations become civilized. Scarcely twelve centuries ago, our ancestors were as barbarous as the Hottentots; and now we surpass Greece in the refinements of taste, luxury, and the arts.

The general logic of languages cannot furnish any valid reason in favour of the antiquity of man. The idioms of the East, far from announcing nations grown old in society, betray men very little removed from a state of nature. Their mechanism is simple in the highest degree. If to all these difficulties of chronology and facts, we add the errors arising from the passions of the historian; if we moreover take into our consideration the accidents of time and place, we shall be compelled to acknowledge, that all the reasons drawn from history in favour of the antiquity of the globe, are as unsatisfactory as useless.

Astronomy.

In the history of the firmament are sought the second proofs of the errors of Scripture. Thus the heavens, which declare the glory of God, proclaim nothing to the Infidel.

Astronomy owes its origin to shepherds. In the deserts of the primitive creation, man wanted a compass to direct him through the trackless forests, or on rivers where never sail before was set. It was natural that he should place himself under the direction of the stars; each family followed the course of a constellation, each star shone as the leader of a flock. India is still both astronomical and pastoral, like Egypt of old. By an ordination not a little remarkable, the simplest nations were best acquainted with the system of the heavens. The immense discoveries, however, in this art, are but of recent date. Of the various philosophical plans of the machinery of the heavens, it was Sir Isaac Newton who selected the noblest, the most sublime design, for it was that of the Deity himself. But who could have thought, that at the moment, so many new proofs of the greatness and wisdom of Providence were discovered? There were men who shut their eyes closer than ever against the light. "How can the world be so modern," it was said, "the very composition of the skies implies millions of years." It is the feeling we possess of immortality, which makes men ashamed of the short period of their existence: they conceive, that by piling tombs upon tombs, and adding cypher to cypher, they shall at length produce an eternity.

The Deluge.

Astronomy having been found insufficient to destroy the veracity of Scripture, natural history has been called to its aid. It has been said, that all the seas of the globe would not be sufficient to cover the globe to the height mentioned in Scripture. To this we answer, that to drown the earth, ocean need only overleap his bounds: and who is there that has penetrated into the treasures of the hail? God has indeed commanded the seas to retire within their beds, but he has impressed on the globe everlasting traces of his wrath. The relics of the elephant of India are piled up in the regions of Siberia, and whole beds of marine substances settled upon the summits of the Alps and the Cordilleras.

It has been said, Examine the fossils, the marbles, the lavas of the earth; and you discover in them a series of innumerable years, marked by their various circles or strata. To this we answer, God could not but create, and doubtless did create, the world with all the marks of maturity and completeness which we behold in it. If the world had not been at the same time young and old, the grand, the moral, and the melancholy, would have been banished from the face of nature. Every scene would indeed have lost its wonders. The very day that ocean poured forth his first waves, he doubtless washed shores already worn by the billows. Without this original antiquity, there would have been neither beauty nor magnificence in the work of the Almighty, but an insipid infancy of plants, animals, and elements. But God was not so wretched a designer as infidels pretend. Adam was born at the full age of manhood; and in like manner did Eve shine in all the blooming graces of female beauty.

ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY.

THIRD CENTURY.

33. Cyprian. — Thascius Cecilius Cyprian was a native of Carthage, and descended from a noble family. His parents were idolaters, and he continued such till the last twelve years of his life. Cyprian was educated in a manner suited to his senatorial condition; and according to Lactantius, he publicly taught rhetoric in his native city with extraordinary reputation. At that period he lived in great splendour and magnificence, his dress sumptuous and his retinue stately, never going abroad but he was thronged with a crowd of clients and followers. His popular talents as an orator, and his eminent authority as a senator, were employed in défence of the superstitions and idolatries of paganism; but Cecilius, one of the ministers of Christ at Carthage, induced him to listen to the gospel, which led to his conversion to the doctrine of God our Saviour. At his baptism, Cyprian took the name of his spiritual benefactor, Cecilius; and, until the day of his death, he cherished for him the sincerest friendship, and received, as his dying charge, the care of his family.

Cyprian's whole soul was now engaged in the study of Christianity; and his progress in divine knowledge was astonishing. In proof of his sincerity, Cyprian advocated the cause of Christ with his pen, and wrote a treatise "On the Grace of God," which he addressed to Donatus, bishop of the Christian church at Carthage. He also wrote another piece "On the Vanity of Idols;" and being married, he resolved upon a state of continence, which was absurdly considered a high degree of piety in that age. He consigned most of his property to the church for the use of the poor, and consecrated himself to the service of the Redeemer. Donatus, therefore, ordained him to the office of the ministry; and that bishop dying A.D. 248, Cyprian was chosen as the most proper person to render service to the church, and to succeed him in the episcopal office. With some expressions of reluctance, having been a Christian but two years, Cyprian entered upon his responsible duties.

During a period of forty years the Christians had enjoyed much peace; through which professors had become luxurious in living and dress, and greatly corrupted in manners. Cyprian resolved on a reformation, and published a treatise "On the Dress of Virgins," in which, besides what he says on that particular, he inculcates many excellent lessons of modesty and sobriety. Decius, the emperor, A.D. 249, issued severe edicts against the Christians, when a dreadful persecution arose; and the following year, the idolaters assembling at the Circus and the Amphitheatre, insisted on Cyprian being thrown to the lions. To avoid the popular fury, Cyprian withdrew from Carthage; and in his retirement he wrote many pious and instructive letters to his friends, encouraging them in their profession of Christ; and also to the Libellatici, those pusillanimous Christians, who were so denominated from having obtained certificates from the heathen magistrates, of their having complied with the emperor's orders in sacrificing to idols!

Cyprian was allowed to return to his pastoral charge at Carthage, where he held several councils concerning the proper mode of proceeding with those who professed repentance for their cowardice in falling from their stedfastness during the persecution. Cyprian received them to the communion of the church; but Novatus, a presbyter, opposed this laxity, and withdrew to Rome, where he joined Novatian; who, with him, thought that, though they might possibly be saved, they ought not to be received back into full communion.

Novatian and Cornelius being both chosen bishops by the Christians at Rome, Cornelius, being less strict in his discipline than Novatian, gained the strongest party, and excommunicated him, denouncing him as a schismatic. Cyprian, in a letter to Cornelius, expressed his approbation of this sentence, on account of Novatus having opposed his lax discipline.

Dr. Haweis, in his "Impartial History of the Church," says, "The reply of Cornelius to the bishop of Carthage bears an acrimony, an insolence, and abuse, that speak as little in favour of the man who could receive it with complacence, as of him who could indite it in the bitterness of his heart; and they must be sad Christians indeed whose state I should not prefer to the bishop's who could write these letters. Novatian, by his revilers, is admitted to be a man of genius, learning, and eloquence. His moral character was unimpeachable. However, it required singular excellence to maintain himself and his congregation against the weight of power and influence which were against him. One of the best, the clearest, and most precise treatises which antiquity can produce, of the Triune God, comes from his pen. He states distinctly, that 'the Holy Ghost is the author of regeneration — the pledge of the promised inheritance — the hand-writing of eternal salvation — who makes us the temple of God and his abode — who intercedes for us with groanings which cannot be uttered — our advocate and defender — dwelling in us — and sanctifying us for immortality,' &c. When I hear Cyprian anathematizing such a man, I can only say, I would rather be under the curses with Novatian, than utter them with Cyprian."

Cyprian at length died a martyr for Christ, A.D. 258, in the persecution under Valerian and Gallienus. Novatian about the same period died a martyr for Christ! Cornelius died in prison, a confessor of Christ! On these good, but imperfect men, Dr. Haweis makes the following beautiful reflections: "Ah! that great men, good men, confessors, martyrs, should quarrel, and not be willing to bear and forbear! If one is our Master, even Christ, to him let us be content to be responsible; follow the best dictates of our conscience, according to our views of God's word, and be happy to indulge our brethren with the same liberty. Cyprian and Novatian, at the right hand of the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls, must be ashamed of their hard spirit, and their harsh speeches. It is a mercy for us all, that we have such a compassionate High Priest, who knows how to pity our infirmities, and to pardon our iniquities. I am the longer on this point, because Mr. Milner calls these the first Dissenters from the church, not a tittle of which I can perceive; for Novatian was a bishop as truly chosen and ordained, from any thing which appears, as Cornelius."

THE BEST GEOGRAPHY OF THE HOLY LAND.

A young man of fortune, lately of Trinity college, Mr. Blane, returned to Cairo with his friend, Mr. Crompton, on the 15th of last May, after a journey across the desert, which was attended with a good deal of hardship, from the want of water and from excessive heat. They had pursued the route of Moses and the Israelites, and travelling with the Book of Exodus in their hands, had reached Mount Sinai. They drank their coffee on the spot where Moses received the Decalogue, visited the cave in which Elijah had taken refuge at Horeb; and placed themselves on the stone whereon Moses sat when his hands were lifted up whilst Israel fought against Amalek. They discovered also several caves containing curious objects of antiquity, not hitherto known nor visited by any traveller. On their return to Cairo they were preparing to start for Jerusalem and Damascus.—Cambridge Chronicle.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXXVIII.

On the Order in which the different subjects of Study should be attended to.

Dear Madam,

It is an important rule in education, never to be pursuing too many objects at the same time, nor even the proper number of objects too sedulously. These rules are peculiarly important in the education of young children.

If you teach them too many things at a time, you will tire their faculties, and defeat your purpose. Dr. Johnson has justly said, "the speed of a horseman must be regulated by the speed of his horse;" and in the same manner, the degree of education you administer depends upon the capacity of your child for receiving it. All instruction ceases to be useful when the child ceases to comprehend. This he will do through mere fatigue after a certain time. Let a little knowledge at a time be communicated to his mind, and then the task be intermitted. It is doubtful whether the faculties even of an adult, which have been inured to action, are capable of clear perception, so as to acquire new ideas, during more than two hours together. I should expect that the faculties of a child are not capable of effectual attention even for so long a time. After you have exercised his attention for an hour, trip with him into the garden, and after a short walk return and resume his education; but divert his mind to a different subject: change of subject is almost as great a relief as total cessation. Never have more than two things in hand at one time. Let these be mutually connected, if possible. Let them be attended to so far that proficiency may be left to future practice, and then turn to something else. Thus, you will begin with reading and writing. Let him devote four hours a day to study, two in the morning and two in the afternoon. Let the first hour be given to reading and the second to writing in the morning: let the first hour be given to writing and the second to reading in the afternoon. Still reverse the order every alternate day: change even in this respect will alleviate labour; the human mind is fatigued by monotonous regularity. In six months, if you pay attention to nothing else as an object of study, he will read and write well enough to need no further formal attention to those subjects.

Then let him begin arithmetic. Let him read and write however during the other hour of the morning and afternoon. Let him read in that other hour to-day, for instance, and write in it to-morrow, and vice versa.

Then let him begin geography and history.

You will never allow him to read the name of a place without looking for it on the map and globe. Have these constantly at hand: let them be tolerably full, that is, have a considerable number of the names of places written down upon them; and when, for instance, he reads in the History of England that William the First landed at Hastings, tell him it is in Sussex, on the coast. Then let him look for it. When he reads that William proceeded to Pevensey, let him look for that neighbouring village, and thus trace the invader's progress up to the metropolis. You will never allow him to read the name of any place to you in the histories of England, Rome, Greece, &c. without finding it out upon the map or globe, and marking its relation with respect to other countries. When you come to read the New Testament with him, you will especially show him on the globe where Palestine is placed; and then having shown him a map of the land itself, and having made him understand that this map is a magnified view of the little spot he sees upon the globe, you will always require him to point out the names of the places mentioned; and so with the Old Testament.

As soon as your child has begun to read and write, let him begin music also; and if you teach him the piano yourself, devote an hour to the lesson in the evening. If a master comes to teach him any other instrument, let the same hour of the same part of the day be devoted to it. This mode of spending the evening will constitute a delightful relaxation to the studies of the day.

Should he have displayed an attachment to the art of drawing, in which you will remember it was recommended to indulge him from an early period, you may vary the evening's employment, by music and drawing alternately. Let your plans of exercise in the open air, the use of tools, gardening, and the other diversions given under the head of physical education, be sedulously continued.

Natural philosophy and natural history may each of them in their turn come into the hour of reading, both morning and afternoon; always, however, make him give you an account, as soon as the lesson is over, of what he had been reading.

If these subjects be thus pursued, steadily, you will find, that by the age of nine years you will have sufficiently initiated him into the elements of knowledge, to allow of his being sent to school. What you have taught him he will know clearly and thoroughly. You will also have communicated habits of mind to him, which will enable him to profit largely by the more extended instructions which he is afterwards to receive. You will also by that time have sufficiently established health and robustness of constitution, and habits of exercise. I suppose also all the moral habits previously enumerated and recommended to have been equally attended to.

I trust to offer you some further Letters upon the remaining branch of education, namely, the religious. I will now, however, pause for a moment, at the conclusion of my advice upon this third branch of education.

I will imagine myself to have completed my task, and that you are in possession of the Letters yet to be sent. I will imagine the advice to be contained in the whole to have been incorporated into your system of education; and all this, for the delight of fancying your child as having been well trained, both in body and in mind, during that time at which the habits become fixed. The period of his life chosen by my imagination for its reverie, shall be that at which he is about to leave your own habitation, and to be consigned to the care of the schoolmaster. I delight to contemplate him, healthy, robust, agile, and well developed in body, possessing habits of correct reasoning, clear perceptions, and an ardent love of truth in mind; as having been imbued with moral habits of universal benevolence, justice, honesty, and rational self-love; and as being acquainted with the genuine doctrines of revelation, and actuated by them, so as to produce habitual cheerfulness and devotion. Such will, I hope, be the happy result and high reward of your care and exertion. Should this be the case at the period referred to, I can confidently remind you, for your encouragement, of the Divine axiom in education, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

CLERICUS.

All earthly comforts are like a fair picture that drawn upon ice.—Brooks.

GOLDEN SENTENCES,

FROM

SERMONS PREACHED BY THE REV. W. MARSH, A.M.

Minister of St. Thomas' Church, Birmingham.

1. Believers are called heirs of promise. They lost their inheritance in Adam, and it is restored to them in Christ; and it is the assurance of having regained this Paradise they are constantly seeking to obtain. This assurance is the flower of faith; and, though not necessary to the life of the plant, it is to its maturity.

2. All Christians should recollect that they are epistles from God, to be seen and read of all men: that example is so very influential, that the apostle places it among the means of grace; saying, that "if any obey not the word, they may even without the word be won by a good conversation." The way thus to adorn the doctrine of your Saviour is, to be much and fervent in prayer to God, for the guidance and influence of his Holy Spirit.

3. By nature we are opaque bodies, we can shine only by reflection; and ere we can shine in the celestial kingdom above, we must walk while below in the light of Christ, the Sun of Righteousness.

4. Faith in Christian truths will produce joy, and faith in Christian precepts will produce obedience; and according to the strength of our faith will be the fervour of our love.

5. Christ is that full-orbed sun, in which all the rays of the Divine attributes and perfections centre, and where they are reduced to such mildness, that the sinner may look and live; and by looking be enlightened, comforted, and saved.

6. It is in the school of affliction, that men learn to know themselves. While all is prosperous and shining around them, they resemble the unruffled rivulet; but when the pebble of adversity is thrown in, the mire, till then unseen, appears.

7. The Christian should not content himself with merely differing from the world; if the world possess singular privileges, he must be willing to be singular: he should take his station at the foot of the cross, and there he shall find rich blessings clustering from it, descending constantly upon him.

8. Christ is the rock on which you must build, if you would build for eternity: all other foundations are as sand, and sink with time.

9. True religion is doctrinal, experimental, and practical: if we possessed only doctrinal religion, it would lead to antinomianism; if only experimental, to enthusiasm; if only practical to pharisaism: therefore, if we would be partakers of the religion of Jesus, all three must be united, we must not attempt to separate them.

10. Jesus is the Prince of Peace: by his birth he proclaims it, by his life he purchased it, by taking our nature and dying he made it, at his death he bequeathed it, by his Spirit he imparts it, and at his second coming it shall be fully and eternally enjoyed.

11. It should be the aim of all men to act that part in time, which God will approve in eternity.

12. Take Christ for your hope, his character for your model, his love for your motive, his Spirit for your strength, and his promises for your encouragement.

13. The value of every thing must be estimated by the evil from which it delivers us, and the good to which it introduces us. How invaluable then is true religion, which delivers us from an eternity of misery, and introduces us to an eternity of joy unutterable.

14. On the divinity of Christ hang all the glories and perfections of the gospel. Rob the Bible of this foundation-stone, and the whole structure instantly crumbles into dust.

15. Let no day pass without inwardly digesting some portion of Scripture; and when you are not obliged to have your thoughts engaged on other subjects, then meditate on this portion; it will prove a guardian angel to you, and be the means of chasing away many an evil spirit from you.

16. How many are so entombed by the riches, the honours, the pleasures, and the sins of the world, as only to be taken out of them to be buried in the earth.

17. Whatever our professions may be, if our spirit be of the world, that decides the character in the sight of God.

18. The mind may be illumined without the heart being changed; but that light is only like the light of the moon, though sometimes beautifully clear, it is always without warmth; but the light of salvation resembles the light of the sun, it warms and influences the heart, and causes it to bring forth fruit; its beneficial influences are seen and felt in the walk and conversation of all those who are thus savingly enlightened by the Holy Spirit.

Death-Bed Testimonies.

No. VIII.

REV. WILLIAM ARNOLD,

Pastor of the Baptist Church, Unicorn Yard, Southwark.

Died May 17th, 1734, in the 43d year of his age.

On the Monday before he died, he asked his physicians, with his usual cheerfulness, what they thought of him? —when they told him there was danger in his case. They were no sooner withdrawn, but he said to his friends, with his hands lifted up towards heaven, and with an air of pleasure and satisfaction in his countenance, "Now I am going, I am going home, I am going to glory." Upon this, he sent for his children, took a solemn and affectionate leave of them, and with the authority of a minister, and the affection of a parent, recommended to them their duty to God, to one another, and how they ought to walk in the world.

Tuesday being appointed by the church as a day of humiliation, fasting, and prayer, on his account, he sent them the following message, which he spoke with the utmost zeal and most melting affection, though he was so weak as to be supported by two persons while he delivered it. "I desire," said he to an officer of the church, then present, "you will be a mouth for me this day to the church. Give my love to them as a fellow-member, as a minister of Christ, and as their pastor. Tell them that I am now going to my God and their God, to my Father and their Father. I desire them all to join in praises to God for the exceeding abundant riches of his grace and mercy to me. These words, 'Thy sins which are many are forgiven,' have been set home upon my soul with such power and joy, as almost to overset the tabernacle: they were once words to me as life from death, and now they are life in death. I am concerned for that little hill in Mount Zion. Some of them, I believe, are seals to my ministry, and will be my joy and crown of rejoicing in the day of Christ. They have been a creditable and reputable church; they are now so; and it is my desire they may continue in credit and reputation after my decease. I now take my farewell of them, and commit them to the care of the Great Shepherd and Bishop of souls. Let them wait on God, that he may give them a pastor after his own heart, to feed them with knowledge and understanding. I desire them to show their love and value for me, by uniting in love and affection to one another, and by filling up their places in the church. They gave themselves not up to a minister, but to the Lord and one another. I desire them to walk closely together in holy communion and fellowship with God and one another, and then they may expect to meet death with joy and comfort, as I do now. And so I take my leave of them, expecting to see them in a little time, and that we shall be companions together, and be for ever with the Lord."

He very frequently expressed a great concern for the Deists, who deny a divine revelation, because they must be wholly destitute of any degree of that sweet comfort which he had received from the promises contained in the word of God: particularly he mentioned these words, "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin," as the great support of his dying hours.

After this, when he had in a very solemn manner bid his last adieu to many of his friends, and several of his brethren in the ministry, he said in the close of the day, "Now my work is done."

Wednesday, he was in the same frame of spirit, rejoicing in the Lord, and longing for his dissolution. Thursday evening, being asked whether his comfort continued? he answered, with his hands lifted up, "Yes, without the least cloud; Satan has not been suffered to interrupt it."

Friday morning, the morning in which he entered into glory, about an hour before he died, he said to some friends, "You will be asked by the world how I went off. You are my witnesses, that I declare with my dying breath, that my firm faith and dependence is on the blood, righteousness, and satisfaction of the Lord Jesus Christ, for my acceptance in the sight of God." After this, thanking them all for their kindness, he wished, in the most affectionate manner, that his God might be their God, and that they might be eternal companions with him in glory. One of them perceiving the near approach of death, said, "Sir, you seem to be very low." He answered with a kind of rapture, "Low! No, I am mounting up as fast as I can." Upon her saying, "Sir, do you feel any pain?" he answered, "No, I bless the Lord, I feel no pain; he has made my passage easy." Some of his last words were, "I am an instance of sovereign and distinguishing grace, a brand plucked out of the burning." A few minutes after this, he fell sweetly asleep in Jesus.

His funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. Samuel Wilson, from Luke vii, 47, "Her sins, which are many, are forgiven."

REV. MATTHEW HENRY.

Died at Nantwich, in Cheshire, June 22, 1714, in the 53d year of his age.

On the 21st of June, 1714, he left his friends at Chester (whither he had been on a visit), and set forward for his people and family at Hackney. He thought he had found very sensible relief from his journey to Knutsford and Lancashire, which encouraged him to make an appointment to preach at Nantwich that day, on his way to London. He was observed by all his friends to be very heavy and sleepy; but being asked how he did? he always replied, "Well." Mr. Sudlow, an apothecary, and very good friend of his, said, before he left Chester, they should never see him again. As he went by Dudden, he drank a glass of the mineral waters there. Before he came to Torperly, his horse stumbled in a dirty hole, and threw him. He was a little wet, but said he was not hurt, nor did he feel any inconvenience from his fall. Those who were with him, pressed him to alight at Torperly, but he would go on to Nantwich, and there he preached: but the want of his usual liveliness was taken notice of by all. His text was Jer. xxxi, 18, "I have surely heard Ephraim bemoaning himself thus, Thou hast chastised me," &c. After sermon, he dined, and was advised to lose a little blood, for fear of any inconvenience from the fall, though he made no complaints. When he had been bled he fell asleep; and his friends fearing he slept too long awoke him, at which he was not pleased. His old intimate friend, Mr. Illidge, was with him, and had been desired by the Hon. Sir Thomas Delves and his lady to invite him to Doddington, and he fully intended to have waited on them; their steward was there with Mr. Illidge, to conduct him to that house, which has been famed for impartial and disinterested religion, but he was not able to proceed any further. He went to bed at Mr. Mottershed's house, and said to his friends, "Pray for me, for now I cannot pray for myself." When they were putting him to bed, he spoke of the excellency of spiritual comforts in the time of need, and blessed God that he had those comforts. He said to Mr. Illidge, "You have been used to take notice of the sayings of dying men: this is mine,—That a life spent in the service of God, and communion with him, is the most comfortable and pleasant life that any one can live in this world." He had but a restless night. About five o'clock in the morning, he was seized with what the doctors agreed to be an apoplectic fit: he lay speechless, with his eyes fixed; and about eight o'clock, on Tuesday morning, June 22, he gently expired.

His funeral sermon at Nantwich was preached by the Rev. John Reynolds, from Matt. xxv, 21, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

That at Hackney was preached by the Rev. W. Tong, from John xiii, 36, "Whither I go, thou canst not follow me now; but thou shalt follow me hereafter."

ILLUSTRATIONS OF 1 COR. XIII, 8—12.

1 Cor. xiii, 8, "Charity never faileth," &c. "Never faileth, οὐδέποτε ἐκπίπτει, literally, never falls off. The Christian, during his stay on earth, has to bear different kinds of fruit, all of which may be said to derive their existence and maturity from love; but all these kinds, with the exception of love, and those which love absorbs, may be dispensed with; when having "fought the good fight," and "finished" his "course," he takes his triumphant flight to the "palace of angels and God," to "lay hold on eternal life," and wear a crown of unfading glory. What need, for instance, of meekness, where there is nothing to ruffle us? What need of patience, where there is nothing to try us? "But love never faileth"—it is the cement of the heavenly society, and is there carried to the highest state of perfection. "But whether there be prophecies they shall fail. As though the apostle had said, The age of prophecy will soon be over; and indeed, all the predictions which are yet unfulfilled, together with those which may hereafter be made, shall very soon "fail" in their accomplishment. Again, "whether there be prophecies"—edifying instructions—"they shall fail," for they shall be unnecessary when the top-stone of the spiritual building has been brought on, with shoutings of Grace, grace, unto it: "whether there be tongues they shall cease," both as it respects their miraculous endowment or their wonderful variety. Those who shall at last sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God, shall certainly come from the east and west and north and south—but their various "tongues" or languages "shall cease"—shall be lost in the universal dialect of heaven: "whether there be knowledge it shall vanish away:"—not that heaven is to be a place of ignorance any more than of hatred—there both love and knowledge will exist in perfection;—but that all earthly knowledge, now so much esteemed and celebrated by men, "shall," owing to its comparative foolishness, "vanish" in the eternal world. Part of the happiness of heaven will consist in an increase of knowledge, but we may rest assured, so boundless are the treasures of heavenly knowledge, that, although our intellectual capacity shall be enlarged, our advance in knowledge exceedingly rapid, and there is an eternity before us, never shall the gigantic mind of even a Newton be able to comprehend the whole.

Ver. 9, "For we know in part, and prophesy in part." We only can know those things which are revealed. Those who are favoured with the Spirit of prophecy can only penetrate into futurity, and foretel coming events so far as they are inspired by the Holy Ghost. Ver. 10, "But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away," as is the early dawn by meridian splendour. Now, as though he had said, for something like an illustration (ver. 11), "When I was a child, I spake as a child"—very simply and very ignorantly—"I understood as a child"—scarcely any thing that I heard—"I thought as a child"—had just the simple views of children:—"but when I became a man, I put away childish things." Just so may it be said that we are now in the childhood of existence; but when we shall have reached the manhood of the future state, shall we put away, as unworthy of us, that kind of thinking and speaking, which was only suited to the infancy of time.

Ver. 12, "For now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face; now I know in part, but then shall I know even as also I am known." Now we see δι' ἐσόπτρου ἐν αἰνίγματι, by a mirror into an enigma: so far from having any adequate conceptions of a future state, at present it appears from these words, that we are not favoured with a direct, but only a second-hand view of its representation—(mark particularly)—what we see is actually a reflection from this mirror; and that which is reflected, is only an imperfect similitude (an enigma) of the original. Thus, for the present, we are left with the assistance only of a few inexplicables to guess about the nature and glories of the heavenly world: "Now, spiritual things are only represented to us by natural—the things which are not seen by those which are;—but "then," when, at death, we have "given up" the enigma—"then," when in heaven it is completely unravelled—"then," when the "day of eternity" has burst upon our regenerate souls, shall we fully know those things, of which here we only had a very partial conception.

Much obscurity has been the result of the rendering the words δι' ἐσόπτρου, "through a glass;" when I suppose that glass was not invented, and especially looking-glasses, till a period much later than the time when the Apostle wrote the first Epistle to the Corinthians. But if you will refer to the eighth verse of the thirty-eighth chapter of the book of Exodus, you will at once perceive a glaring impropriety in the use of the word by our translators, where it is stated that the "brazen laver" and the brazen foot were made of the "looking-glasses" "of the women assembling," &c. The use of the word mirror (of any kind of polished metal), removes the inconsistency of the passages.

REFLECTIONS ON THE LATE CALAMITOUS SHIPWRECKS.

"They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters, these see the works of Jehovah, and his wonders in the deep." Psal. cvii, 23, 24. Such were the inspired reflections of the devout Psalmist, who probably had no idea of the extent to which commerce by sea has been carried in our times. Friday, August 30, 1833, will long be remembered by thousands, on account of dreadful storms, which overwhelmed many in the depths of the ocean.

"Early in the afternoon of that day, between two and three o'clock, the Amphitrite, Hunter, commander, bound for Botany Bay, with one hundred and twenty-five female convicts on board, and several children, grounded about half a mile to the right of Boulogne, and within a short distance of the shore. Assistance was promptly tendered, but was refused by the captain in the most positive manner. His obstinacy is supposed to have proceeded from the hope that the ship would be got off on the return of the tide; and he is represented to have been further stimulated by the surgeon, who insisted, that as the custody of the women had been confided to him by the Government, it was his duty to take care that no communication should take place between them and the shore. When the tide returned the danger was irremediable: the violence of the storm continued unabated; and as the ship did not float, the perilous condition of the crew could no longer be concealed. The women, who had been shut up under the hatches, are said to have forcibly burst from the place of their confinement, the majority of them congregating in the cabin. A little before ten o'clock, the waves broke through the poop, and swept away in an instant every soul in the cabin. The work of destruction was soon completed; in a few moments the ship went to pieces, and out of one hundred and fifty-four persons on board, only three escaped to land, and one of these died a few hours afterwards! The captain is stated to have got on the same raft which bore to the shore one of the survivors, but a wave carried him off, and though he swam for some time, he ultimately perished. The surgeon and his wife also met a watery grave!"

Such is an abridged account of only one of those dreadful wrecks, which occurred on that fatal night: but what an affecting scene, independently of the sad catastrophe! One hundred and twenty-five of our countrywomen, unworthy to remain in their native land! How truly shocking! Banished from society on account of their crimes! Had any of them been brought to seek salvation by Jesus Christ? Doubtless they had been supplied with the Holy Scriptures; and surely we may indulge the hope, that Sovereign Mercy had granted some of them repentance and the knowledge of the truth.

Sailors, also; how peculiar their condition! how appalling their dangers! and how desirable to supply them with the Word of God, and other religious tracts and books! Surely the recent calamitous shipwrecks will serve as the occasion for more zealous and extensive operations of the new British and Foreign Sailors' Society.

VIEW OF THE MOUNT OF OLIVES FROM JERUSALEM.

THE MOUNT OF OLIVES.

THE Monnt of Olives, or Mount Olivet, is one of the most celebrated places in the Holy Land. It is situated on the eastern side of Jerusalem, distant only a "Sabbath day's journey," less than a mile, and separated from the city only by the brook Kidron, and the valley of Jehoshaphat, which extends from north to south.

This mountain derived its name from the abundance of olive trees which grew upon it: but its chief celebrity arises from the life and ministry of Christ. The Mount of Olives has three principal summits, giving names to several districts: first, GETHSEMANE, the place of oil-presses; second, BETHANY, the house of dates; third, BETHPHAGE, the house of green figs. The recollection of this will remove a difficulty, which has appeared in the statement of Luke, relating to the place of our Lord's ascension. See Luke xxiv, 50; Acts i, 12: and, further to illustrate the geographical situation of these places, Luke xix, 29—38; John xi, 18.

Mount Olivet, then, was the scene of some of the Redeemer's most glorious works, illustrative of his character and claims as the predicted Messiah. It was in this consecrated district that he raised Lazarus from the dead—wept over Jerusalem, foretelling its ruin by the Roman legions, and the awful doom of its infidel, guilty inhabitants—and endured his inconceivable agonies in the garden of Gethsemane. It was from this mountain that he rode into Jerusalem as the King of Zion, sitting upon the foal of an ass, while the inspired multitude proclaimed his Messiahship, singing, "Hosanna to the Son of David!" On this mountain he gave his apostles their high and universal commission to evangelize all nations; and from its middle summit the Redeemer ascended up to his celestial glory.

Mount Olives was once infamous through the criminal folly of King Solomon: for it was here that he built temples to Ashtoreth, Chemosh, and Milcom, the false and abominable divinities of the Ammonites and Moabites (1 Kings xi, 7, 33), out of complaisance to his wives of those nations. Hence it is, that this place was called "The Mountain of Corruption," by succeeding ages (2 Kings xxiii, 13).

Dr. Clark's graphic description cannot fail to be peculiarly interesting to all our readers. He says, "If Mount Calvary has sunk beneath the overwhelming influence of superstition, studiously endeavouring to modify and disfigure it, through so many ages; if the situation of Mount Sion yet remains to be ascertained; the Mount of Olives, undisguised by fanatical labours, exhibits the appearance it presented in all the periods of its history. From its elevated summit, almost all the principal features of the city may be discerned; and the changes that eighteen centuries have wrought in its topography may perhaps be ascertained. The features of nature continue the same, though works of art have been done away; the beautiful gate of the temple is no more; but Siloa's fountains haply flow, and Kedron sometimes murmurs in the valley of Jehoshaphat.

"The hill which now bears the name of Sion, is situated upon the south side of Jerusalem, part of it being excluded by the wall of the present city, which passes over the top of the mount. If this be indeed Mount Sion, the prophecy concerning it (Mic. iii, 12), that the plough should pass over it, has been fulfilled to the letter; for such labours were actually going on when we arrived. Here the Turks have a mosque over what they call the tomb of David.

"Leaving the mountain, where all the sepulchres of the kings of Judah are hewn, and regaining the road which conducts towards the east, into the valley of Jehoshaphat, we passed the fountain of Siloa; from hence we ascended to the summit of the Mount of Olives, passing in our way a number of Hebrew tombs. Here indeed we stood upon holy ground; and it is a question, which might reasonably be proposed to Jew, to Christian, or Mahometan, whether, in reference to the history of their respective nations, it be possible to attain a more interesting place of observation. So commanding is the view of Jerusalem afforded in this situation, that the eye roams over all the streets and around the walls, as if in survey of a plan, or model of the city. The most conspicuous object is the mosque, erected upon the site and foundation of the temple of Solomon.

"A spectator, standing upon the Mount of Olives, and looking down upon the space enclosed by the walls of Jerusalem, in the present state, as they have remained since their restoration in the sixteenth century—must be convinced, that instead of covering two conspicuous hills, Jerusalem now occupies only one eminence, namely, that of Mount Moriah, where of old the temple stood, and where, like a phœnix that hath arisen from the ashes of its parent, the famous mosque of Omar, is now situated. It is probable that the whole of Mount Sion has been excluded, and that the mountain covered by ruined edifices, whose base is perforated by ancient sepulchres, and separated from Mount Moriah by a deep trench, which Josephus calls Tyropæon, extending as far as the fountain of Siloa towards the eastern valley, is, in fact, that eminence which was once surrounded by the 'bulwarks, towers, and regal buildings of the house of David.'

"As we descended from the mountain, we visited an olive ground, always mentioned as the Hortus Oliveti, or garden of Gethsemane. This place is, not without reason, shown as the scene of our Saviour's agony the night before his crucifixion, both from the circumstance of the name it still retains, and its situation with regard to the city. We found a grove of aged olive trees, of most immense size, covered with fruit almost ripe. It is a curious and interesting fact, that, during a period of little more than two thousand years, Hebrews, Assyrians, Romans, Mahometans, and Christians, have successively been in possession of the rocky mountains of Palestine; yet the olive still vindicates its paternal soil, and is found at this day upon the same spot, which was called by the Hebrew writers 'Mount Olivet,' and the 'Mount of Olives,' eleven hundred years before the Christian era.

"Proceeding towards the south, along the eastern side of the valley, between the Mount of Olives and Mount Moriah, towards the bridge over the Kedron, across which, Christ is said to have passed in his visit to the Garden of Gethsemane, we came to the sepulchres of the patriarchs, facing that part of Jerusalem where Solomon's temple formerly stood. The antiquities which particularly bear this name are four in number. According to the order in which they occur from north to south, they are severally called, the sepulchres of Jehoshaphat, of Absalom, the cave of St. James, and the sepulchre of Zechariah."

Other interesting particulars concerning the Holy City will be found in our first volume, p. 169, to which the reader is referred.

DETACHED THOUGHTS.

CHRISTIAN MOTIVES.

How grandly has the Apostle described the hopes of a Christian to be "full of immortality!" They are redolent of the glories and reflective of the purity of another world, forming principles for action as far above the mere dictates of human philosophy, as that philosophy, even divine as by its votaries it has been called, is above the untutored instincts of uneducated ignorance. The love of Christ constraining man, is the most exalted and influential motive for virtue in its highest developement; and the grand principle of love's reaction to its first Author, "who died that we might live," "suffering the just for the unjust, that he might bring us unto God," is at once a source of the most exquisite feeling generated in our own bosoms, "of peace that passes understanding," and a cause as sublime as it is simple in its form, that "we should love him who so loved us."

To have the love of God as the motive, and the glory of God always in view as the end of our actions, should be the great object of our lives. It is not less our happiness than our duty; and by that wonderful and retributive action which seems to pervade the moral government of the Great Creator, the effect is not more certain, that in thus honouring God, and having our hearts ever fixed upon him and his glory, we are fulfilling our most reasonable service, than that we shall find its return in the prosperity of our souls, and in those inexpressible consolations, which he who knoweth what is in man will bestow upon us.

ARCHBISHOP LEIGHTON AND THE ROBBERS.

One day happened a tremendous storm of lightning and thunder as he was going from Glasgow to Dunblane. He was descried, when at a considerable distance, by two men of bad character. They had not courage to rob him; but, wishing to fall on some method of extorting money from him, one said, "I will lie down by the way-side as if I were dead, and you shall inform the Archbishop that I was killed by the lightning, and beg money of him to bury me." When the Archbishop arrived at the spot, the wicked wretch told him the fabricated story: he sympathized with the survivor, gave him money, and proceeded on his journey. But when the man returned to his companion, he found him really lifeless! Immediately he began to exclaim aloud, "Oh! Sir, he is dead! Oh! Sir, he is dead!" On this the Archbishop, discovering the fraud, left the man with this important reflection: "It is a dangerous thing to trifle with the judgments of God!"

THE BEAUTIES OF CHRISTIANITY.

Christianity compared with Atheism.

The groundwork of Christianity are the doctrines of the existence of God, and the immortality of the soul. The plants of the valley and the cedars of the mountain, proclaim a God; the lightning announces his power, and the ocean declares his immensity. Man alone has said, "There is no God." Has he then, when in adversity, never raised his eyes towards heaven; has he in prosperity never cast them on the earth? "The earth is filled with the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handy-work." If there were no other proofs of the existence of God than the wonders of nature, these evidences are sufficient to convince every man whose only object is truth. But there is another as powerful an argument: by renouncing the Supreme Being, they are obliged to renounce a future state; the soul, nevertheless, disturbs them; she appears every moment before them, and compels them, in spite of their sophistry, to acknowledge her existence and immortality. The only being which is not all in all to itself, is man: the soul is eternally craving, and if it be impossible to deny that man cherishes hopes to the very tomb, if it be certain that all earthly possessions, far from crowning our wishes, only serve to increase the void in the soul, we cannot but conclude there is a state beyond the regions of time. It would insult the understanding of our readers, were we to attempt to show how the existence of God and the immortality of the soul are proved by conscience. "There is in man," says Cicero, "a power which impels him to that which is good, and deters him from evil: a power as ancient as that God, by whom heaven and earth subsist."

If every thing should be esteemed in proportion to its utility, then is atheism utterly contemptible, for it is not of use to any one. Let us survey human life, and begin with the poor and the wretched, since they constitute the major part of our species. Say, countless families, is it to you that atheism is serviceable? What! not one voice raised in its behalf? What do I hear? a hymn of praise and thanksgiving?—these are believers!

With what despair would the rich man quit this world, if he conceived he was parting from happiness for ever! Religion enhances his pleasures, and prevents his being satiated with enjoyment, the natural result of a long series of prosperity.

The greatest generals of antiquity made professions of piety. No character is more amiable than that of a Christian hero; with the courage of the warrior he combines the charity of the gospel: he is, as it were, an angel sent by God to mitigate the horrors of war.

But it is in sight of the tomb, the awful approach to another world, that Christianity displays all its sublimity. When the atheist, at the end of his career, discovers the delusion of his system, he would fain return to God, but it is too late; the mind, hardened by incredulity, rejects all conviction. But the faith of the Christian is strengthened by his happiness, and his happiness by his faith: he dies, yet his last sigh was inaudible; he expires, and, long after his departure, his friends keep silence around him, in the impression that he is only slumbering; so gentle, so easy, is the departure of the Christian.

Religion speaks only of the grandeur and beauty of existence. Atheism is continually setting plague and famine before our eyes. Finally, religion assures us, that our afflictions shall have an end, she comforts us with the promise of another life.

> "'Tis religion that can give > Peaceful pleasures while we live;
> 'Tis religion will supply
> Solid comforts when we die."

The Future Happiness of the Righteous.

It has been asked, what is that plenitude of celestial happiness promised by Christianity? The purest of our sentiments in this world, is admiration, though this is always mingled with weakness. Imagine then a perfect Being, the source of all beings, in whom is clearly manifest all that was, and is, and is to come. Suppose, at the same time, a soul exempt from wants, incorruptible, indefatigable; imagine this soul contemplating the Omnipotent, incessantly discovering new perfections of Deity, and proceeding from admiration to admiration. Consider also the Deity as supreme beauty, as the universal principle of love, so that the happy spirit is wholly absorbed by the love of God. Lastly, persuade yourself, that the blessed are thoroughly convinced of the endless duration of their happiness, you will then have an idea, though very imperfect, of the felicity of the righteous: we shall then comprehend why the choir of the redeemed can only repeat the song of "Holy! Holy! Holy!" which is incessantly dying away and reviving in the eternal extacies of heaven.

REFLECTIONS OF A TRAVELLER.

There are periods and seasons in our life-time, in which we feel a happy complacency of temper, and an inward cheerfulness and joy, for which we cannot very well account, but which constrain us to be at peace with our neighbours, and in love with all the works of God. In this truly enviable frame of mind I awoke this morning to proceed onwards on horseback; it was a morning which was fairly entitled to the epithet of "incense-breathing," for the variety of sweet-smelling perfume which exhaled after the rain from the forest flowers and shrubs, was delicious and almost overpowering. The scenery of to-day has been more interesting and lovely than any we have heretofore beheld. The path circled round a magnificent cultivated valley, hemmed in almost on every side with mountains of granite, of the most grotesque and irregular shapes, the summits of which are covered with stunted trees, and the hollows in their slopes occupied by clusters of huts. A number of strange birds resort to this valley, many of whose notes were rich, full, and melodious, and their plumage, splendid and beautiful. The modest partridge appeared in company with the magnificent Balearic crane with his regal crest, and delicate humming birds hopped from twig to twig, some of them of a dark shining green, some had red silky wings and purple bodies, some were variegated with stripes of crimson and gold, chirping and warbling amid the thick foliage of trees. It is the contemplation of such beautiful objects as these, all so playful and happy, or the more sublime ones of dark-waving forests, plains of vast extent, or stupendous mountains, that gives the mind the most sensible emotions of delight and grandeur, leading it "To look from nature up to nature's God."

Sunday School Lectures.

LECTURE VIII.

"GIVE US THIS DAY OUR DAILY BREAD."

Teacher. Last Sunday I endeavoured to make you understand the meaning of redemption; who was the Redeemer; who were the redeemed; from whom we were redeemed. I also pointed you to the price, with which we were redeemed; and lastly, I tried to show you from Scripture, that the price of redemption has been paid for all men; consequently, if they will, they may return to their Father, their Redeemer, their Sanctifier, and be made heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; kings and priests unto God; escape everlasting ruin and damnation, and enjoy everlasting salvation in heaven.

What word did I explain to you last Sunday?—Redemption.

What did I show you was the meaning of it?—A buying back.

Who is our Redeemer?—Jesus Christ.

Who are the redeemed?—Mankind.

From whom are we redeemed?—Satan.

What is the price with which we are redeemed?—Christ's blood.

Teacher. I am now going to show you two things, which Christ has accomplished.

1. Christ has borne the punishment of the sins of the world.

2. He has obtained the Holy Spirit for all.

What is the first of these two things?—Christ has borne the punishment.

What is the second thing I am to show you?—Christ has obtained the Holy Spirit for all.

Teacher. Now, lastly, I will show you that much more is needful to salvation; and give you reasons why redemption, and having had the punishment of our sins borne for us, and the Holy Spirit being within our reach, will not, cannot, alone save a sinner.

What is the last thing I am to show you?—That redemption, and Christ's having borne the punishment of our sins, and having purchased the Holy Spirit, cannot by themselves save a sinner.

Teacher. The wicked are turned into hell, not so much on account of their many sins, as on account of the neglect of that precept, "Ask." Ask for God's Spirit, to make them clean, by washing away their sins in Christ's blood: ask for Christ's righteousness, the wedding garment.

Why are the wicked turned into hell?—Because they are not fit for heaven.

What have they neglected to ask for?—God's Spirit, and Christ's righteousness.

Teacher. I said that the wicked were not turned into hell, so much as a punishment for their sins, as because they were not fit for heaven. This must be truth, because Christ bore the punishment of the sins of all while hanging on the tree, as may be seen from John i, 29, "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world!"

What is the second thing that I have to show?—That the Holy Spirit has been obtained by Christ for all.

Teacher. One passage compared with another, will be quite sufficient to prove this: Rev. xxii, 17, "Whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely:" now compare this with John vii, 38, 39, and we shall see what this water of life is, of which every one here is invited so freely to drink: "He that believeth on me, as the Scripture saith, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water; but this spake he of the Spirit." All are invited; whosoever will, let him come, and be a partaker of the Spirit; and, if all are invited, it must be clear, that the Spirit has been obtained for all.

What is this water, of which all may drink?—The influences of the Holy Spirit.

Where are we told that this refers to the Holy Spirit?—John vii, 38, 39, "He that believeth on me, as the Scripture saith, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water; but this spake he of the Spirit."

What is the last thing that I have to show?—That though the punishment of a person's sins may be borne for him, and though the Holy Spirit may be within his reach, he cannot be saved if he will not receive these blessings.

Why are not these three things alone able to save a man; redemption, his punishment having been borne, and the Spirit having been put within his reach?—Because the sinner has not fled from Satan to Christ; because he is not fit for heaven; because he has not got the Spirit for his own; because his sin has not been washed away; because he has not got Christ's righteousness; because he is not justified; and because he is not justified, therefore he cannot be glorified.

Teacher. I have now given you my reasons for saying, 1st. That all men have been redeemed. 2dly. That the punishment of all men's sins has been borne. 3dly. That the Spirit has been obtained for all; and, lastly, I have shown you, why thus much could not save him, and how much more was wanting, and how he may obtain what was wanting, viz. by prayer. And what more now, in conclusion, can I do but entreat you to pray,—pray that God's Spirit wash you from your sins with Christ's blood; pray that Christ would give you his righteousness, and that thus being justified, God would finally glorify you.

ON THE STUDY OF GEOLOGY.

No account is given us in Scripture of the geological formation of the different strata, rocks and minerals, which constitute the interior and the crust of the globe. The knowledge of these is left to be explored and ascertained by the researches and reasonings of scientific inquirers. The intelligent curiosity of many in every country of Europe, has been for some time directed to a minute examination of the mineralogical contents and geological structure of our globe, and with the most encouraging success. Surprising discoveries have been made within the last fifty years; and on no topic has the human mind shown its penetrating powers of research and inferential reasoning more creditably than on this. It has already disclosed many of the animals and vegetables of the antediluvian world, and has explored several important facts of the ancient state, both of our surface, and the rocks and substances immediately below it. The silence of the Mosaic records on this branch of history, allows every latitude to speculation; yet that theory will no doubt be found the truest, the most scientific and satisfactory, which is most coincident with the Hebrew document. The Newtonian genius has, however, yet to arise in this department of our studies, whose capacious and penetrating mind can unite the facts and science of nature with the ancient sacred record. His reward, like that of our greatest mathematician, will be an intellectual immortality.

A little armour would serve if a man might choose where his enemy should strike at him: but we are told to take the whole armour of God, implying, that we shall be assaulted at every point.—Owen.

MRS. HANNAH MORE ANTICIPATING HEAVEN.

THIS "Mother in Israel" having "departed this life," many, on hearing her character and talents commended, will naturally be led to look at her writings, and if they have ever read them to reperuse them, to learn more particularly the springs of her actions, and the ground of her immortal prospects. This has been our case; and we have referred with delight to her "Reflections on Prayer," published in 1819, to renew her "Anticipations of Heaven," as described in that excellent work: we give them for the edification of our readers.

"When we consider the conflicts and the trials of the conscientious, watchful, praying Christian, we shall estimate aright the value of the consoling promise of that eternal rest from his labours, which supports him under them. And though rest is one of the lowest descriptions of the promised bliss of heaven, yet it holds out a cheering prospect of relief and satisfaction to a feeling being, who is conscious of the fallen condition of his mortal nature in all its weakness and imperfection. Rest, therefore, is of itself a promise sufficiently inviting to make him desire to depart and to be with Christ, even independently of his higher hope. The joy unspeakable, the crown of glory, and all those other splendid images of the blessedness of heaven, exalt and delight his mind. But it is, though with a higher, yet with a more indefinite delight. He adores, without fully comprehending the mighty blessing. But the promise of rest is more intelligible to the heavy-laden Christian; he better understands it, because it is so exactly applicable to his present wants and feelings: — this is not our rest. It offers the relief longed for by a weary, frail, feverish being. He who best knew what man wanted, promised to his disciples peace and rest, and the Divine Spirit has represented the state of heaven under this image more frequently than under any other, as being in more direct contrast to his present state — a state of care, anxiety, and trouble, and a state of sin, the cause of all other troubles. Perhaps this less elevated view of heaven may occur more rarely to persons of high-wrought feelings in religion; yet to the Christian of a contrary character, it is a never-failing consolation, a home-felt solace, the object of his fervent prayer. What a support, to be persuaded that 'the work of righteousness is peace, and the effect of righteousness is quietness and assurance for ever!'"

We have pleasure in giving some particulars of the death and character of Mrs. Hannah More, from the pen of a friend.

DEATH AND CHARACTER OF THE LATE MRS. H. MORE.

"Died on the 7th of September, at her residence in Windsor Terrace, Clifton, in the 88th year of her age, after a painful and protracted illness, Mrs. Hannah More.

"Few persons have enjoyed a higher degree of public esteem and veneration than this excellent and distinguished lady. Early in life she attracted general notice by a brilliant display of literary talent, and was honoured with the intimate acquaintance of Johnson and Burke, of Reynolds and Garrick, and of many other highly eminent individuals, who equally appreciated her amiable qualities and her superior intellect. But under a deep conviction, that to live to the glory of God and to the good of our fellow-creatures is the great object of human existence, and the only one which can bring peace at the last, she quitted in the prime of her days the bright circles of fashion and literature, and, retiring into the neighbourhood of Bristol, devoted herself to a life of active Christian benevolence, and to the composition of various works, having for their object the religious improvement of mankind. Her pen could adapt itself with equal success to the instruction of the highest and of the humblest classes, and the numerous editions through which her various publications have passed, attest the high sense entertained by the public of their varied utility and excellence.

"Her practical conduct beautifully exemplified the moral energy of her Christian principles. She was the delight of a widely-extended sphere of friends, whom she charmed by her mental powers, edified by her example, and knit closely to her in affection by the warmth and constancy of her friendship.

"She lived and walked in an atmosphere of love, and it was her delight to do good. The poor for many miles around her felt the influence of her unceasing benevolence, and her numerous schools attested her zeal for the improvement and edification of the rising generation. In these works of faith and charity she was aided for a long course of years by the concurring efforts of four sisters, who lived with her, who regarded her with mingled feelings of admiration and affection, and towards whom her conduct was ever marked by the kindest and most endearing consideration. It was truly a sisterhood animated by all the social and hospitable virtues.

"Mrs. Hannah More's last illness was accompanied by feverish delirium; but the blessed influence of Christian habits was strikingly exemplified even under the decay of extreme old age and its attendant consequences. Not seldom she broke forth into earnest prayer and devout ejaculation, and invariably met the affectionate attentions of the friends who sedulously watched over her sick bed, by unceasing and most expressive returns of grateful love. The writer of this tribute to her memory saw her only the day before her last seizure, when she expressed to him in a most impressive manner the sentiments of a humble and penitent believer in Jesus Christ, assuring him that she reposed her hopes of salvation on his merits alone, and expressing at the same time a firm and joyful affiance in his unchangeable promises. In her excellent writings she will long live, not only as one of the brightest ornaments of her sex, but as the benefactress of her species."

DIRECTIONS FOR STUDYING THE SCRIPTURES.

IN studying the Scriptures, it is peculiarly desirable that we should on no occasion depart any more from the usual and natural meaning of the words and phrases therein, than we do in reading any other author. They have been greatly disfigured by the forced constructions which men sometimes seek to put upon them, and much dissatisfaction has on this account been excited in the intelligent mind. The true construction of every part must be, not the possibilities of meaning which ingenuity may draw from the expression, but that sense and purport which the author himself, in penning them, intended that they should express. His personal meaning at the time, and not the import which our criticism can now extract, should be the great object of our attention.

AFRICAN REVERENCE FOR ELDERS.

Richard and John Lander, in their late Travels through Africa, speaking of the manners of a large town (Badagry), say, —

"We have observed one virtue in the younger branches of the community: it is the profound respect and reverence which they entertain for their elders, and which perhaps has never been surpassed in any age or country, not even amongst the ancient Spartans themselves."

SCRIPTURE GAZETTEER.

Brook is distinguished from a river by its flowing at particular times; for example, after great rains or the melting of the snow; whereas a river flows constantly at all times. However, this distinctness is not always observed in Scripture, and one is often taken for the other, by giving great rivers, such as the Euphrates, the Nile, the Jordan, and other rivers, the name of brook. Thus the Euphrates (Isa. xv, 7) is called the brook of willows. It is observed that the Hebrew word nachal, which signifies a brook, is also the term for a valley, whence the one is often placed for the other in different translations of the Scriptures; thus, that which the Septuagint translates the brook of cords (Joel iii, 18) and the authors of the Vulgate the brook of thorns, our translators of the Bible have rendered the valley of Shittim; and it is thought to be the brook of Cedron, which running between the city of Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives, discharges itself into the Dead-Sea.

C.

Cabul (displeasing or dirty), the name which Hiram, king of Tyre, gave to the twenty cities in the land of Galilee, of which Solomon made him a present, in acknowledgment for the great services he had done him in building the temple. (1 Kings ix, 15.) These cities not being agreeable to Hiram when he came to see them, he called them the land of Cabul, which in the Hebrew tongue denotes displeasing or dirty. As to the situation of these cities, it is reasonable to suppose that they lay towards Tyre, whereof Hiram was king.

Cesarea (a bush of hair), a city built by Herod the Great, and thus called in honour of Augustus, being formerly called the Tower of Strato. This city stood on the sea side, on the coast of Phœnicia, and was very convenient for trade, but that it had a bad harbour. To remedy this, he ordered a mole to be made, in the form of a half-moon, and large enough for a royal navy to ride in. The buildings of this town were all of marble, as well the private houses as the palaces; but the master-piece of all was the port, whereof we meet with a description in Josephus, Ant. lib. xv, c. 15. This city, which was six hundred furlongs from Jerusalem, is often spoken of in the New Testament. Here it was that King Agrippa was smitten by the Lord, for neglecting to give God the glory, when the people were so liberal to him of praises. Cornelius the Centurion, who was baptized by St. Peter, lived at Cesarea. There, Philip the Deacon, with his four maiden daughters, had their habitation. At Cesarea, the prophet Agabus foretold to Paul, that he would be bound and confined by his enemies at Jerusalem, &c. Lastly, the same Apostle continued two years a prisoner at Cesarea, till he was conducted to Rome, where he had appealed to Nero's tribunal.

Calneh, a city in the land of Shinar, built by Nimrod, and the last city mentioned (Gen. x, 10) as belonging to his kingdom. It is believed to be the same with Calno, mentioned in Isaiah (x, 9), and with Canneh in Ezekiel (xxvii, 23) with still greater variation. It is observed, that it must have been situated in Mesopotamia, since the prophet joins it with Haran, Eden, Assyria, and Chilmad, which carried on a trade with Tyre. It is said by the Chaldee interpreter, as also by Eusebius and Jerome, to be the same with Ctesiphon, standing upon the Tigris, about three miles distant from Velencia, and that it was once the capital city of the Parthians.

Calvary (the place of a skull), Mount, is a small eminency, or hill, on the greater Mount Moriah. It was anciently appropriated to the execution of malefactors, and therefore shut out of the walls of the city, as an execrable and polluted place. But since it was made the altar on which was offered up the precious and all-sufficient sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, it has recovered itself from that infamy, and has been always reverenced and resorted to with such devotion by all Christians, that it has attracted the city round about it, and stands now in the midst of Jerusalem; a great part of the hill of Sion being shut out of the walls, to make room for the admission of Calvary! This mount is likewise honoured with a stately church, erected by Helena, mother to Constantine the Great, called the Church of the Sepulchre, as being built over the place where our Saviour's sepulchre stood. This church is enriched with abundance of magnificent ornaments; and Mount Calvary is more honoured by Christians, than Old Jerusalem ever was by the children of the synagogue. Maundrel gives a very minute and entertaining description of the many superstitious ceremonies observed here by pilgrims and devotees, who visit the holy sepulchre, as may be seen in his Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 70, &c.

Cana (zeal), of Galilee, a little town where Jesus performed his first miracle (John ii, 1). Nathaniel was of Cana in Galilee, where our Lord was invited three days after he had received Nathaniel as a disciple. This is called Cana of Galilee, to distinguish it from Cana, or Shana, mentioned in Joshua xix, 28, belonging to the tribe of Asher, and lying not far from Sidon, and so situated much farther north than Cana of Galilee, which lay in the tribe of Zebulon, and not far from Nazareth.

Capernaum (field of repentance), a city celebrated in the Gospels, being the place where Jesus usually resided during the time of his ministry. This city is nowhere mentioned in the Old Testament, under this or any other name like it, and therefore it is not improbable that it was one of those towns which the Jews built after their return from the Babylonish captivity. It stood on the sea coast, i. e. on the coast of the sea of Galilee, in the borders of Zebulun and Naphtalim, and, consequently, towards the upper part thereof. It took its name, no doubt, from an adjacent spring of great repute for its clear and limpid waters, and which, according to Josephus, was by the natives called Capernam. As this spring might be some inducement to the building the town in the place where it stood, so its being a convenient wafting place from Galilee to any part of the other side of the sea, might be some motive to our Lord for his moving from Nazareth, and making this the place of his constant residence. Upon this account, Capernaum was highly honoured, and said by our Lord himself to be exalted unto heaven; and because it made no right use of his signal favour, it drew from him the severe denunciation, that it should be brought down to hell, which has certainly been verified: for, so far is it from being the metropolis of all Galilee (as it once was), that it consisted long since of no more than six poor fishermen's cottages, and may perhaps be now totally desolate.

Caphtor (a sphere), the island Caphtor, whence came the Caphtorims, otherwise called the Cheritims or Cherithites, and the Philistines. The generality of interpreters believe, that by Caphtor was signified Cappadocia; and by the Caphtorims the Cappadocians. But F. Calmet is of opinion, that by Caphtor is meant the isle of Crete, and this opinion he supports by many learned arguments in a particular dissertation prefixed to the first book of Samuel, which well deserves the inquisitive reader's attentive perusal.

Death-Bed Testimonies.

COLLECTED BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM BUTTON.

No. IX.

REV. THOMAS JONES,

Chaplain of St. Saviour's, Southwark. Died June 6, 1762.

The present times afford many instances of triumphant faith, and there is a very striking one before us. Whose death was ever more precious than our brother's, in the sight of the Lord? How could God show his love to him upon his dying bed more than he did? Although his fever was violent for seven days, yet his soul was still calm. He was not troubled with any fear of death, that was kindly taken away. He had no doubt concerning his eternal state. He was made patient to God's will, bore pain without murmuring, and waited the Lord's time for his release. Were not these undoubted proofs of the Lord's love to him? He suffered his faith to be tried in the fire, that it might come out like gold, purer and brighter; and it stood in the fire, rejoiced in it, and was refined by it. In one of his weakest hours, he said, "Blessed be the Lord for that degree of faith which he hath given me, though it has operated in so weak a manner, yet I have many blessed and comfortable marks in my own soul of his love to me." Here was faith, and much humility. A servant of Christ went to see him in his illness, and asked him how he did? He answered, "I am so full of pain, that I can think but little; but I know that Jesus is carrying on the interest of my poor soul, notwithstanding." These are to me the choicest of his dying words. I see in them a well-grounded trust and confidence in God, far more deep and solid than all the rejoicing of triumphant faith. For when he had not this to comfort him, he had what was better; when he had no sight, he could walk by faith. He could find nothing in himself to put the least trust in, as to his acceptance with God, and therefore his trust was stronger in Christ. This showed itself in what he said on his death-bed, "What an unfelt, what an unthought-of corruption is here, both in body and in soul." He felt more of it, and to a greater degree, than he had ever thought of before; and yet this deep sense of corruption did not drive him from Christ, but made his faith cleave the closer to him: "My flesh and my heart faileth (said he), but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever." His ground for this, he declared, was, "A covenant of mercy, free grace in the Lord Jesus:" in which, knowing he had a share, he could say, "Now let thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation; now, Lord, I can lay myself down in peace, and safely take my rest." In this happy frame he was praying, "Lord, secure a soul thou hast died to save." Then, after a pause, he cried, "He will! He will! I have part here, I shall soon have all." He said on Friday, "I have had a glorious view of the love of Christ to my soul this morning." This love shed abroad in his heart, brought many sweet words out of his dying mouth, such as, "For me to live is Christ, to die is gain; come, Lord Jesus, come quickly, and give me an easy dismission; Lord, give me an easy dismission to a blessed eternity." This triumphant faith held out to the last. He looked forward with joy when he said, "Before this time to-morrow, it may be, I shall be where all sorrow shall be done away." And at another time he said, "I shall have a sabbath of Trinity before I thought of it, to worship a Triune God," which was granted him: he kept his Trinity Sunday in heaven, adoring the Three Persons in One Jehovah. Was there not great faith, and great conjugal affection, in what he said to Mrs. Jones? "Don't be surprised at any alteration you may see in me, for death always makes strange alterations; when the Lord is pleased to give me my dismission, rejoice over my corpse, and praise God for what we have suffered together here, and for what we shall enjoy together hereafter." Towards his latter end, he was much in prayer. These were some of his expressions, "The silver cords of life are breaking, and man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets; Lord, guide me home in safety, and lead me through the shadow of death; this mortal shall soon put on immortality; though worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God, whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another. I go hence like a shadow that declineth, I wither away like grass, but the Lord is the portion of my soul, and strong hope." His hope did not fail him, God was with him when he died, so that he had no evil to fear when he went down into the valley of the shadow of death. His body was left to rest in peace, and his soul is with that innumerable company who are standing round the throne, and praising God and the Lamb, for ever and ever.

Funeral sermon preached by the Rev. W. Romaine, from Psalm cxvi, 15, "Precious in the sight of the Lord, is the death of his saints."

REV. JOHN BAILEY.

Died 1697, aged 54.

At the age of twenty-two, he was settled at Chester, and was imprisoned for Nonconformity. He afterwards went to Ireland, and then to New England, where he laboured fourteen years: at length, dismal pains of the gout, with a complication of maladies, confined him for three months. During which time, he derived peculiar pleasure from reading the 53d of Isaiah, concerning the sorrows of our Lord, whereby all our sorrows are sanctified.

For some time in his last sickness, his heavenly soul was harassed with terrible discouragements; under which it was yet a common expression with him, "The Master hath done all things well." But at last he attained a blessed satisfaction that he was going into eternal peace. When his affectionate friends were weeping around him, he rebuked them, saying, "Away with your idols! Away with your idols!" A little before his last illness, he wrote in his diary, "I was affected with what I read of Mr. Shewel, of Coventry, who died in the pulpit. Lord, let me not die meanly, but in dying, bring much glory to Thee." And so it was. Just as he was going to expire, he seemed as if he had some extraordinary apprehension of the glory in which our Lord is enthroned above. He strove to speak to his virtuous consort, and at length exclaimed, "Oh! what shall I say? he is altogether lovely:" and to another relative, "Oh! all our praises of him here are poor low things." He then added, "His glorious angels are come for me." Upon which, he closed his eyes about three o'clock on the Lord's day afternoon, and never opened them more.

Funeral sermon preached by Mr. Cotton Mather, at his own desire, from Psalm xxxi, 5, "Into thine hand I commit my spirit."

ON ALEXANDER.

No marvel, thou, great monarch, didst complain,
And weep there were no other worlds to gain:
Thy griefs and thy complaints were not amiss;
He had need grieve, who finds no world but this.

Quarles.

"O LOVE THE LORD!"—PSALM XXXI, 23.

Do not I love Thee, O my Lord,
  And long to love Thee more?
More than the food that crowns my board,
  Or heaps of golden store?

More than the blood within my veins,
  The life which Thou hast given?
More than all other good or gains,
  The gifts of bounteous Heaven?

O! what were life without thy love?
  Once felt, what else can bring
Such perfect taste of bliss above,
  Of life's eternal spring?

I love thy watchful providence:
  Preserv'd by day and night,
I see the good thine hands dispense,
  With ever new delight.

I love thy reign, O Lord of Hosts!
  Thine is this earthly ball:
Thy retributions and rewards
  Extend alike to all.

I love thy wise and just control
  O'er all things that have breath;
'Tis this preserves the mighty whole
  From anarchy and death.

I love all nature, for 'tis thine:
  Thy riches spread abroad
Bespeak beneficence divine,
  The goodness of my God.

These springs of love and joy arise
  Wherever I may be;
They daily cheer my heart and eyes,—
  God is in all I see.

But, O! the cross! the wondrous cross!
  What scenes of love unfold
In that mysterious gift to us,—
  Love never to be told.

O may this love inspire my soul
  With love unquenchable,
Long as eternal ages roll,
  Increasing as they swell.

ON DEATH.

Death's awful front can ne'er dismay
  The Christian's happy mind,
Which can the gloomy grave survey,
  In faith and hope resign'd.

Sure the redeem'd should never dread
  To quit this scene of strife;
For well they know, that from the dead
  They 'll rise to purer life.

Gather'd beneath their Saviour's wing,
  With kind paternal care,
How can they feel Death's bitter sting,
  And hell's dire torments share?

How sweet to them the sleep of death!
  For angels soothe their rest;
And, quicken'd by their Saviour's breath,
  They wake among the bless'd!

Death is to them but transient night,
  Life shrouded in the clay;
From which they wing their joyous flight
  To an ETERNAL DAY!

IS IT WELL?

Three Important Questions to Wives and Mothers. By C. T. Bedell, D.D. Rector of St. Andrew's, Philadelphia. London, Tract Society, 32mo. half-bd. pp. 118.

THIS is a very precious little volume, which in the most earnest manner we recommend to be seriously perused by every wife and every mother. Dr. Bedell is entitled to the warmest thanks, not only of American wives and mothers, but of all bearing those most important titles in Great Britain. From the following paragraph of the Preface, our readers will best learn the object of the work.

"The author conscientiously believes, that there are very few who understand the full weight of responsibility which they assume, when they consent to change their relative position in society, and thus, from the comparatively irresponsible situation of single persons, enter upon married life. The great design of the author, in this little work, is to state the responsibility of wives and mothers; and, as much as in him lies, to endeavour to stimulate them to the performance of all that is required at their hands. He has also sought to give such counsel as might assist them in the discharge of the duties on which he has insisted."

CHRISTIAN MELODIES.

THE SABBATH.—THE GARDEN.—THE CHRISTIAN.

THIS beautiful volume, embellished with twelve plates engraved on steel, is a collection of the choicest poems on the several subjects included in its title. We have no doubt but it will be highly prized as a pocket companion by many a youthful Christian, on whose account we give it our sincere recommendation.

ANECDOTE OF DR. MARSHALL.

DR. MARSHALL, a lecturer on human anatomy, a man of strong mind, had deeply studied the construction and laws of man, and was never happier than when explaining them. He once devoted a whole lecture to display the profound science that was visible in the formation of the double hinges of our joints. Such was the effect of his demonstrations, that an inquisitive friend, who had accompanied me with sceptical inclinations, suddenly exclaimed with great emphasis, "A man must be a fool indeed, who after duly studying his own body can remain an atheist." I felt as he did, but had not been aware that his objecting mind was spontaneously working itself into so important a conviction.

INTERIOR OF THE TEMPLE OF THE SUN, AT CUSCO.

ANCIENT PERU.

u, in South America, has long been associated in minds with the idea of prodigious wealth. Its s of gold and silver are greatly celebrated; and in ure Number, we purpose to give some extended unt of them. The fact is believed to be, that the ious metals are so plentiful in general along the rent chains of the Andes, that it may be affirmed, the Europeans are but beginning to know and enjoy the inexhaustible fund of wealth in the New World.

From what country the ancient Peruvians proceeded, is utterly unknown: but a regular priesthood had been established among them, and had subsisted for centuries before the discovery of America. Peru was first discovered by Balbao, A. D. 1513, attacked by Pizarro and Almagro in 1514, and conquered by them in 1531. It was in a measure civilized from its more savage state, according to Peruvian tradition, about 400 years before the conquest, between which periods there reigned twelve successive sovereigns, denominated INCAS.

MANCO CAPAC, the first of the Incas, with his wife, and sister Oello, appeared to the savage natives on the banks of the lake Titiaca. Their persons were calculated to inspire admiration and respect; their dress was elegant; they declared themselves to be the children of the sun, deputed by him, in pity to the human race, to civilize their manners, and to reclaim them from their barbarous habits. This assertion was deemed worthy of credit by the simple savages, and Manco Capac found a people willing to receive his laws. Having thus succeeded in gaining over to his interest a considerable number of adherents, he journeyed northward, fixing his rod of gold, which he declared he had received from his father, the sun, in the ground wherever he stopped; and asserted that he was commanded to build a city and establish his residence, on the spot where the rod should descend out of sight at the first stroke. On his way, the number of his followers continually increased; the vale of Cusco was considered an eligible place for a settlement; the golden rod disappeared; the foundations of the Temple of the Sun were laid; Cusco, the capital of his new empire, was built; and virgins of the royal blood were appointed to serve at the altar of the new divinity.

There was only one principal temple dedicated to the sun. This temple was in the city of Cusco, built of freestone, but its form is undescribed. The riches in the interior are said to have been immense. The walls were incrusted internally with gold, and of gold was the figure of the sun, of great magnitude, covering one side of the temple. This figure was round, like its original, with rays diverging from every part of its circumference; on each side of it were thrones of gold, on which were placed, in a sitting posture, the bodies of the deceased Incas. Its gates were of gold, and a cornice of gold, a yard deep, surrounded the top of the walls on the outside. In every part of the temple were exhibited, by way of ornament, representations in gold, of almost every object with which the Peruvians were acquainted. Besides these, were other rooms full of images; one in particular, in which was a silver statue of the moon, with a female face, seated on a silver throne. On each side of this image were placed, on silver thrones, the bodies of their deceased queens, embalmed like those of their husbands, the Incas, with such art that they seemed alive. To this image of the moon, as sister and wife of the sun, and mother of the Incas, the Peruvians sacrificed. Besides this chief temple, there were four other temples in Cusco, all of a pyramidal form; they were richly decorated, and called, "The Temple of the Moon"—"The Temple of the Stars"—"The Temple of the Rainbow,"—and "The Temple of the Thunder," which were all accounted servants and attendants of the sun, and were worshipped with inferior homage. Those of the rainbow and thunder were adorned with gold, the other two with silver. To these temples were appended a large court for the priests, where they met to consult on religious matters.

A number of select females, called "The Virgins of the Sun," were devoted to the service of the divinity. These, in Cusco, were all of the royal family; in the provinces, they were of the noblest families. They were admitted into convents at eight years of age, where they lived in perpetual retirement, and inviolable virginity, being permitted to see neither man nor woman, except the empress. If any man attempted to stain their virgin purity, the punishment of death extended not merely to the offender, but to the whole of his family; even his herds and flocks were destroyed, his house razed to the foundation, and his lands entirely laid waste. In these convents they were taught to spin, weave, and sew. The robes worn by the emperor and his consort on solemn occasions were prepared by their hands, whilst others of them dressed the victuals of the Inca.

The sacrifices offered to the sun, were partly animal, and partly of the produce of the ground. Many of the Spanish historians assert that human sacrifices constituted a part of their worship; and Acosta affirms, that two hundred infant victims were annually offered for the health of the Inca. These assertions are flatly denied by De la Vega, who, though he admits the prevalence of human sacrifices amongst his remote ancestors, maintains that they were abolished by the Incas, who never stained the altars of the sun with human blood, nor could conceive that their beneficent father could be pleased with such inhuman rites. Yet, upon the death of an Inca, or of any other eminent person, a considerable number of his domestics were put to death, and interred round their guacas, or tombs, that they might appear in the next world with the same dignity, and be served with the same respect. On the death of Huayna Capac, the thirteenth Inca, above one thousand victims were doomed to accompany his body to the tomb. Four great annual festivals were kept; the greatest of which were solemnized at the summer solstice, in honour of the sun and his descendants, the Incas. Besides these, there were monthly festivals, chiefly observed by the priests within their temples. A perpetual fire was kept in the great temple at Cusco, and the other temples throughout the empire, from year to year, under the inspection of the nuns, or vestal virgins.

Avarice and thirst for gold, inspired the Spaniards in their conquest of Peru. All the immense riches of the celebrated "Temple of the Sun," at Cusco, fell into their hands; and one of them, to whose share the "Image of the Sun" fell, lost it at play before sunrise in the morning! To follow Pizarro and Almagro, with their immediate successors, through the whole of their progress, would conduct us to every recess of villany; and disclose scenes of treachery, cruelty, and wickedness, in their most hateful forms!

Pagan idolatry is overthrown in Peru: and Popery, in its most degrading character of ignorance and superstition, prevails in this rich district of South America: but we trust the time is not far distant, when "the Sun of Righteousness shall arise, with healing in his wings," and bless the wretched Peruvians. Thousands of copies of the Holy Scriptures have been distributed in that country, and many are evidently thirsting for "the waters of life," which are conveyed by the word of God.

THE CHRISTIAN'S APPEAL TO THE INFIDEL.

If Revelation be, as some suppose,
An empty fiction, whence delusion flows,
The fabled error with no evil teems,
It charms me waking, and delights my dreams.
With seraph tongue it bids my troubles cease,
And points to paths of pleasantness and peace.
Nor will its comforts fail, when fails my breath,
But, like an angel, bless my soul in death.
Yet should the pleasing hope its voice inspires
Delusive prove, when aged Time expires,
The fond delusion, from all mischief free,
Hereafter will not, cannot injure me.
But think, should its tremendous threats prove true,
What must, O Infidel! become of you.

He that would be little in temptation, let him be much in prayer.—Owen.

THE BEAUTIES OF CHRISTIANITY.

On the Connection of Christianity with Literature.

HAVING thus far discoursed on the doctrinal beauties of Christianity, let us enter upon the second branch of our subject. The productions most foreign to us, the sacred books of heathen nations, excite in us no surprise; we find in all of them the ordinary chain of human ideas. The Bible alone is like none of them; it is a monument detached from all others. Twenty authors, living at periods very distant from each other, composed the sacred books; and yet their different styles, equally inimitable, are not to be met with in any other writing. But this is not the only extraordinary thing which men unanimously discover in the Scriptures: those who will not acknowledge the authenticity of the Bible, nevertheless believe that there is something more than common in this same Bible. There is not a situation in life, for which a text, apparently dictated with an express reference to it, may not be found in the Bible.

It would be a difficult task to persuade us, that all possible contingencies of fortune, with all their consequences, had been foreseen and penned by men. Now it is certain that we find in the Scriptures—

The groundwork of all the human sciences.

All the political precepts, from the pastoral ages and the patriarchal government, to the ages of corruption.

All the moral precepts, applicable to all ranks and to all the incidents of life.

Of the styles of Scripture, three are particularly remarkable.

1st. The historic, as that of Genesis and the Pentateuch.

2d. Sacred poetry, as it exists in the Psalms and Prophecies.

3d. The evangelical, or Gospel style.

The first of these, with a charm that baffles expression, sometimes imitates the narrative, as in the history of Joseph; at others, bursts out into lyric song, as after the passage of the Red Sea: here sighs forth the elegy of the holy Arab; there, with Ruth, sings affecting pastorals. This chosen people, whose every step is marked with miracles,—this people, for whom the sun stands still, the rock pours forth water, and the heavens shower down manna, could not have ordinary annals. Their revolutions are alternately related with the trumpet, the lyre, and the pastoral pipe; and the style of their history is in itself a continual miracle, that attests the truth of those things which it perpetuates. He who has the least taste for the beautiful, is marvellously astonished from one end to the other of the Bible. What can be compared to the opening of Genesis, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth?" God stoops to the language of men, to reduce his wonders to the level of their comprehension, and still he is God. When we reflect that Moses is the most ancient historian, when we consider him as the author of one of the most excellent legislative codes, and as the most sublime writer that ever existed, we cannot forbear feelings of astonishment; but when, with reference to Christianity, we remark, that the history of the Israelites is not only the real history of ancient days, but the type, likewise, of modern times; that the Jewish people is a symbolical epitome of the human race; that Jerusalem must be taken for another city, the Land of Promise for another region, and the call of Abraham for another vocation;—we want words for our sentiments, and are ready to exclaim with the prophet of old, "Before time existed, God is our King."

In Job, the historic style changes into elegy: here indeed we find the same simplicity, the same sublimity, as in Genesis. Job is the perfect type of melancholy, the emblem of suffering humanity; and the inspired writer has found lamentations sufficient to express all the afflictions incident to the whole human race. As, moreover, every thing in Scripture has a final reference to the new covenant, we are authorized in believing, that these elegies were composed for the days of mourning of the church of Christ.

With regard to the poetic character of the Holy Scriptures, we may use the words of the learned Dr. Lowth: "What is there in the whole compass of poetry, or what can the human mind conceive more grand, more noble, or more animated, what is there more beautiful or interesting, than the sacred writings of the Hebrew Prophets? They equal the almost inexpressible greatness of the subjects, by the splendour of their diction and the majesty of their poetry."

The third and last style of the sacred volume, is that of the New Testament: here the sublimity of the prophets is softened into tenderness; here love itself speaks, and the Word is really made flesh. The religion of the Son of God is the essence, as it were, of what is most celestial in all religions. The character of the evangelical style is a tone of parental authority, mingled with a certain fraternal indulgence, and unspeakable commiseration of a God, who, to redeem us, deigned to become the son and brother of men. "If the Scripture," says St. Gregory, "comprehends mysteries above the most enlightened understandings, it also contains simple truths for the nourishment of the humble and illiterate; it carries wherewith to suckle infants, and wherewith to fill the greatest geniuses with admiration."

Let us now consider the effects of Christianity upon literature in general. On whatever side you view the religion of the gospel, you find that it enlarges the understanding, and tends to expand the feelings; in the sciences, its tenets are not hostile to any natural truth, its doctrine forbids not study: a religion which can claim a Bacon, a Newton, a Grotius, a Pascal, and a Fenelon, such a religion may boast of being favourable to philosophy. We yet read with pleasure the profession of faith of that most illustrious man, Lord Chancellor Bacon, and the prayer which he was accustomed to repeat before he repaired to business: this Christian simplicity in a great man is truly affecting. Newton and Bossuet uncovered their heads when pronouncing the name of God: they were more worthy of admiration at that moment, than when the one weighed those worlds, the dust of which, with all its vanities, the other taught mankind to despise.

Whoever rejects those sublime notions of nature and of God which religion inspires, wilfully deprives himself of an abundant source of images and ideas. He, in fact, will be most intimately acquainted with man, who has long studied providence; he will be best able to fathom human wisdom, who has most examined the depths of divine intelligence.

The restlessness of the heart, the secret workings of the passions, will be inexplicable, unless we consult the counsels of the Most High. Let us then take eternity for the groundwork of the history of time, let us refer every thing to God as the Universal Cause, a God attentive to the interests of the earth; impiety, on the other hand, the immediate cause of the calamities of nations. Every writer who refuses to believe in a God, the author of the universe, excludes infinity from his works, he confines his intellect within a circle, from which it cannot escape: he sees nothing that is noble in nature; all her operations are, in his infatuated opinion, only the movements of self-existing machinery; and if he is thus limited in regard to the objects of nature, how shall he describe man with eloquence? For him language has no richness, and from the treasures of expression he is entirely shut out.

Christianity furnishes so many proofs of its excellence, that when you fancy the subject exhausted, another suddenly starts up under your pen. We have reasoned on Christianity in the arts and sciences, and are now called on to exhibit the decided superiority of its eloquence. The only species of eloquence used by the ancients were judicial and political, moral eloquence appeared not upon earth till the gospel dispensation. The orators of Greece and Rome founded their hopes of eloquence on the agitation which they excited in the heart: the eloquence of the pulpit has sought its success in a higher region; by appeasing the passions, she makes them listen to her voice. God and Charity, such is her text, ever the same, ever inexhaustible. Incapable of fear and injustice, she gives lessons to kings, but without flattery; she comforts the indigent, but without reproaches. The heathens were ignorant that real existence begins not until death, the Christian religion has alone founded that great school of the grave, where the apostle of the gospel imbibes instruction. In short, religion, in all ages and countries, has been the source of eloquence.

WHAT IS THE BEST PLAN FOR BIBLE CLASSES?

CHRISTIAN pastors, Sunday school teachers, and parents, are deeply interested in this question. Scriptural knowledge is divinely ordained to be the means of regenerating mankind, according to the inspired prediction, "The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea." Bible classes seem admirably adapted to promote that glorious object, and therefore an intelligent, practical answer to the question proposed, will be suitable for the Christian's Penny Magazine, and probably useful to many of its readers. Although my method may not be the "Best Plan for Bible Classes," yet as it has been found profitable in a considerable circle during several years, and part of the plan for nearly twenty years under my direction, it may perhaps furnish valuable hints to those for whom they are designed.

I take a section of some chapter in the New Testament, form a number of questions upon it, and copy them on slips of paper to the supposed number wanted, ready for the Prayer Meeting on Monday evening. This exercise takes place once in a fortnight or three weeks. After a brief exposition of the section, and reading the questions, any person present is allowed to take one; and those who choose write answers, putting them in a letter box conveniently placed in the chapel, for me to take out on the Lord's day evening. On the Monday evening I read them, approving those which are correct in sentiment and expression, and pointing out errors which any may contain. As no name is allowed to be put to any of the papers, I may not know who are the writers, which is sometimes the case; and corrections, in a spirit of kindness, exposing the inaccuracy, as it is not generally known whose paper it may be, are always well received, and become profitable. Some of the answers would do credit to a theological student; and the exercise is declared, by those who attend, to be peculiarly edifying.

A neighbouring clergyman had adopted part of my plan for similar exercise, with much benefit to his congregation. Should any clergyman, dissenting minister, Sunday school teacher, or parent, be induced to try the same plan, I shall be rewarded, his people or pupils will be edified, and God will be honoured, by an additional impetus being given to the habit of studying the inspired oracles.

ANSWER OF A YOUNG PERSON IN A BIBLE CLASS.

Sir,

I have had the privilege of attending several of the Bible Class meetings, and have found them very interesting, and I trust I can add profitable. Encouraged by what you said on the last occasion, I ventured to take a paper on leaving the school-room, which I found contained the first question proposed by you on that evening, "What is meant by Philip preaching Christ to the Samaritans?" In reflecting upon this question, I imagined to myself, Philip leaving Jerusalem to avoid the persecution which raged there, and escaping to Samaria. Arrived at this city, what would his first feelings be? Most likely, gratitude to the Most High, for deliverance from cruel and wicked men; and I think also he must have felt deep regret at losing the society of those with whom he had taken sweet counsel, whose hands had administered to him the bread of life, and who had called and set him apart to the honourable and important office he filled in the Christian church. But he would soon think on his future employment. Prudence, we might suppose, would suggest the necessity of his seeking retirement, of concealing his principles, of ceasing to appear publicly as a disciple of the despised Jesus of Nazareth. He could not forget the hatred which had been manifested towards all who dared to bear the name of Jesus. He could not but reflect on the martyrdom of his companion and fellow-disciple, Stephen, nor expect any thing better for himself, were he to stand forth as a soldier of the cross. The risk he must know and feel to be great, and that probably bonds, imprisonment, and death, would await him. But such prospects do not appear to have damped his ardour, or abated his zeal. He appears to have lost all thought of self; he felt and acted as a patriot and a Christian, as one who had been richly endued with the gift of the Holy Spirit, as one who had felt the love of Christ shed abroad in his heart, and which, therefore, led him to desire that the Samaritans might be saved. With a noble resolution then, and

"With arm invincible to wield
The Spirit's sword, the Spirit's shield," he stood forth to proclaim to his countrymen the words of eternal life. Disregarding alike the frowns and the smiles of men, he could say with the great apostle of the Gentiles, "None of these things move me;" and knowing there is "none other name given under heaven among men, whereby they may be saved," he "preached Christ unto them."

May we not with propriety conclude, that he preached Christ unto them as the subject of prophecy, as him of whom Moses and the prophets wrote? Knowing that they were acquainted with the sacred writings, he would appeal "to the law and to the testimony;" he would show that the long-expected Messiah had come, and the predictions made concerning his first advent, and the work he was to perform on earth, had all received their accomplishment; that all the rites and ceremonies, the sacrifices and oblations of the Mosaic dispensation, had reference to him, and prefigured the work which he came to perform. He would preach Christ to them as the Prophet foretold by Moses, when he said, "A Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you, of your brethren, like unto me;" as the Priest referred to by the Psalmist, when he sang, "Thou art a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchisidec;" as the King seated upon "the holy hill of Zion," "whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and of whose kingdom there shall be no end."

He preached Christ to them in the dignity of his person, as he "who was in the beginning with God, and was God, as he who was in the form of God, and thought it not robbery to be equal with God:" as the Creator, Preserver, and Upholder of all things, in whom all live, and move, and have their being.

He preached Christ unto them in his mysterious incarnation and wonderful humility, leaving the highest throne in glory, assuming our nature, and tabernacling in the flesh; living a life of poverty and of pain, despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; and, oh! wonder of wonders! at last dying the ignominious death of the cross, that the guilty might go free. He would show to them the authenticity of his mission, by the miracles which he had wrought while on earth. Philip would, and no doubt did, remind them that these mighty works were not done in a corner. He could appeal to them, and say, "Have you not witnessed, or at least heard from credible authority, of these things? Did not the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, the deaf hear? Were not the lepers cleansed, and the dead raised to life? Were not multitudes fed with a few small loaves and fishes? Was not his whole life spent in doing good to the bodies and souls of men? Yet with wicked hands he has been crucified and slain!"

He preached Christ to them as their only Saviour. He would tell them of the necessity of the atonement made by him on Calvary, and show, that while by his spotless life the law of God had been honoured, by his vicarious death the claims of justice had been satisfied, and the way opened by which God can be just, and the justifier of them that believe in Jesus.

He preached Christ unto them as risen from the dead, and ascended up into glory, and there exalted as a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance unto Israel and the remission of sins, to bestow pardon on the penitent, and reconcile the rebel to God. "Be it therefore known unto you, men and brethren, that through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins." He would exhort them to close in with the offers of mercy, reminding them, that if they rejected the atonement of Christ, there remained no more sacrifice for sin; that "whosoever believeth on him shall have everlasting life; but he that believeth not, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him."

He preached Christ unto them as an Intercessor at the right hand of God, living to carry on his cause; and being possessed of all power in heaven and on earth, would render unavailing all the opposition made by them to oppose his reign; that to him every knee should bow and every tongue confess, for he must reign till he hath put all his enemies under his feet.

Lastly, he preached Christ unto them as their future Judge. If they refused to embrace the sceptre of his grace, they must submit to his iron rod; for the time is approaching when he will be revealed from heaven with flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and obey not his gospel. Then,

> "Thron'd in mid-heaven, with crowns of glory spread,
> He'll sit in judgment on the quick and dead."

And then will all receive according to what they have done, whether good or bad. Those that have Christ for their Saviour and their friend will then be welcomed to glory; while to the unbelieving he will say, "Those mine enemies, that would not I should reign over them, bring them hither, and slay them before me."

Such, I think, we may fairly suppose to have formed the theme of apostolic ministration, and such to be included in the preaching of Christ by Philip the Deacon. And does it not point out what ministers should preach, and what their hearers love to listen to? If Christ is left out of the sermon, the basis of Christianity is wanting; and wherever Christ is preached, there may we expect success to follow. If I had room I should like to relate the anecdote of the Moravian Missionaries, who so long sought to reform the Indians, but tried in vain, till they preached Christ, when the most wonderful results ensued. Also the case of the poor Hindoo, who walking on spikes as a voluntary punishment, heard the Missionary take for his text, "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son, cleanseth from all unrighteousness," and jumping up, threw off his torturing sandals, and exclaimed, "That is what I want!" Perhaps, Sir, you will have the kindness to relate these anecdotes more fully.

I am afraid you will think me very tedious, and I shall therefore close with mentioning a circumstance that occured a few days since. Meeting a neighbour, I inquired of him where he had attended on the preceding Sabbath afternoon. He informed me he went a short distance from this neighbourhood, and heard an elderly minister preach. On asking him how the minister was liked, he replied, that some present complained very much; but, added he, I liked him very well, for "he preached Christ."

I remain, yours respectfully,
THE WRITER.

THE LOVE OF KNOWLEDGE.

THE love of knowledge, or of intellectual power, is, in its most perfect development, the love of infinite wisdom, or the love of God. Even in our imperfect life, this passion exists in a considerable degree; it increases with age, outlives the corporeal faculties, and at the moment of dissolution is felt by the conscious being, and our future destiny depends upon the manner in which it has been exercised. When misapplied to vague curiosity, restless ambition, and pride, the being is degraded, and sinks in the scale of existence; but when this love has been exercised on the noblest objects, in discovering their various properties, and applying them to useful and benevolent purposes, in developing the laws of God, and admiring them, it becomes then of a nobler kind, and raises its possessor to the most exalted height of honour which can be attained in this most transitory world.

Sunday School Lectures.

LECTURE IX.

"GIVE US THIS DAY OUR DAILY BREAD."

Teacher. This is the fifth Sunday that I have spoken to you on this portion of the Lord's prayer, and it is also the last. On the first Sunday, I explained to you the meaning of this sentence, as it referred to our temporal wants. On the second Sunday, and on the last two Sundays, as I shall also to-day, I considered it as referring to the wants of the soul: on the second Sunday, I went into these several wants of the soul very generally. On the third Sunday, we considered what was the meaning of the word redemption, who was the Redeemer, who were the redeemed, from whom we were redeemed, and what was the price with which we were redeemed; and lastly, I showed from Scripture, that all were redeemed. On the fourth Sunday, I showed how that Christ has borne the punishment deserved by all, both lost sinners and saved; that Christ has obtained the Holy Spirit for all; and lastly, I showed you that redemption, and Christ's having borne the sins of all, and offering the Holy Spirit, cannot by themselves save a sinner. On the fifth Sunday (i. e. to-day), I shall show what Christ has done for the glorified only.

What is it that we are to do to-day?—To show what Christ has done for the glorified only.

Teacher. The righteous and wicked, all have been redeemed, had the punishment of their sins borne, and the Holy Spirit offered to them: now the righteous having fled from Satan to Christ, taking advantage of his redemption, have prayed for the Spirit, who

1st. Has washed away their sins in Christ's blood, and has,

2dly. Sanctified them; then,

3dly. Christ has given them his righteousness, thus making them fit for heaven; and 4thly. God has justified them, and will also glorify them.

These are the four things which are performed only for those who are saved: if these four things were accomplished for all, then all would be saved.

What are those four things which are done only for those who are saved?—The glorified only are cleansed by Christ's blood from their sins, are sanctified, clothed with Christ's righteousness, and then justified, and when justified, glorified.

Why are not these four things done for all?—Because, if the sins of all were washed out by Christ's blood, if all were sanctified, clothed with Christ's righteousness, and then justified, it must follow, that all would be glorified, because then they would be heirs with Christ, and be entitled to heaven.

What is the meaning of sanctification?—The making of a man holy, willingly devoting himself to God's service, and loving God's will.

Who is to sanctify us?—The Holy Spirit.

Teacher. It is declared, 1 Cor. vi, 11, "But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God."

Where is it declared that the Holy Spirit washes a believer from sin, and sanctifies him?—1 Cor. vi, 11.

In what words?—"But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God."

Teacher. A man cannot go to heaven, without his sins having been taken away from him, because it is declared, Rev. xxi, 27, "And there shall in no wise enter into it (i. e. heaven), any thing that is defiled."

Can a man go to heaven in a state of sin?—No.

Why not?—Because it is declared, Rev. xxi, 27, "And there shall in no wise," &c.

What is the second thing that a true Christian has, and not the impenitent sinner?—Christ's righteousness.

What is the meaning of righteousness?—Good works.

Why will not our own righteousness do instead of Christ's?—Because we have none.

Where do we find this declared?—Rom. iii, 10, "There is none righteous, no not one."

Whose righteousness must we have then?—Christ's.

Where is this declared?—Rom. x, 4, "For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness, to every one that believeth."

Teacher. It is plainly shown that no man can enter heaven without Christ's righteousness, in a parable, Matt. xxii, 12, 13, where a king is represented as making a great feast; and it is said that those who came to the feast were obliged to have on a wedding garment; it is also added, that one guest came without a garment, and was consequently cast out. The meaning of which is simply this: The king is the Father; the feast, heaven; the garment, Christ's righteousness; and the man who intruded himself into the feast was a sinner without Christ's righteousness.

Where is it declared that no man can go to heaven without Christ's righteousness?—Matt. xxii, 12, 13.

In what words?—"And he said," &c.

Teacher. Now no man can have Christ's righteousness without being made holy, and no man can be made holy without having Christ's righteouness. A man must be made holy, before he can have Christ's righteousness, as you would strip a man of his dirty and ragged clothes before you would give him a beautiful new suit: the filthy rags are our own righteousness, the new suit Christ's righteousness.

What is the third thing that the Christian only has done for him?—He is justified.

Teacher. Justification means, being placed precisely in the same situation as if man had never sinned. Suppose a man to owe another 20*l*., and another was to pay down the money for the debtor, he would be placed in the same situation as if he never owed a farthing to his creditor; this is justification: and justification is caused by a man's sin being taken away, by being sanctified, and having Christ's righteousness, and upon this follows glory.

But man is not merely a debtor with nothing to pay, but a criminal also, with punishment to endure. If I were only a debtor, and Christ had paid the debt for me, I am no longer a debtor, and then I have a right to heaven through Christ. But being also criminals, we cease not to be criminals if another die for us. If I were a murderer, and some one died in my stead, I should be just as much a murderer, when my benefactor had died for me, as when I was under sentence of condemnation; and therefore it is of God's sovereign will, and that only, that I am saved, if ever I am saved.

From what I have said it follows, that to obtain sanctification, Christ's righteousness, justification, and glory, is, or ought to be, our most earnest wish: and remember what are the means, "Ask, and ye shall receive." But consider what David said, "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me." Strive then, trusting in God through Christ, to conquer sin and Satan, earnestly desiring to forsake unrighteousness, and those things which offend God, and as earnestly desiring to glorify him in your bodies, which are his; and then, for Christ's sake, you will not go away empty.

ON CHRISTIAN EDUCATION.

Part I.

" Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

Parents are naturally and honourably anxious about advancing the interests of their children; but they do not always extend this anxiety to their best interests. They prepare them for the world, but neglect to prepare them for eternity: their affection is warm, but short-sighted. Liberal learning need not interfere with religious acquirements; nor ought any human learning to keep religious instruction in the background, so as to render it a subordinate part in the education of a Christian gentleman. Let it be your chief concern to train up your son in the fear of God. Imbue the youthful mind betimes with sound principles and right habits. Consider that such are to be the elements of his future character, the fountain of honourable actions, the germ of whatever may hereafter be pure, virtuous, and lovely. In education never lose sight of this great truth, that irreligion is the death of all that is graceful and amiable in the mind — the destruction of all moral beauty: an irreligious man has no conception of any thing that is lofty in virtue or sublime in feeling. He does not look to God as the model of perfection: he will act nothing that is holy, for he does not honour His commandments. There is no true elevation of soul, but what the youth must acquire by the knowledge of God as revealed in his word; no perfect example but that exhibited to him by our Saviour. Nothing but the gospel, through the grace of God, will check his corruptions, give him a sense of his accountableness, and raise his nature above the degraded state to which sin has reduced it.

Let your child be made familiar with God's word, his providence, his controlling power, his superintending eye. Let him be taught, not barely to read, but to understand, to love, to venerate his Bible. Implant in his mind the evidences of Christianity, in the simplest and most explicit manner: furnish him with arguments to defend it, for he will not fail to hear it attacked. Teach him to despise ridicule, that last resort of the defender of a bad cause.

Learning, though it invigorates the mind, will not reform it: it will correct his taste, but not enable him to resist temptation: it will improve his judgment of the world, but not secure him from its pollutions. Human learning will only teach him the knowledge of others, the Bible that of himself.

Morality is disgusted by vulgar vice, by the practical sins of the sensual man; but mere morality can never extirpate the vices of the heart. His must be the religion of the New Testament. Be not ashamed to teach your son the gospel of Jesus Christ: other notions will occupy ground which you leave vacant. Oh! stamp right impressions on the heart while it is soft, tender, and ductile.

Hannah More.

"John xvi, 26, 'I say not unto you that I will pray the Father for you.' We are but little aware how much we are indebted to the intercession of Christ. But I conceive the meaning of this is,—I do not say that I will pray the Father that he will love you. It never was the work of the great Intercessor to pray the Father to love his people. The love of God flows from the heart of God. The intercession opens the way by which the love may flow to us in the way of strict justice and holiness."

LECTURES TO MECHANICS.

The important services rendered to the cause of Christ by the "Christian Instruction Society," demand the warmest acknowledgments of every well-wisher to the spiritual improvement of his countrymen. Amongst their other plans of usefulness, the establishment of an annual course of "Lectures to Mechanics" in London is a most valuable part of their labours, and offers to the working classes of the metropolis, which contain many of the most acute and intelligent of our countrymen, an opportunity of obtaining information on the most important topics of Christianity, from ministers of the Gospel eminently qualified for the task, in an argumentative form peculiarly adapted to the habits and feelings of the parties for whose benefit they are especially designed. We recommend to all our readers of this class an attendance on the ensuing Course of Lectures, which commence on the 1st of October next; and which, if heard with that degree of serious attention which their vast importance demands, are eminently calculated, under the Divine blessing, to make the hearers "wise unto salvation."

"As at sunset we observe the dark clouds of the western horizon, the lower edges of which, by their bright light, show the sun to be already risen in the country beneath them; I would say that they serve as an image of the hopes of immortality derived from revelation: for as we are certain from the light reflected in those clouds, that the country on which they border is in the brightest sunshine, though we are entirely ignorant of the surface and the scenery; so by revelation the light of an imperishable and glorious world is disclosed to us; but it is in eternity, and its objects cannot be seen by mortal eye, or imaged by mortal imagination."

WOMAN.

How vast, how complicate the debt
I owe to thee, 'twere vain to tell;
In childhood can I e'er forget
The voice which like a soothing spell
Beguil'd each grief? For I was rear'd
Beneath thy kind and fostering care;
Thy smiles my earliest joys endear'd;
As life advanc'd, more priz'd they were,
Prompting me manhood's ills to bear.

They feel not thy transcendant worth
Who love thee most in sun-bright hours;
I know thy smile can heighten mirth,
As daylight gladdens opening flowers:
But 'tis in seasons far more drear,
When dark despair o'erclouds the mind,
And sorrows know no bursting tear,
'Tis then in thee the wretched find
That charm peculiarly thy own,
Which seems, by art that all can feel,
The balm of sympathy to shed
On wounds which God alone can heal,
And call back Hope as from the dead.
None, none can paint who have not known
Such hours, what thou canst then reveal.

'Tis not thy beauty can impart
This influence o'er the mourner's heart;
It is the patient, quiet power
Of deep affection, given with birth,
Thy richest and thy noblest dower,
Whose meek and self-forgetting worth,
In bleak adversity's chill blast,
Endures unshaken to the last.

Yet though this glorious gift appear
Thy natural birthright here below,
Let meek humility and fear
Its holiest source both feel and know.
Mere earthly love may come and go,
As meteors o'er our path may shine;
But that which lives through care and woe,
Religion's influence must refine.
This only gives that higher zest,
To which thy spirit should aspire;
Thy influence o'er man's grateful breast
By this, dominion should acquire.

Man is immers'd in worldly cares,
And ceaseless conflicts; science; fame;
Commerce; the world's uncounted snares
Beset his every earthly aim.
Thine is the privilege to claim
A more sequester'd path: oh! strive
To cherish that ethereal flame,
Which shall mortality survive!
The busiest life that man can lead
Has many a moment's breathing space:
Seek thou for wisdom, strength, to plead
In such, for pure Religion's grace.
Then shalt thou in thy proper place
Meekly the Gospel's power adorn;
And prove, in more than form or face,
Man is indeed of Woman born.

BERNARD BARTON.

HYMN.

The everlasting streams which flow
In Eden's garden, by whose side
Immortal trees and flow'rets grow,
Are from that mighty fount supplied,
Which to our lowlier earth has given
Streams pure and fresh as those of heaven.
The music whose enchanting strains
Are wak'd by angels, first was taught
By him who to our groves and plains
The melodies of nature brought;
And those, like these, commingling blend,
And to his hallow'd seat ascend.

That God, who gave immortal breath
To million cherubs near his face,
Is he who disciplines by death
Man's here probationary race;
And gives delight, or sends distress,
Alike to benefit and bless.

THE MODERN JEWS' DAY OF ATONEMENT,

Tuesday, September 24, 1833.

Sacrificial offerings of atonement constituted the grand peculiarity of the Levitical institutions. Atonement was daily made, both morning and evening, for the sins of the nation. Exod. xxix, 38—42. This ceremony was doubled on the Sabbath; but its annual observance was attended with most remarkable circumstances of solemnity.

Divine inspiration directed Moses to institute these sacrifices; and the same inspiration of the Holy Spirit, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, shows their typical character as fully accomplished by Jesus Christ, when he "by one offering perfected for ever them that are sanctified," and gave himself a propitiation for the sins of the whole world.

The Jews disbelieve the New Testament interpretation of their prophets, and reject the Christian application of their sacrifices as prefiguring the atonement of Christ; yet they still observe the "day of atonement," which falls this year on Tuesday, September 24. The readers of the Christian's Penny Magazine will doubtless be edified by an account of the manner in which it is observed: and this we promise them in our next Number, desiring them in the mean time to consider the remarkable prediction of a Hebrew prophet, descriptive of the condition of his people in their state of dispersion and infidelity. "For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim." Hos. iii, 4.

ON OLD AGE.

Divine Providence seems to have intended advanced age as a season of repose, reflection, and preparation for death; and to have sent its infirmities, sufferings, and debility, as gracious intimations of our approaching change, and with a merciful view of our attaining, by those remembrances, to the end of our faith, even the salvation of our souls.

MOSES LIFTING UP THE SERPENT IN THE WILDERNESS.

THE DYING CAMP OF ISRAEL.

PAINTERS and poets have found ample scope for the indulgence of a fertile imagination in the Dying Camp of Israel. The melancholy fact, and the miraculous cure, furnish us with the most instructive lessons; and they are especially commended to our consideration by the reference to the circumstances made by our blessed Saviour.

Moses records that extraordinary event thus:—"And they journeyed from Mount Hor by the way of the Red Sea, to compass the land of Edom: and the soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way. And the people spake against God, and against Moses, Wherefore have ye brought us up out of Egypt to die in the wilderness? for there is no bread, neither is there any water; and our soul loatheth this light bread. And the LORD sent fiery serpents among the people, and they bit the people; and much people of Israel died. Therefore the people came to Moses, and said, We have sinned, for we have spoken against the LORD, and against thee; pray unto the LORD, that he take away the serpents from us. And Moses prayed for the people. And the LORD said unto Moses, Make thee a fiery serpent, and set it upon a pole: and it shall come to pass, that every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it, shall live. And Moses made a serpent of brass, and put it upon a pole; and it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived." Num. xxi, 4—9. Our Lord, in discoursing with Nicodemus, says, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life." John iii, 14, 15.

Clearly to apprehend the circumstances of the Israelites, at the period of this visitation, it will be necessary to consider the wilderness, the vast Desert of Arabia, in which they were sojourning, led by the visible tokens of the Divine Presence, and supplied in all things needful, by his special, miraculous providence.

The Wilderness "in which the children of Israel sojourned after their departure from Egypt, is in the Sacred Writings particularly called The Desert; very numerous are the allusions made to it, and to the Divine protection and support, which were extended to them during their migration. Moses, when recapitulating their various deliverances, terms this desert 'a desert land, and waste howling wilderness,' Deut. xxxii, 10; and 'that great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents, scorpions, and drought, where there was no water." Deut. viii, 15. The prophet Hosea describes it as a 'land of great drought,' Hos. xiii, 5; but the most minute description is that in Jer. ii, 6, 'a land of deserts and of pits, a land of drought, and of the shadow of death, a land that no man passed through, and where no man dwelt.' These characteristics of the desert, particularly the want of water, will account for the repeated murmurings of the Israelites, both for food and water (especially the latter): and the extremity of their sufferings is thus concisely, but most emphatically pourtrayed by the Psalmist (cvii, 5).

'Hungry and thirsty, their soul fainted in them.'

"In this our temperate climate, surrounded as we are with perpetual verdure, and with every object that can delight the eye, we can scarcely conceive the horrors encountered by the hapless traveller when crossing the trackless sands, and exposed to all the ardours of a vertical sun. The most recent, as well as the most graphic description of a desert (which admirably illustrates the passages above cited), is that given by the enterprising traveller, M. Belzoni, whose researches have contributed so much to the elucidation of the sacred writings. Speaking of a desert crossed by him in Upper Egypt, on the western side of the Red Sea, and which is parallel with the great desert traversed by the Israelites on the eastern side of that sea, he says, 'It is difficult to form a correct idea of a desert, without having been in one: it is an endless plain of sand and stones, sometimes intermixed with mountains of all sizes and heights, without roads or shelter, without any sort of produce for food. The few scattered trees and shrubs of thorns, that only appear when the rainy season leaves some moisture, barely serve to feed wild animals, and a few birds. Every thing is left to nature; the wandering inhabitants do not care to cultivate even these few plants, and when there is no more of them in one place, they go to another. When these trees become old and lose their vegetation, the sun, which constantly beams upon them, burns and reduces them to ashes; I have seen many of them entirely burnt. The other smaller plants have no sooner risen out of the earth than they are dried up, and all take the colour of straw, with the exception of the plant harack; this falls off before it is dry.

"'Generally speaking, in a desert, there are few springs of water, some of them at the distance of four, six, and eight days' journey from one another, and not all of sweet water: on the contrary, it is generally salt or bitter; so that if the thirsty traveller drinks of it, it increases his thirst, and he suffers more than before. But, when the calamity happens, that the next well, which is so anxiously sought for, is found dry, the misery of such a situation cannot be well described. The camels, which afford the only means of escape, are so thirsty, that they cannot proceed to another well: and, if the travellers kill them, to extract the little liquid which remains in their stomachs, they themselves cannot advance any farther. The situation must be dreadful, and admits of no resource. Many perish, victims of the most horrible thirst. It is then that the value of a cup of water is really felt. He that has a zenzabia of it, is the richest of all. In such a case there is no distinction. If the master has none, the servant will not give it to him; for very few are the instances, where a man will voluntarily lose his life to save that of another, particularly in a caravan in the desert, where people are strangers to each other. What a situation for a man, though a rich one, perhaps the owner of all the caravans! He is dying for a cup of water—no one gives it to him—he offers all he possesses—no one hears him—they are all dying—though by walking a few hours farther they might be saved! If the camels are lying down, and cannot be made to rise—no one has strength to walk—only he that has a glass of that precious liquor lives to walk a mile farther, and, perhaps, dies too. If the voyages on seas are dangerous, so are those in the deserts. At sea, the provisions very often fail; in the desert it is worse: at sea, storms are met with; in the desert, there cannot be a greater storm than to find a dry well; at sea, one meets with pirates—we escape—we surrender—we die: in the desert they rob the traveller of all his property and water; they let him live, perhaps, but what a life! to die the most barbarous and agonizing death. In short, to be thirsty in a desert, without water, exposed to the burning sun, without shelter, and no hopes of finding either, is the most terrible situation that a man can be placed in, and one of the greatest sufferings that a human being can sustain: the eyes grow inflamed; the tongue and lips swell; a hollow sound is heard in the ears, which brings on deafness, and the brains appear to grow thick and inflamed:—all these feelings arise from the want of a little water. In the midst of all this misery, the deceitful morasses appear before the traveller at no great distance, something like a lake or river of clear fresh water. If, perchance, a traveller is not undeceived, he hastens his pace to reach it sooner; the more he advances towards it, the more it recedes from him, till at last it vanishes entirely, and the deluded passenger often asks, where is the water he saw at no great distance? He can scarcely believe that he was so deceived; he protests that he saw the waves running before the wind, and the reflection of the high rocks in the water.

"'If unfortunately any one falls sick on the road, there is no alternative; he must endure the fatigue of travelling on a camel, which is troublesome even to healthy people, or he must be left behind on the sand, without any assistance, and remain so till a slow death comes to relieve him. What horror! What a brutal proceeding to an unfortunate sick man! No one remains with him, not even his old and faithful servant; no one will stay and die with him; all pity his fate, but no one will be his companion.'"

Calamitous and horrible as were the natural circumstances of the country in which the Israelites were journeying, to ordinary travellers, yet they were daily furnished with food and drink, both excellent and abundant, by a constant miracle. They murmured and rebelled against God, and his servant Moses: "And the LORD sent fiery serpents among the people," &c.

Dr. Gill, in his Commentary, remarks concerning these serpents: "There were great numbers of them in the deserts of Arabia, and about the Red Sea; but hitherto the Israelites were protected from them by the cloud about them; but sinning, the Lord suffered them to come among them, to punish them. These are called fiery, either from their colour, as Ælianus relates, to which the brazen serpent, after made, bore some likeness; so there were others in the same parts of Arabia of a red or scarlet colour, as Diodorus Siculus says, of a span long, and their bite entirely incurable: or else they are so called from the effect of them, exciting heat and thirst in those they bit; so Jarchi says, they are so called because they burn with the poison of their teeth. These very probably were flying ones, as may seem from Isa. xiv, 29, and being sent of God, might come flying among the people, and bite them. And such were in the fenny and marshy parts of Arabia, of which many writers speak, as flying from those parts into Egypt, where they used to be met by a bird called Ibis, which killed them, and for that reason was had in great veneration by the Egyptians. Herodotus says they are nowhere but in Arabia; and also that they are of that kind of serpents, which are called Hydri; their wings are not feathered, but like the wings of bats, and this Bochart takes to be here meant. And they bit the people, and much people of Israel died: for, as before related from Diodorus Siculus, their bite was altogether incurable. And Solinus says, of the same Arabian flying serpents, that their poison is so quick, that death follows before the pain can be felt: and of that kind of serpent, the Hydrus, it is said by Leo Africanus, that their poison is most pernicious, and that there is no other remedy against the bite of them, but to cut off that part of the member bitten, before the poison can penetrate into the other parts of the body. The Dipsas, another kind of serpent, which others are of opinion is designed, by biting, brings immediately a thirst on persons, intolerable, and almost unextinguishable, and a deadly one, unless help is most speedily had: and if this was the case here, it was very bad indeed, since there was no water. Solinus says, this kind of serpent kills with thirst. Aristotle speaks of a serpent some call the sacred one, and that whatsoever it bites putrefies immediately all around it.

"These serpents, and their bites, may be emblems of the old serpent, the devil, and of his fiery darts, and of sin brought in by him, and which he tempts men unto: the effects of which are terrible and deadly, unless prevented by the grace of God."

Moses says, that "much people of Israel died." How long this dreadful scourge prevailed, and how long their miraculous supply of water was suspended, we are not informed; but probably not three days; and God, having brought the people to repentance, graciously afforded them the means of obtaining a cure by miracle!

Our blessed Lord refers to this in his conversation with Nicodemus, as affording a striking illustration of his own work of redemption, and of the divine cure and spiritual salvation which sinners may obtain by looking to him.

Mr. T. H. Horne, in his valuable "Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures," remarks, "On the subject of the serpent-bitten Israelites being healed by looking at the brazen serpent, there is a good comment in the Book of Wisdom, chap. xvi, 4—12, in which are these remarkable words:—'They were admonished, having a sign of salvation (i. e. the brazen serpent), to put them in remembrance of the commandments of thy law. For he that turned himself towards it, was not saved by the thing that he saw, but by Thee that art the saviour of all.' (ver. 6, 7). To the circumstance of looking at the brazen serpent in order to be healed, our Lord refers (John iii, 14, 15), 'As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him, should not perish, but have eternal life:' from which words we may learn, 1. That as the serpent was lifted up on the pole or ensign; so Jesus Christ was lifted up on the cross. 2. That as the Israelites were to look at the brazen serpent; so sinners must look to Christ for salvation. 3. That as God provided no other remedy than this looking, for the wounded Israelites; so he has provided no other way of salvation than faith in the blood of his Son. 4. That as he who looked at the brazen serpent was cured and did live; so he that believeth on the Lord Jesus Christ shall not perish, but have eternal life. 5. That as neither the serpent, nor looking at it, but the invisible power of God, healed the people; so neither the cross of Christ, nor his merely being crucified, but the pardon he has bought by his blood, communicated by the powerful energy of his Spirit, saves the souls of men. May not all these things be plainly seen in the circumstances of this transaction, without making the serpent a type of Jesus Christ (the most exceptionable that could possibly be chosen), and running the parallel, as some have done, through ten or a dozen of particulars?"

This serpent of brass, which God mercifully ordained as the means of recovery from the plague, "was preserved as a monument of the Divine mercy: but in process of time became an instrument of idolatry. When this superstition began, it is difficult to determine: but the best account is given by the Jewish rabbi, David Kimchi, in the following manner: From the time that the kings of Israel did evil, and the children of Israel followed idolatry, till the reign of Hezekiah, they offered incense to it; for, it being written in the law of Moses, whoever looketh upon it shall live, they fancied they might obtain blessings by its mediation; and therefore thought it worthy to be worshipped. It had been kept from the days of Moses, in memory of a miracle, in the same manner as the pot of manna was: and Asa and Jehoshaphat did not extirpate it when they rooted out idolatry, because in their reign they did not observe that the people worshipped this serpent, or burnt incense to it; and therefore they left it as a memorial. But Hezekiah thought fit to take it quite away, when he abolished other idolatry, because, in the time of his father, they adored it as an idol; and though pious people among them accounted it only as a memorial of a wonderful work, yet he judged it better to abolish it, though the memory of the miracle should happen to be lost, than suffer it to remain, and leave the Israelites in danger of committing idolatry hereafter with it."

THE BEAUTIES OF CHRISTIANITY.

On the Forms and Ceremonies of the Church.

Let us now treat on the fourth, and last, branch of our subject, the forms and worship of Christianity. The common prayers of the church are admirable; it is only the habit of repetition that renders us insensible to their excellencies. Where is there a profession of faith so simple, pure, and luminous, as this: "I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible," &c. The Lord's prayer is the production of one who was intimately acquainted with all our wants: "Our Father who art in heaven:" this is an invocation of our great Creator, by the most endearing of all relations. "Hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come." May the spirit of Christianity pervade the universe, and the glories of thy paradise succeed thy reign upon earth. "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven:" this expression of pious resignation embraces the whole universe. "Give us this day our daily bread:" how impressive and philosophical! a little bread is the only real want of man, and that required but for the day; for will he be alive to-morrow? "And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us:" a code of morality and charity comprised in the very smallest compass. "And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil:" behold the human heart exposed without reserve! behold man and all his strength! Let him not ask to acquire wealth, or gratify ambition; let him pray only that he may not be attacked and overcome. Such is the Christian hero. None but the Author of human nature could be so thoroughly acquainted with his work.

The Sabbath.

This division of time is of the highest antiquity, and corresponds with that when the Creator rested from his work. The infidel government of republican France, endeavouring to uproot all religious institutions, changed the seventh into the tenth day; but terror, which was all powerful, never could compel the peasant to observe the tenth day as a day of rest, because the strength of man and of animals is inadequate to the exertion. The ox cannot labour nine successive days: at the end of the sixth, his lowing seems to demand the hours marked by the Creator for the general rest of nature. It is doubtless necessary that man should have some recreation after his labours; but as his leisure is beyond the reach of the civil law, to release him at that time from the influence of the religious law is to remove every curb on licentiousness. It was to prevent this danger, that the ancients made the day of rest a religious day, and Christianity consecrated the example.

The Funeral Service.

The last duty that we pay to our fellow-creatures would be melancholy indeed, if not impressed with the stamp of religion. Religion received birth at the tombs, and it is right that the voice of hope should issue from the grave, and that the priest of the living God should attend the remains of man to their last abode.

Among the ancients, the remains of the indigent and the slave were forsaken, almost without ceremony; among us, the minister of the altar is bound to bestow the same attendance on the corpse of the peasant as of the monarch. Religion then forcibly impresses on us the conviction of an awful equality; the great name of Christian, places all mankind upon a level in death.

Among the Greeks and Romans, the vulgar dead were interred at the entrance of towns; tombs on the public roads are the genuine monuments of the pilgrim. Besides the ordinary places of sepulture, the monuments of persons of renown were erected on the sea coast.

The Chinese have an affecting custom; they inter their relatives in their gardens: it is soothing to have some memorials of the friends who are gone before us. In speaking of the sepulchre of our religion, we feel that only this is truly worthy of man. The monument of the heathen speaks only of the past; the Christian, of the future; thus with respect to burial places, it commits the ashes of the faithful to the protection of the temples of the Lord, and deposits the dead in the house of the Living God.

Survey of Missions.

Here is another of those grand, original ideas, which belong exclusively to the Christian religion. The idolatrous nations knew nothing of that divine enthusiasm, which animates the apostle of the gospel; the ancient sages never quitted their pleasure to go and civilize the savage, instruct the ignorant, heal the sick, or relieve the distressed; but this is what Christians have done, and still are doing every day. Not an island, not a rock in the ocean, has escaped; and as of old, the kingdoms of the earth were inadequate to the ambition of the Macedonian monarch, so the globe itself is too contracted for their charity.

General Summary.

To have only a superficial acquaintance with the benefits conferred by Christianity, would, in fact, be to know nothing on the subject; it is into the minute details of those benefits, into the ingenuity with which religion has varied her gifts, dispensed her succours, distributed her treasures and her remedies, that we ought to penetrate. Charity, an absolutely Christian virtue, originated in Jesus Christ; it was his virtue that principally distinguished him, as a man, from the rest of mankind, and was the seal of the regeneration of human nature. By charity it was that the apostles, after the example of their divine Master, so rapidly won the hearts of their fellow-men, and so irresistibly carried conviction home to their bosoms. The primitive believers, instructed in this great virtue, formed a general fund for the relief of the poor, the sick, and the traveller. This was the commencement of hospitals: from that moment works of beneficence had no bounds. A flood of charity may be said to have burst upon the before-unheeded wretched. It may be asked, how the ancients managed without hospitals? They had two methods which Christians have not, to rid themselves of the unfortunate—infanticide and slavery.

Those who represent Christianity as checking the advancement of learning, manifestly contradict all historical evidence. In every country, civilization has invariably been a consequence of the Gospel. The reverse is the case with the religions of Mahomet, Brahma, and Confucius: they have limited the intellectual progress of society, and made man grow old in the ignorance of society. Christianity preserved society from total destruction by converting the barbarians, and by collecting the wrecks of civilization and the arts. Jesus Christ may, therefore, with strict truth, be denominated, in a material sense, that Saviour of the world which he is in a spiritual sense; it was by his gospel dispensation that the face of the world began to be entirely changed. The precise time of his advent was truly remarkable: a little earlier, and the nations had been found upheld by their ancient laws; a little later, and society would have suffered shipwreck. St. Paul says, "When the fulness of time was come, God sent his Son into the world."

The gospel has changed mankind in every point, and enabled it to take an immense step towards perfection. It is certain that the pagan nations were in a kind of moral infancy in comparison to ourselves. Christianity is a religion congenial to the present age, as the reign of types and emblems was suited to the cradle of Israel. The truths of Christianity, far from requiring the submission of our reason, command, on the contrary, its most sublime exercise.

With respect to the morality of the gospel, its beauty is universally admitted; the more it is known and practised, the more the eyes of men will be opened to their real happiness. "A little philosophy," says Bacon, "withdraws us from religion, but a good deal of philosophy brings us back again; no one denies the existence of a God, but he who has reason to wish that there were none." Rousseau says, "Religion has imparted softness and benignity to our manners and customs: what numberless works of mercy have been produced by the gospel!" The more, in fact, that we examine Christianity, the more it stands the test of reason, the more we discover its grandeur. Its mysteries explain man and nature, its actions support its precepts, we are indebted to it for every thing: it is the religion of a free people, for it instils into us a consciousness of the dignity of our nature, it connects morality with religion, and man with God. Were you even to divest it of its supernatural evidences, there would be sufficient left in the sublimity of its morality, and in the immensity of its benefits, to prove it to be the most divine and pure religion ever practised by man. Finally, framed for our afflictions and our wants, the Christian religion ever exhibits to our view the twofold picture of terrestial griefs and heavenly joys, it proves a real balsam for our wounds, it lulls our woes, and sheds around us peace, teaching man to look upon himself as no more than a pilgrim travelling through a vale of tears, and finding no repose till he reaches the tomb as the entrance to heaven.

THE DAY OF ATONEMENT AMONG THE MODERN JEWS.

According to the predictions of Moses and the succeeding Hebrew prophets, the Israelites have been scattered among all nations. They are still preserved, by the marvellous providence of God, a separate and distinct people, a living monument of the superintending government of the Almighty, and an incontrovertible proof of the truth and divinity of the Holy Scriptures, and of Christianity. These people still abide as Hosea foretold,—"without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim." Chap. iii, 4.

The Divine purpose is, however (and the state of that scattered nation manifestly illustrates that immutable decree), that the people of Israel shall be restored. "Blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." Rom. xi, 25, 26. The Christian apostle speaks in harmony with the Israelitish prophet—"Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days." Hosea iii, 5.

Though the Jews can no longer observe the ceremonies of their ancient institutions as they were appointed, they observe the days and times which were divinely ordained. The daily service which the modern Jews read in their synagogues, on the Day of Atonement, instead of offering sacrifices, is truly instructive; but its great length will not permit its insertion here. The following is the manner of the Jewish worship, as described by Emma de Lissau, in the first volume of her interesting work.

"Synagogue worship is always performed in Hebrew. On Monday and Thursday, the law is read, and on the Sabbath and all festivals. The reading desk is placed in the centre of the Synagogue, and the reader, and his attendant singers, stand with their faces towards the veil that conceals the ark or chest, where are deposited the scrolls of the law, crowned, and in the richly embroidered covers to which are attached small silver bells and ornaments. Reading, and even touching these scrolls are productive of emolument to the revenue of the Synagogue, and form no inconsiderable part of it. Withdrawing the veil—taking the law from the depository behind it—carrying it to the desk—reading a verse from it aloud—holding up the open scroll to the view of the people—returning it to its place—all these are acts of worship, and being deemed meritorious, are put up for sale at the reading desk, and awarded to the highest bidder. At high festivals, such as the New Year, Day of Atonement, Tabernacles, and Feast of Weeks, large sums are given for these privileges. Marks placed in the synagogue book, on the reading desk, are fixed to the names of the purchasers, and the amount is added to their yearly bills, which are always regularly discharged. They also pay for their seats, which are made to open for the reception of their books, synagogue veil, &c. Those who occupy the reading desk, and all persons ascending it, in consequence of having purchased that right, wear the veil, or garment of fringes, bordered with blue, and formed like a scarf, and a three-cornered hat. Prayers are read, by the reader appointed, and responded to by the congregation; but the most solemn prayer of the Jews, called the prayer of eighteen blessings, is recited devoutly in a low tone, by each individual apart, having his face turned to the east, where once stood the temple, in accordance with the prayer of King Solomon, at its dedication. During this prayer, they beat twice on their breast, saying, "We have sinned, we have greatly sinned." What a striking affinity is there between this and the "Mea Culpa, Mea Maxima Culpa" of the Romish worship! and the service of each, is in a language not in common use. Except in reciting the above prayer, the manner of Jewish worship is careless and apathetic; between the responses they converse freely, break off to respond, and again resume their discourse. This is the less to be wondered at, when it is recollected, that the service is performed in a language only known to the learned. Most Jews can read Hebrew, and recite their prayers in it, but this they do mechanically, and without any consciousness of what they repeat, parrot-like, by rote. They have no sermon, excepting two in each year, on the sabbath in the passover week, called the great sabbath, and the first sabbath in the new year. These discourses are delivered in Hebrew, by the presiding Rabbi, and are logical compositions, on moral subjects. The synagogues are crowded to excess at these times, and the Rabbi stands on a raised seat, placed in front of the veil, while speaking, but he is only understood by the learned part of his auditory!

"The veil of the synagogue is white, on the new year, and day of atonement. At all other times it is a splendidly ornamented one. The rolls of the law, veil, &c. are presents from devout Jews; and at solemn festivals, when prayers are offered up for the souls of the dead, departed benefactors to the synagogue are not omitted." Emma de Lissau, vol. i, p. 258, 259.

"The Shemonah Essra for the Day of Atonement, as said Evening, Morning, and Afternoon," contained in the "Daily Prayers of the Jews," translated, we recommend to the notice of such of our readers as may have access to that manual of their devotions.

The Thirteen Creeds of the Jews.

Christians entertain many mistakes relating to the descendants of the ancient people of God. Probably their most venerated form of Belief will be read with interest by many of the subscribers to the Christian's Penny Magazine, and we therefore insert it for their edification.

"I. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name, that he is the guide and creator to all the creations; and that he alone hath made, doth make, and ever will make all productions.

II. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name, is a unity, and that there is no unity in any manner whatsoever like unto his unity; and that he alone is our God, who was, is, and ever will be.

III. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name, is not corporeal, and that there appertaineth not to him any corporeal essence, and that there is no likeness to him whatever.

IV. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name, is the first and the last.

V. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name, he alone is worthy to be worshipped, and there is none besides him worthy to be worshipped.

VI. I believe with a perfect faith, that all the words of the prophets are true.

VII. I believe with a perfect faith, that the prophecy of Moses our instructor (peace be to him) was faithful; and that he was the master of all the wise men, that preceded him, and have succeeded him.

VIII. I believe with a perfect faith, that all the law which is found at present in our possession, is that which was given to Moses our instructor, peace be to him.

IX. I believe with a perfect faith, that this law will never be exchanged, nor will there be any other law given from the Creator, blessed be his name.

X. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name, knoweth all the thoughts and actions of men.

XI. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator, blessed be his name, will benevolently reward him who keepeth his commandments, and will punish him who transgresseth his commandments.

XII. I believe with a perfect faith in the coming of the Messiah, and though notwithstanding he tarrieth, I will await in expectation of his daily coming.

XIII. I believe with a perfect faith, that the resurrection of the dead will be whenever such a desire shall come from the Creator, blessed be his name, and exalted be his memory for ever and eternity. AMEN."

MRS. HANNAH MORE'S LEGACIES.

THE divinely benevolent genius of Christianity receives the most ample confirmation from the exemplary lives of many of its professors. And their death also affords the most delightful testimony to its godlike character. The late lamented Mrs. Hannah More adorned the gospel by her holy life—advocated its glorious principles by her powerful pen—and, at length, gave her dying testimony to its adaptation to bless mankind, by bequeathing a great part of her property to Christian Institutions. We copy the following from the Bristol Mirror.

ON OUR FUTURE ACCOUNTABLENESS.

IT should ever be impressed on our minds, that there is a day of awful inquisition, in which we must stand unconnected, single, and uncovered. It is not the best attachments we may have formed, or the most valuable societies to which we may have belonged, that will then stand us in any stead. We should therefore join them now with a pure and simple intention. We must not seek them as something on which to lean, and wherewith to share our responsibility; that is our own single and undivided concern. It is in vain to hope, that by belonging to any society however good, to any party however honourable, we can shrink from our own personal individual accountableness. The union of the labourers gives no claim to a division of the responsibility. In this world we may be useful among bodies of men; in the great judgment we must stand alone. Though we assist them here, they cannot answer for us hereafter.

ON CHRISTIAN EDUCATION.

PART II.

FANCY not that these pursuits will check his vivacity or obstruct his amiable cheerfulness. The ingenuous mind is never so happy as when in a state of virtuous exertion. Much less fear that they will depress his genius; his mind will find wider room in which to expand, his intellectual eye will take in a more extensive range: to know that he is formed for immortality is not likely to contract his ideas. And if to know that he is an immortal being will exalt his thoughts, to know that he is an accountable being will correct his habits: to know that "God is the rewarder of all them that seek him," will stimulate him in the race of Christian duty; to know that there is a day, in which God will judge the world, will quicken his preparation for that day. From his Bible only let him draw his sense of those principles by which he will be hereafter judged; and be careful ever to distinguish in his mind between the worldly morality of the multitude, and that Christian holiness which is the dictate of the Scriptures. Pleasing manners will attract popular regard, and worldly motives will produce popular actions, but genuine virtue proceeds only from Christian principles.

And after all, though you cannot by your best exertions, seconded by the most fervent prayer, command success, yet what a support will it be under the possible defeat of your fairest hopes, that you strove to avert it? Even if, through the prevalence of temptation, the perverseness of his nature, and the malignity of his corruptions, the best-founded hopes should be disappointed, what a heartfelt consolation will it be under this heaviest of all trials, that the misconduct of the child is not imputable to the neglect of the father: though it will not pluck the sting from his guilt, it will render the poignancy of your own anguish more tolerable. But let us indulge higher hopes and brighter prospects, from the rich provision which God has put into our hands for accomplishing his great designs in our favour.

Religious education, with God's blessing, which every truly Christian father will not fail to invoke, is all in all towards the restoration and elevation of our national character. Why then need we doubt, that the Christian religion, grafted on the substantial stock of the genuine British character, and watered by the dews of Heaven, may bring forth the noblest productions of which this lower world is capable? Though neither the security nor the triumph will be complete, till these "trees of righteousness" are transplanted into the paradise of God.

Reader, if you are indeed a Christian father, anticipate in idea that triumphant moment, when, having cast your crown at the foot of the eternal throne, you shall be called upon to give an account of your own conduct, and, as far as has depended on you, of that of your offspring. Think of the multiplied felicities of meeting in the presence of God, those whom your example and instruction have, through His grace, contributed to bring thither!

HANNAH MORE.

"THE results of intellectual labour, or of scientific genius, are permanent, and incapable of being lost. Monarchs change their plans, governments their objects. Fleets and armies effect their purpose, and then pass away; but a piece of steel touched by the magnet, preserves its character for ever, and secures to man the pilotage of the trackless ocean."

FORMATION OF THE CHRISTIAN CHARACTER.

CAREFULLY encourage the first dawning dispositions of piety in your heart; cherish every indication of a change in your views, and an improvement in your sentiments. Let not the world nor the things of the world stifle the new-born principle, nor make you ashamed modestly to avow it. Do not however conclude that a complete change has been effected in your heart, because there is a revolution in your opinions, and a favourable alteration in your feelings. The formation of a Christian character is not the work of a day: not only are the views to be changed, not only is the heart to be convinced of sin; but its propensities are to be bent into a contrary direction. Religion is an interior concern. Try yourselves—prove yourselves—examine yourselves—distrust yourselves: seek counsel of wise established Christians: pray earnestly for more light and knowledge, and especially for perseverance. Pray that you may be able to go on with the same zeal with which you set out. Of how many may it be said, "Ye did run well, what hindered you?" Carefully distinguish between the feverish heat of animal fervour, and the vital warmth of Christian feeling: mere youthful energy, operating upon a newly-awakened remorse for a thoughtless life, will carry the mind certain lengths; but if unaccompanied with a continued application for a better strength than your own, this will soon fail. The Christian race is not to be run at a heat; religion is a steady, progressive course; it gains strength by going: the nearer the approach to the goal, the more ardent the desire to reach it. If you advance, you glorify God, and promote your own salvation; if you recede, you injure the cause you now intend to serve, and bring upon yourselves a fearful condemnation. Self-abasement, self-examination and prayer, are the best preservatives for all who have entered on a religious life, and especially becoming young Christians. Though in your journey you may imagine yourself not so near as when you first set out, this is not really the case: you will have a lower opinion of your state, on account of your having obtained higher views of the spirituality of the law of God, and a more humbling sense of your own unworthiness. Even the almost Christian prophet seems not to have been so deeply convinced of sin, as when, overwhelmed by the glory of the Divine vision, he exclaimed, "Mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts!"

PROVIDENCE ILLUSTRATED.

See a fond mother and her offspring round,
  Her soft soul melting with maternal love:
  Some to her breast she clasps, and others prove
By kisses her affection: on the ground,
Her ready foot affords a rest for one,
  Another smiling sits upon her knee:
  By their desiring eyes and actions free
And lisping words their little wants are known.
To those she gives a smile, a frown to these,
  But all in love. Thus awful Providence
  Watches and helps us, oft denies our sense,
But to invite more earnest prayer and praise;
  Or, by withholding that which we implore,
  In the refusal gives a blessing more.

"Sin is worse than death or hell; for they are good for something, viz. to satisfy God's justice; but sin only abuses his mercy."—Pearce.

PAST, PRESENT, FUTURE.

I mused, while I turned on a feverish bed,
Recalling the changes I've seen;
"There is so much of grief and of grievance," I said,
"In the things and the thoughts that have been,
That they canker the budding of hope with their blight,
And o'ershadow the future with memory's night."

Then I counted the joys, and the beautiful dreams
Of the sunshine and stars of the past,
In the glory-gilt twilight of youth-time, which seems
To echo back bliss to the last:
And I said, "Life's a blessing, and man should be blest;
And the sorrows of life are but shadows at best."

It seem'd that I stood on the verge of the tomb,
While the flapping of ravens I heard;
I felt the sweet calm between gladness and gloom,
And patiently waited the word—
The word which should bid me descend: but my breast
Was still as the snows on the mountains that rest.

Too much I've enjoyed on life's journey, to close
My pilgrimage free from regret;
And I've suffered too much from its wants and its woes,
Their scourgings and stings to forget:
So come when it will, the decree from on high,
I am willing to live—but contented to die.

"LO, I AM WITH YOU ALWAYS." MATT. XXVIII.

And is my Lord so near?
And will he always be?
The mighty promise that I hear,
Can it be spoke to me?

Will Christ vouchsafe to come,
And with my nature stay,
Till to his own eternal home,
He summon me away.

O mercy, deep and high!
He deigns to dwell with dust!
The dear decree is past, and I
In that decree will trust.

His presence I invoke,
He will not this deny!
"Lo, I am with you always," spoke
By Him who cannot lie.

My trembling fears allay:
Assurance sweet is mine;
And I will confidently pray,
And trust his word divine.

Enough, my faithful Lord,
In thee I must be strong;
Thou, my exceeding great reward,
Shall be my ceaseless song!

ON REPENTANCE.

'Tis not to cry God mercy, or to sit
And droop, or to confess that thou hast fail'd.
'Tis to bewail the sins thou didst commit,
And not commit those sins thou hast bewail'd.
He that bewails and not forsakes them too,
Confesses rather what he means to do.

QUARLES.

ACCOUNT OF THE RIVER NILE.

THE Nile may be considered as the greatest natural curiosity in Egypt. Nature, to supply her parsimonious distribution of water from the heavens, has ordained an annual overflow of that river, to water and enrich the land, so that perpetual plenty and verdure here flourish without the assistance of the clouds. The Nile is said to rise at the foot of a great mountain in Abyssinia: this, however, is rather matter of conjecture; but supposing it to be in that direction, its course being north and south, the whole extent thereof must be about 1,200 miles.

The annual rise which it experiences, is owing to the periodical rains that fall in Abyssinia. The river begins to swell at Cairo and in Lower Egypt towards the latter end of June, and rising gradually till the middle of September, decreases during the months of October and November. The height which it attains often varies, and occasions thereby a plenty or a scarcity, since one extreme is as fatal to the country as the other: if there is a deficiency of water, many lands are deprived of the benefit thereof; if there is a superabundance, it does not retire soon enough for the corn to be sown, the river at this time spreading itself over the country, on each side for several leagues [illegible] pears like a sea. Whatever parts lay so remote as [illegible] out of the reach of the inundation, are watered [illegible] canals; and the appearance which Egypt presents at [illegible] time is very singular, a vast expanse of water all [illegible] with towns and villages as it were rising out of [illegible] flood, and numberless groves and fruit trees, [illegible] tops are the only parts of them visible. At the [illegible] of Rhoida, near Cairo, is a pillar placed in the [illegible] of a pool of water, on the same level with the [illegible] having different gradations marked on it, to deter[illegible] the daily rise and fall of the Nile. As soon as [illegible] tide begins to rise, the superintending officer re[illegible] it to the Pacha, and receives handsome presents from him on that event, which is also celebrated by public rejoicings throughout the city: its daily height is likewise constantly proclaimed by public criers, till it arrives at the wished-for point, when the bank of the canal designed to distribute the waters through the city, is broken down with great solemnity and [illegible]riment, a clay model of a woman being at the [illegible] time thrown into the river, as a present for its annual visit. The city then becomes a scene of joy and feasting, the inhabitants receive the river into their streets and squares with the utmost gladness, and boats and barges are seen rowing, gaily adorned, on lakes and canals which before were dry land.

When the waters retire, they leave a vast quantity of fish on the land, and at the same time, what is much more valuable, a slime which acts as manure to fertilize the fields. By this annual addition of soil, Egypt has been very much raised and enlarged in the course of years; and as the bed of the Nile extends for some miles into the sea, the country increases by little and little every year, and many places are now inland towns, which before were washed by the ocean.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

, and bullion of gold and silver, as mentioned Ioly Scriptures, will receive its most important :ion from the immense treasures of the Bank of l. That wonderful establishment, requiring, we and, about eight hundred clerks and agents to n its vast concerns, is considered as the centre nancial operations of Europe, and indeed of the ivilized world.

Bank of England was established in 1694, n act was passed empowering their Majesties and Mary, to incorporate the subscribers he title of "The Governor and Company of the f England," in consideration of the loan of 00*l*. granted to the government, for which 3 per cent. was paid. Since the period of the hment of the Bank of England, the commercial s of this country have grown up to a magnitude it is probable no one at that period contem-

The capital of the Bank has, during that time, ugmented from 1,200,000*l*. to the sum of 00*l*., and its influence upon the money con- ' the kingdom has increased in a proportionate

A succession of dreadful wars increased the expenses of the government until the peace of Paris in 1815, so that the public or national debt amounts now to the astonishing sum of EIGHT HUNDRED MILLIONS OF POUNDS STERLING!

The Bank of England is a bank of deposits as well as of issue. It has always acted as banker to the government. The balances of public money which remained in its hands were much larger formerly than they have been of late, as appears from the following statement of the average aggregate amounts so held during each year, from 1807 to 1831:—

	£.		£.
1807	12,647,551	1820	3,718,442
1808	11,761,448	1821	3,920,157
1809	11,093,648	1822	4,107,853
1810	11,950,047	1823	5,526,635
1811	10,191,854	1824	7,222,187
1812	10,390,130	1825	5,347,314
1813	10,393,404	1826	4,214,271
1814	12,158,227	1827	4,223,867
1815	11,737,436	1828	3,821,697
1816	10,807,660	1829	3,862,656

1818	7,066,887	1831	3,948,102
1819	4,538,373

The profits which the Bank derived from this source during the war, when the balances were so large, must have been very great.

Private deposits in the Bank of England during the same period were very large, an account of which will show a considerable augmentation of this branch of its business:—

The immense pile of building in which these prodigious money concerns are carried on, is more extensive in its range of offices, and more eminent for its architectural ornament and interior arrangement, than any single public office in the metropolis. The whole buildings are included in an area of an irregular form, the exterior wall of which measures 365 feet in front, or the south side, 410 feet on the north side, 245 on the east side, and 440 feet on the west side. The building, with all its fittings and furniture, is estimated by the architect of the Bank to be worth the sum of ONE MILLION sterling: so that this sum, added to the balance in the foregoing statement, makes the capital of that establishment 18,190,760*l.*!!

GOLD AND SILVER BULLION

Voluntary contributed to the service of God, by King David and his Princes, preparatory to the erection of the Temple by King Solomon.

Prodigious as is the quantity of gold and silver that is found in the British empire in coin and bullion, probably amounting to 40,000,000*l.* sterling; that will seem but little compared with the treasures of King David, which he had collected to adorn and enrich the Temple of God. Purposing in his heart that good work, and directed to an architectural plan by Divine inspiration, he called together his princes, and said, "Solomon my son is young and tender, and the house that is to be builded for the LORD must be exceeding magnifical, of fame and of glory throughout all countries: I will therefore now make preparation for it. So David prepared abundantly before his death." 1 Chron. xxii, 5. "I have prepared for the house of the LORD an hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver; and of brass and iron without weight, for it is in abundance: timber also and stone have I prepared; and thou mayest add thereto." Ver. 14.

This "hundred thousand talents of gold," at 5,075*l.* 15*s.* 7½*d.* the talent, would amount to the sum of 507,578,125*l.* as is remarked in a Note in Bagster's "Comprehensive Bible," on the text. And in another Note, the editor states, that, "a thousand thousand talents of silver," at 353*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.* the talent, would amount to 353,591,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*; and both sums would amount to the immense sum of 861,169,791*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*," which is an amount larger than the whole national debt of Great Britain.

Besides this amazing amount of gold and silver, David gave another large quantity for the service of God. Hence we read, "Furthermore David the King said unto all the congregation: Moreover, because I have set my affection to the house of my God, I have of mine own proper good, of gold and silver, which I have given to the house of my God, over and above all that I have prepared for the holy house, even three thousand talents of gold, of the gold of Ophir, and seven thousand talents of refined silver, to overlay the walls of the houses withal. The gold for things of gold, and the silver for things of silver, and for all manner of work to be made by the hands of artificers.

And who then is willing to consecrate his service this day unto the LORD? Then the chief of the fathers and princes of the tribes of Israel, and the captains of thousands and of hundreds, with the rulers of the king's work, offered willingly, and gave for the service of the house of God, of gold five thousand talents and ten thousamd drams, and of silver ten thousand talents, and of brass eighteen thousand talents, and one hundred thousand talents of iron." 1 Chron. xxix, 3—7.

Eight thousand talents of gold, thus given additionally by the king and his nobles, as above, would amount to 40,606,250*l.* and seventeen thousand talents of silver at the price above stated would amount to 6,011,058*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*; and the whole sums thus contributed amounted to 907,787,100*l.*!!

THE REMOVAL OF GREAT AND GOOD MEN.

ADAMANTINE indeed must be the heart and sensibilities of those, who are unaffected by the recent removal of so many distinguished men. Verily, death has achieved a mighty victory, in taking so many "to the house appointed for all living:" death has taken from our hemisphere, men of high moral worth, of splendid intellectual attainments, and of unfeigned piety. Who that has listened to the glowing eloquence, and observer the unassuming and childlike piety of Robert Hall, but has felt he was treading on holy ground, when the man of God "reasoned on righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come?" Who that is familiar with the practical lessons, and moral and religious sentiments of Wilberforce and Hannah More, has not found in his heart a response to their powerful appeals? I may add, also, the names of Adam Clarke, Rowland Hill, Thorpe, Watson, Winter, Wood, and others—names associated with whatever is sublime, honourable, lovely, and praiseworthy.

Far be it from me merely to eulogize the dead: I would look at them as their characters set forth the gospel of Jesus Christ, as the lustre of his imitable perfections shone in them, and as the Holy Ghost developed his graces and operations.

1. Their removal is loss to others, but gain to themselves.

They have occasioned a wide breach in the world, and especially in the church. Hundreds of thousands will mourn because of them, in whose esteem their names are sacred and their memory is blessed. But the living feel the loss; to them, "death is gain." Here they partook of common frailties, and suffered the lot of all men; now they have reached the haven of eternal blessedness. Here they appeared in rags; now they are clothed in robes of unfading beauty. Here they were mortal and corruptible; now they are immortal and incorruptible. Here they were afflicted and cast down; now they chant the endless praises of their exalted Head. O happy spirits! "God hath wiped away all tears." Now you breathe a purer atmosphere. Now you enjoy a nobler state of being. "Having been faithful over a few things, God hath made you rulers over many things."

2. They furnish an illustration of the divine character of Christianity.

It has long been the boast of sceptical writers, that superiority of intellect was on their side, and that where rare abilities have been found among Christian writers, they have been interested men. Without referring to past ages or to present times, I maintain, there are names mentioned above, which fully refute this infidel chimera. What but pure motives and honest conviction, could prompt such men as Robert Hall, William Wilberforce, Rowland Hill, and that distinguished female, Hannah More, to consecrate their talents to the despised Nazarene?

The original genius and transcendant powers of Hall would have rendered him popular in any sphere of life, whether of politics or literature. The rank of Rowland Hill, the peculiar cast and playfulness of his genius, qualified him for a very different sphere from that in which he moved, he might have shone as a courtier and distinguished wit. And surely the most captious of them cannot attribute other than disinterested motives to the names of Wilberforce and Hannah More. O ye disciples of the meek and lowly Jesus, ye young Christians especially, allow one of your number to implore of you, if at any time ye grow sceptical in your minds, to weigh the matter well. Surely what these lofty spirits deemed worthy of their choice, is worthy of our calm and dispassionate inquiry. In their esteem, Jesus Christ was altogether lovely. They were not ashamed of his cross; to them his service was perfect freedom. No prospects of sublunary joy could compensate for the absence of his favour and blessing. They fully embraced the realities of his divine mission. His promises upheld them under the most trying circumstances; and the prospect of eternal glory sustained their souls, when the soul could no longer sustain the body.

3. God prolonged their lives, until they were eminently useful.

The procedure of the Supreme Being is at all times connected with his sovereignty and wisdom: though mortal eye and finite capacity are frequently unable to trace its equity. "Clouds and darkness are round about him: righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne." When he removes youthful disciples of talent, zeal, and promising usefulness, to a premature grave, his sovereignty and wisdom harmonize. But when he lengthens out their being, it is profitable and advantageous for the church. Thus it was with these fathers in Israel whose departure we are now contemplating; all of them were eminently useful, and some of them spared to far advanced years. Who can tell of the good effected through their instrumentality? Who can tell their influence in the extended circles in which they moved? They advocated the cause of humanity, they promoted the best interests of the oppressed, and made a bold stand for primitive and genuine Christianity, where luxury, vice, neutrality, and scepticism, prevailed to a fearful extent. They despised the trappings of fashion and aristocratic dignity, and "chose rather" the permanent joys of religion. They advocated with eloquence and zeal the heaven-born principles of liberty and toleration, when assailed by bigotry and intolerance; and their graphic illustrations of theological truth, and laborious biblical criticisms, are imperishable as the language in which they wrote.

But the good effected by the Holy Ghost through their instrumentality, cannot be unfolded by the annals of the biographer. The hearts and consciences of living men, the records of futurity, can alone adequately develop their eminent usefulness. They have obtained bloodless victories over "the world, the flesh, and the devil;" they have effected in the hearts of men a moral revolution; where sin and darkness had domination, Christ has swayed his peaceful sceptre. O what honour conferred on mortals, to be the means of saving immortal souls, to rescue man from outer darkness, and from irretrievable perdition! What is the wreath of fame compared to this? What are the dying laurels of the hero, compared to the salvation of a soul?

4. All men die, "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

Solomon says, "To the righteous and the wicked it happeneth alike;" but, says a greater than Solomon, "I am he that liveth, and was dead; and behold I am alive for evermore." The channels may be directed in a new course, but the fountain-head is the same. Christians, who have been the ornament and delight of their own circle, are taken from our world, but "Jesus Christ is the same." Ministers, who have been the joy of their congregations and churches, are called away, but "Jesus Christ is the same." He is the head of the church, controls all things, and his resources are inexhaustible. In his own good time, others will be raised up to accomplish his purposes, and to advance the interests of his everlasting kingdom.

Blessed Saviour! "Ride forth conquering and to conquer," subdue the nations to thyself, hasten the latter-day glory; and may every fabric of superstition, vice, error, and bigotry, be levelled to the ground, and on its ruins may there be established thy everlasting kingdom!

LECTURE X.

AND FORGIVE US OUR TRESPASSES, AS WE FORGIVE THEM THAT TRESPASS AGAINST US.

This is a very remarkable passage of the Lord's prayer. We are here taught to pray, that God would forgive us our sins, as we forgive our friends and neighbours their offences against ourselves: as if it were of no avail to pray to God to forgive us our manifold sins, until we had forgiven others their offences against ourselves. And indeed, if we do not forgive the faults of others freely, how can we utter this prayer? for we ask God to forgive us, as, in the same manner as, in the same degree as, we forgive others; if then we do not freely forgive others their sins, and yet utter this prayer to our God, we are surely bringing upon ourselves condemnation; in other words, praying God not to forgive us our sins.

What is the meaning of the word "trespasses?"—Offences.

What do we ask for, when we utter this petition?—We ask God to forgive us our sins, in the same manner as we forgive others their offences towards ourselves.

Many are the important points which this portion of our Lord's prayer presents to our minds.

1st. It speaks of sin, or "trespasses."

"Sin," St. Paul tells us, "is the transgression of the law," or the disobeying of God's commandments; and the law, or these commandments, Christ has briefly summed up, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart, and with all thy mind," and "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." But an apostle, inspired by the Holy Spirit, has summed the law up in one word, for he has declared that "love is the fulfilling of the law:" "Love" then is the word, in which the whole of God's commandments are comprised. Whatsoever, then, we do, that is contrary to Christian love or charity, is sin. "God so loved us, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." If God has so loved us, would it not be a great sin against love on our parts, not to do what he commands us? Are we, then, not guilty of vile ingratitude? How often have we offended! God has said, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," and "Thou shalt love me with all thy heart." How often have we broken these two commandments of God! How often have we loved the world, ourselves, and worldly pleasures, better than our God, better than our neighbour, better than heaven! Even to such a degree have we often loved them, as to risk our immortal souls on the brink of everlasting fire!

What is sin?—"The transgression of the law."

In what word has St. Paul summed up the whole law?—"Love."

Is, then, whatsoever is contrary to love or Christian charity sin?—Yes.

How has God loved us?—So as to give his Son.

How have we regarded God's commandments?—We have broken them.

What do we deserve for having thus sinned?—We have deserved God's anger.

2dly. We may notice that our Saviour speaks of forgiveness God is love; "He willeth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should be converted and live." God is provoked every day, yet his mercy endureth for ever; surely God is love: he has shown us that he is love, by Christ's death. Who would have given his only Son to die for us, but a God full of love and tender mercy? We may see that God is love, in his dealings with men, with the Israelites of old, with our first parents, when they sinned in the garden of Eden. We may see that God is love in his dealings with ourselves, that he has not already destroyed us, that we are yet alive, such great sinners, enjoying all the necessaries and comforts of life, living in a land flowing with milk and honey, with the hope of a bright home beyond the skies, where all tears and sorrows shall be wiped away. Surely there is forgiveness with God, and by that forgiveness God does show himself to be love.

What is God?—God is love.

How has God shown himself to be love?—By giving Christ his Son to die for us, and by his daily mercies towards us.

What are God's great mercies towards us?—That we are not now in a state of torment, but that we have the hope of everlasting happiness.

3dly. There is the spirit in which we ought to pray mentioned.

We must come in the spirit of love and charity to God; we must have love in our hearts towards one another; we must come in love, to the throne of the God of love. This prayer Christ evidently framed only for true worshippers, only for those who had a right spirit renewed in them. Hatred and malice are the fruits of the natural heart; love is only the fruit of the Spirit working in the renewed heart. How well God's word agrees: David says, "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me;" and do we not find here a similar declaration? And with what power of language is that precept here inculcated, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

In what spirit must we pray to God?—In a spirit of love towards all men.

For whom did Christ frame this prayer?—For true worshippers, for those who worship the Father in spirit and in truth.

What are the fruits of the natural heart?—Hatred, malice, bitterness, evil speaking.

What are the fruits of the renewed heart?—Love, and joy, and peace, by the Holy Ghost.

With what two other precepts does this portion of the Lord's prayer more particularly agree?—"Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," and, "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me."

4thly. How are all to obtain the spirit of love. It is not natural to us; "love is of God," and not of man; it is not to be obtained by riches, nor by any self-righteous deeds, whether of giving money to the poor (by some called charity, but in too many instances it is self-love), or of penance, or by any such ineffectual and foolish means. But God's word tells us the way: "Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened." "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name," says Christ, "that will he give you." If then we wish to have that love in our hearts which is of God, we must ask him for it through the merit of Christ Jesus.

How may we obtain true charity? — By prayer.

Teacher. Ask, then, that your joy may be full.

DEPRAVITY OF THE BRITISH METROPOLIS.

THE following statement relative to the mass of depravity in the British metropolis, will surely plead for Christian Instruction Societies.

"The General Annual Report of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the County of Middlesex," for 1832, states, that "TWELVE THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED AND FORTY-THREE offenders have been lodged in the House of Correction during the twelve months last past."

This, however, is but a small portion of our metropolitan offenders. "The condition of the culprits in this House of Correction," say the justices, "differs in many respects from that of other prisoners. Numbers of them are reared from their cradle without education, corrupted by the wickedness of their parents at home, and contaminated by the evil example of their companions abroad, and all of them surrounded with the many ensnaring temptations of the metropolis. Profligate foreigners, provincial transgressors, infidels speculative and practical, sensualists and prodigals of every kind, fly to this great city: without character as to morality, idle, poor, and friendless, they shelter themselves unobserved for a while, but eventually increase the mass of iniquity in our crowded prisons. Once imprisoned, their return to virtuous society becomes exceedingly difficult. Every avenue is closed against them, and every door shut. To those who knew them in better circumstances they apply in vain for employment, or assistance of any kind. They are now without what is called character, and strangers regard them not; they are become the children of necessity; they cannot by their own exertions extricate themselves out of their difficulties, and though liberated from prison, they have neither the opportunity nor the means of obtaining subsistence, except by begging, depredation, theft, or plunder. Were a moral classification attempted, the whole might be comprehended under three heads. First, the abandoned, whose passions being violent, and strengthened by indulgence, have led them from bad to worse: they have lost all self-respect, boast of their iniquity, rejoice in doing mischief, and are become reckless. Second, the incipient criminal, the dupe of another; or having, through ignorance, inconsideration, the force of temptation, or the pressure of necessity, fallen under the rebuke of the law; and would endure any labour, and undergo any privation, to regain his station in society. Third, the poor and destitute, who are objects of pity and compassion; many of them orphans, without a friend to appreciate their worth; moral, honest, industrious, and sober, in general, they are ready for any service that would afford them a maintenance at home or abroad. Such is the congregation the chaplain has to teach; and he attempts to meet their intellectual and spiritual wants in the six following ways, — by preaching, exposition, exhortation, lecturing, catechizing, and schooling."

These several methods are explained in the Report, in a manner that reflects credit on the chaplain; and while every one must sympathize with him in his arduous duties, every Christian will sincerely pray for his success.

"In conclusion," it is said, "if one thing gives the chaplain more pain than another, in his efforts to save from ruin, it is with respect to female convicts; when they (being chaste) leave a prison, and have no friends at hand to protect them, they shortly return to prison in another character, having no other resource but to throw themselves into that vast mass of prostitution, which is growing to an amount so enormous, and infecting the population of this great city with a moral pollution so extensive, as to paralyze, and almost to destroy, its mightiest counteracting energies."

EXPLANATION OF ROM. XII, 3—5.

(In answer to a Correspondent.)

DR. DODDRIDGE'S translation and paraphrase will probably explain to the satisfaction of "JOSEPH" the text he proposes. He will compare it with the authorized text, and remark, that the words in Italics constitute the new translation, and those in the Roman type the Doctor's paraphrase.

"And I particularly say, and give it in charge, according to that grace which is given to me as an inspired apostle, to every one that is among you, as if personally named, to take the greatest heed that he be not exalted into spiritual pride by the gifts and privileges which God hath conferred upon you. I charge each not to arrogate [to himself] above what he ought to think, but to think of himself with modesty, sobriety, and humility; according to the measure of that faith, and in correspondent proportion to those gifts, which God hath distributed to every man among you. And surely when you consider it is God who hath given all, there will appear little reason to magnify yourselves on any distinguishing share of his bounty which any one may have received. Especially when you remember, that this distribution is made, not only or chiefly for your own sake, but out of regard to the good of the whole: For as in one body we have many members, but all the members have not the same use, but each its proper function and service appointed by the wise Former and gracious Preserver of the whole; so we, though many, are one body in Christ, and every one members of each other: we should therefor endeavour each of us to know his own place and condition, and mutually to make our various capacities as serviceable as we can."

USES OF CONVERSATION.

"Good sense will stagnate: thoughts shut up want air,
And spoil, like bales unopen'd to the sun.
Thought in the mine may come forth gold or dross;
When coin'd in word, we know its real worth.
Had thought been all, sweet speech had been denied.
'Tis converse qualifies for solitude,
As exercise for salutary rest." YOUNG.

CHRISTIANS do not make conversation a theatre for dispute or display: they consider it as a reciprocation of benignity — a desire to draw out the talents of those who with more merit have less pretensions. An interchange of sentiments between intellectual and highly-principled persons confers both pleasure and benefit. To make it at once pleasant and profitable, there must be an accordance of principle, if not of opinion. The conversation will frequently have a tincture of religion, though the topic under discussion may not be religious. Topics purely secular are susceptible of this spirit, and in pious and discreet hands will be treated in a way to promote religion without the appearance of intruding it.

SCRIPTURE GAZETTEER.

Carmel (vineyard of God), a city in the tribe of Judah, situated on the mountain of the same name, in the southern part of Palestine, where Nabal the Carmelite, Abigail's husband, dwelt. Josh. xv, 55.

Carmel, Mount, situated to the south of Ptolemais, and the north of Dora, upon the Mediterranean. At the foot of this mountain, on the north side, runs the brook Kishon, and a little farther the river Belcus. On the side next the sea, there is a cave shown, where some suppose the prophet Elijah desired Ahab to bring Baal's false prophets, when fire descended from heaven upon the burnt sacrifice which he had prepared there. 1 Kings xviii.

Cenchrea (millet), a sea-port town belonging to Corinth, in the Archipelago. This town, which was at some distance from Corinth, was, notwithstanding, looked upon as a kind of suburb to the city. St. Paul, being ready to embark in order to go to Jerusalem, had his hair cut off here, in compliance with a vow he had made.

Chaldea (as demons), a country of Asia, known in the most ancient times by the names of Shinar, Shinaar, &c.; it lies between thirty and thirty-five degrees of north latitude, and was bounded, according to Ptolemy, on the north by Mesopotamia, on the east by the Tigris, on the west by Arabia Deserta, and on the south by the Persian Gulf and part of Arabia Felix. The metropolis of Chaldea was Babylon, whence the country more immediately in the neighbourhood of this city was generally, by profane writers, termed Babylonia. The name of Chaldea is nowhere to be met with in the Hebrew text, the word being Chasdim, whence Josephus thinks the name of Chaldea was derived; and Dr. Wells is of opinion, that it was taken from Chesed, one of the sons of Nahor, Abraham's brother. The Chaldeans were much famed for their knowledge in astronomy, and their skill in the several branches of mathematics and geometry. See our account of Babylon, p. 129, and also p. 222.

Cherith (cutting), a brook beyond Jordan, that falls into this river below Bethshan. Near this brook, and in the valley through which it runs, the prophet Elijah lay concealed for some time, to avoid the persecution of Jezebel; and here the ravens every morning and evening brought him bread and meat.

Cilicia (which overturns), a country on the south-east of Asia Minor, and lying on the northern coast, at the east end of the Mediterranean; the capital city whereof is Tarsus, the native city of St. Paul.

Cinnereth, or Cinneroth, a city of the tribe of Naphtali, to the south whereof lay a great plain, which reached as far as the Dead Sea, along the river Jordan. Many believe, with a great deal of probability, that Cinnereth was the same with Tiberias; and as the lake of Gennesareth, which is in Hebrew called the lake of Cinnereth, is, without doubt, that of Tiberias, there is some reason to believe that Cinnereth and Tiberias are the same city, as we will endeavour more fully to show under the article Tiberias.

The lake of Cinnereth, or Tiberias, or the lake of Gennesareth, are so many names given to it from the situation of the city Cinnereth or Tiberias, lying upon the western shore, and towards the southern extremity of it; and because the canton of Gennesareth lies upon the eastern extremity of it. It is likewise called the sea of Galilee (Matt. iv, 18), because the north-east sides of it are enclosed by Galilee. In Josephus's account of it, it is a hundred furlongs in length, and forty wide. The water of this lake is very good to drink, and breeds abundance of fish. There St. Peter, St. John, St. Andrew, and St. James, who were fishermen, carried on their trade. The river Jordan passes through this lake, and is continually bringing into it a fresh supply of water. The country which borders upon the sea of Galilee, is remarkably beautiful and fertile.

Cnidus, a city standing on a promontory or foreland of the same name, in that part of the province of Caria, which was more peculiarly called Doris. This city was remarkable for the worship of Venus, and for the celebrated statue of that goddess, made by the famous artificer Praxiteles.

Colosse (punishment), a city of Phrygia, which Herodotus tells us stood where the river Lycus running under-ground, disappears: but this river rising above-ground again, at the distance of five furlongs from this city, empties itself into the river Meander. It is generally agreed among learned men, that Colosse stood at no great distance from Laodicea and Hierapolis; whence we find St. Paul mentioning the inhabitants of these three great cities together, Col. iv, 15. This city, Dr. Wells informs us, has been long since buried in ruins, the memory of it being now chiefly, if not wholly, preserved in the Epistle of St. Paul, wrote to its inhabitants.

Coos, an island of the Archipelago, lying near the south-west point of Asia Minor. It is now commonly called Lango; and was formerly celebrated for its excellent wine; and is also memorable for the birth of Hippocrates, the celebrated physician, and Apelles, the famous painter. Here was formerly made that fine thin stuff, so much used among the chief ladies of Rome, which at once showed them both clothed and naked. In the suburbs of the chief town of this island, called by the same name as the isle, stood a temple of Esculapius, much celebrated in former times, and greatly enriched by the offerings made to the supposed deity.

Corinth (beauty), a celebrated city, the capital of Achaia, seated on the isthmus, and separates Peloponnessus from Achaia. This city was one of the best peopled and most wealthy of all Greece. Its situation between two seas, drew thither the trade of both the east and west from all parts. Its riches produced pride, ostentation, effeminacy, and all manner of vices, which are the consequences of too great plenty. Lasciviousness in particular was not only tolerated here, but in a manner consecrated, by the worship of Venus, and the public prostitution of those who were devoted to her. But what this city was most famous for among the heathen authors, was, its citadel, which was called Acro-Corinthus, from its being built on a high mountain or rock, and for its insolence against the Roman legates, which made L. Mummius destroy it; but in its conflagration, so many statues of different metals were melted down, that the remains of them made the famous Corinthian brass, which was accounted more valuable than either gold or silver. After this destruction, it was restored by Julius Cæsar to its former splendour, and in a short time became the most beautiful city of all Greece, insomuch that the admired order of pillars, which are used at this day in the decoration of many fine buildings, took from this place the name of Corinthian pillars.

Crete (fleshly), one of the noblest islands in the Mediterranean Sea, being formerly called Hecatompolis, as having a hundred considerable towns or cities; as also, Macarios, or Macaronesus, the Happy Island, from the goodness of the soil and the healthy temperature of the air. It is now commonly called Candia, from its principal town, Candia, which was an archbishop's see, great, rich, and populous, as long as it continued in the hands of the Venetians; and stood the longest siege against the Turks of any place in the whole world, but was at last obliged to submit, in 1669. This isle lies over against the mouth or entrance of the Ægean sea, or Archipelago, and at a pretty nearly equal distance from Europe, Asia, and Africa. The inland parts are very mountainous, yet fruitful, especially of wines, called Muscadine, but it is deficient in corn. Titus was constituted by St. Paul first bishop of Crete, charging him in that epistle which he wrote to him, to rebuke the people of this island severely and in strong terms, to prevent their being fond of Jewish fables, human ordinances, and the observances of the law; for, as he adds (chap. i, 12, 13), "the Cretans, as one of their own prophets (or poets) bears witness, are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies." This Cretan poet is generally acknowledged to be Epimenides, a native of Crete, who asserts this particular, so much to the disadvantage of his countrymen.

DR. YOUNG'S DYING TESTIMONY.

Probably our "Constant Reader" at Lincoln, will think the following a sufficient answer at present to his interesting inquiry respecting the venerable author of the "Night Thoughts," and we will endeavour to give him further information in a future Number.

Dr. Cotton, who was intimate with Dr. Young, paid him a visit about a fortnight before he was seized with his last illness. The old man was then in perfect health; the antiquity of his person, the gravity of his utterance, and the earnestness with which he discoursed about religion, gave him, in the Doctor's eyes, the appearance of a prophet. They had been delivering their sentiments upon a book of Newton (on the Prophecies), when Dr. Young closed the conference thus: "My friend, there are two considerations upon which my faith in Christ is built, as upon a rock: the fall of man, the redemption of man, and the resurrection of man, the three cardinal articles of our religion, are such as human ingenuity could never have invented; therefore, they must be divine. The other argument is this: If the prophecies have been fulfilled (of which there is abundant demonstration), the Scripture must be the word of God; and, if the Scripture is the word of God, Christianity must be true."

ALMANACK IMPOSITIONS.

There is a certain species of imposition which prevails in this country, which, we are persuaded, even many of the genuine professors of Christianity by far too much countenance; and which, at this season of the year, it may not be improper, or unprofitable, to caution them against.

Amongst the variety of almanacks annually published, there are those which pretend to foretel future events. It is easy to see the deceit and fallacy of their pretensions, which at best are but probable conjectures, founded upon the aspect of past or present existing circumstances. If this were all, it perhaps might be tolerated, but surely is unworthy to be countenanced by professing Christians. But what should render them peculiarly odious, is, their professing to foretel future events by astrological calculations: a science, if it may be so called, which has neither authority nor countenance from the sacred Scriptures, but which is treated by them as heathenish and superstitious. Let those who have been partial to such vain productions, only read Isaiah xlvii, 13, and Dan. ii, 27, and they will there see what they are to be accounted of, and in what company they are to be found; and let them learn to despise their equivocal and artful insinuations, which are too frequently blended with profanity: for is it not profanity in them to attempt to palm their frauds upon mankind by Scripture quotations, which they seldom fail to do, especially Judges v, 20, and Job xxxviii, 31, neither of which teaches nor warrants any such practice? Had Barak or Deborah consulted the stars? No such thing. Were not the sweet influences of Pleiades the same in Job's adversity as in his prosperity? Certainly they were. Shall the sun, moon, and stars, which the Most High has divided as benefits to all nations under heaven indiscriminately, have a particular and moral influence attributed to them? What an approach to heathenism is this!

PIETY OF LINNÆUS.

This great Botanist was born in Sweden, in 1707, and died in 1778. One of the most distinguished attributes of his mind, was the warmth of his religious sentiments and profound adoration of the Deity. He resembled in this respect Newton, Haller, Locke, and others, whose respect of religion rendered their knowledge still more estimable. The deeper he penetrated into the secrets of nature, the more he admired the wisdom of her Creator. He praised this wisdom in his works, recommended it by his speeches, and honoured it by his actions. Through all his writings there breathes forth a lively admiration of the greatness and wisdom of God, and a tender gratitude for his benefits. He believed in Providence, because his daily observations upon nature furnished him with fresh proofs of its sublime immensity. Whenever he found an opportunity of expatiating on the greatness, the providence, and omnipotence of God, which frequently happened in his lectures and botanical excursions, his heart glowed with a celestial fire, and his mouth poured forth torrents of admirable eloquence. This made him one of the best inculcators of morality; he instilled by so doing a similar spirit of religion into the breast of his pupils. Over the door of the hall in which he gave his lectures, was this inscription, "Live virtuous; God observes you." He could never think on the wonderful paths by which the Almighty had guided him, without being much affected, and thanking Providence for all the instances of his grace and mercy.

AMBITION.

I saw thee in thy glory—round thy brows
The laurel wreath was twin'd; and at thy feet,
The glittering playthings of thy vacant hours,
Were crowns and sceptres. When I deem'd
Thou wouldst have soar'd beyond those starry plains,
To reign supreme o'er each angelic power,
And vassal cherubim,—I turned, and lo!
The worm was preying on the kingly brow
Where shone the diadem; the winding sheet
Was all the robe that royalty could boast;
Instead of realms which scarce the sun could span,
The narrow grave prescrib'd the utmost bounds of thy dominions!

Conscience is the soul of a man recoiling back upon itself. It is like the earth, not so much moved from all winds without, as from the vapours within.—Ward.

IN MEMORY OF THE REV. ROWLAND HILL.

Lo! where the pompous column rears its head
In solemn mockery o'er the mighty dead;
The bending statue mournfully appears,
Weeping its flood of adamantine tears.
Haply for them no genuine tear could start,
Pregnant with sorrow from a bursting heart.
Haply by them no good was e'er achiev'd;
The marble only tells that once they lived.
But thou, O Hill! whom Infidels admir'd,
By no false zeal, but genuine virtue fir'd,
Hast left a name endear'd to every heart,
Nor sculptur'd tomb nor lay could e'er impart.
'Twas thine, O Hill! the diffident to speed,
And, champion-like, to point the way, and lead.
'Twas thine the Sceptics many doubts to sooth,
To shun the fiction, and reveal the truth.
What though no letter'd monument we raise,
To tell thy virtues and to speak thy praise,
Are there not hearts wherein we e'er shall trace
Impressions made that time can ne'er efface?
For me, O Hill! in childhood's early day,
Or e'er I knew a madd'ning passion's sway,
When listening anecdotes a parent told,
I've heard thy godlike charities extoll'd;
For these alone, while burns the vital flame,
I'll love thy memory and revere thy name.

TO A MOURNER.

"Sorrow not, as one without hope."

The creeping worm, that weak and weary
Was slumbering in its narrow cell,
Enraptur'd bursts that prison dreary,
And fluttering leaves its wither'd shell:
Gently moving, gaily roving,
Far away from earthly care;
Soaring brightly, wafted lightly,
Through the boundless fields of air.

Then, mourner, dry that thoughtless tear,
And gaze no more upon the dead.
'Tis but a solitary bier,
No earthly spirit lingers there,
On wings of light to heaven 'tis fled!

"HE HATH SAID, I WILL NEVER LEAVE THEE."

Thou wilt never leave me, never;
God of truth, and God of love,
Hast thou promis'd? Thou wilt ever
Faithful to that promise prove.
Not to one alone thou speakest,
O most condescending Lord!
But to all in Christ, the weakest,
Thou proclaim'st the wondrous word.

"I will never leave thee, never;
I, thine all-sufficient Lord;
I, thy shield and buckler ever,
Thy exceeding great reward.
I can well preserve thee ever,
All thy foes and dangers see;
And will suffer nought to sever
Thy confiding soul from me."

Lord! thy goodness thrills my spirit;
'Tis enough, the word is past;
I thy presence shall inherit,
While eternity shall last.
Thou wilt never leave me, never,
God of love, on whom I call;
God, my God, and mine for ever,
And for ever ALL IN ALL!

A MEMOIR OF MISS MARY JANE GRAHAM,

Late of Stoke Fleming, Devon. By the Rev. Charles Bridges, M.A. Vicar of Old Newton, Suffolk. Second Edition, 12mo. boards, pp. 448. Seely and Burnside, London.

Mr. Bridges states in his Preface, that he "did not enjoy the privilege of personal acquaintance with the subject of this Memoir. But when the materials, both of incident and manuscripts, were placed in his hands, he could not but feel that many subjects of valuable interest and importance might be brought out with advantage to the church."

Every one acquainted with Mr. Bridges' excellent "Commentary on the Hundred and Nineteenth Psalm," will be prepared to confide in his judgment respecting Miss Graham; and we concur in opinion with that estimable clergyman, that she was a "highly-gifted and consecrated character," and that her example, as exhibited in this Memoir, may, under "the blessing of the Great Head of the church," "reflect the glories of His adorable name, and quicken the energies of those who bear that name upon their profession, to aspire to a more elevated standard of Christian devotedness and privilege."

EXTRACTS FROM A CHRISTIAN'S DIARY.

CHRISTIAN TESTIMONY.

"It is a blessed thing to be able to leave a dying testimony to the glory of God: but it is a blessing highly to be sought, to show by our whole lives, by a living testimony, that Christ has been formed in us the hope of glory! O may this be the case with me and mine! May I, O blessed Father and God! be enabled by thy Holy Spirit to show forth thy praise by my whole life and conversation; and grant that as thy boundless love and mercy have shown to me what I am as a sinner before thee, and what Christ is as a Saviour for me, that thy image may be deeply wrought on my soul. As I see more and more of the inexpressible glories of Christ, may my whole heart be absorbed with him, that he may be wrapt up in the very principle of my being, and deeply seated in the very essence of my soul; become the centre of my affections, and the ultimate end and object of all my hopes, all my efforts, all my desires!

"To love God in Christ, may it be all my happiness here! To see him in glory above will be heaven hereafter!"

WESTERN ENTRANCE TO THE CITY OF PEKING.

PEKING, THE CAPITAL OF CHINA.

HINA, at the present moment, is worthily engaging e attention of all classes in Great Britain. The new easure of the Government for the opening of the ade to that immense empire, has forced this subject pon the public consideration; and we participate in e general sympathy. Commerce, we trust, will be stly extended among that almost innumerable people; d, with the cargoes of British manufactures, the easures of Christian knowledge, and missionaries to reach the everlasting gospel, for the honour of the edeemer and the salvation of the degraded idola-rs.

In illustration of our engraving we shall give an ac-ount of the metropolis of the Chinese empire, and a atement of the agency now employed in diffusing hristianity among its deluded inhabitants.

China, being the most populous country upon earth, as many cities swarming with people. Pekin, or eking, signifying The Northern Court; Nanking, The outhern Court; and Canton, are the principal.

"Pekin, at present the seat of the court, is situated the northern part of the empire, at the distance of bout 60 miles from the great wall, on a fertile plain, where the air is favourable to the health of the inhabitants, and where every necessary of life is abundantly produced. It consists of two parts, one called the Tartar city, the other the Chinese city. The former, which is the principal division, is in the form of a parallelogram, and its walls include about 14 square miles. The latter contains about 9 square miles, so that the space included within the walls of both parts, is 23 square miles. The suburbs are very extensive, and the population of the whole extremely great, no writer making it less than 2,000,000; and Staunton, from the most authentic information which he could procure, making it 3,000,000.

"If we may believe Grosier, the Tartar city is surrounded by walls of great strength; twelve men, he assures us, might ride abreast upon the top. By Staunton, their height is said to be forty feet, the thickness at the base, twenty feet; and upon the platform, where the parapet is erected, twelve feet. At the distance of sixty yards from each other are erected square towers. The wall has nine gates, on each of which is erected a watch-tower for its protection.

"The principal streets are upwards of one hundred feet in breadth, and in length, three or four miles. The houses seldom consist of more than one floor.

The shops, which everywhere abound, display a neatness, elegance, and wealth, which can nowhere be surpassed. Every tradesman places over his door his name, and a catalogue of the articles in which he deals. The great streets, which lie in the direction of the gates, are always crowded, to a degree which seems to surpass the effects of its population. No woman is ever publicly seen; notwithstanding which, the crowds of people are described as being, to an European, altogether inconceivable. Several causes concur in making the streets to be more crowded than the population renders necessary. The provisions for the inhabitants are brought by land-carriage, which daily brings into the city many persons who do not reside there. Artificers are continually in the streets in search of employment, and offering their services where they may think them necessary. The magistrates and mandarins never go abroad without being numerously attended; and jugglers, auctioneers, and quacks of every description, attract crowds of such as may be accidentally passing.

"The palace of the emperor, which occupies, it is asserted, no less than a square mile, is built in the most elegant style of Chinese architecture, exhibiting to the eyes of an European, an appearance said to have some resemblance to the effects of enchantment. The palaces of the mandarins are numerous, and as they consist invariably of one floor, they occupy much room in the city. Though they equal not the elegance of the imperial palace, they display a very splendid appearance. In Pekin, the missionaries have four monasteries, and four churches. The Jesuits have a cloister, and a church of elegant architecture in the European style."

MISSIONARIES TO THE CHINESE.

Accurate information relating to the great theatre of missionary operations is peculiarly desirable. This, so far as relates to the Chinese, we can offer to our readers in the following most interesting document, which, although it has been published in England, is but very imperfectly known. "Twenty-five years" have been devoted to China by Dr. Morrison: his labours have been most extraordinary; and God has graciously honoured that excellent man, more than almost any individual of this generation! May the Holy Spirit, in all his new covenant gifts and graces, be abundantly poured forth upon that eminent labourer and on his devoted colleagues!

"Canton, China, Sept. 4, 1832.

"To the Churches of Christ in Europe, America, and elsewhere, the following statement is respectfully presented.

"Twenty-five years have this day elapsed, since the first Protestant Missionary arrived in China, alone and in the midst of perfect strangers, with but few friends, and with many foes. Divine Providence, however, prepared a quiet residence for him; and by the help of God he has continued to the present time, and can now rejoice in what God has wrought. The Chinese language was at first thought an almost insurmountable difficulty. That difficulty has been overcome. The language has been acquired, and various facilities provided for its further acquisition. Dictionaries, grammars, vocabularies, and translations have been penned and printed. Chinese scholars have increased, both at home and abroad, both for secular and religious purposes. It is not likely that the Chinese will ever again be abandoned. The Holy Scriptures in Chinese, by Morrison and Milne, together with religious tracts, prayer books, &c., have been published; and now, thanks be to God, missionaries from other nations have come to aid in their distribution and explanation. The London Missionary Society's Chinese press, at the Anglo-Chinese College, Malacca, and Mr. Medhurst's in Java, have sent forth millions of pages, containing the truths of the everlasting gospel; and that institution has given a Christian education to scores of native youths. There are also native Chinese, who preach Christ's gospel, and teach from house to house. Such is a general outline of the progress of the mission. We boast not of great doings; yet are devoutly thankful to God that the work has not ceased, but, amidst many deaths and disasters, has still gathered strength from year to year.

"The establishment of English presses in China, both for the diffusion of general knowledge, and for religious purposes, arose out of the Protestant mission. The Honourable East India Company's press, to print Dr. Morrison's Dictionary, was the first; and now, both English and Americans endeavour, by the press, to draw attention to China, and give information concerning it and the surrounding nations. The Indo-Chinese Gleaner, at Malacca; the Canton Newspapers; and the Chinese Repository, have all risen up since our mission commenced. Missionary voyages have been performed, and the Chinese sought out, at various places, under European control, in the Archipelago; as well as in Siam, at the Loochoo islands, at Corea, and along the coast of China itself, up to the very walls of Pekin. Some tracts, written by Protestant missionaries, have reached, and been read by the Emperor himself. Still this is but the day of small things. The harvest is indeed great, but the labourers are few. Preachers, and teachers, and writers, and printers, in much larger numbers, are wanted, to spread the knowledge of God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ, among the Chinese-language nations. O Lord, send forth labourers whom thou wilt own and bless; and let thy hand work with them, till China shall be completely turned from dumb idols, vain superstitions, wicked works, and false hopes,—'from Satan to God!'

"The persons at present connected with the Chinese mission are—

1. Robert Morrison, D. D., of the London Missionary Society—in China.
2. William Henry Medhurst, of the London Missionary Society—in Java.
3. Samuel Kidd, of the London Missionary Society—sick in England.
4. Jacob Tomlin, of the London Missionary Society—at the Anglo-Chinese College, Malacca.
5. Samuel Dyer, of the London Missionary Society—at Penang.
6. Charles Gutzlaff, of the Netherlands Missionary Society—on a voyage.
7. E. C. Bridgman, of the Americ. Board—at Canton.
8. David Abeel, of the American Board—in Siam.
9. Leang-Afa, native Teacher, of the London Missionary Society—in China.
10. Keuh Agang, assistant to ditto, and lithographic printer—in China.
11. Le-Asin, assistant to Leang-Afa—in China.

"Only ten persons have been baptized, of whom the three above-named are part. The two first owed their religious impressions to the late Dr. Milne, at the Anglo-Chinese college, where they were printers. Another was a student, and still retained in the college.

"About ten years after the Protestant mission was established in China, a chaplain for the British factory was sent out from the episcopal church in England; and about twenty years from the commencement of the mission, a seamen's chaplain was sent out from the American Seamen's Friend Society. Dr. Morrison hoisted the first Bethel flag on the Chinese waters, in 1822. Mr. Abeel officiated in 1830, and the present occupant of this cure is the Rev. Edwin Stevens, from New York. Mr. Abeel is a minister of the Dutch reformed church. Messrs. Bridgman and Stevens are from Congregational churches. Their patron in China, a merchant of great devotedness to the blessed Saviour, is of the Presbyterian church in America.

"In 1831, the Scripture Lessons of the British and Foreign School Society were printed in China, and are found a very acceptable epitome of Sacred Writ. The Rev. E. C. Bridgman, with the assistance of his native scholars, and Mr. John R. Morrison, made the extracts from Morrison and Milne's Chinese version of the Bible. Leang-Afa, with his first assistant named above, carried them through the press; and Christian merchants in China subscribed the necessary funds.

"During the current year Leang-Afa has printed nine tracts, of about fifty pages each, composed by himself, and interspersed with passages of Sacred Scripture. They were revised by Dr. Morrison, when in manuscript; and printed at the expense of the London Religious Tract Society. Keuh-Agang has printed Scripture sheet tracts, &c., with the lithographic press, and Mr. Gutzlaff has taken them to the north of China for distribution. Mr. Bridgman has instructed several native lads in the English language, and first principles of Christian truth. He has also performed divine service in English, once every Sabbath-day, at Canton.

"The servants of our Lord, engaged in this mission, although from different nations, and connected with different churches, have cherished reciprocal affection, and united in the most cordial co-operation. By this brief exposition, they wish to call the attention of the churches, throughout the whole of Christendom, to the evangelization of at least four hundred millions of their fellow-creatures and fellow-sinners, in eastern Asia, comprehending China and the surrounding nations. Ye Christian churches, hear your Saviour's last command—'Go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature!'

"Robert Morrison.
"Elijah Coleman Bridgman."

CHINESE ANTIQUITY DISPROVED.

It is well known that the Chinese pretend to an excessive antiquity. Their chronology exceeds all bounds of probability: and, could their pretensions be verified, the Mosaic account of the creation must necessarily be discredited. But we have a singular fact to state, which will prove that their boasted antiquity really falls within the limits of the Mosaic chronology. For the evidence we are about to produce, we are indebted to the discoveries of modern astronomy. The Chinese have ever made a point of inserting in their calendars remarkable eclipses, or conjunctions of the planets, together with the name of that emperor in whose reign they were observed. To these events they have also fixed their own dates. There is a very singular conjunction of the sun, moon, and several planets, recorded in their annals, as having taken place almost at the very commencement of their remote history. The far-famed Cassini, to ascertain the fact, calculated back and decisively proved, that such an extraordinary conjunction actually did take place at China, on Feb. 26, 1012 years before Christ. This falls 400 years after the flood, and a little after the birth of Abraham. Here are two important facts ascertained: the one is, that the Chinese are a very ancient nation; and the other, that their pretensions to antiquity beyond that of Moses are unfounded; because this event, which they themselves represent as happening near the beginning of their immense calculations, falls far within the history and chronology of the Scriptures.—Collyer's Scripture Facts.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ABRAHAM.

BORN A.M. 2009. DIED A.M. 2184, AGED 175 YEARS.

The Parentage of Abraham.

Babel being erected, the family of Noah became extensively scattered in the confusion. Mankind were soon exceedingly multiplied: but they were distinguished by a still further departure from God; and although a copious genealogy of the fathers has been preserved for our instruction, no person of remarkable eminence is mentioned between the patriarchs Noah and Abraham.

The few notices recorded of those days, exhibited the natural and uniform "operations of pride, ambition, and avarice; plans of empires formed; imperial cities founded; new discoveries made; and new settlements established." The details of that period might have been amusing or instructive to us as citizens of the world, but they would not be deeply interesting to us as Christians, having no special relation to the economy of redemption, nor to the chief design of the sacred volume: that design being not so much to impart information, natural or political, as to convey the knowledge of salvation by Jesus Christ, whom to know is life eternal. The inspired historian, therefore, hastens to the times of Abraham, to whom the revelation of the Messiah was made more clear and explicit, as the Mediator between God and man, and in whom all the families of the earth should be blessed.

Leaving Nimrod and his vain-glorious companions to finish the monument of their own folly, and to feel the consequences of their impiety, let us attend the sacred historian in tracing, not the rise and progress of empires, but the formation, the unfolding, and the execution of the plan of redemption." The oblivion into which Providence has plunged the mighty founders of Babylon and Nineveh will not be regretted by us, while we contemplate the origin, vocation, and destination of Abraham, whom the pen of inspiration has denominated, "The father of the faithful," and "The friend of God" (Rom. iv, 11; James ii, 23), distinctions far more noble than any which are worn, or even coveted by kings and emperors.

Our edification cannot fail to be promoted by considering, that Abraham is connected with Adam, almost immediately by the single life of Noah: for Noah was born only one hundred and twenty-six years after the decease of Adam, and lived till within two years of the birth of Abraham. The father and founder of the Jewish nation, in this view, is very little more than the third in succession from the first man! The knowledge of important facts, therefore, and the doctrines and promises of salvation, might be readily, immediately, and without interruption, communicated through so long a course of time. By computation we find, that the original revelation to Adam might be conveyed down to Abraham, at the distance of two thousand years, through only two intermediate persons. Adam lived till Methuselah was two hundred and fifty-three years old, and Shem was nearly one hundred years old when Methuselah died. When Shem died, Abraham had attained the age of nearly a hundred and fifty years: Methuselah and Shem would, therefore, be the direct channel of conveyance to Abraham, of the most important and instructive facts, and the doctrines of pardon and salvation.

From Adam to Noah there were ten generations, occupying a period of one thousand six hundred and fifty-six years. From Noah to Abraham there were also ten generations, the period of which embraced only three hundred and fifty-two years! While extreme longevity was necessary to carry on the wise designs of Providence, men lived to the age of nearly a thousand years: but when God purposed to substitute a written revelation of his holy will, instead of oral tradition handed down from father to son, the days of man were reduced to less than a hundred years!

Abram was the youngest son of Terah, born when his father was a hundred and thirty years of age; Nahor and Haran were his elder brothers. Ur in Chaldea was his native place, a city lying near to Nineveh, between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, in the country of Mesopotamia. His eldest brother Haran, born when his father was seventy years of age, and sixty years before Abram, "died before his father Terah, in the land of his nativity, in Ur of the Chaldees" (Gen. xi, 28), at the age of about one hundred and thirty-five years. Haran leaving three children, Lot his son and two daughters, Milcah and Sarah, the latter of whom, as the Jews say, appears to have been called also Iscah (ver. 29), Abram chose Sarai, one of his nieces, ten years younger than himself, to be his wife, his brother Nahor having married her sister Milcah. Such appears to have been the custom in families in those ages, and these arrangements seem to have been formed with the entire approbation of their father Terah, and probably, at this time, with the view to preserve the fear of God in their families.

LECTURE XI.

AND LEAD US NOT INTO TEMPTATION, BUT DELIVER US FROM EVIL.

We here pray to God that he would not lead us into temptation. It is of importance that we should understand the meaning of the word "temptation," as here used: we must remember that it does not mean that God tempts a man to sin, to break his commandments, for God's part is to deliver us from sin, not to lead us into sin; God leads us into the paths of righteousness; and moreover St. James says, "When a man is tempted, let him not say that he is tempted of God," because, he adds, "God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man; but every man is tempted, when he is drawn away by his own lust, and enticed." In what sense then are we to understand this expression, addressed to "our Father who is in heaven," "and lead us not into temptation?" It means, "suffer us not to be tempted, above that we are able to bear:" God allows Satan to tempt man, to try him: and this God often does in mercy, that man may know himself, that he is but weakness, and that he may also be known of others, that men may see whom in reality he serves and loves, whether God or Mammon, that men may see by his conduct while under trial, that he is indeed no hypocrite.

I have shown you what this passage does not mean, and what it does mean; and who is the author of evil, and who permits evil; and I also have given you two reasons why God allows Satan to tempt man.

What does this passage not mean?—It does not mean that God tempts man to sin.

What does it mean?—It means, that God allows Satan to tempt man.

Who is the author of evil?—Satan.

Who permits evil?—God.

What were the two reasons I gave why God permits evil?—God permits Satan to tempt us, that we may know ourselves, and that we may be known of others.

What do we pray for when we say, "lead us not into temptation?"—Suffer us not to be tempted above what we are able to bear.

Teacher. The other part of this clause is, "but deliver us from evil." We must ask of God to deliver us from evil, because he alone can; man cannot deliver himself from Satan, or govern his own evil heart in his own strength; he must be strengthened by the Spirit, who is able, and also willing to deliver us.

Why do we pray to God to deliver us from evil?—Because he alone is able to deliver us.

Teacher. God is to deliver us from evil; now mark what we are to understand by evil. It refers, first, to Satan, our greatest enemy both spiritual and bodily, the cause of all sin and misery, a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour, from whom, unless God protect us and deliver us, we cannot escape. Secondly, It refers to our own evil hearts, naturally so treacherous, so deceitful; we have not only a roaring and open enemy without, but a secret and deadly enemy within, on Satan's side, with him confederate against our immortal souls. Thirdly, It will refer to "wicked men," those who are Satan's messengers, those who have sold themselves to him to work the works of darkness, who, at enmity with the Captain of our salvation, and fighting under the devil's banner, shall finally by the Lamb be conquered, and be for ever shut up in the pit of horrors. Fourthly, It may refer to the pomps and vanities of this wicked world, which lulling the soul into a kind of stupor as it regards God and heaven, too often draw the unwary soul from the way of life to the gate of eternal death. Fifthly, and lastly, It refers to every thing that is not of God; for whatsoever is not of God is evil, and whatsoever is of sin is of Satan, and whatsoever pertains to Satan must be hurtful and dangerous to the soul.

What five things are included under the term "evil," here used?—It refers, First, To Satan; Secondly, To our own hearts; Thirdly, To wicked men; Fourthly, To the pomps and vanities of this wicked world; Fifthly, To every thing that is not of God.

Teacher. If we pray to God to deliver us from evil, and not to lead us into temptation, lest we should fall; we must indeed be very careful that we do not willingly or heedlessly run into the way of temptation: if we do thus wickedly act, and yet utter these words of our Lord, we must be arrant hypocrites. O that men would seriously consider this petition, which they so often repeat! If this were the case, our theatres and playhouses would be thinly attended; the races, and balls, and card-tables would lack attendance; the eye and heart would be closely watched, for we are surrounded by legions of enemies. Now remember, that if you trust to human arm for strength to conquer the powers of darkness, as surely will you be overcome, as surely will you be lost for ever. Seek ye the Lord, then, while he may be found, draw nigh unto him, while he is near. Let the wicked forsake his ways, and the ungodly man his thoughts, and turn to the Lord his God, and he will have mercy, and he will plenteously forgive. Delay not, tarry not, but fly to Christ, for each day your hearts are growing harder. The moment is arrived. O, now is the day of salvation, and not to-morrow; fly then now from the wrath to come, unto the arms of Him who died for you and rose again, who will wash you, and sanctify you, and justify you, and give you a place among the heirs of his glory.

FORMATION OF WILBERFORCE'S RELIGIOUS CHARACTER.

The formation of such a religious character as that of Mr. Wilberforce, must be a subject of no ordinary interest: and its history is given in a Funeral Discourse delivered at Hull, by the Rev. John Scott, M. A. From this we learn that Mr. Wilberforce had been favoured with the instructions of the Rev. Joseph Milner, the pious author of the "History of the Church of Christ;" and he attended the ministry of that faithful preacher of the gospel. His religious impressions thus received, were deepened by residing in London with a pious uncle and aunt, who introduced him to the excellent Mr. Newton, whose ministry they attended; but on his removal to college, or even before, as the Rev. Mr. Scott says, he declined from that seriousness which began to distinguish him. On entering into public life as a member of parliament, by the London clubs and political meetings, his heart, it is to be feared, was considerably drawn away from God, and turned aside to vanity, and his religious principles in some degree corrupted or undermined. But the same year at which we have arrived was, through God's mercy, to furnish the occasion of his recovery, and to lay the foundation of that holy and decidedly religious character, which he eventually maintained to the end of his days.

In the latter part of the year 1784, and again in 1785, he travelled on the continent with a party of friends. The late Dean of Carlisle, Dr. Isaac Milner, was his companion in the same carriage: and here these highly-gifted friends discussed various interesting topics together. Religion was of the number: and on one occasion Mr. Wilberforce having expressed respect for a pious clergyman, but added, that he "carried things too far," his friend pressed him upon this point. "What did he mean by carrying things too far, or being too strict? On what ground did he pronounce this to be the case? When we talked of going too far, some standard must necessarily be referred to: was the standard of Scripture exceeded? or could any other standard be satisfactorily adopted and maintained? Perhaps it would not easily be shown that where things were carried, as it was alleged, too far, they were carried beyond the rules of Scripture, but only beyond what was usually practised and approved among men!"

Mr. Wilberforce, when thus pressed by his friend, endeavoured to explain and defend his position as well as he could: but he was dissatisfied himself with what he had to offer: in short, he felt that his own notions on the subject were vague and untenable. A lodgment was thus made in his conscience; matter for serious thinking was suggested; and his thoughts could find no rest till they found it from the word of God, and the adoption of a scriptural standard, by which to form all his judgments and regulate all his conduct.

Another incident in the history of his mind at this period, as related by himself, is not less interesting and instructive than the preceding: "As I read," said he, "the promises of Holy Scripture, 'Ask and ye shall receive, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you;' God will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him; 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest;' 'I will take away the heart of stone, and give you the heart of flesh;' 'I will put my laws in your hearts, and write them in your inward parts;' 'I will be merciful unto their unrighteousness, and their sins and iniquities will I remember no more.' As I read these passages, it occurred to me to reflect—If these things be so—if there be any truth in all this—and if I set myself to seek the blessings thus promised—I shall certainly find a sensible effect and change wrought within me, such as is thus described. I will put the matter to the proof, I will try the experiment, I will seek that I may find the promised blessings! He did so: and the result was peace, and liberty, and victory; peace of conscience, and purified affections; deliverance from those sins which had ensnared him, or held him in bondage; 'the victory that overcometh the world,' and boldness 'to confess Christ before men.' 'He had the witness in himself,' 1 John v, 10; a sensible evidence, both that the word of God is true, and that he had not in vain sought the fulfilment of its promises in himself."

Mr. Scott then makes this appropriate appeal: "And was not this, brethren, a truly rational proceeding? Was it any other than a strictly correct application of the principle of the experimental philosophy? Bringing an alleged fact to the test of actual experience, making a great and important experiment, for the express purpose of ascertaining whether its result was such as it was averred it would be? Let me say to you all, 'Go ye, and do likewise:' put the truth of the Divine asseverations to the test; ask such things as God hath promised, with becoming seriousness, humility, and perseverance; and see now if it shall not be unto you 'according to his word.' Be not content to speculate upon matters so thoroughly practical, and so nearly concerning your eternal welfare. 'Ask, that ye may receive, and that your joy may be full.'"

Now it was that Mr. Wilberforce, with these altered feelings of mind, sought again the acquaintance of Mr. Newton; and in the winter of 1785-6, that he began, at Mr. N.'s recommendation, to attend the ministry of a revered relative of my own (Mr. Scott's father, the celebrated Commentator); which for many years he continued regularly to do, till a change of his situation in life obliged him to become only an occasional, instead of a constant hearer.

Thus may be said to have been completed the settlement of Mr. Wilberforce's principles and character; and by such gifts of nature, such a process of education and training, and such influences of divine grace, was the foundation laid for all that was to follow.

DISINTERESTEDNESS OF CHRISTIANITY.

Lord Chesterfield, who adorned conversation by his wit, as much as he impaired it by his principles, has defined politeness to be "the art of pleasing." St. Paul recommends with as much warmth as his Lordship the duty of pleasing our neighbours: but here the two moralists part. The noble writer would have us please others to benefit ourselves: all his precepts originate and terminate in that one object—self. The Christian writer directs us to please others for their highest good, their moral edification. The essence of the worldly code of ethics is selfishness: that of the Christian is disinterestedness. There is a generosity in Christian intercourse, the very reverse of that little narrow spirit ascribed to it by those who do not know or do not love it. True religion keeps the whole man in order, whether he be engaged in business or in company: it sheds its benign influence far beyond its own sphere, and by a reflex light casts a ray on actions to which it has no immediate reference. The Christian uses his talents temperately, and had rather not shine at all, than shine at the expense of another. The religious man finds means for the exercise of many Christian virtues without descanting on them—candour, charitable construction, patience with the less enlightened and temper with the less forbearing, a scrupulous veracity, an inviolable sincerity, a watchful guard against every vain thought and every light expression.

UNWARRANTED CONFIDENCE IN DIVINE MERCY.

Sir,

What replies are most suitable to make to those persons, who, amid the ills of life, endeavour to solace themselves with the mercy of God and the promises of the Gospel, yet evince no disposition to love God or obey his commandments? An answer to the above in your valuable Magazine will much oblige

A Constant Reader.

Our Correspondent supposes a case, many examples of which are found in our Christian country. They are most truly distressing to the minds of decided, intelligent, spiritually-minded followers of the Redeemer; for they know, that whatever references any may make to the mercy of God, "without holiness no man shall see the Lord," and that "except a man be born of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God;" "for our God," who is "glorious in holiness," is also "a consuming fire." At the same time, they require to be treated with peculiar tenderness and discretion, as well as faithfulness.

"Replies" to their observations are not sufficient; nor is controversy to be recommended. Sympathizing kindness, inculcating the grand principles of the gospel of Christ, will be the most likely means of effectual conversion of the mind from that state of delusion: but still, every effort to lead the heart to God, embracing his salvation by Jesus Christ, will be utterly ineffectual without the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit.

Afflictions demonstrate the fallen condition of mankind. Misery, under the government of God, infinitely wise, powerful, and good, could not possibly exist but as the consequence of guilt. Divine revelation inculcates this doctrine in every page; and exhibits the Son of God, in the character of Mediator, securing by his death, as a sacrifice of atonement for sin, a channel for the communication of eternal mercy. Every reference to the mercy of God and to the promises of the gospel, on the part of those enduring "the ills of life," should be encouraged; but at the same time, every possible means, in a sympathizing spirit of kindness, should be employed to direct the sufferer to the atonement of Christ, as the only medium of our personal reconciliation with God, and as the only ground of our appropriation of his promises.

"We are all hoping in the same mercy of God, and expecting the same heaven," is the language of many who appear to be altogether uninfluenced by the Spirit of Christ. Persons of a worldly spirit, as our Correspondent writes, "evincing no love to God, or obedience to his commandments," however they may sometimes, in the season of affliction, speak of the mercy of God, or of heaven, are unhappily and fatally mistaken. The mercy with which they endeavour to solace themselves, is merely deliverance from their present sufferings and misery; and the heaven which they expect is some undescribed place of exemption from calamity and sorrow, in the enjoyment of ease and gratification. It may not be the sensual Paradise of Mohammed, nor the fancied Elysium of the Greeks, but it is not the heaven of the Scriptures.

The hope of the Christian is "the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life;" embracing the full pardon of sin, spiritual peace with God, and a lively sense of his sovereign kindness in granting deliverance from deserved condemnation by the sufferings of the Redeemer. The heaven which the Christian expects is an eternal Sabbath of spiritual, holy, delightful exercises, with all his glorified powers in the active worship and service of God in his immediate presence, and in the blessed society of myriads of angels and glorified saints. Scriptural views of the Divine mercy through Christ Jesus, and the inspired representations of the Christian's heaven, should be offered to those who are mistaken and deluded, that they also, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, may be brought to seek and obtain salvation and eternal glory, the gifts of God through the Divine Redeemer.

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE OF THE TRUTH OF REVELATION.

(From the Diary of a departed Christian.)

There are seasons, when the internal evidences of the Bible, as a revelation from God, are so strong and irresistible on the Christian's mind, and the truths which that blessed volume unfolds come with such energy and unction on the soul, that not to recognize the influence of the Spirit of God in his word, would be to doubt the evidence of the senses. How sweet is it to hold communion with God, when he vouchsafes to visit the soul, and then to have fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ! — when the work of the Spirit on the heart sweetly leads us to Jesus, and through Jesus the Mediator to God! — when the veil seems for a while withdrawn, which hides the unseen but not unfelt realities of another world from us! — and God, speaking to us by his word, so applies some part of it to us, so fixes and lays it on our hearts, that we can say, "It is our Father's message to us!" How careful ought we to be to cultivate a spirit to receive these whispers of mercy. How much do we lose by not keeping a listening ear and an attentive heart when God is willing to speak with us. Communion with God! Yes, the believer knows what it is: it is no vain abstraction, no heated enthusiasm of the imagination, as the cold philosopher may scoffingly think.

Oh! my God and Father! draw me up to hold that blessed and soul-elevating intercourse with thee, which thou givest at thy own sovereign pleasure to those who seek thee! Why are thy visits, O my Saviour, so short and so distant? Are they too ravishing for our earthliness to bear? Canst thou not enlarge our capacities even here to receive more of thy communicable fulness, and to apprehend some brighter revelation of thy uncreated glory? Why, O my soul! dost thou not pant after this sweet and heavenly communion more? The Spirit and the bride say, Come. O let me re-echo, Come Lord Jesus! But I have tasted that the Lord is gracious. I have sat under his shadow with great delight, and his banner over me has been love. And though here still constrained often to walk without the full sunshine of my Saviour's presence, though here still obliged to see only through a glass darkly, yet let me be thankful for what I do know of God. Blessed thought! to be able to say in the assurance of faith, "I know that it is my Father who is in heaven! I know that my Redeemer liveth! and that the Spirit of God is my Comforter!" It is the seal and witness of greater bliss; for whom he loveth, he loveth to the end; and he who has begun the good work will carry it on to perfection, to that blessed consummation when faith shall be swallowed up in open vision, and the full splendours of eternity burst on the transported soul! Here let me live the life of faith upon the Son of God. Nothing can be too humble to think of myself, nothing too high of my Saviour. O for a thankful, quiet, confiding spirit! May I rest in his love, knowing that God is love; and that he who hath not withheld his only-begotten Son, how will he not with him freely give us all things! And I ascribe to God Almighty, Father, Son, and Spirit, all glory, blessing, and adoration, now and evermore. Amen.

EXTENT AND DREADFUL EFFECTS OF INTEMPERANCE.

The quantity of spirits which pay duty for home consumption in this kingdom has more than doubled within a few past years. According to Parliamentary Returns made in 1831, it amounted to 27,719,999 gallons at proof, which, with the addition of one-sixth for the reduction of strength by retailers, amounted to 16,736,712*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.*; and this sum does not include any part of the many millions of gallons known to be illicitly distilled, or imported without paying duty.

The Poors' Rates and County Rates, for England and Wales only, amount annually to 8,000,000*l.* The proportion of this expenditure occasioned by drinking may be most safely estimated at two-thirds, say 5,333,333*l.*; which, added to the cost of spirits alone, 16,736,712*l*, gives the sum expended by this nation, in the last five years, on these two objects only, at 110,350,225*l.*; amounting, in only twenty years, to more than 440,000,000*l.* sterling; without including any computation for the enormous sums consumed in the abuse of wine and beer, the expenses of prosecutions, the injury done to our foreign trade, the loss of shipping, and the notorious destruction of property in various other ways.

It has been estimated, that four-fifths of all the Crimes in our country have been committed under the excitement of liquor. During the last year, 32,636 persons were taken into custody by the Metropolitan Police for drunkenness alone; not including any of the numerous cases in which assaults or more serious offences have been committed under the influence of drinking: and it should be observed, that this statement relates only to the suburbs of London, without any calculation for the thousands of cases which occurred in the city itself.

Excessive drinking is the principal cause of our Parochial Expenses. Of 143 inmates of a London parish workhouse, 105 had been reduced to that state by intemperance; and the small remainder comprises all the blind, epileptic, and idiotic, as well as all the aged poor, some of whom would also drink to intoxication if opportunity offered.

More than one half of the Madness in our country is occasioned by drinking. Of 495 patients admitted in four years into a lunatic asylum at Liverpool, 257 were known to have lost their reason by this vice.

ADVANCEMENT OF RELIGION IN AMERICA.

Dr. Cox, of New York, has been on a visit to England during the past summer, for the improvement of his health. The object of his voyage across the vast Atlantic, to the land of his fathers, having, through the Divine blessing, been happily realized, he has returned home to his family and his pastoral duties. During his visit to Scotland, he attended the "United Associate Synod," while that reverend body was deliberating on a Memorial respecting the Observance of the Sabbath. To this a reference is made in the following account.

"The Rev. Dr. Cox, a member of the Presbyterian church of the United States, having entered during Dr. Ritchie's address, it was proposed to adjourn the further consideration of the memorial, and take into consideration the letter which had been transmitted from the General Assembly of the American Presbyterian Church. The letter was accordingly read. It gave an interesting account of the progress of Presbyterianism in America, and states, that in the year 1704 there were only six Presbyterian ministers throughout the colonies; and that at the last computation there were 22 synods, 111 presbyteries, 1,800 ministers, 2,600 churches, and 233,000 members. The object of the letter was to obtain an interchange of yearly reports between the two churches, and the consent of the Secession to hold prayer-meetings in all her different churches for the conversion of the world, on the first Monday of January next.

"Dr. Cox then rose, and gave a general account of the state and prospects of the Presbyterian church in the United States, remarking, that the discussions which prevailed among them were respecting the metaphysics rather than the facts of religion, and that the ministers of the church might all be called Calvinists in their title, however they might differ in various shades of opinion respecting it. With respect to the support of ministers, he said that they were all liberally supported by the people, and mentioned, as one instance among many, that when his health obliged him to visit Europe, his congregation unanimously offered not only to continue his salary, but to pay the expenses of his voyage, and farther, to support any successor he might name in his absence. There was not a minister, he said, who wished support from the State, and the man who said they did would everywhere be treated as a calumniator."

TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE W. WILBERFORCE, ESQ.

Among the tributes paid to his memory, we copy a Resolution of the Committee of the Church Missionary Society, passed on the 12th of August:—

"Resolved, That in recording the death of Mr. Wilberforce, a Governor and Vice-President of the Society from its formation, the Committee cannot but testify their strong sense of the valuable services rendered by him, on numerous occasions, to this Institution; and, while they bow with submission to the will of our Heavenly Father in removing him, they would offer up unfeigned thanksgiving, in acknowledgment of the benefits which it has pleased God to bestow on their country and on mankind, by the rare endowments which He granted to that distinguished man — by the singular opportunities of wide and commanding influence opened to him — and especially by that gracious power of the Holy Spirit on his heart, which enabled him, for a long course of years, under the constraining influence of the love of Christ, to direct his talents, with sincere aim and unblemished character, to the glory of God, in labouring for the present and eternal good of his fellow-men: and the Committee unfeignedly rejoice that this eminent servant of Christ was allowed to witness, before his eyes were closed on this world, the near consummation, so far as this country is concerned, of that object to which, with unwearied perseverance and unsubdued fortitude, he had devoted all the best years of his life — the Liberation of Africa and her Children from their bonds."

ON THE SUN AND STARS.

Our dying Saviour's like the setting sun:
  His saints on earth are like the stars of night.
Experience tells us, till the sun be gone,
  The stars appear not with their glistening light.
Till sun-set we discern no stars at all:
The saints receive their glory in his fall.

QUARLES.

TO THE MEMORY OF MR. WILBERFORCE.

What is the charm of sweetest, holiest worth,
To him who loves with early dawn to muse
O'er nature brightening into daylight hues,
Giving each form of grace and grandeur birth,
As if all things were new in heaven and earth?
Oh! 'tis a charm we feel but cannot name;
Something to hush the voice, and fix the eye,
Beyond the purple tint and golden flame,
Beyond the blushing of the gorgeous sky;
A thought within the heart, — that God is nigh.
So, Wilberforce, thy zeal for man below
Was more than earth-born love of human-kind;
And souls that kindled in thy burning glow,
Felt 'twas the Saviour's sunlight on the mind.

POPULAR HYMNS IN GERMANY.

Germany, as many of our readers are aware, has fearfully sunk into a kind of infidel scepticism. Deism was rendered fashionable at the German courts by Joseph II, emperor of the Romans, and Frederick I, king of Prussia, and their influence on the continent was extensive and lasting. Nevertheless, the pious writings of Arndt, Spener, Frank, Gerhard, and other of the German Pietists, were scattered widely, and still possessed by many who read them with a lively and saving interest. Their evangelical hymns, too, in a great variety of metres, amounting it is said to seventy thousand, while those used in England by every denomination amount to only about five thousand, are sung by many in humble life, doubtless with melody in their hearts. Surely these will be the means, in connection with the circulation of the Scriptures, of a revival of religion in that immense district of the Continent, under the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit. Our Readers will form some idea of their popular hymns from a Translation of a German Watchman's Song.

Hark ye, neighbours, and hear me tell,
Ten now strikes on the belfry bell.
Ten are the holy commandments given
To man below from God in heaven.
Human watch from harm can't ward ye,
God will watch and God will guard ye.

Hark ye, neighbours, and hear me tell,
Eleven sounds on the belfry bell.
Eleven apostles of holy mind
Taught the Gospel to mankind.
Human watch, &c.

Hark ye, neighbours, and hear me tell,
Twelve resounds from the belfry bell.
Twelve disciples to Jesus came,
Who suffer'd rebuke for their Saviour's name.
Human watch, &c.

Hark ye, neighbours, and hear me tell,
One has struck on the belfry bell.
One God above is Lord indeed,
Who bears us forth in the hour of need.
Human watch, &c.

Hark ye, neighbours, and hear me tell,
Two resounds on the belfry bell.
Two paths before mankind are free;
Neighbour, choose the good for thee.
Human watch, &c.

Hark ye, neighbours, and hear me tell,
Three now strikes on the belfry bell.
Threefold reigns the heavenly host,
The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.
Human watch from harm can't ward ye,
God will watch and God will guard ye;
He, through his eternal might,
Send you all a blessed night.

THE RECORD OF PROVIDENCE;

Or, the Government of God displayed, in a Series of interesting Facts from Sacred and Profane History. By the Rev. John Young, author of "Scripture Balances," &c. &c. 12mo. cloth. London, Houlston and Son.

Divine Providence is awfully mysterious. But it being the government of Him who is "too wise to err and too good to be unkind," a devout contemplation of his righteous direction of all affairs in the world, must be of incalculable advantage to the Christian. Our blessed Lord has assured his disciples, "In the world ye shall have tribulation;" and, as an apostle has declared, "Now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations," &c. 1 Pet. i, 6, 7.

Illustrations of Providence occupy a large portion of the Holy Scriptures; and the principles of faith, and hope, and resignation, in the ancient saints of God, are commended to us in this manner by inspiration. Mr. Young has industriously collected a most edifying number and variety of facts, which we have no doubt will be read by many with considerable delight and profit. We shall have occasion again to refer to this interesting volume.

AWFULLY INSTRUCTIVE DISCOVERY.

Sanguinary examples, in deterring from crime, have been found fearfully deficient in efficacy. Of this we have a most affecting illustration in the following:—

"The Rev. Mr. Roberts, of Bristol, in his visits to prisons in England from time to time, has fallen in with many convicts under sentence of death. In 167 instances he inquired of the malefactor whether he had ever witnessed an execution. It turned out that no fewer than 164 out of 167 condemned offenders had been spectators in the crowd upon these melancholy occasions, which the legislature designed to operate as warnings to the profligate.

A WORTHY EXAMPLE.

London Missionary Society.—The Rev. Robert Cotton Mather and the Rev. John Adam Schürman, with their wives, sailed from Portsmouth, on the 9th of July, in the "Alexander," Captain G. Waugh, for Calcutta, on their way to join the mission in Benares: on the day after they sailed, the Directors received the following Letter, with its enclosure.

"Observing in the Evangelical Magazine for this month, that God is opening a door for his truth to enter at Benares, East Indies, and believing that, if truth enters, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, darkness must, though reluctantly, retire; and wishing all possible success to your efforts in sending missionaries to such dark regions; enclosed you will receive 400*l*. in aid of the same, from a well-wisher to the universal spread of Divine truth."

CORINTH.

ANCIENT CORINTH.

ENT CORINTH was one of the most illustrious of Greece. In some respects it has been con-ed superior even to Athens. Sacred, as well as ne history, celebrates it for its splendour; and as at of learning, luxury, and voluptuousness. Co-is said to have been founded in the time of Moses, the year 1514 before the advent of Christ, by hus, the son of Eolus and grandfather of Ulysses.

autifully situated on the southern part of the us, which joins the Peloponnesus to the cont, about sixty stadia, or seven miles and a half the sea on each side, commerce flourished at th as a convenient mart; and hence it became ed with the most sumptuous buildings: temples, res, porticoes, and palaces, adorned this city; and eculiar style displayed in the columns with which ublic edifices were enriched, occasioned that order chitecture to be denominated from the city Co-ian.

tues for temples and palaces, and all the liberal were brought to their greatest perfection at Co-
. All the European and Asiatic princes, who had aste in painting and sculpture, furnished them-here with their richest moveables.

rinth was considered one of the strongest cities in the world, when taken in the year 146 before the Christian era, and pillaged and burnt by the legions of Rome. Mummius, the Roman consul, allowed his troops to ransack the city; when they destroyed the most valuable pictures and the statues, the works of the greatest masters. Many inestimable pieces of the most famous painters and statuaries fell into the hands of the ignorant soldiers, who either destroyed them, or parted with them for trifles. Polybius, the historian, was an eye-witness to this barbarism of the Romans. He had the mortification to see two of them playing at dice on a famous picture of Aristides, which was accounted one of the wonders of the world. The piece was a Bacchus, so exquisitely finished, that it was proverbially said of any extraordinary performance, "It is as well done as the Bacchus of Aristides." This master-piece of painting, however, the soldiers willingly exchanged for a more convenient play-table; but when the spoils of Corinth were put up to sale, Attalus, king of Pergamus, offered for it 600,000 sesterces, nearly 5,000*l.* sterling. It was carried to Rome, and lodged in the temple of Ceres. The city being thoroughly pillaged, fire was set to it in many places, which produced a prodigious conflagration. At this time the gold, silver, and brass, which the Corinthians had concealed, were melted, and ran down the streets in streams; which, when the flames were extinguished, was found to contain a new composition, called "Corinthian metal."

Corinth lay in ruins nearly a century, until Julius Cæsar settled there a colony of Romans: these, in removing the rubbish, found many rich embossed vases, both earthen and metal. Industrious curiosity was excited, as great prices were obtained for these antiquities: no burying place was left unexamined, and Rome is said to have been filled with the furniture of the Corinthian sepulchres.

Corinth was restored by the Romans; when the circuit of the city was estimated at forty stadia, or five miles; and the suburbs included, it exceeded eighty-five stadia, or nearly eleven miles. Acro-Corinthus was a lofty mountain, nearly half a mile in perpendicular height, on which the citadel was erected, overlooking the whole city. Besides this fortification, the works of art, which displayed the opulence and taste of the Corinthians, were the grottos, raised over the fountains of Pyrené, sacred to the Muses, and constructed of white marble; the theatre, and stadium, built of the same materials, and decorated in the most magnificent manner; the temple of Neptune, containing the chariots of that fabulous deity and of Amphitrite, drawn by horses covered over with gold, and adorned with ivory hoofs. The avenue which led to this splendid edifice was decorated with the statues of those who had been victorious in the Isthmian games.

Corinth was scarcely less celebrated for the learning and ingenuity of its inhabitants than for the extent of its commerce and the magnificence of its buildings. The arts and sciences were carried to such perfection, that Cicero terms it "Totius Greciæ lumen," the light of all Greece; and Florus calls it "Greciæ decus," the ornament of Greece. Seminaries abounded at Corinth, in which philosophy and rhetoric were taught publicly by learned professors, and foreigners resorted to them from all quarters to perfect their education. Hence the remark of Horace, a Roman poet, "Non cuivis homini contigit adire Corinth," It does not fall to every man to go to Corinth.

Celebrated as Corinth was for learning and elegance, it was equally notorious for debauchery. Strabo informs us, that, "in the temple of Venus, at Corinth, there were more than a thousand harlots, slaves of the temple, who, in honour of the goddess, hired themselves to prostitution; on which account the city was crowded and became wealthy." Lasciviousness was, therefore, carried to such an infamous height at Corinth, that a woman was regarded as a prostitute, when she was designated as a Corinthian!

CHRISTIANTY INTRODUCED TO THE CORINTHIANS.

Christianity triumphed even at Corinth, notwithstanding the shocking idolatry, and the proverbial licentiousness of its inhabitants. Immorality and profligacy had arisen to its greatest height when the apostle Paul visited that celebrated city. Bigotry and enmity inflamed the Jews against his person and ministry, and he turned to the Gentiles. What discouragements he experienced, his relief by a vision of his Lord assuring him of his having "much people in that city," and his ultimate success,—are manifest by the Acts of the Apostles, chap. xviii, and his two Epistles to the Corinthian believers.

Paul laboured at Corinth nearly two years; and the fruits of his ministry were formed into a church, which was eminently distinguished for its spiritual endowments: yet, through the shocking impurities of the pagans, and the ambition of some erroneous teachers, the Corinthian professors were led into many disorders.

"The First Epistle to the Corinthians," was written A. D. 57, about two years after the apostle left them: and the design of it was twofold. First, to correct their improprieties, by healing their divisions, by engaging them to personal holiness, for the honour of Christ, and by establishing them in the doctrine of the resurrection to eternal glory. Secondly, to satisfy their inquiries on several points concerning which they had written to the apostle, especially respecting marriage, meats offered to idols, and spiritual gifts.

"The Second Epistle to the Corinthians," is believed to have been written about a year after the former. That having been useful in promoting a reformation in the church, especially in relation to many whose conduct had been dishonourable and scandalous, some erroneus teachers were offended with the apostle, blamed him for interfering in the affairs of the congregation, and endeavoured to lessen his apostolic authority and invalidate his divine commission. This Epistle, therefore, was intended to comfort the penitents, and to justify the character of the apostle as an ambassador of Christ.

PRESENT STATE OF CORINTH.

Corinth flourished for some time after it received Christianity, but most calamitous has been its modern history. Adrian, the Roman emperor, about A. D. 125, made some improvements in this city; and early in the third century, when Pausanias visited it, many temples and statues indicated its prosperity. But the Heruli, about A. D. 268, burned Corinth to ashes. In the year 525 it was again almost ruined by an earthquake. About 1180, it was taken and plundered by Roger, king of Sicily. Since 1458 it was till lately under the power of the Turks; and it is so decayed, that its inhabitants amount to no more than about 1,500 or 2,000, partly Mohammedans, and partly professors of Christianity.

Corinth still occupies a considerable extent, its situation being elevated, beneath the lofty Acro-Corinthus, with an easy descent towards the Gulf of Lepanto. The houses are scattered, or in parcels, except in the bazaar. Cypresses, among which tower the domes of mosques, with gardens of lemon and orange trees, are beautifully interspersed. The air is reckoned bad in the summer, and exceedingly unhealthy in autumn. Wheeler relates, that from the top of the Acro-Corinthus, he enjoyed one of the most agreeable prospects which the world can afford; and he guessed that the walls of the city are about two miles in compass, inclosing mosques, with houses and churches, mostly in ruins.

Alluding to the labours of the apostle Paul at Corinth, a late French writer, who visited this vicinity, remarks: "When the Cæsars rebuilt the walls of Corinth, and the temples of the gods rose from the ruins more magnificent than ever, an obscure architect was rearing in silence an edifice which still remains standing amidst the ruins of Greece. This man, unknown to the great, despised by the multitude, rejected as the offscouring of the world, at first associated with himself only two companions, Crispus and Gaius, and with the family of Stephanas. These were the humble architects of an indestructible temple, and the first believers in Corinth. The traveller surveys the site of the celebrated city; he discovers not a vestige of the altars of Paganism, but perceives some Christian chapels rising from among the cottages of the Greeks. The apostle might still, from his celestial abode, give the salutation of peace to his children, and address them in the words, 'Paul, to the church of God which is at Corinth.'"

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ABRAHAM.

The Call of Abraham.

Abraham, "the father of the faithful," and "the friend of God," in the early part of his life was an idolater! But we have little certain information concerning his character and habits, except what is contained in the address of Joshua to the people of Israel. "And Joshua said unto all the people, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood, in old time, even Terah the father of Abraham and the father of Nachor: and they served other gods." Josh. xxiv, 2.

Human biographers would have been likely to conceal this reference to Abraham's character in early years, while they traced his growing fitness for his future elevation. But the riches of divine mercy shine more eminently conspicuous, in recording the original and the infirmities of the Scripture saints, while detailing their progressive preparation to be exhibited as illustrious worthies, holding communion with God. The same sovereign grace, by which Paul was transformed from a mad persecutor to be an apostle of Christ, wrought effectually in calling Abram from his idolatry to be a prophet of the Lord, the founder of his church, and the pattern of believers.

At what precise period of his life Abram was "called by grace," we are not clearly informed: but probably many years before his removal from the city of his nativity. The Jews have a tradition that he was an eminent preacher against the Chaldean idolatry, and that he inveighed with so much zeal against the increasing abominations of his countrymen, in worshipping fire and the heavenly bodies, that they threw him into a burning fiery furnace, but from which, by the Divine power, he escaped unhurt. His ministry failed of its desired effect, in relation to his countrymen; though it appears to have been the means of the conversion of his father and of all his family.

Perhaps few can conceive the delightful satisfaction which Abram experienced, in seeing such blessed fruits of his labours: yet our pious young readers may derive the greatest encouragement from it, to persevere in their benevolent efforts, notwithstanding opposition, to bring their irreligious friends to a saving knowledge of that Redeemer, on whom they have believed for life everlasting.

While his countrymen continued in their idolatry, Abram enjoyed sacred communion with the "Father of spirits;" and as Stephen observes, "the God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran, and said unto him, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred; and come into the land which I shall show thee." Acts vii, 2, 3. The principles of Abram were to be tried; and it was to be proved whether he loved God more than all his friends, and whether he could cheerfully forsake all to go along with God.

As to the mode of the Divine communication with Abram, we are not particularly informed; but it was of such a kind, and with such efficacy, as to determine and satisfy his mind. Abram communicated to his father the subject of the commandment of the Lord, and Terah believed in his divine commission. Having confidence in the pious integrity of his son, Terah resolved immediately to forsake his native country, and yielded obedience to the admonition of Heaven. On this account, the inspired historian observes, "And Terah took Abram his son, and Lot the son of Haran his son's son, and Sarai his daughter-in-law, his son Abram's wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan; and they came unto Haran, and dwelt there." Gen. xi, 31.

Haran was about three hundred miles, or half way from Ur to Canaan, and in the north-west of Mesopotamia. Thus removed from the idolatries of Chaldea, and the infirmities of their aged father increasing through fatigue, his dutiful children built a city in a convenient situation, in which they settled for a season. To this they gave the name of Haran, or Charran, in commemoration of their elder brother, lately deceased at Ur, before they commenced their journey. Their venerable parent, having attained a greater age than most of his contemporaries, did not long survive this event. "And the days of Terah were two hundred and five years: and Terah died in Haran." Ver. 32.

Having committed to the earth the mortal remains of his revered father, Abram reflected upon the gracious promise which God had given when he commanded him to leave his native land. Probably the Lord renewed his assurance, in which he had formerly said, "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing. And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curse thee; and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Gen. xii, 2, 3.

The promise accompanying the Divine command might seem obscure, and relating to things far too remote: obedience therefore required no ordinary measure of spiritual grace. Natural reason would suggest, that a settled habitation among friends or near to them, was the most likely way to enjoy the Divine blessing in a numerous posterity, so as to be the channel of heavenly mercies to all nations: nor would the enemy of souls fail to insinuate a doubt, whether the vision of God were not a delusion of the fancy, as it prescribed conditions so painful, and embraced consequences so distant and uncertain. A lively imagination would pourtray the dangerous migration, with a numerous household, through countries unknown. Still Abram was ready to tear himself from the nearest connections, although uncertain what reception he should meet with from a strange people, sunk perhaps in idolatry, and more debased than his own countrymen from whom he had been called: they might also be hostile to each other, and ready to sacrifice him as an intruder upon their territories. But Abram believed the promises of God; and by this living faith, the mind of the patriarch was elevated, far superior to every fleshly principle and every painful apprehension, and secured against the influence of the malicious tempter. He regarded simply the gracious and imperative word of God: as it is observed by an apostle—"By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed, and went, not knowing" (and, having God for his guide, not caring) "whither he went." Heb. xi, 8.

Not for Abram's sake was this recorded; but as an admirable example to us of lively faith and cheerful obedience. In affairs relating only to the present world, prudential considerations may dictate to our young friends the propriety of seeking counsel from sagacious friends; but in matters of religious obligation, in which the call and direction are evidently from God, hesitancy and indecision are disobedience. True faith is prompt to obey, rising as on the wings of an eagle to perform the revealed will of the Lord.

Leaving his brother Nahor, and those who chose to remain with him at Haran, "Abram departed, as the Lord had spoken unto him: and Lot went with him: and Abram was seventy and five years old when he departed out of Haran. And Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot his brother's son, and all their substance that they had gathered, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran; and they went forth to go into the land of Canaan; and into the land of Canaan they came." Gen. xii, 4, 5.

"Thus Abram, by Divine command,
Left his own house to walk with God.
His faith beheld the promis'd land,
And fir'd his zeal along the road."

LECTURE XII.

FOR THINE IS THE KINGDOM, THE POWER, AND THE GLORY, FOR EVER AND EVER.

Teacher. This ascription of praise, glory, honour, and power to God, seems peculiarly appropriate at the close of this prayer, after having asked God to forgive us our sins, to deliver us from so many dangers, and to crown us daily with loving-kindness and tender mercies. It begins with the word "for," which seems to join this sentence to the preceding clause, "deliver us from evil;" and by that word much seems to be implied: it seems to give the reason why we ask God to protect us and to bless us, and to acknowledge that we are not able to deliver our own souls from the snare of the fowler, and that no man is able to redeem his brother: it seems to confess, that no strength less powerful than Jehovah's is able to deliver: that no arm is able to save us, but that which is omnipotent, which governs all nations and all powers, which sways a universal sceptre, whose is the glory of every good action, because by God's power every good and perfect deed is accomplished; whose existence, power, kingdom, and glory, last through all eternity.

What does this word, "for," at the beginning of this clause, seem to imply? — That no power less mighty than God's is able to deliver us from evil.

Teacher. This subject is naturally divided into three parts: God's kingdom, his power, and his glory.

First, What is God's kingdom?

Teacher. We spoke of God's kingdom when we considered that portion of the Lord's prayer, "Thy kingdom come." I then, you may remember, tried to show you, that there were two kingdoms; one was the world, the nations of the earth; and the other was within us, viz. our own hearts. We there pray, that God's kingdom would come quickly. You may remember how I explained this to you, by showing you, that a king may rule while there are enemies in his land; and I told you, that when we said "thy kingdom come," we prayed, that God's enemies may either be converted or be destroyed: both the enemies of God in this world, Satan and wicked men; and the enemies of God in our own hearts, bad thoughts and the corruption of our nature. And I showed you moreover that we prayed, that God's kingdom of grace, God's Holy Spirit, may take up his abode in all hearts.

What are the two kingdoms here referred to? — The whole world, and our own hearts.

How do we reconcile these two passages, "Thy kingdom come," and "Thine is the kingdom?" — We pray, when we say "Thy kingdom come," that Satan may be destroyed, and that wicked men may be converted; that sin may be taken away from our hearts, and that God may dwell within us.

Teacher. Then in answer to the question, "What is God's kingdom," we say, the whole world, and the heart of man; because God governs the whole world, and all things are his, because all things were created by him; and the kingdom refers to our own hearts, God's casting out Satan, and ruling there himself.

Secondly, What are we to understand by God's power?

All power is of God: the ploughman tills the ground, not with his own strength, but with the strength that God gives to him. It is with God's strength that we walk, that we move: it is in God "we live, and move, and have our being." But power here is employed as referring to the power by which men are "turned from darkness to light, to serve the living God;" by which "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ." It is by God's strength that our heart is changed, that sin is taken away, and that we are made fit for heaven: it is by God's strength that the evil spirit is turned out of our hearts, and that it is made a habitation fit for God himself: it is by God's strength that hereafter all wicked men shall be cast into hell with Satan and his angels, and that the righteous hereafter shall be exalted into everlasting habitations.

Whence comes all power? — From God.

By whose power do we walk? — By God's.

By whose power are we turned from Satan to God? — By God's power.

By whose power will all wicked men be hereafter turned into hell, and the righteous exalted to heaven? — By God's.

Thirdly, What are we to understand by God's glory?

All things manifest God's glory: the world, the sun, the moon, the stars, the sheep, the oxen, all things animate and inanimate, were made for God's glory: the angels and archangels, and all the company of heaven, were made to glorify God: the righteous are exalted to heaven for God's glory; and Satan, his angels, and the wicked, when condemned to fiery torments, all show forth God's glory, because all things were made by God, and "for his glory they are and were created."

For whose glory were all things made? — For God's.

For whose glory were we made? — For God's.

Teacher. This ascription of honour, glory, and power to God, ends with the declaration that it shall last for ever: and it seems to be spoken of by the Christian with a feeling of delight, it being his wish that God for ever should be glorified. Now why do true believers wish God to be glorified? Because they themselves are so connected with their Heavenly Father, that God himself cannot be glorified without his children being glorified also. Christ is the head, believers are the members: if the head be exalted, the members must also be exalted. Another reason is, because they love God, and consequently it is a delight to them that he should be glorified. A third reason is, because they love their fellow-mortals, and desire to see them happy; and man never can be happy until it is his desire that God should be glorified.

In what spirit does the Christian ascribe everlasting glory to his Maker? — In a spirit of joy.

Why does every true believer desire that God should be glorified? — Because the glorifying of God is the glorifying of himself; because he loves his God; because he loves his fellow-mortals, and desires that they also should be happy.

Teacher. "Ye are not your own," says the apostle, "ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your bodies, and in your spirits, which are his."

ON OUR REDEMPTION.

We were created at a word, a breath;
Redeemed with no less than blood and death.
O how much greater labour is it then
To wash a sinner than to make a man. — Quarles.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XXXIX.

RELIGION.

On the Time at which Religious Instruction should begin, and of what it ought to consist during Childhood and Youth.

Dear Madam,

I HAVE now entered upon a range of topics, which, you are well aware, is of far higher importance than any to which my preceding Letters have related. Without religion, and without proper views of it, your child can neither pass his time happily on earth, as the faithful subject and dutiful offspring of his Heavenly Father, nor be prepared to be an instrument of His glory and an object of His favour, in scenes of being, and under dispensations of power, wisdom, and goodness, yet to be unfolded.

I have the happiness to know that you truly believe, that the Heavenly Father of all is the source of all good of every kind to his offspring, and that he will especially bestow a greater measure of his assistance to the moral necessities of mankind, if they request it in the name of his beloved Son Jesus Christ our Lord.

I offer to him my petition in that prevailing name, that he would strengthen the powers of my understanding and influence the affections of my heart, so that I may be able to proffer useful counsel upon a topic, in which the honour of the Creator and the welfare of his creatures are so intimately concerned.

With regard to the time at which religious instruction (that is, a communication of the knowledge of the principal doctrines of natural and revealed religion) should begin, you are aware that a considerable difference of opinion obtains among the writers upon Education. Of course it cannot be till your child is able to speak, and for myself I must avow my persuasion, that a considerable period of time ought to elapse even after that period. Could we possess the perfect command of circumstances, that is, could we prevent all preoccupation of the mind by what the child must, as it is, unavoidably hear and see connected with the subject, I could much rather prefer that the powers of the understanding should have attained a considerable degree of maturity, and those of the affections a considerable measure of development, previous to the statement to him of those amazing truths which relate to the Author of our being, our relations towards him, and his designs towards ourselves; and for this plain reason, that it is impossible to convey distinct conceptions to him even upon the first principles before that period, and that to attempt it will only end in discouraging him in the pursuit of knowledge, and blunting the powers of his understanding. The cardinal rule of education is, never to submit any thing to a child's mind which he cannot perfectly comprehend; and acting upon this rule would, I believe, cause a postponement of the attempt to teach religion to a much later period than is generally suspected.

The period of the day, and the extent of time during which the subject should be taught, appear to me of considerable importance.

The best time for it appears to me to be about one quarter of an hour before he begins his morning studies. The subject, if attended to in a proper manner, will tend to tranquillize and even strengthen his mind for his remaining duties.

It is however most important, that no instruction, as such, should ever be attempted to be communicated to him at any other part of the day. Viewed in the light of a lesson in religion (and what else can it be at his supposed period of life?) to be recurring to the subject again and again at different intervals, will only serve to tire and disgust him, and hence to retard his improvement. Such a practice will also have another bad effect upon his own mind and upon yours, namely, the habit of familiarity with such topics, and hence a diminution of that respect to the subject, without which perfect ignorance of it were to be much preferred.

With regard to the nature of the religious knowledge to be communicated, this must of course depend throughout the whole progress upon the degree to which the powers of his understanding are developed.

The first principles, as they are justly called, must come first. The being of a God is the basis of all religion. Teach him however the mere simple idea, that there is a Being who dwells in the heavens above him, who made all things which he perceives. Let all your descriptions tend to communicate the idea that He is an intelligent Person, and that although he dwells in the heavens, and we cannot see Him, he can and always does by night and by day see us. Avoid however, most studiously, any views of this subject which are calculated to terrify him. Let him be taught that God supplies him, yourself, and all mankind with our food, clothing, and dwellings, &c. Do all you can to make him conceive of God as a purely benevolent being. Seize the proper occasion, which will frequently occur, such as, when it is fine weather, when a fruitful shower descends, when he has lately gathered beautiful flowers and delicious fruit, whenever he is benefited and gratified, especially through the more obvious bounties of Providence, such as the productions of the ground, or when he gazes upon a landscape rich in beauty and fruitfulness, upon such occasions remind him that all he admires and enjoys is the gift of his God. I should approve, that, as an illustration of this subject to his mind, you should embrace many an opportunity of telling him, especially after he has been most signally benefited and beloved by you, that it is his God that causes you to love him, and to attend to him and supply him as you do.

Let this grand and glorious truth, the exclusive benevolence of God, be most early and entirely established in his mind, and you will thus prevent much superstition, false terror, ignorance, and even crime in after-life.

I could wish that some time should elapse before the recondite truths respecting our blessed Redeemer were submitted to his view. He may however be taught simply to think of Jesus Christ as the Son of God, who loves little children. I doubt the advantage of his being very early taught the existence of even good angels. I suppose there can be no question as to the propriety of teaching a child the existence and agency of the fallen intelligences. I could wish that the account of the introduction of evil should be unknown to him at the same period, and for some time afterwards. He cannot understand it: he will be sure to misunderstand it, and to derive from it injurious associations with the whole subject. The preceding topics are enough: to teach them in proper gradations, and to teach them thoroughly, will occupy a year or two.

As to the mode by which these things are to be taught, if you will begin the religious instruction of your child early, it must be entirely prescriptive; that is, you must simply assert these things, and never attempt to prove or give reasons for them: all reasoning is lost, and the attempt to communicate it does harm upon the mind of a child at this early period. Let your manner during the lesson be serious, but tranquil, and beware of aiming at an impressive manner on the occasion. Teach, and do not awe your child: you will make him hate both religion and yourself, if you do. The solemn dismal looks and sighs of parents when instructing their children on these topics, have done incalculable injury in numerous instances. There is no reason whatever why (but all the contrary) you should depart on such occasions from your usual natural demeanor, only of course somewhat more serious; this also being totally unaffected, for the child's sake and your own. After all, the exhibition of religious truths to the mind, though important, is secondary to the importance of habits. If I were required to sum up the whole science of education in one sentence, it should be, the science of establishing desirable habits. And how is this to be done? Not by propounding principles, but by the repetition of the acts of conduct which tend to the establishment of the habits in question. Men act from habit, not from principles. Principle may strengthen habits, and explain their utility, but the habits must be first, and the principle comes afterwards. A virtuous man means a man of virtuous habits, a religious man a man of religious habits. Thousands have the principles, who have not the habits, and who, alas! do not know their essential importance, and never seek them. They are consequently no better, as moral beings, for their religious knowledge. Hence they are astonished and dismayed and discouraged, and say many things about the uncontrollable depravity of their natures. They might justly be told, that the only fault is, they have not habits of morality and religion: that if they wish to improve, they must acquire them: that these are not acquired by the knowledge of principles, but by the repetition of separate acts: that it is not possible that mere principle, however wisely propounded or deeply believed, should counteract habits. In a word, inculcate from the earliest period all the physical, intellectual, and moral habits, which go to form a virtuous and good man: at the proper time and in a proper manner superadd the knowledge of the principles, of their desirableness and propriety. If you adopt a contrary course, the result will infallibly mock your expectation.

The contrary course is the grand error of religious education in general; and with deep regret, mingled however with confidence as to the correctness of the argument, I may say, Look at the too general results!

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.
CLERICUS.

CHRISTIAN PROSPECTS IN INDIA.

FROM the "Report of the Select Committee on the Affairs of the East India Company," we learn many interesting particulars relating to the immense territory in Asia subject to the crown of Great Britain. Christian knowledge has begun to be diffused in a remarkable degree over those idolatrous regions, where the nations have long been sitting in darkness and the shadow of death. The failure of Roman catholic missionaries is acknowledged by themselves, and attested by other witnesses; while the progress of the Protestants, of different denominations, appears to be daily becoming more successful. Their judicious plan is to establish schools, as well as preach the gospel, and translate and circulate the Scriptures. Schools they have established both in the north and south of India. The number of scholars in Bengal alone amounts to about 50,000.

This general diffusion of instruction is producing the best and most salutary effect, not only on the children educated, but on the minds of their parents and neighbours, preparing them to receive the doctrines of salvation by Jesus Christ. Female schools have also been successfully established: at the different missionary stations there were, in 1823, nearly 1,200 female children under instruction, and that number has progressively increased to 3,000.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES OF EUROPE.

THE contents of the Public Libraries of Europe, which cannot amount to fewer than between seven and eight hundred, have been estimated, by Malthus, at 19,847,000 volumes. Of these contents, there are preserved in the MISSIONARY LABOURERS FOR BRITISH AMERICA.

SURELY the claims of British America on the various Missionary Societies in England are very great. Several devoted men have been sent out to that important field of labour, but we doubt whether its necessities have been duly considered. Emigration renders it increasingly interesting as a theatre of evangelical operations. The following is the number of emigrants, as reported at the office of his Majesty's chief agent for emigrants at Quebec, for the last four years.

Amonnting altogether to 145,945 souls! lamentably deficient, probably, in Christian ordinances.

A Vegetable preferable to the Potatoe.—A new tuberous root has lately been introduced into this country from Chili, called the Oxalis Crenata, which is said to be decidedly preferable to the potatoe. It bears a fine yellow flower, and is ornamental in the garden. A treasure so valuable demands the attention of every British horticulturist, and we should be glad to hear further of this precious vegetable.

ON THE CULTIVATION OF A SOUND JUDGMENT.

Judgment is to the faculties of the mind what charity is to the virtues of the heart: as without charity the latter are of little worth, so without judgment talents are of little comparative use. Judgment, with the aid of God's Spirit and the instructions of his word; is the balance in which qualities are weighed, by which the proportions of our duties and the harmony of our virtues are preserved. When exercised in subservience to the divine rule, it subdues vanity, corrects impetuosity, and checks enthusiasm. Judgment is so far from being a cooler of zeal, as some suppose, that it increases its effect by directing its movements; and a warm heart will always produce more extensive, because more lasting good, when conducted by a cool head. A sound judgment, though equally bestowed with other blessings by Him from whom cometh every good gift, yet it is not so much born with us as improved by us. By teaching us to discern the faults of others, it warns us to avoid them: by detecting our own, it leads to their cure. The deepest humility is generally connected with the soundest judgment. The judicious Christian is watchful against speculative errors, as well as against errors in conduct. Judgment is, in short, that quality of the mind which requires to be kept in ever-wakeful activity; and the advantages it procures us, and the evils from which it preserves us, will be more apparent the more it is kept in exercise.

Religious charity more especially demands the full exercise of the judgment. A judicious Christian will double the good done, by his selection of the object and his manner of relieving it. All things that are good are not equally good.

Above all, an enlightened judgment will enable you to attain and to preserve consistency, that infallible criterion of a highly-finished Christian character, the want of which makes some really religious persons not a little vulnerable. So much to be regretted is it, that goodness of intention is not always attended by propriety in the execution. Some persons are over-scrupulous as to minor points, and lax in others of more importance. These incongruities not only bring the individual into disgrace, but religion itself into discredit. Consistency presents Christianity in her fairest attitude and loveliest figure: it is the beautiful result of all the qualities and graces of a truly religious mind united and brought into action. Where the character is consistent, prejudice cannot ridicule, nor infidelity sneer. The world may dislike, but cannot despise it. In the more advanced Christian, religion may seem to be less prominent in parts of the character, because it is infused into the whole. Like the life-blood, its vital power pervades the entire system; not an action of the life that is not governed by it; it is diffused through the whole conduct, and sheds its benign influence, not only on the things done, but on the temper of the doer in performing them. The affections now have other objects, the time other duties, the thoughts other employments. There will be more exertion, but with less display; it will be less obtrusive, because it is more rooted and grounded: there will be more humility, because the heart will have found out its own corruptions. Thus through the joint operation of judgment in the intellect and principle in the heart, the religion will become equable, regular, and consistent. Of all persons, religious persons are most bound to cultivate this precious faculty. We see how highly the great apostle of the Gentiles valued it: in directing the spiritual labours of his beloved young friend, in stirring him up to every good word and work, he does not forget this exhortation, "The Lord give thee a right understanding in all things." Again he prays for his beloved Philippians, "that their love may abound more and more in knowledge and in all judgment." These admonitions acquire great additional force when it is considered, that he who gave them was a man of exceeding ardency of temper, and of zeal without a parallel. This experienced saint must have frequently seen the danger of imprudent piety, of self-confidence, of zeal not regulated by knowledge, and therefore presses the great importance of a sound judgment.

There never was but one visible exhibition of infallible judgment, and complete consistency. In that Divine Person who vouchsafed to dwell with men on earth, that he might give us a perfect example in his life, before he obtained salvation for us by his death; in him alone was judgment without any shadow of error, consistency without any speck of imperfection. His divine perfections none can approach, but all may humbly imitate those which come within the compass of his humility.

ARABIAN PRACTICE OF CHARMS.

Charms are what the Arabs have most faith in when they are ill; their medicines are mostly simple and very excellent, but the writers of charms are more frequently applied to: they possess nostrums which not only heal wounds, bestow eloquence, and the gift of persuasion, but which calm all agitation and distress of mind. A writer with a ready wit and imposing manner, is at no loss for employment; his medicine chest consists of a gourd or a calabash for an ink bottle, and a reed for a pen, and pills and potions are wholly superseded. The imagination is worked upon, which more than half performs the cure, and extreme temperance completes the restoration of the patient. On some occasions, all the writers or maraboots in the neighbourhood are employed, and the tassels of a great man's cap or turban have been literally covered with the charms, which consist mostly of extracts from the Koran, or certain well-known proverbs. Major Denham, in his Travels through Africa, says, "A man came and offered me two fowls if I would give him a charm for a disease of the stomach; but I was obliged to decline the office of charm writer, and confine myself to cure diseases by medicine. A blooming widow applied for medicine to get her a husband. It is not good to pretend ignorance, and I therefore told her I had no such medicine with me."

It appears highly feasible that this singular custom of charm writing, is derived from the Pharisaic practice mentioned by our Saviour, "of making broad the phylacteries;" the strict formalists among the Jews were in the habit of wearing detached sentences of the Scriptures on different parts of their robes, which if precept could enforce practice, would have had a most beneficial influence on the morals and discipline of all ranks of society.

TOO LONG NEGLECT OF THE BIBLE.

Recommended to the attention of those who live in the neglect of their Bibles.

A person in Birmingham, who lived in the neglect of the worship of God, and of reading his word, was, on a Lord's day, sitting at the fire with his family. He said he thought he would read a chapter in the Bible, not having read one for a long time: but, alas! he was disappointed, it was too late; for, in the very act of reaching it from the shelf, he sunk down, and immediately expired! Reader, while it is called "to-day," resolutely begin to read the Holy Scriptures.

ON THE EFFICACY OF RELIGION.

Life is a varied scene of hopes and fears,
Doubt and uncertainty pervade its years;
Though Hope's bright torch illumes our weary way,
How oft do fatal fears our steps betray!
Peace now reveals, now hides her angel form;
Now glows the sunshine, and now howls the storm:
Now Pleasure holds us in her easy thrall,
Till Woe starts up, and turns her sweets to gall.
But there's a refuge whither we may flee,
And find repose in our extremity.
Religion is the rock to which we cling,
When o'er our heads their storms misfortunes fling:
She is our true, our only faultless guide,
Mid th' ebbs and flows of life's precarious tide.
Through all the woes that crowd its chequer'd way,
And cloud the sunshine of its brightest day,
She to the soul a sacred balm supplies,
Till, rapt in holy thought, it greets the skies.
When Life's fair prospect suddenly grows dim,
And Sorrow's cup is foaming o'er the brim;
When there's a canker at the bosom's core,
And Mirth's sweet blossoms there expand no more;
Religion, like a seraph from the tomb,
Starts forth to life, and cheers the gather'd gloom;
Bids the harsh throbbings of the bosom cease,
And to the fretted conscience whispers peace.
From her all good derives its power to bless;
Through her no ill can curse, no woes oppress.
She (and for more than this her powers suffice)
Can render this dull world a Paradise;
From sin's fermenting mass extract the leaven,
And the bleach'd soul exalt at length to heaven.
Oh! when the blackest storms of misery lower,
And terrors gather o'er our dying hour;
When, at this life's dark close, the mind's perplext
At what may be the nature of the next;
When sullen fears o'er brighter hopes prevail,
And all the boasted stores of reason fail
To cheer the soul, about to take its flight
To day eternal, or eternal night; —
Religion cheers her, ere that awful lapse,
When all is shrouded in a dread perhaps
To those whose hearts the hope of future bliss
Has fail'd to wean from such a world as this.
She points to Him, from whose full pores were wrung
The sanguine drops of agony, — who hung
Rack'd on the cross, and with his dying breath
Confirm'd his conquest over sin and death;
Bruis'd with his sacred heel the serpent's head,
Whilst all Hell groan'd to see its victor dead,
Since thus He perfected that wondrous plan
Which Heaven reopen'd to revolted man.
Religion only can prepare our flight
For the pure realms of everlasting light.
Make her thy refuge in this vale of tears,
She'll calm thy sorrows and assuage thy fears.
Should grief alarm, or sorrow's pangs prevail,
However doubt may lash, or woes assail,
She'll heal the smarting stripes of Misery's rod,
And bring thee safely to the throne of God.

ON DOVES AND SERPENTS.

We must have doves and serpents in our heart;
But how they must be marshall'd, there's the art.
They must agree, and not be far asunder;
The dove must hold the wily serpent under.
Their natures teach what places they must keep;
The dove can fly, the serpent only creep.

A COMMENTARY UPON THE HOLY BIBLE,

From Henry and Scott, with occasional Observations and Notes from other Writers. Matthew to Acts. Religious Tract Society. Small 8vo. cloth, pp. 648.

"Family Bibles," large and adorned with plates, are commonly among the household ornaments of orderly and religious persons in humble life. They are regarded with a high degree of reverence; they serve for a record of births, deaths, &c.; but on account of their elegant bindings they are oftentimes of less practical utility than a common school Bible. Instead of an expensive folio, beautifully adorned with costly engravings, we beg to recommend the "Commentary on the Holy Bible," by the Religious Tract Society. It is a careful and judicious compilation from those invaluable stores of evangelical and orthodox Commentaries of the learned and excellent Henry and Scott, enriched with many important observations from a hundred of the most esteemed commentators and standard writers. The mass of biblical information and devotional reflections in this volume from Matthew to the Acts inclusive, is prodigious; and its cheapness and neatness place it within the reach of all. There is a most commendable custom on the Continent, in some states, of giving every newly-married couple a copy of the Holy Bible. We do earnestly recommend that pious parents particularly would present their children, when leaving the parental roof, with a copy of this valuable commentary.

PRODIGIOUS AMERICAN LEGACY.

A Frenchman, of the name of Girard, who left France in early life only a common sailor-boy, died a short time ago in Philadelphia. By his perseverance and indefatigable industry he had acquired an immense fortune, being considered the largest ship-owner in America. He had accumulated property to the amount of about 100,000,000 of francs, more than 4,000,000*l.* sterling! Among his legacies he left 10,000,000 of francs (about 400,000*l.*) to found a college: but he required that no priest of any religion should be allowed to enter it! The bulk of his fortune, more than 60,000,000 of francs, or 2,400,000*l.* he left to the city of Philadelphia. This large amount, if properly expended in public works of utility and ornament, may contribute in an astonishing degree to the happiness of that city and the state. Surely the legislature will set aside the atheistical clause in the will of that eccentric unbeliever, that the doctrines of everlasting life may be inculcated on the youth of Girard's college, by a faithful minister of Christ.

"The principles of evil have a fatal activity. With every exertion, the best of men can do but a moderate amount of good; but it is in the power of the most contemptible individual to do incalculable mischief."

"The grand principles of right and wrong operate in the same way between nations as individuals. Fair and open conduct, and inviolable faith, however they may seem adverse to present purposes, are the only kind of policy that will ensure ultimate and honourable success."

"Idleness is that silent file, which little by little wears away our strength and valour."

THE TOWER OF LONDON, FROM TOWER HILL.

THE TOWER OF LONDON.

Recollections the most profitable and interesting are awakened in the mind of every intelligent Briton, by a contemplation of the Tower of London. Designed originally as a fortress to defend the naval approach to the metropolis, and appropriated to the purposes of a palace and a prison, human nature has been exhibited within its venerable walls under all the extreme circumstances of royal magnificence and suffering degradation. Festivities the most sumptuous—murders the most atrocious—and martyrdoms the most instructive, are associated in the records of this metropolitan fortification, and its history must be deeply interesting to every Englishman and to every Christian.

Antiquaries are of opinion, that the Romans originally built a fortress on this spot; as in 1720, in digging on the south side of what is called Cæsar's Chapel, there were discovered some old foundations of stone, three yards broad, and so strongly cemented, that it was with the utmost difficulty they were forced up by the workmen.

William the Conqueror, however, is generally considered the founder of the Tower of London, and that the great square tower, called The White Tower, was erected in 1078, under the direction of Gundulph, bishop of Rochester, famous for his architectural skill. This originally stood by itself; Fitz-Stephen gives it the name of Arx Palatina, or the Palatine Tower; the commander of which had the title of Palatine. Within this tower is a very ancient chapel, appropriated to the devotions of the kings and queens. In 1092, a violent tempest did great injury to the Tower; but it was repaired by William II, and Henry I. The former added another castellated building on the south side, between it and the Thames, afterward called St. Thomas's Tower. The Tower was first inclosed by William Longchamp, bishop of Ely, chancellor under Richard I, who surrounded the whole with walls embattled, and made on the outside a vast ditch, in which, in after times, water from the Thames was introduced. Different princes added other works; and the present extent within the walls is 12 acres and 5 roods: the circuit on the outside of the ditch is 1,052 yards.

The Lion's Tower, originally called the Bulwark, was built by Edward IV. Henry I had his menagerie at his manor of Woodstock (where he kept lions, leopards, lynxes, porcupines, and other wild animals) removed to the Tower; which is now well supplied with a noble collection of wild beasts.

Objects of Curiosity in the Tower.

Strangers visiting the Tower, are first generally shown the wild beasts. The next object of curiosity is the White Tower. The whole of this building is filled with arms and warlike instruments, and such models of them as have, at various times, been presented to the government. On the first floor are two rooms, one containing arms for about 10,000 seamen; the other containing warlike engines of various descriptions. Near the south-west angle is the Spanish Armoury; so called from its being the repository of the spoils of the Spanish armada, vainly pronounced by the pope to be invincible.

The Grand Store House, 245 feet long and 60 broad, contains what is called a wilderness of arms, so ingeniously arranged, by a common gunsmith named Harris, that at one glance in a single room may be seen arms for 80,000 men, all in the most admirable state of brightness, and fit for use. There are said to be arms in this storehouse sufficient for nearly 200,000 men!

The Horse Armoury, contains a representation of the kings and heroes of England, in the warlike accoutrements of their appropriate times, many of them on horseback.

Royal Jewels in the Tower.

To the east of the grand storehouse, in a dark stone room, are deposited the English Regalia, or royal jewels, and precious implements.

1. The Imperial Crown, used at the coronation of the kings, made of fine gold, and enriched with diamonds, rubies, emeralds, sapphires, and pearls: the cap within is of purple velvet, lined with taffety, and turned up with ermine. With this it has been said the kings of England have been crowned since the time of Edward the Confessor: but this may reasonably be controverted, as in the time of the Commonwealth, the crown, as well as the greater part of the regalia, was sold. The imperial crown seems to be that made in the time of Charles II, after his restoration.

2. The Golden Globe, put into the king's right hand before he is crowned; this is enriched with precious stones.

3. The Golden Sceptre, with its cross upon a large amethyst, set round with diamonds.

4. The Sceptre and Dove, perched upon a Jerusalem cross, enriched with diamonds.

5. St. Edward's Staff; this splendid ornament is 4 feet 7½ inches long, and 3¾ in circumference, all of beaten gold; and which is carried before the king at his coronation.

6. The Crown of State; this precious diadem is worn by the king in parliament; it is enriched with the rarest gems, amongst which are a large emerald, 7 inches round, a pearl reckoned the finest in the world, and a ruby of inestimable value.

7. The Prince of Wales's Crown, made for him while Regent.

8. The Crown, Globe, and Sceptre, of Queen Mary II, with the diadem which she wore at her coronation.

9. An Ivory Sceptre, garnished with gold, with a dove on the top, of gold, enamelled with white; this was made for the queen of James II.

10. The Curtana, or Sword of Mercy, with a blade 32 inches long, and nearly 2 broad, without a point: this is carried before the king at his coronation between the two swords of justice.

11. The Golden Spurs, and Armillas, or Bracelets, for the wrists.

12. The Ampulla, or Golden Eagle, which contains the holy oil, with which the monarchs are anointed; and the Golden Spoon into which it is poured.

13. A Golden Salt-Cellar, in the form of the square White Tower, of most exquisite workmanship. Most of these are very ancient, and are used only at coronations.

14. A Silver Font, double gilt, elegantly wrought, in which the royal family are baptized.

15. A Silver Fountain, very large, presented to Charles II, by the town of Plymouth.

Besides these particularly enumerated, this depository contains the crown jewels, worn by the royal family on state occasions, and much ancient plate.

Beauchamp Tower.

This division of the Tower is famous for the many illustrious personages who have been confined within its walls. Notices of these would be peculiarly interesting to the Christian reader, as they lead his mind back to that glorious event, the Protestant Reformation. Several of the most eminent of those servants of God, to whose principles and labour the nation and the world are so greatly indebted, were here confined. But we must defer our notices of these to a future opportunity: still we cannot deny ourselves the gratification of quoting an inscription from these walls, a memorial of that almost inimitable example of female loveliness and innocence, the Lady Jane Gray. It is said to have been scratched by her on the wall of her apartment with a pin:—

> "Non aliena putes homini quæ oblingere possunt,
> Sors hodierna mihi, cras erit illa tibi.
> Jane Dudley."

The following has been given as a translation:—

> "To mortals' common fate thy mind resign:
> My lot to-day—to-morrow may be thine."

"YOU SHALL BE MY GOD."

Captain Blythe took with him two young Otaheitans, who were employed to look after the bread-fruit trees on board, in their way to the West Indies. On their passage, one of them was taken ill. After two or three days, he applied to Mr. Harwood for relief, who gave him some medicine, the good effect of which he was soon sensible of. "Now," said he to Mr. Harwood, "you shall be my god; for I have been praying to my god these three days to heal me, and he has not; therefore, you shall now be my god."

We pity the poor pagan, and blush for his superstition: but with all his error, was he not more rational, than is that man, who never prays; but by his atheistical, irreligious life, practically says, There is no God?

Will God bless such as bid him not good-morrow and good-even?—Ward.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ABRAHAM.

God's Covenant with Abraham.

"The Call of Abram" from Chaldean idolatry, to walk with God in a life of faith and holiness, was not merely for his own salvation, but for the lasting benefit of the world. By that event the venerable patriarch is introduced to us in a new character, and the condescending grace of Almighty God, manifested towards him, illustrates his expressive titles, "The Friend of God," and "Father of the faithful." Pertinently has it been remarked, that "all the true blessedness the world is now, or ever shall be possessed of, is owing to Abram and his posterity." Through them we have a Bible and a Saviour, the gospel and the hope of eternal life. This inestimable blessedness, which has descended through many generations to us, we now enjoy by virtue of the covenant which God made with his chosen servant.

God's covenant with Abram was a gracious promise, repeatedly renewed during the period of more than fifty years: it comprehended various blessings for the present world, the Messiah with all the fruits of his mediation, and everlasting felicity in the world of glory. On some occasions, for the encouragement of Abram, and to be recorded for our consolation, the promise was delivered under the awful solemnity of the Almighty swearing to his servant. "For when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he sware by himself, saying, Surely, blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee." Heb. vi, 13, 14.

On the birth of John, the forerunner of Christ, his father Zacharias celebrated this ancient covenant, and burst forth admiring the faithfulness of God, which was hastening "to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant, the oath which he sware to our father Abraham." Luke i, 72, 73.

While Abram was yet in his native city, "Ur of the Chaldees," God made this covenant with his servant, and said, "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Gen. xii, 2, 3. The latter part of this gracious promise crowned all the rest, as it directly pointed to the Messiah, in whom alone all the families of mankind can be truly blessed.

Abram arrived in Canaan, and built an altar for the public worship of God by means of sacrifice, first at Sichem, then at Bethel, and about three years after his departure frem Chaldea at Hebron; at each of which places, God granted to his faithful servant some special tokens of his blissful friendship.

Nine years had Abram left his native country, living by faith upon the promise of God, while yet he had no child. A degree of despondency appears to have seized the mind of "the father of believers." To remove his anxieties, "the word of the Lord came unto Abram," for the fifth time, "in a vision, saying, Fear not, Abram; I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward." Excited by these inspiring words, but not altogether relieved, "Abram said, Lord God, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus? Behold, to me thou hast given no seed, and lo, one born in my house is mine heir." Abram was at a loss to conceive how the covenant could be fulfilled while he had no child, and his beloved wife seventy-four years of age. "And the word of the Lord came unto him, saying, This shall not be thine heir; but he that shall come forth out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir. And he brought him forth abroad, and said, Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them: and he said, So shall thy seed be." New vigour entered the soul of Abram; "And he believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness. And he said unto him, I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it." Gen. xv.

The corrupt Canaanites were then in the land, and they were both numerous and powerful. Abram was therefore somewhat perplexed to perceive how God would fulfil his revealed purpose. He sought a solution of his difficulty from him who alone could give it. "And he said, Lord God, whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?" God did not rebuke the humble suppliant, but graciously unfolded his holy purposes, to satisfy his inquiring servant, by means of an extraordinary vision.

"And he said unto him, Take me an heifer of three years old, and a she goat of three years old, and a ram of three years old, and a turtle dove, and a young pigeon. And he divided them in the midst, and laid each piece one against another: but the birds divided he not. And when the sun was going down, a deep sleep fell upon Abram; and, lo, an horror of great darkness fell upon him. And he said, Know of a surety, that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them, and they shall afflict them four hundred years. And also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge: and afterward shall they come out with great substance. And thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age. But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full. And it came to pass, that when the sun went down, and it was dark, behold a smoking furnace and a burning lamp that passed between those pieces. In the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates: the Kenites, and the Kenizzites, and the Kadmonites, and the Hittites, and the Perizzites, and the Rephaims, and the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Girgashites, and the Jebusites." Gen. xv.

The whole transaction, as recorded in this chapter, astonishes while it instructs us. We perceive in Abram, true faith struggling against unbelief, and gaining a triumph. Believers in our times must not wonder if they experience seasons of darkness, and even of temporary distress: for it is believed, that in most instances in which the mind endeavours after dependence upon God, changing circumstances will occasion fear and gloomy apprehensions. But it is not the will of our covenant God and Father, that such should cherish dejection of mind. He says to us as to the holy patriarch, "Fear not:" and all that he was to Abram, he will be to his people in these later days. Did Abram rejoice in the prospect of a son? We may exult, that the promised seed of Abram has appeared, the Son of God, who "took hold on the seed of Abram," and that in him the covenant of eternal grace, on which repose our highest hopes, has been established, and ratified with the most affecting solemnities, even by the shedding of his own blood. Did Abram expect from the Divine promises, the blessings of an earthly Canaan? We have the same, or stronger assurances, that we shall inherit the kingdom of glory in heaven.

Sarai with her venerable husband, firmly believing the promises of God, but conscious that through age she was incapable of child-bearing, persuaded Abram to take Hagar, her maid, in marriage, that she might have a son, at least by adoption; a practice common even in those days. Hagar bare a son to Abram; and, concluding that he must be the promised seed, he brought him up as the heir of all his property: nor was it till Ishmael was about thirteen years of age, that the Lord corrected his mistake, and promised him a son by Sarai.

Again the Lord was pleased graciously to ratify his former covenant with Abram, when he and his beloved wife were greatly advanced in age. On this occasion, he changed the name of Abram, signifying high father, to Abraham, father of a multitude; and as a further trial of his faith, commanded him to submit to circumcision, and to bring all the male part of his family to yield to the same ordinance. This was ordained also to be henceforth the initiatory rite of admission of his male descendants into the visible church, and to the privileges of communion with the people of God. Under the gospel, baptism takes place of circumcision.

"And when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the LORD appeared to Abram, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect. And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and multiply thee exceedingly. And Abram fell on his face: and God talked with him, saying, As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations. Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham: for a father of many nations have I made thee. And I will make thee exceedingly fruitful, and I will make nations of thee, and kings shall come out of thee. And I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee. And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession: and I will be their God." Gen. xvii, 1—8.

To complete the felicity of Abraham, he was assured that Sarai, the beloved wife of his youth, should bear him a son, who should be the heir of all those blessings before promised, and be the channel of conveying them to all nations, by means of the long-expected Messiah. "And God said unto Abraham, As for Sarai thy wife, thou shalt not call her name Sarai, but Sarah shall her name be. And I will bless her, and give thee a son also of her: yea I will bless her, and she shall be a mother of nations; kings of people shall be of her." Ver. 15, 16.

The ratification of this promise was the change of Sarai's name. She must no longer be called my princess, which Sarai signifies; as if her honour were confined to her own family: but Sarah, absolutely, a princess, even of multitudes; intimating, that from her should come, not only a numberless posterity, but the Messiah, "the Prince of the kings of the earth."

Full of faith and delighted beyond measure, "then Abraham fell upon his face and laughed, and said in his heart, Shall a child be born unto him that is a hundred years old? and shall Sarah, that is ninety years old, bear?" But besides admiring gratitude for the goodness of God, the best affections of his mind were moved for his son Ishmael. Like a holy man of God, and a pious parent, Abraham poured forth his soul in supplication for his present and eternal welfare. "And Abraham said unto God, O that Ishmael might live before thee!" His ardent prayer, offered in faith, was accepted of the Lord. "And God said, Sarah thy wife shall bear thee a son indeed; and thou shalt call his name Isaac: and I will establish my covenant with him for an everlasting covenant, and with his seed after him. As for Ishmael, I have heard thee. Behold, I have blessed him, and will make him a great nation. But my covenant will I establish with Isaac, which Sarah shall bear unto thee at this set time next year. And he left off talking with him, and God went up from Abraham." Ver. 19—22.

Thus was the Divine covenant established between God and Abraham; and as the patriarch had laughed within himself for joy, at hearing the gracious promise of a son, he was commanded to give him the name of Isaac, which signifies laughter.

Once more the Lord renewed his covenant with Abraham, when he proved his faith by the wondrous offering up of his son Isaac. It had already been declared and sealed, but now at last it is sworn. "And the angel of the LORD called unto Abraham out of heaven the second time, and said, By myself have I sworn, saith the LORD, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son; that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice." Gen. xxii, 15—18.

Every part of this covenant of the Lord with his servant Abraham abounds with instruction and encouragement to us, who believe the record which God has given of his son Jesus Christ. No consideration can be more encouraging than the directions of the apostle to us to improve this subject, observing, "When God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he sware by himself, saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee.—Wherein God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath: that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us: which hope we have as an anchor of the soul." Heb. vi, 13—19.

LECTURE XIII.

AMEN.

Teacher. This word is used at the end of this prayer, and indeed at the end of every prayer, signifying that it is our most earnest desire that what we have been praying for may be accomplished; and at the end of each prayer it should be repeated by all, not only by the minister but also by the congregation, to show that what has been said by him that offers up the prayer, contains the hearty desires of all his hearers. The meaning of the word Amen is "So be it," or, "It is my earnest desire and wish that this should be done."

What is the meaning of the word Amen?—So be it.

Why do we say Amen at the end of our prayers?—To show, that we earnestly desire that what we pray for may be accomplished.

By whom, when many people are praying together, ought this word to be repeated?—By every body.

Teacher. This word, then, is used at the end of this prayer to show, that it is our earnest desire that what we have asked God for may be accomplished. I have endeavoured for a considerable time to show you the meaning of this prayer of our Lord Christ's; and having now come to the close of it, I would briefly sum up the meaning of these several petitions, and then wind it all up with some reflections with regard to ourselves.

Our Father which art in Heaven.

These words teach us, that we may pray to God without fear, because he is "our Father;" but that nevertheless we must pray to God with reverence, because he is "in heaven," surrounded by myriads of angels, ever waiting to do his pleasure. Since, then, God is such a mighty and glorious God, we must, when we approach the throne of grace, come with reverence, though with boldness, through him that died for us and rose again, even Christ the righteous.

Hallowed be thy Name.

The meaning of to hallow is to honour, or to reverence; and when we utter these words, "hallowed be thy name," we pray to God to lead ourselves and all mankind to honour and glorify him.

Thy Kingdom come.

We here pray that God's kingdom may come; that God would quickly come, and rule over this world; that he would make men to love him, and willingly to obey him, casting out into hell Satan, with wicked men; and that he himself would be all in all, both in our hearts and in the whole world.

Thy Will be done on Earth, as it is in Heaven.

God's will is, all that he has commanded in the Bible; that we should love God and our neighbour perfectly. We pray that men may obey God's will on earth, with all that love and holiness as the angels do in heaven.

Give us this Day our daily Bread.

Bread here means every thing that is necessary, for our bodies and for our souls. For our bodies. Our parents give us our daily food; but God gives it to them, by making the corn to grow, giving sun and rain in due season. God gives us life, and health, and strength. "It is in God we live, and move, and have our being." God gives us "day by day," or daily, those things of which we have need. This shows us, that God's mercies to us are bestowed every day and hour, and that we could not live a moment without God. As to our souls. The doctrine of the gospel and the Holy Spirit are the soul's daily bread; which, as bread does our bodies, keep alive, strengthen, and comfort our immortal souls.

And forgive us our Sins, as we forgive them that trespass against us.

The meaning of the word trespass is offence; and we here ask God to forgive us our sins, in the same manner as we forgive others their offences against ourselves. We must therefore be careful when we use these words, that we draw not down on our heads curses instead of blessings.

Lead us not into Temptation, but deliver us from Evil.

I have showed you, that this passage does not mean that God tempts man to sin, but that he allows Satan sometimes to tempt us, that we may know ourselves, and be known of others; and I said, that when we used these words, we prayed God not to allow us to be tempted above that we are able to bear. On the other part of the clause, "deliver us from evil," I gave you the reason why we asked God to deliver us, viz. because he only can deliver us from evil. I then showed you, that the evil referred, first, to Satan; secondly, to our own hearts; thirdly, to wicked men; fourthly, to the pomps and vanities of this wicked world; fifthly, to every thing that is contrary to God.

For thine is the Kingdom, the Power, and the Glory, for ever and ever.

The "for," with which this clause begins, seems to signify, that no power less than that which is almighty can deliver us from evil. This ascription of praise to God seems to be given in a spirit of joy; and I gave three reasons why the believer desires God to be glorified: first, because the glorifying of God is the glorifying of himself; secondly, because he loves God; thirdly, because he loves his fellow-mortals, and desires that they also should be happy.

Thus briefly have I summed up the meaning of this prayer of our Lord Jesus Christ, framed by him with godlike wisdom. May God impress the meaning of these words upon your hearts, and make them the means of your loving him more and serving him better.

I now wind up the whole with a few suitable reflections as to our own state before God, having had this prayer put into our mouths, expressing all our wants.

You are responsible for the knowledge you possess of God, and of salvation. How many children are there who never heard of Christ, of heaven, and of hell! You have been told of salvation, of the way to escape hell and reach heaven: you have been told of what Christ has done for you, and of what he will do for you: you have been entreated to pray that God would wash away your sins in Christ's blood, that he would sanctify you, give you righteousness, justify you, and glorify you.

Ye are young, but Christ thought ye not too young to die for, and therefore will not think ye too young to condemn. Think not to go to heaven without having prayed: and cease not to urge your prayers, until your requests are answered. O forget not that there is a hell to be avoided, and a heaven to be obtained! a hell of everlasting torments, and a heaven of inexpressible joy! We trifle not with your souls, we tell you of realities, which, if ye believe not now, experience will compel you to believe hereafter. May God send his Holy Spirit upon you all, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

RELIGIOUS AND MORAL STATISTICS OF THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

From Returns printed for the House of Commons, and published in No. 106 of the Anti-Slavery Reporter, we learn, "the number of schools, in which the usual branches of education are taught, in the colony, is 29. These are attended by 1,287 whites, 216 free persons, and 159 slaves: total, 1,662.

Places of worship:—

Denominations.	Places.	Ministers.
Episcopalian	8	8
Dutch Calvinists	19	20
Scotch Presbyterian	1	1
Roman Catholic	1	2
Lutheran	1	1
	30	32

The episcopalian churches are attended by about 1,600 hearers, the Dutch Calvinists by upwards of 6,000, and the other sects by about 1,000 more. The great majority of these are whites, the free black and coloured persons being about 550, and the slaves about 155.

Missionary Efforts to evangelize Africa.

The Report above given does not include the missionary labourers from the Moravian, the London, and the Wesleyan Missionary Societies, whose efforts have accomplished much in diffusing the knowledge of Christ in the colony of the Cape, and far beyond it in the interior of Africa.

At the close of 1821, the congregations of the Moravian settlements at Groene Kloof and Grace Vale contained 537 communicants; 250 baptized, but not communicants; 417 baptized children; 91 candidates for baptism; and 125 new people: in all, 1,420 souls. A third settlement has been formed at Enon on the Witte river, and the members of the Moravian church in South Africa are above 1,900, who are Hottentots.

The London Missionary Society has within the colony of the Cape fourteen stations, and, besides their wives, eighteen missionaries: beyond the colony, eight stations, and, besides their wives, fourteen missionaries.

All these stations appear to be prospering, under the Divine blessing. And the Wesleyan Missionary Society and the Church Missionary have considerable stations in different parts of Africa; besides the rising colony of Liberia, and the surprising operations in the island of Madagascar by the London Missionary Society.

PHILANTHROPOS.

PROSPECTS OF BRITAIN IN AFRICA.

MR. DOUGLAS, in his admirable pamphlet on "The Prospects of Britain," takes a most instructive survey of the British empire and its influence among the different states of the world, with the eye of an acute philosopher and of a devout Christian. We have been delighted with his remarks on the condition of Africa, and with his benevolent suggestions in relation to that wretched continent. The British Government seems actuated by a policy similar to that recommended by that learned and pious Christian philanthropist; and we trust that, by means of our colonies and missions on the African coast, that whole continent will ultimately be illuminated by the light of sound knowledge, and regenerated by evangelical truth.

"Africa," says Mr. Douglas, "is still more helpless than Asia, and farther removed from all influences of good. Preparations, however, are already begun for a renovating change of that unhappy continent. The liberated blacks are beginning to return to the seeds of knowledge, and with the rudiments of the true religion, and America will soon send them forth in great numbers, and spread them over those shores which are opposite to the New World.

"But England has more in her immediate power than states which are only growing into their fulness of strength. Even now, England might begin the civilization of Africa on a considerable scale. The natives themselves seem to afford a hint, when they supposed that Clapperton was sent to establish peace amongst their different tribes. The extreme barbarism of Africa arises from its perpetual wars; but Britain might easily, by her influence, begin to establish confederacies of peace along the coast, and overawe the turbulent and evil-disposed, by a small body of black troops, trained with European discipline, and moveable by sea.

From the Cape of Good Hope, Britain might include tribe after tribe in the interior, within her influence, prevent them from prosecuting their destructive forays, and induce them to cultivate the arts of peace. Their superstition hangs so lightly about them, that they would readily adopt the profession of the religion of Britain, as they would readily acknowledge, if that were desirable, the supremacy of the British king.

A certain degree of subjection is easily spread over a large surface in Africa. The kings of Abyssinia had long their supremacy acknowledged by very different tribes, far beyond the bounds of their actual and scanty power. A small army of blacks, with the advantage of European skill, might penetrate through the country with no serious obstacle, except from the climate, and that, with proper precautions, would do them little injury. Britain could be furnished with instructed blacks from the United States of America, if not also from the West India islands, and civilization might strike its roots along the coast, and under the influence of Britain; while the riches of an unexhausted continent would be laid open to English commerce and enterprise.

"Britain has long employed the natives of India as sepoys; but, though distinguished by their point of honour, and not deficient in courage, they are comparatively a feeble race, and their utility is much hindered by the shackles of caste. But in Africa we might raise some of the finest troops in the world. The inhabitants are the strongest and bravest, as well as the best-natured, the most patient and tractable, of the human race. Very few troops could be found who, in equal numbers, would stand a charge of bayonets from a regiment of picked blacks, officered by Englishmen.

"England also might have many advantages towards a moral renovation of Africa, by obtaining the possession of islands to the east and west of that continent, which would serve as training points either for peace or war.

"With a little determination on our part, we might at once put an end to the slave trade, and the cessation of that horrid traffic alone would lead the tribes of the interior to new sources of industry for the supply of their wants.

"The opening of the unexplored African mines might be a new era of prosperity to Britain. The supineness of the European powers with respect to Africa is remarkable. The Portuguese did more for bringing that continent under European influence, during the first year of its discovery, than all the powers of Europe have done since. They met with no serious obstacle in their progress, except from their own cruelty, ignorance, and bigotry; but, with all their faults, had the prosperity of Portugal continued longer, they would have produced a considerable change over a large extent of country. The new discoveries which Britain has made in Africa afford additional facilities for a maritime power extending its influence over the interior."

LADY FANSHAWE'S ADVICE TO HER SON.

THIS exemplary woman was the wife of Sir Richard Fanshawe, a gentleman particularly distinguished in the cause of Charles the First, and ambassador from Charles the Second to the court of Spain. Her very interesting Memoirs, written in a series of letters to her son, commence with the following affectionate advice.

"Endeavour to be innocent as a dove, but as wise as a serpent; and let this lesson direct you in the greatest extremes of fortune. Hate idleness, and curb all passions. Be true in all your words and actions, and let your opinions be just and well considered. Be charitable in all thought, word, and deed, and ever ready to forgive injuries; and more pleased to do good than to receive good. Be civil and obliging to all: keep your friendship sacred, as the greatest tie upon earth, and be sure to ground it upon virtue, for no other is either happy or lasting. Endeavour always to be content in that estate of life, to which it hath pleased God to call you; and think it a great fault not to employ your time either for the good of your soul or improvement of your understanding or estate; for a vicious youth never was seen to terminate in a contented cheerful old age. Remember the proverb, Such as his company is, such is the man; and have glorious actions before your eyes, and forget not that you must give God an account hereafter, on all occasions."

The world is compared to a sea: the sea is good for navigation, but bad for habitation.—Philip Goodwin.

ANECDOTE OF THE DUKE OF ORMOND.

In the reign of Queen Anne, the noble BUTLER, duke of Ormond, was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland; and when sailing with his attendants from Chester to Dublin, was overtaken by a violent storm, which drove them on the rocks of Anglesea, where they were wrecked. His Grace and part of his companions with difficulty saved their lives by swimming to the land.

The part of the island where they came on shore was cold, barren, and uncultivated; and the first home they arrived at, was the humble cottage of a poor curate, who, with his wife, kindled a generous fire, dried the garments of their weather-beaten guests, and set before them the best fare their house afforded, and lodged them as they were able, till the storm was over.

Ormond was much affected with the kind reception he had met with, and inquired the name of his host, which was Joseph K———. He asked respecting his circumstances, and on his departure promised to remember him: his secretary at the same time gave the curate directions where he might find his guests if ever he should come to Dublin.

The curate waited long to hear from the duke, but in vain. At length, roused by his wife, he resolved to push his fortune; and having equipped himself as decently as he could, set off for the Irish metropolis. Though obscurely stationed, he was known to the dean as a man of no contemptible abilities, and was introduced to preach at the cathedral, where the duke attended, with many other persons of distinction.

He had prepared a sermon to his purpose, and took for his text Gen. xl, 23, "Yet did not the chief BUTLER remember JOSEPH, but forgat him." He discoursed, as his text naturally led him, upon the sin of ingratitude, which he painted in lively colours, especially the ingratitude of the great and affluent, in forgetting the friendly offices they might, one time or other, have received from persons in humble life. He observed, however, that this negligence might arise, not so much from an innate depravity of heart, as from particular causes: from deep engagement in business; from the amusements and dissipations of high life; perhaps from the many solicitations of mercenary sycophants ever pressing to be heard. When he came to his application, he asked his honourable audience, whether some among them had not, in the vicissitude of human affairs, received important offices of friendship from people in far humbler circumstances, but blest with generous hearts, and whether they had in no instance forgotten such kindness? He mentioned the case of shipwreck, where the affluent have often become dependent on the poor, and led his hearers each to put the question to himself? "Was I ever in my life exposed to the rage of the merciless elements, where all nature seemed to conspire my destruction? Did I ever see my companions buried in the devouring deep, and myself brought safely to land with a surviving few? And did any poor man, with his kind-hearted wife, receive me with my shipwrecked associates, and warm and comfort us to the utmost of their power; wishing to have done much more, and not suffering us to depart till serene skies and genial sunshine prepared our way? And have I suffered such benevolence to go unnoticed and unrewarded, and my benefactors to remain, perhaps to languish, under the pressure of friendless poverty?"

Ormond was all attention, and his heart smote him; when, on a closer examination of the features and countenance of the preacher, he recognized his generous landlord of Anglesea. Turning to his secretary, "Is not this our honest friend JOSEPH?" said the duke. "I believe it is," replied the secretary. Upon this, orders were instantly given to invite him to dinner.

When he came into the Duke's presence, he frankly confessed to him (though not without a modest blush or two) that he thought he had one opportunity in his life to put him in mind of his promise, and he had embraced it. "You are a deserving honest man," replied the duke, and ordered an immediate inquiry into the vacancies of the church. A living of 300*l.* a year was found; and to this his Grace at once advanced him.

Alas! how short-lived is human power; and often, how sudden the turns of Providence. At the accession of George I, Ormond was divested of all his honours; fled from a capital impeachment, and his whole fortune was seized by the crown.

His old friend JOSEPH now remembered him. This grateful man, hearing of the duke's misfortune, settled upon him, with the free consent of his wife, 200*l.* a year out of the 300*l.* which the duke in his better days had given him.

Surprised at this liberality, his Grace wrote a particular detail of it to a nobleman at court, who, though a zealous partizan of another faction, maintained with him an inviolable friendship. By the interest of this nobleman, JOSEPH was promoted to a living of 500*l.* a year; and he would now have rejoiced to make a generous addition to the duke's support; but Ormond in the mean time had entered that country and JOSEPH could no more alleviate the misfortunes of his noble patron.

> "From whose bourn no traveller returns,"

KING CHARLES II, HIS CHAPLAIN, AND HIS COOK.

The witty Earl of Rochester, being in company with King Charles II, his queen, chaplain, and some ministers of state, after they had been discoursing on public business, the king suddenly exclaimed, "Let our thoughts be unbended from the cares of state, and give us a generous glass of WINE, THAT CHEERETH, as the Scripture saith, GOD AND MAN." The queen hearing this, modestly said, she thought there could be no such text in Scripture, and that the idea was little less than blasphemy. The king replied, he was not prepared to turn to chapter and verse, but was sure he had met with it in his scripture reading. The chaplain was appealed to, and he was of the same opinion as the queen. Rochester suspecting the king to be right, and being no friend to the chaplain, slipt out of the room to inquire among the servants if any of them were conversant with the Bible. They named David, the Scotch cook, who always carried a Bible about him; and David being called, recollected both the text, and where to find it. Rochester ordered him to be in waiting, and returned to the king. This text was still the topic of conversation, and Rochester moved to call in David, who, he said, he found was well acquainted with the Scriptures. David appeared, and being asked the question, produced his Bible and read the text (Judges ix, 13). The king smiled, the queen asked pardon, and the chaplain blushed. Rochester then asked the doctor, if he could interpret the text, now it was produced? The doctor was mute. The earl therefore applied to David for the exposition. The cook immediately replied, "How much wine cheereth MAN, your lordship knows: and that it cheereth GOD, I beg leave to say, that under the Old Testament dispensation there were meat-offerings and drink-offerings. The latter consisted of WINE, which was typical of the blood of the Mediator, which by a metaphor was said to cheer God, as he was well pleased in the way of salvation he had appointed; whereby his justice was satisfied, his law fulfilled, his mercy reigned, his grace triumphed, all his perfections harmonized, the sinner was saved, and God in Christ glorified."

The king was surprised at this evangelical exposition; Rochester applauded, and after some severe reflections upon the doctor very gravely moved, that his Majesty would be pleased to make the Chaplain his Cook, and this Cook his Chaplain.

OUR HOPE OF IMMORTALITY.

The mighty future fills the mind
That pants for more than earth can give:
Man, in his narrow sphere confin'd,
Dies, when he but begins to live.

Oh! if there be no world on high,
To yield his powers unfetter'd scope,
If man be only born to die,
Whence this inheritance of hope?
Wherefore to him alone were lent
Riches that never can be spent?

Enough, not more, to all the rest
For life and happiness was given;
To man, mysteriously unblest,
Too much for any state but heaven.

It is not thus — it cannot be,
That one so gloriously endowed
With views that reach eternity,
Should shine, then vanish like a cloud.
Is there a God? All nature shows
There is, whom yet no mortal knows.

The mind that could this truth conceive,
Which brute sensation never taught,
No longer to the dust would cleave,
But grow immortal at the thought!

CALVARY.

'Twas man, vile man, uprais'd his impious hand,
And dragg'd the Saviour to an earthly bar:
Midst midnight gloom burst forth the murderous band,
With staves and glittering spears rais'd high in air,
Midst shouts of "Crucify him! Crucify!"
They forc'd him on to Calvary.

But hark! he speaks; and from the mountain's height
"'Tis done!" I hear, "and Justice satisfied."
Nature stood still — the sun refus'd his light,
And sunk abash'd as the Redeemer died.
The heavens grew black and tempests roll'd on high,
While thunders burst o'er Calvary.

Earth seem'd to feel, and to its centre shook,
Like fallen leaf torn by the rattling storm;
Firm mountains trembled, and the flinty rock
Ope'd wide its caverns, by convulsions torn:
But Man beheld unmov'd the Sufferer die,
And proudly turn'd from Calvary.

Death hurl'd his dart, and glutted his desire;
The devils shouted as the Saviour fell;
Whilst angels in amazement dropp'd the lyre,
Or tuned it low, the mournful tale to tell;
Then downward flew the spectacle to see,
And drop a tear o'er Calvary.

And did he die? — the dear Redeemer die —
The surety bleed, that I, a worm, might live?
Yes, cloth'd in blood, drench'd deep in agony,
With his expiring gasp he cried, "Forgive!"
Then, dearest Lord, shall I forgetful be,
And ne'er remember Calvary?

No, Lord! on earth thou hast a Table spread,
With emblems of thy dying, saving love;
Hast bid thy longing children come and feed
On dainties kindly scatter'd from above:
Thy blest command I gladly would obey,
And here remember Calvary.

Thus, Jesus, I'd commemorate the day
When thou for me, for all wast crucified:
Let atheists mock, let sceptics turn away,
Here "refuge safe" my trembling soul shall hide;
And whilst the bread I taste, O meet with me!
Dear Lord, remember Calvary.

Then at the solemn, the decisive day,
When the archangel tall shall sound his blast,
Triumphant may I rise, and soar away
To meet thee in the air in joyful haste.
May the descending Judge then smile on me,
While he remembers Calvary.

ESSAY ON THE DIVINE AUTHORITY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

By David Bogue, D. D. 18mo. cloth, pp. 270. Tract Society.

We wish every mechanic and artisan in Great Britain possessed a copy of this invaluable volume. Infidel boasters, denying "the immortality of the soul," which is "the glory of man," are insinuating themselves into the confidence of those classes of the community, in our large towns and cities, "promising them liberty, while they themselves are the servants of corruption." We have not the slightest objection to the claims of the New Testament being examined; our great solicitude is, that every individual of the community may rigorously, scrupulously, and diligently scrutinise them; and if its doctrines are found unfriendly to personal and social happiness, to liberty, to prosperity, let them be rejected. But if their purity, reasonableness, benevolence, philanthropy should be manifest — and confident we are that they will so be manifest to every honest inquirer — let them be embraced and prized as divine, and leading to a glorious immortality. We most earnestly entreat masters of manufactories, such as prize the doctrines of Divine Revelation, to purchase this inestimable little volume, for a present to their workmen and servants. In this way they will effectually contribute, under God's blessing, to improve their dependents and bless their country, while they are taking the likeliest means to secure their own property.

Dr. Bogue states in the Preface, — "The following Treatise was drawn up at the request of the London Missionary Society. That zealous and active body resolved, at their annual meeting in May, 1800, to print a very large edition of the New Testament, for the use of the people of France. On considering the wide spread of infidelity in that country, it was thought it would be for their edification to accompany it with an Essay on the Divine Authority of the Writings of the Evangelists and Apostles."

We know not in what terms sufficiently to recommend this volume.

DR. FLETCHER'S MEETING HOUSE

is an object of the deepest interest with thousands in he east of our metropolis. Blessings unnumbered, and those "which accompany salvation," have been mparted to many by means of the faithful preaching of the gospel in that place, from its erection down to he present time, and the charity and Sunday schools, connected with that congregation, have been the means of training many thousands in the ways of scriptural knowledge and Christian holiness. Every institution formed to promote the present and eternal interests of man, both at home and abroad, finds, in the large congregation attending Dr. Fletcher's ministry, generous supporters. In referring to the last Report of the London Missionary Society, we find 212*l*. 3*s*. 10*d*., as their conribution for the year ending March 1833, and we have reason to believe that others have shared the same proportion of liberality. We have pleasure therefore in giving a place to the following historical sketch of the cause of Christ at Stepney, drawn up by a gentleman of that congregation.

"The earliest records of the Christian Society meetng at Stepney, are dated 1644, at which time the Rev. Mr. Greenhill was incumbent of the parish church. The Society, it is understood, was first instituted by Henry Burton, an eminent sufferer in the days of Archbishop Laud, and who had formed a church after the Independent plan, in Friday Street, in the city. The church, according to tradition, met near a place called "the Walnut Tree," after the passing of the act of uniformity, in 1662. In 1668, Mr. Matthew Mead was chosen assistant to Mr. Greenhill, and after his death, which took place September 27, 1671, Mr. Mead was chosen pastor, and ordained, December 14, 1671, by Dr. Owen, Mr. Caryl, Mr. Griffiths, and Mr. Collings. On the 10th of May, 1674, the foundation of the meeting-house was laid, and opened for worship the 13th of September following. During the persecution, Mr. Mead fled to Holland, and preached at Utrecht, where he gained the respect and esteem of the government, and, as a token of their regard, the States General presented the four large pillars which support the roof of the edifice. So little confidence was placed in "the Indulgence," grant by Charles, that the building was so formed as to be easily converted into dwelling-houses. But the Lord determined that the waves of persecution should be stayed, and "go no farther."

In 1675, Mr. Mead commenced the May-day lecture to young people, which has been continued to the present time, and which the Lord has rendered so eminently useful during the ministrations of successive pastors. In the memorable year 1688, the galleries were erected, and "the pews set up." October 16, 1669, Mr. Mead died, and was interred near the south-west door of Stepney church. The tomb is still kept in repair by the members of the church. His funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. John Howe, and is contained in his works. Mr. Symmonds had been chosen assistant to Mr. Mead in 1698, and officiated till 1700, when the Rev. John Galpine was chosen pastor. The ordination was conducted by Dr. Chauncey, Dr. Singleton, and Mr. Nesbitt, on February 6, 1700. Mr. Symmonds continued as assistant till 1704, when he was succeeded by Mr. Thomas Bradbury, who continued till his removal to the church at Fetter Lane, and afterwards at New Court, Carey Street. In 1708, Mr. Shollet was chosen assistant. On the death of Mr. Galpine, Nov. 24, 1712, the Rev. Thomas Mitchell was chosen pastor. And, by the records of the church, it appeared that none but "the brethren" voted. Messrs. Clarke, Ridgeley, and Nesbitt officiated at the ordination of Mr. M., September 24, 1713. Mr. John Hubbard was appointed assistant on the resignation of Mr. Shollett, December 4, 1718, and pastor, on the death of Mr. Mitchell, January 9, 1720, whose funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. Matthew Clarke, from Acts xiii, 36. At the ordination of Mr. Hubbard, Messrs. Nesbitt, Ridgeley, Bragge, and Bradbury, engaged. Mr. Hubbard was one of the tutors of the Mile End Academy, held at Grove House. He died July 13, 1743, and the funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Guyse. The church and congregation appear at this time to have been much reduced in numbers, but upon the appointment of Mr. Samuel Brewer as pastor, on June 8, 1746 (he was ordained, October 23, 1746, by Dr. Marriot, Dr. Guyse, Messrs. Jennings, Hall, and Andrews), the cause again revived, and continued to flourish for fifty years, during which he laboured here. He preached his fiftieth May-day sermon in 1796, and died on the 11th of the following month. Mr. George Ford, who had been his assistant from August, 1793, and was appointed as co-pastor and successor in October, 1794, preached the funeral sermon. During the ministry of Mr. Brewer, several important institutions were formed and endowed by the liberality of the church and congregation. Among these are the alms-houses for aged members of the church; the charity schools for clothing and educating one hundred poor children, &c. &c. Mr. Ford continued to labour among an affectionate people till April 4, 1821, when he was suddenly removed from his labours on earth to his rest in heaven. He preached on the Sabbath preceding his death, in the morning, from Rom. viii, 18, and in the afternoon, from Isa. xlv, 25. His ordination service was conducted, September 14, 1796, by Mr. Knight, Dr. Fisher, Mr. Kello, Mr. Clayton, and Mr. Towle. His funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Collyer, from Psalm xl, 9, 10. The remains of the two last-mentioned pastors were interred in the meeting burial-ground, adjoining the alms-houses.

"The church presented an invitation to the Rev. J. Fletcher, D.D. of Blackburn, September 6, 1821, to accept the office of pastor among them, which was declined. The invitation was renewed, July 8, 1822, and accepted, and Mr. F. commenced his stated labours on the second Sabbath in January, 1823. The public recognition took place February 19, 1823, when the Rev. Dr. J. P. Smith, Dr. Winter, Mr. Burder, sen., and Dr. H. F. Burder, engaged in the service. 'The hand of the Lord' has been most strikingly manifested in this appointment, 'by signs following.' Many an aged disciple, while he recollects the fervour and piety of a Brewer and a Ford, is constrained to exclaim, 'What hath God wrought!' when he views the greatly extended church and the overflowing congregations, as well as the enlarged and efficient institutions formed for the welfare of Zion at home and abroad. It is the earnest and sincere desire of the compiler of this article, that this prosperity may continue and extend until it shall be no longer necessary for any to say to his neighbour, 'Know the Lord,' but when all shall know him, from the least unto the greatest."

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ABRAHAM.

The Sojourning of Abraham.

With almighty Providence for his guide, and the word of the Lord for his consolation, Abraham obeyed the Divine command, and came into the land of Canaan. But the actual enjoyment of it as his own territory, was not granted to him in person. Stephen the Deacon, in his memorable defence before the Jewish Sanhedrim, remarks, that "God gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on: yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child." Acts vii, 5. The patriarch, therefore, lived by faith, relying on the immutable truth of a covenant-keeping God. According to the statement of the apostle, "By faith Abraham sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles." Heb. xi, 9.

Having entered Canaan, Abram passed the land unto Sichem, unto the plain of Moreh. "And the Lord appeared unto Abram, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land." Gen. xii. 6. The Canaanite was then in the land: but although he could find no city or house to dwell in, blessed with the gracious presence of God, and sensible of the value of that unspeakable privilege, "he pitched his tent" in Sichem, and there "he builded an altar unto the Lord."

It is abundantly manifest, that the sacred and delightful power of religion can be cherished and maintained only by the appointed means of grace, and no good can be reasonably expected in our changing circumstances of life, unless we seek the Divine blessing and direction, setting up "an altar to the Lord," after the example of the patriarch, wherever we fix our habitation.

Abram continued but a short period in the vicinity of Sichem. "And he removed thence unto a mountain on the east of Bethel; and there he builded an altar unto the Lord, and called upon the name of the Lord." Again removing, "Abram journeyed, going on still toward the south;" the rich benediction of Heaven largely resting upon him.

But the greatest favourite of Heaven is not exempt from the ordinary calamities of the present life: he suffers in common with others. "There was a grievous famine in the land," and Abram experienced a measure of its evils. Impelled by necessity, he seeks an asylum in the neighbouring fertile country: "and Abram went down into Egypt to sojourn there." But on entering that kingdom with a large household in his retinue, he was aware that much inquiry would be made respecting such a body of foreigners; and the fears of Abram were many and distressing, respecting the safety and honour of his beloved wife. Sarah was, at this time, about sixty-five years of age, appearing, probably, very beautiful in the bloom of life; and coming from a country a thousand miles north, she was much fairer han the tawny Egyptians. Cherishing affectionate solicitude for his endeared partner, he forgot the ever-present and omnipotent care of their covenant God, and adopted an expedient for his own safety, as imprudent in itself, as it was unworthy of his general chaacter. His criminal policy was virtually to deny the act of their marriage! And by his recommendation, Sarai acquiesced in this culpable dissimulation! "And t came to pass, when he was come near to enter into Egypt, that he said unto Sarai his wife, Behold now, know that thou art a fair woman to look upon: therefore it shall come to pass, when the Egyptians shall see thee, that they shall say, This is his wife: and they will kill me, but they will save thee alive. Say, I pray thee, thou art my sister: that it may be well with me for thy sake; and my soul shall live because of thee." Gen. xii, 11—13.

What a lamentable spectacle do we here behold in the "father of the faithful!" How exceedingly is he fallen! He appears to have totally lost sight of God; to have forgotten his gracious promise, and to have made shipwreck of his own faith. "And it came to pass, that, when Abram was come into Egypt, the Egyptians beheld the woman that she was very fair. The princes also of Pharaoh commended her before Pharaoh: and the woman was taken into Pharaoh's house." Ver. 14, 15.

The deceitfulness and hardening nature of sin are impressively evident in this whole transaction. It seems difficult to perceive, how an affectionate husband could be induced, in this manner, to surrender a beloved wife: sacrificing, not only his honour as a man of piety, but his tender sensibilities as a husband. But it is probable that Abram retired to Egypt without consulting the will of God; and he was therefore permitted to fail in his faith, to lose his confidence, and to fall into sin, by trusting to his own wisdom and prudence. Sarai also must have fallen exceedingly, to be silent when separated from her husband; and though Pharaoh "entreated Abram well for her sake," and sent valuable presents to him, as the brother of Sarai, it must have been a poor consolation to him for so grievous a loss. But the God of Abram watched over his dejected servant, and preserved the honour of his wife, rebuking the monarch for her sake. "And the Lord plagued Pharaoh and his house with great plagues because of Sarai, Abram's wife." Ver. 17.

To ascertain the cause of their extraordinary sufferings, the priests and magicians were consulted; and they were led to declare, that it was on account of the king taking the wife of another man, a servant of the Most High God. Idolatry prevailed in Egypt, but the rites of hospitality were still held sacred; and the king, shocked at the decision of the priests, "called Abram, and said, What is this that thou hast done unto me? Why didst thou not tell me that she was thy wife? Why saidst thou she is my sister? So I might have taken her to me to wife: now therefore, behold thy wife, take her, and go thy way. And Pharaoh commanded his men concerning him; and they sent him away, and his wife, and all that he had." Ver. 18—20.

We are constrained to admire the upright conduct of Pharaoh. His remonstrance was at once dignified, appropriate, and piercing; and "the prophet of the Lord" must have been deeply affected with a penetrating sense of shame, on being reproved thus by an idolatrous heathen. Conscious of wrong, yet grateful to the generous monarch for his noble behaviour, Abram was silent and departed!

The Divine blessing removed the famine, and by his command, plenty immediately succeeded. "And Abram went up out of Egypt, he, and his wife, and all that he had, and Lot with him, into the south. And Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold. And he went on his journey from the south even to Bethel, unto the place where his tent had been at the beginning, between Bethel and Hai, unto the place of the altar, which he had made there at the first." Gen. xiii, 1—4.

As Abram measured back his steps to Bethel, repenting of his prevarication, his mind was renewed by the Spirit of grace to its former state of spiritual health and vigour. He recollected the merciful tokens of the Divine favour which he had there enjoyed, and delighted to reflect upon the manifestations of God's loving-kindness, which he had experienced in former days. Beholding the consecrated spot, on which his altar had been erected, he would feel shame for his backslidings, and be resolved, in the strength of God, to honour his profession by unlimited confidence in the Divine care. He settled again near Bethel; "and there Abram called on the name of the Lord." Ver. 4.

How amiable does the venerable patriarch now appear! Surrounded by his numerous household, he officiates as priest of the Most High God, teaching by his act of sacrifice, the only way of access to the throne of mercy, through the blood of atonement, proclaiming the infinite perfections of Jehovah, and rendering to him solemn thanks for delivering and preserving mercies.

The household of Lot seems to have been nearly equal to that of Abram, "and the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together: for their substance was very great, so that they could not dwell together." Ver. 6. Frequent strifes also arose between their herdsmen; by which the benevolent mind of Abram was sincerely grieved. On his proposition, therefore, they separated, after dwelling together from their infancy, about fourscore years. Lot chose the fertile plain of Jordan; and, the Lord having again renewed his promise to Abram, he "removed his tent, and came and dwelt in the plain of Mamre which is in Hebron, and built there an altar to the Lord." Ver. 18.

Excepting a short period, in which he sojourned in the neighbouring country of the Philistines, Abram appears to have dwelt in the country of Mamre the whole remainder of his life, which, during the long course of more than ninety years, must have embraced many important events. Among those occurrences must be reckoned the invasion of the adjoining country by five confederate kings, and his temporary residence in Gerar. The former of these events will be considered in the following chapter, the latter shall be briefly noticed in this place.

After contemplating pious Abraham in Mamre, walking with God before all his house, every Christian reader must be truly distressed with what the inspired writer records of him in the land of the Philistines. "And Abraham journeyed thence toward the south country, and dwelt between Kadesh and Shur, and sojourned in Gerar. And Abraham said of Sarah his wife, She is my sister: and Abimelech king of Gerar sent, and took Sarah." Gen. xx, 1, 2. "But God came to Abimelech in a dream by night," and by his merciful interposition, the honour of Sarah was again preserved. Abraham apologized to the king for his dissimulation, and by prayer, God was intreated to pardon and bless both Abimelech and Abraham. But how seriously humiliating to find Abraham and Sarah a second time in circumstances of criminal weakness and duplicity! Especially was their conduct guilty, after having received such signal mercies from the Lord, the names of both having been changed, and a son having been promised to Abraham by Sarah! What an affecting view does it present of the infirmity of human nature! May we be more sensible of our need of the special grace of Christ, and every one be more earnestly imploring, in the language of the Psalmist, "Uphold me according to thy word, that I may live; and let me not be ashamed of my hope." Psalm cxix, 116.

A DESCRIPTIVE ACCOUNT OF BRITISH INDIA.

Of all the countries on the Asiatic continent, India has, from the earliest ages, excited the greatest interest. The exploits of conquerors who made it the object of their expeditions, as also its splendid productions both of nature and art, procured for it a great name in the remotest eras of antiquity.

It has ever been imaged by the western world, as adorned with all that is splendid and gorgeous, glittering as it were with gold and gems, and profuse of fragrant and delicious odours. Though there be in this something romantic and illusory, still India forms unquestionably one of the most remarkable regions of the globe. The varied grandeur of its scenery, with the rich and copious productions of its soil, are not equalled in any other country.

It is also extremely probable that it was, if not the first, at least one of the earliest seats of civilization, and all the improvements of social life.

The great interest which India itself thus excites, must be greatly increased by the fact of its having so completely been rendered a province of our empire. This connection is peculiarly strengthened by the great number of our countrymen who are constantly going out to administer its affairs. We thereby form closer personal ties with our eastern settlements, than with the different counties of England itself.

India has very grand natural boundaries. On its northern frontier are the Himmaleh mountains, of an equal height at least to any others on the globe; the western and eastern limits are the lower course of two great rivers, the Indus and the Brahmapoutra. The southern boundary is a very extensive peninsula surrounded by the ocean. India thus defined, extends something above 1,800 miles from north to south, and at its greatest breadth nearly 1,500 miles; it is, as it were, an epitome of the whole earth: it has regions beneath the brightest rays of a tropical sun, and others, than which the depths of the polar world are not more dreary. We do not in India, as in Africa or Europe, see nature under one uniform aspect, we have to trace her gradual yet rapid transitions, between the most opposite extremes.

The main body, as it were, of India, the chief scene of her matchless fertility, and the seat of her great empires, is composed of a plain extending along its entire breadth, between the Brahmapoutra and the Indus, and reaching across from the great chain of mountains to the high table land of the south. With the exception perhaps of China, it may be considered the finest and most fertile on the face of the earth; the whole of its immense surface, with but one exception, forms one continued level of unvaried richness, over which majestic rivers diffuse their sea-like expanse. The province of Bengal is not diversified with a rock or a hillock; the Ganges rolls through it, and in the rainy season covers a great extent of land with its fertilizing inundation. From this rich, well-watered soil, the sun calls forth an almost unrivalled power of vegetation, and makes it one entire field of waving grain. Its staples consist of solid, useful articles, rice, the eastern staff of life, sugar, opium, indigo, and in the drier tracts, cotton. North of the Ganges, the provinces of Oude, sloping up to the mountains, enjoy a more cool and salubrious climate; here the Ganges is succeeded by the Jumna; to the south of the Jumna, the surface is broken by eminences, while insulated perpendicular rocks form those almost impregnable hill forts, so much celebrated in Indian history.

To complete the survey of the great Indian plain, there only remains to be described a feature dissimilar to the rest. Immediately west of the Jumna is a desert region, about 600 miles long and 300 broad, presenting a similar aspect to the most dreary tracts of Arabia and Africa; according to the observations of a recent traveller, it consists of sand hills interspersed with coarse grass and stunted prickly shrubs. At wide intervals are clusters of mud huts, while on more smooth and level parts the traveller is tantalized by the phenomenon of the mirage, producing the appearance of immense lakes that even reflect the surrounding objects.

North of this great plain towers the mountain region of the Himmaleh, with summits wrapped in perpetual snow. At the foot of these mountains is an immense swamp, the pestilential vapours exhaling from which make it, at certain seasons, the region of death. On ascending from this dark pestilential place, a more pleasing scene opens to the view. The path lies through smiling and fruitful valleys, overhung by romantic steeps covered with the noblest forests. The views in the foreground of cultured vales, hills behind crowned with natural plantations, and in the distance the snow-clad pinnacles of the mountains, form a combination of the most sublime and enchanting scenery. The Himmaleh, as it ascends higher, assumes a much bolder aspect; the lofty ridge and the dashing torrent resemble our own Highlands, while steep sides, sometimes wooded, sometimes only naked rocks, form dark chasms and ravines, at the bottom of which there is barely room for the torrent to force a way. So generally irregular is the surface of this territory, that it is supposed, in the whole extent of country surrounding Serinagur, there could not have been found another spot whereon to have erected that small city. At Nahn the traveller mounts through the principal street by a stair cut in the rock. The streets and houses of Rampore rise in tiers above each other, while the river foams and dashes beneath, and awful crags and precipices overhang it from above. But notwithstanding the gloomy and uninviting aspect of these mountain scenes, there are a few places where they open out into cultivated plains of considerable extent. The most extensive of these is the kingdom of Cashmere, which, beyond any other spot on earth, seems to merit the appellation of a terrestial paradise. In the distance, amid perpetual snows, is seen the central mass of this enormous chain of mountains; it has been estimated to be more than a thousand miles in length, and about eighty in breadth, forming one continued desert of precipices, rocks, and ice. Yet through all these mighty obstructions the daring industry of man has contrived to form passes, narrow indeed as well as fearful and perilous, but by means of which Thibet and India find it possible to exchange their respective commodities. Rude staircases are constructed along the precipices, while in other parts the road is made of branches of trees and earth, suspended at an awful height, and shaking beneath the tread of the passenger.

The Deccan, or southern peninsula, which alone remains to be described, presents none of those singular features distinguishing the greater central plain, and its northern boundary. Hills of moderate elevation diversify its surface, and its scenery is beautiful and picturesque; the greater part is cultivated, though it has a large portion of jungle, rock, and sandy waste.

India, in the view of the ancients, appeared an almost inaccessible region, its extensive seas were nearly impassable by infant navigation. Yet its wealth and populousness rendered it the object of ambition. Its fabrics, the most beautiful productions of human art, were sought after eagerly; and the manners of its people, and the maxims of its sages, strongly excited philosophical inquiry.

For these reasons, India, from the moment its existence was known, held a great and conspicuous name. No statement is made in the sacred volume, from which we can conclude that the Jews had any knowledge of India; the river Euphrates and its territory, they described as the ends of the earth: yet we cannot but believe that the spices and precious cloth, formed part of the Indian trade.

Of the several expeditions to subjugate this country, that of Alexander the Macedonian gives us the most ample information, for one of his greatest qualities was an ardent thirst for knowledge, and especially for geographical discovery. He is said to have first discovered the phenomena of the tides; in descending a river his troops were alarmed by the waters receding and leaving their ships on dry land, the rising however of the stream allayed their fears, and confirmed the discovery. But it was not till the year 1498, that India was known to Europe; a Portuguese monarch, fired with the discoveries of Columbus, equipped a fleet to explore the Eastern world; and the way having been opened, other European nations followed up the enterprise.

COMMUNION WITH GOD.

(From the Diary of a departed Christian.)

How many especial seasons have I been favoured with, in which the very light of heaven has shone into my soul! When realizing the promises of God, through faith in Christ Jesus, I have felt the inward testimony of God's love, and an assurance that my iniquities were all forgiven, when, by the Spirit's teaching, the Scripture has appeared all light, and an evidence far above all merely outward demonstrations has pervaded my spirit, of the blessedness of God's revelation, and the certainty of all its promises. When by faith I could say, I know that my Redeemer liveth; I feel that the everlasting God is my Father, and will be with me in life, and support me in death, and be my portion for ever. That the blessed Spirit is with my spirit, to teach me and guide me into truth, and with his gentle but powerful influence to lead me upwards to God, to purify my heart, and to enable me through grace to bring forth his fruits in my life. Oh! blessed seasons! Oh! most desirable visits of love! What can earth offer to be named in the comparison! How utterly, how unspeakably insignificant are all things earthly in the contrast! But it is not always thus in my experience.

How often, alas! has all been dark and dreary within. No comfort in the soul; no going forth of the affections towards God! Temptations besetting the mind, and the flesh prevalent over the spirit. The Sun of Righteousness hidden behind a cloud, and the sweet influence of the Spirit not found moving over the mind.

But anon, perhaps in a moment, the whole darkness seems to remove, and light and love spring up together, and I wonder at the folly which could have prevented me from the enjoyment of that blessed presence which God bestows. I despise the miserable thoughts of him, which kept my soul away from that source of blessedness, which could tempt me for a moment to doubt either his revelation or his love; — and again faith springs up on the wings of love; and in the enjoyment of this blessed state, the soul can exclaim with truth, It is the very foretaste of heaven!

As I know from my own experience, from the word of my God, and the statements of other Christians, that we shall and do fluctuate in either a greater or less degree while here below, in our feelings and enjoyments,—I have written this, that by the goodness of God I may turn to it under such changes, not considering them as any strange thing happening, but earnestly praying more and more to be keeping the eye of faith more intensely fixed on Christ the great object of faith, and growing up more and more into his likeness, until by his mercy I shall come to the fulness of the stature of a man in him. THE STATE OF BRITISH SAILORS ABROAD.

"The state of British sailors abroad," says the Rev. Mr. Croggon, a Wesleyan missionary at Zante, "is awful beyond description." The British and Foreign Sailors' Society are surely aware of this; and we trust that the servants of Christ of all denominations in the country will render that institution efficient aid. British commerce, influence, and honour, are deeply involved in the character of our sailors. But how much more so British religion! Our missionaries are sent forth to almost every shore; but instead of their instructions being recommended by the purity of life exhibited by our sailors, who for commercial and other purposes visit those shores, their habits of life have the most pernicious influence upon pagan foreigners! Surely every thing which can be done, ought to be effected for our sailors in British ports, and every ship ought to be furnished with religious books and tracts. Mr. Croggon says in his letter to which we have referred, "I am happy to say, my Sunday morning congregation is much increased lately: when the weather permits many come from the port as well as the town, so that the room is filled with attentive hearers: the masters of vessels also frequently come with some of their crew, but the state of British sailors abroad, is awful beyond description. It grieves me to the heart, to behold them so given up to intoxication; but frequently a serious soul finds his way to the house of prayer, and in a foreign land, how profitable to wait upon God!"

REVIVAL OF THE ORDER OF THE JESUITS.

Popery is founded upon human impositions, having no basis for its peculiar doctrines and ceremonies in the testimony of the Holy Scriptures. Jesuitism is the perfection of popish priestcraft: but as it had proceeded in its career of iniquity until it had become dreadful in its aspect and operations, even to the popedom itself, its extinction was pronounced in 1773, by a bull of Pope Clement XIV.

Since the restoration of the monarchy in France, the order of the Jesuits has been revived; and in 1833, at the breaking up of the Jesuit establishment at Montrouge, among their archives was found the following statement respecting the society. The government is divided into 5 assistances, which comprehend 39 provinces, 24 professed houses, 669 colleges, 61 noviciates, 176 seminaries, 335 residences, 223 missions, 22,787 Jesuits, of whom 11,010 are priests. In England, 19 noviciates, 299 Jesuits, 28 priests.

Many entertain the idea that their power increases in England; and this opinion is probably correct. It is also said that multitudes of Jesuits are being trained on the continent, by whom our country will soon be overspread. We are confident that Jesuitism cannot prevail in the clear light of the word of God: let our pastors, therefore, be more diligent, imparting sound scriptural knowledge, and ecclesiastical history, especially to our youth.

SCRIPTURE GAZETTEER.

Cyprus (fair, or fairness), a famous island in the Mediterranean sea, between Cilicia and Syria. It is distant, according to Dr. Wells, about a hundred miles from the main-land of Syria, and about sixty from Cilicia; is extended in length from east to west about two hundred miles, and in breadth sixty. The ancients were of opinion it took its name from the cypress tree, which grows there in great abundance. They celebrate it much for its fertility, as being sufficiently provided with all things within itself; for which reason they call it the rich and happy island: but so infamous was it for luxury, and all kinds of debauchery, that it gave the name Cypris, or Cypria, to Venus, who was the chief goddess of it in the time of heathenism, when they used to consecrate their women to prostitution, and by a law compel them to cohabit with strangers, as did the Babylonians. The apostle Paul and Barnabas departed from Antioch, embarked at Seleucia, and landed in the isle of Cyprus. Acts xiii, 4, 5, 6. While they continued at Salamis, they preached Jesus Christ in the Jewish synagogues, and from thence they went and visited all the cities in the island, preaching the Gospel everywhere. At Paphos they met with the pretended prophet Bar-jesus, whom St. Paul struck with blindness. St. Barnabas is considered as the principal apostle and first bishop of this island, where it is said he suffered martyrdom.

Cyrene (a wall) a city of Lybia in Africa, which, as it was the principal city of that province, sometimes gave it the name of Cyrenean, which, by St. Luke (Acts ii, 10), is paraphrastically called Libya, about Cyrene. This was a city of great note, and one of such power as even to contend with Carthage for pre eminence. It is famous in profane writers for being the birth-place of Eratosthenes the mathematician and Callimachus the poet; and in holy writ as being the birth-place of Simon, whom the Jews compelled to bear our Saviour's cross. Matth. xxvii, 32. There were a great many Jews near Cyrene, and great numbers of them embraced the Christian religion (Acts xi, 20, and xiii); but others opposed it with much obstinacy.

D.

Daberath (a word or thing), a town belonging to the tribe of Zebulon, or at least in the confines of this tribe (Josh. xix, 12). But Joshua shows very clearly (xxi, 28), that there is a town of this name in the tribe of Issachar, this tribe having made a cession of this town to the Levites for their habitation. Josephus frequently speaks of this place under the name of Daburitta or Darabitta, situated in the great plain at the extremity of Galilee and Samaria.

Dalmanutha (a bucket). St. Mark (viii, 10) says, that our Saviour embarked with his disciples upon the sea of Tiberias and came to Dalmanutha. St. Matthew (xvi, 59) says that he went to Magdala. Some copies read Magedan; and many MSS of St. Mark read it thus. The Syriac, Arabic, and several old copies, read Magedan. The place to which our Saviour came at this time, says Dr. Wells, lay between or in the neighbourhood of Magdala and Dalmanutha; and these were seated on the eastern side of the sea.

Dalmatia (deceitful lamps), a part of old Illyria, lying along the Gulf of Venice. Titus preached the Gospel here. 2 Tim. iv, 10.

Damascus (a sackful of blood), a celebrated city in Syria, and one of the most venerable for antiquity in the whole world, being the birth-place of Eliezer, the steward of Abraham. Nor has it been less considerable on account of its strength and greatness, being for a long time the capital of Syria, and the residence of the Syrian kings mentioned in the Old Testament. To pass by other titles, it is styled by Julian the Eye of the East, and stands in every respect in one of the most delightful situations of the whole world. Maundrell acquaints us, that no place can promise the beholder at a distance greater voluptuousness; insomuch that the Turks have a tradition, that their prophet coming near Damascus, took his station upon a certain precipice for some time, in order to view the city; and considering its enchanting beauty and delightfulness, he would not tempt his frailty by entering into it, but instantly departed with this reflection, that there was but one Paradise designed for man, and for his part he was resolved not to take his in this world. The city is situate in an even plain, so that the eye can but just discern the mountains that encompass it on the farther side. It stands on the west side of the plain, at not above two miles distance from the place where the river Barrady breaks out from between the mountains, its gardens extending almost to that very place. At about five hundred paces from Damascus on the south side, upon the highway, the place is shown where St. Paul was thrown upon the ground, and heard a voice saying unto him, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" Here a church was built, which at present is entirely ruined. In the same city is still to be seen the house which is said to be that of Ananias, who baptized and instructed St. Paul; it was changed into a church, but the Turks have made a mosque of it. Several writers have been of opinion, that Cain and Abel dwelt near Damascus, and that this city took its name from the blood of Abel, Dam, in Hebrew, signifying blood, and Sachi, a righteous person; and they still show in these parts, Abel's monument, which is said to be forty feet in length. The Jews and Christians have a tradition, that Paradise was situated in the valley of Damascus. The beauty and fertility of this place induced the inhabitants to be of this opinion, though it is at a considerable distance from the Tigris and Euphrates. They also assert that Adam was created near Damascus, of a certain red earth, which is to be seen at the same place, and which to them seemed more proper than any other to form flesh. For a further account of this delightful place, we refer our readers to Maundrell's Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem.

Debir, otherwise called Kirjath-sepher, or the city of letters, or Kirjath-arba, a city in the tribe of Judah, very near Hebron. The first inhabitants of it were giants, of the race of Anak. Joshua (x, 39) took it, and put the king to death, who commanded in it. Debir fell by lot to Caleb; and Othniel going first to the assault, and entering the place, Caleb gave him his daughter Achsah in marriage. Debir was one of the cities belonging to the Levites.

Decapolis (place of ten cities), a country in Palestine, so called because it contained ten principal cities, situated some on this, and some on the other side Jordan. There is mention of this country in Matth. iv, 26, and in Mark v, 20.

Derbe (a sting), a city of Lycaonia, whither Paul and Barnabas retreated after having been driven from Iconium (Acts xiv, 6) in the year of Christ 41.

Dar, or Dora, the capital of a country in the land of Canaan, called in Hebrew Nephat-Dor. Joshua (xii, 2, 3) conquered it, and killed its king. He gave the city to the half tribe of Manasseh, on this side Jordan. Josh. xvii, 11. Dor is situated upon the Mediterranean sea, with a very bad port belonging to it. It lies near Cesarea, in Palestine, and near Mount Carmel. Antiochus besieged Tryphon, the usurper of the kingdom of Syria, in this city.

MY SCRAP BOOK.

LEAF XIV.

"The Bee that wanders, and sips from every flower, disposes what she has gathered into her cells."—Seneca.

Old Mr. Thomas Bradbury was remarkable for a strict punctuality in family devotion. One evening, when the bell had rung, his servants ran hastily up to prayer, and forgot to shut the area door, next the street. Some fellows seeking an opportunity to commit a robbery, happened to observe the door open, and one of them getting over the palisades, entered the house. Creeping up stairs, he heard the old gentleman at prayer, that God would preserve his house from thieves. The man was thunder-struck, and unable to persist in his design. He therefore returned and told the circumstance to his companions, who abused him for his timidity. But the man himself was so affected, that some time after, he related the event to Mr. Bradbury, and became an attendant on his ministry.

Illustration of Malachi iv. 2.—The late Mr. Robinson, of Cambridge, called upon a friend*, just as he had received a letter from his son, who was surgeon on board a vessel then lying off Smyrna. The son mentioned to his father, that every morning about sun-rise, a fresh gale of air blew from the sea across the land, and from its wholesomeness and utility in clearing the infected air, this wind is always called the Doctor. "Now," said Mr. Robinson, "it strikes me, that the prophet Malachi, who lived in that quarter of the world, might allude to this circumstance, when he says, 'The Sun of Righteousness shall arise with healing in his wings.' The Psalmist mentions 'the wings of the wind;' and it appears to me, that this salubrious breeze which attends the rising of the sun, may be properly enough considered as the wings of the sun, which contain such healing influences, rather than the beams of the sun, as that passage has been commonly understood."

Apologue.—Having in my youth notions of severe piety, says a Persian writer, I used to rise in the night, to watch, pray, and read the Koran. One night, wholly engaged in these exercises, my father, a man of practical virtue, awoke while I was reading. "Behold," said I to him, "thy other children are lost in irreligious slumber, while I alone wake to praise God." "Son of my soul," replied my father, "it is better to sleep, than wake to remark the faults of thy brethren."—Sadi.

Christian Liberality, an Anecdote.—Many persons contract their liberality, if by any providential occurrences they suffer losses in their secular affairs. That some good men, however, have been of another mind, and that they have not been afraid to trust God under such circumstances, will fully appear from the following incident, which is related by Mr. Tong, in his Life of Mr. Shower, p. 3. A religious and wealthy merchant in Derbyshire, having heard of the loss of a ship near Hull, in which he had effects to the value of 1,500*l.* presently called to his cash-keeper, and ordered him to distribute 100*l.* amongst such poor ministers and Christians as he should direct: "for," said he, "if it be going by 1,500*l. at a lump, it is time to make sure of some part of it before it be all gone!*" What is given for the sake of Christ, shall be amply and certainly recompensed.

A gentleman of very little seriousness, being once in company of Mr. R. Rogers, an old nonconformist minister, said to him, "Mr. Rogers, I like your company, but you are so precise." "O Sir," replied he, "I serve a precise God."

Mr. Bunyan having once preached with particular warmth and liberty, one of his hearers observed to him, what a delightful sermon he had delivered. "Ay," said the good man, "you need not remind me of that, for the devil told me so before I left the pulpit."

Spanish Proverbs.

We can say nothing of the day till the sun is set.

Be slow in choosing a friend, but slower in changing.

Companionship and good-fellowship, must not be mistaken for true friendship.

Content in the humblest dwelling, is better than care in a splendid palace.

Consider well before you tie a knot you can never undo.

He who makes an idol of his interest, makes a martyr of his religion.

Actions deliberated upon, are seldom embittered by repentance.

Let not thy heart be upon the world, when thy hands are raised in prayer.

The Christian's Wants.

I want—that sacred flame of love to God,
Which every evil passion shall subdue,
That like the sun diffuses all abroad,
And leads spectators to admire him too.

I want—a full release from every sin,
From all its guilt, and captivating powers,
From all that keen distress I feel within,
That racks my waking and my sleeping hours.

I want—the smiles of his beloved face,
On which my hopes and comforts only live,
The sacred influence, the saving grace,
Which he hath purchas'd, and alone can give.

I want—the blessed Spirit near my heart,
To purify and change that loathsome waste:
O that my God would energy impart,
And let my soul his new creation taste.

I want—that wisdom which is from above,
To teach me when to speak, and what conceal;
The serpent well attemper'd with the dove,
And pious prudence mix'd with fervent zeal.

I want—more gratitude for what I have;
O that my God would this desire fulfil!
And when he dooms my comforts to the grave,
Grant me more resignation to his will.

I want—affections that have larger scope,
To render every service more devout:
I want a stronger faith, a brighter hope,
To silence and to banish every doubt.

I want—alas! I want I know not what;—
Establish'd grace, and consequent delight:
My wants exceed the stretch of human thought;
How I may live, and how expire aright.

But if my suit in part must be denied,
May sorrows well prepare for joys on high;
Thus every want shall more than be supplied,
And every wish in full fruition die.

"Sincerity has a certain steady dignity in itself, that always obtains respect; and though it may sometimes not be very pleasing to vanity, it is never liable to the disapprobation attendant on fickleness and levity."

"They have reason to be well pleased with their lot in life, who can distinguish the hand of God in their misfortunes."

ON THE PORTRAIT OF A KNEELING CHILD.

"Or lisps with holy look his evening prayer."—CAMPBELL.

MOTHER! teach thy child to pray,
In the morning of life's day:
Then direct his heart and eye,
Far above the bright blue sky,
To his Father's throne on high.
Tell him of a Saviour's love;
Say that Saviour reigns above;
Tell him He can always see
Little children bend the knee,
And has promis'd to bestow
Every good they need below.

Mother! teach thy child to kneel,
And to make his own appeal;
Pleading his Redeemer's name,
Who to save young children came,
Ere pollution grows with years,
Sin produces doubts and fears;
Ere the world shall frown or smile,
Or with empty show beguile;
And ere many a flaming dart
From the tempter reach his heart;
Teach, oh! teach thy child to fall,
And on his Heavenly Parent call.
He will need a sword and shield,
To prepare him for the field;
For a conflict hard and long
He must venture with the strong;
And will often be distrest,
But may not a moment rest.
Prayer will prove both shield and sword,
Certain conquest will afford.

Mother! teach thy child to pray,
In the morning of life's day;
Long ere evening he may die;
Point him to a home on high:
Father, Son, and Spirit there,
Wait to grant the infant's prayer;
To receive the infant's breath*,
Ransom'd by a Saviour's death;
Made by Him as fit for heaven,
Pure as when in Eden given.
He may be but lent to thee,
Teach him then to bend the knee.

"ESCAPE FOR THY LIFE."—GEN. XIX, 17.

SINNER, rise! with ardour rise,
Seek the things above the skies,
Be unto salvation wise,
Nor longer dare delay.
See the crown of life in view,
Jesus holds it out to you;
Now the glorious prize pursue,
While it is call'd to-day.

Clouds will soon o'erspread your skies,
Death in darkness seal your eyes,
When in ceaseless agonies
Repentance will be vain.
Now is the day, now is the hour;
God on you will his Spirit pour;
You are weak, he'll grant you power:
Seek, and you shall obtain.

Think not to yourself to say,
"Why should I repent to-day?
When death comes, then will I pray:
Religion I despise!"
Say, poor sinner, dost thou know,
That to-night thy soul may go
Up to God, then sink in woe,
Never again to rise?

Stay not then in all the plain,
Haste a refuge to obtain,
Ere God's wrath, like burning rain,
Comes rushing from the sky.
Fly to Jesus crucified,
Shelter in his open'd side;
Here in safety you may hide,
And wrath will pass you by.

Sinner, rise! with ardour rise,
Seek the things above the skies,
Be unto salvation wise,
Nor longer dare delay.
See the crown of life in view,
Jesus holds it out to you;
Now the glorious prize pursue,
While it is call'd to-day.

THE EAST INDIA COMPANY, AND THEIR EMPIRE.

HE British Empire in India has been described as the ost extraordinary spectacle "which the political world ver saw:" as nearly equalling in extent that which e Romans once established in Europe; while it has rpassed and differs from theirs in the celerity and inerior agency, numerically considered, by which it has een acquired; in the benevolent character and efficincy of its administration; and in its remoteness om the seat and source of the ruling power and inuence.

The empire thus subjected to the dominion of Great ritain comprehends more than 500,000 square miles of erritory in the peninsula of India, inhabited by not ess than 100,000,000 of human beings; and is at a istance from Great Britain of 5,000 miles by land, nd 12,000 miles by sea. Not the least remarkable ircumstance connected with this empire is, that it was equired, and its government has been administered, by joint-stock company of merchants, whose high and overeign commands upon all points connected with overnment are issued without observation from their ommercial hall in Leadenhall Street, London.

At no former period in the history of the world has such a spectacle been presented to the contemplation of mankind; and it now derives additional interest from the consideration, that Christianity in its imperishable interests is deeply involved in the future conduct of this corporation.

The trade with India first commenced in 1599. In 1600, Queen Elizabeth established a company to conduct it; but this company appears to have been a shipping company; the adventurers sending their goods at their own risk. In 1612 the funds of individuals were combined into a common capital or stock, of which each person held a share or shares, according to the sum which he had subscribed for the purposes of trade. The value of a share was 50*l*, and the capital formed by these shares amounted to 740,000*l*. The traffic appears to have been at that period lucrative, and to have afforded a considerable profit to the first adventurers, notwithstanding many losses which they sustained through the rivalry and malice of the Dutch.

Hitherto the Company had traded under a royal charter, unsupported by parliamentary authority, which gave them an exclusive prisilege. The profits which the Company thus acquired, induced others to inquire into the validity of their claims; and it was decided, that, without the sanction of every branch of the legislature, no charter could convey the privilege of an exclusive trade; accordingly, many adventurers engaged in the Indian trade, independently of the Company; and the profits of those who had supposed themselves to be possessed of an exclusive privilege, were greatly injured by the competition.

In this situation the Company's affairs continued until 1698, when, to obtain a charter conferring an exclusive privilege of trading to India, a number of subscribers, unconnected, with the old Company, offered to King William 2,000,000*l.*, at 8 per cent. interest: whereupon, the old Company, to maintain their privileges, offered to government 700,000*l.* at 4 per cent. Necessity induced the administration to accept the larger sum, though at the higher interest. A new Company was thus erected: but the old Company was not abolished. Rivalry was the consequence, and the interests of both parties were injured by it: besides, the new subscribers were not obliged to unite in a joint stock. A few of them insisted upon carrying on the trade separately, and mutual jealousy arose, highly prejudicial to all the chartered adventurers.

In 1702, by what was called an "Indenture Tripartite," of which Queen Anne formed the third party, the two companies were in some measure united; and, in 1708, they were, by act of parliament, formed into one company, under the denomination of The United Company of Merchants of England, trading to the East Indies, a name which they have ever since retained. The individuals, indeed, who had insisted upon a separate trade, were not immediately deprived of their privileges, but the Company was authorized, after three years' notice, to purchase the capital of those individuals, and thus to convert the whole capital into a joint stock. The Company's capital stock, which is vested in the British funds, has been subsequently augmented, and amounted, in 1812, to 6,000,000*l.*

On the renewal of the East India Company's charter, in 1813, a new era in Indian commerce commenced, the trade being thrown open to the enterprise of individuals, under certain restrictions and regulations, as specified at large in the Act of the 53 Geo. III, cap. 55. The following abstract is from Colquhoun:—

"By this Act the territorial acquisitions in India, with the late acquisitions on the continent of Asia, or in any island north of the Equator, are to remain in the government of the East India Company for 20 years, from the 10th of April, 1814. The Company have also the exclusive monopoly of the trade to and from China, for the like term of years. Private traders, subjects of His Majesty, in the United Kingdom, may export goods to any port or place within the limits of the Company's charter, provided the return cargoes are sent to such ports only in Great Britain and Ireland, as shall be specified by an order of His Majesty in Council in Great Britain, and by the Lord Lieutenant and Council in Ireland.

"By this Act, the East India Directors are hereafter required to keep separate and distinct accounts of their territorial, political, and commercial affairs, which have been heretofore so amalgamated as to render it impossible, with any degree of accuracy, to ascertain the profit or loss on their trade.

"In the same year, the Acts of the 54 Geo. III, cap. 34, 35, 36, make further regulations with respect to the East India trade. By the first Act, British subjects may trade between the United Kingdom and the limits of the Company's charter, and to any intermediate port or place situate in North and South America (British Colonies in America excepted), either directly or circuitously, provided they do not trade in tea; excepting also the dominions of the emperor of China. The second Act allows trade to be carried on in India in ships not British built, until the 1st of January, 1815. The third Act makes various regulations with respect to duties, drawbacks, manifests, &c. These four Acts of Parliament regulate the whole of the trade to India, in conformity to the new system which has been established."

By the act recently passed, the East India Company are altogether divested of their commercial character, and remain incorporated for the purpose of governing India only; concerning which, we shall give some important information in a future Number.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ABRAHAM.

Abraham's Conduct towards Lot.

The conduct of Abraham towards his nephew Lot, finely exhibits to us the amiable character of the patriarch. Lot had accompanied his uncle from Haran, and during three years, attended him in his sojourning in Canaan and Egypt. But it became indispensably necessary that they should separate, their households were so large, and their cattle became so numerous.

It has been common to represent Lot as a very young man, entirely dependent upon Abraham, and as having received from him all the property which he possessed. But this arises from a serious mistake: for though Abraham was his uncle, and might be his senior, it could be but very little, as Lot's father was the elder brother of Abraham, and sixty years older than he. It is evident also, that Lot had considerable possessions in Haran, doubtless left him by his deceased parent.

The riches of Lot might not be equal to those of Abraham, but the sacred writer observes, "And Lot also, who went with Abram, had flocks, and herds, and tents. And the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together: for their substance was very great, so that they could not dwell together." Gen. xiii, 5, 6.

Sincere friendship, founded upon religious principle, united the hearts of these two excellent men, and a separation must have been truly painful to both of them. But "there was a strife between the herdmen of Abram's cattle, and the herdmen of Lot's cattle." And what rendered the appearance of strife the more disreputable was, the masters were worshippers of the true God: it was even dangerous to them, as foreigners, for "the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelled then in the land." The fire thus kindled might possibly be inflamed, until the masters should be led take part with the servants, and thus their friendship would cease. This was perceived by Abraham, and with a noble magnanimity, equal to his prudent sagacity, he proposed a separation to his nephew. "And Abram said unto Lot, Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me; if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left." Ver. 8, 9.

Language fails justly to characterize the disinterested proposition of Abraham. A thousand sermons preached, and as many volumes written, to recommend a spirit of peacefulness, benevolence, and condescending politeness, were far short of the expressive and persuasive lesson which we are taught by this act of the patriarch. Lot being younger than Abraham, and certainly under many obligations o him, ought to have declined the proposal, and to have referred the choice to his uncle. But, forgetting the convenience of his generous relation, and, as it seems, somewhat influenced by a covetous spirit, "Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, even as the garden of the LORD. Then Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan; and Lot journeyed east: and they separated themselves the one from the other. Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom. But the men of Sodom were wicked, and sinners before the LORD exceedingly." Ver. 10—13.

For Abraham, so good a man and so kind a relation, to part with his nearest kinsman, a servant of God, must have been exceedingly painful. But he had the consolation of reflecting, that the loss was not sustained through any fault of his own; and whatever blank was made by the failure of creature comforts, was more than supplied by the presence of God the Creator, by the gracious promises of Him "who sticketh closer than a brother." "And the LORD said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward. For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever. And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth; so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered." Ver. 14—16.

While Abraham dwelt in the plains of Mamre, enjoying fellowship with his God, "Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked," was involved in the miseries of a dreadful war. Chedorlaomer and Amraphel, the kings of Persia and Chaldea, with their allies, invaded the land, defeated the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, and ravaged the country. "And they took Lot, Abram's brother's son, who dwelt in Sodom, and his goods, and departed." Gen. xiv, 11, 12.

The news of this calamity soon reached the ears of Abraham: "for he dwelt in the plain of Mamre the Amorite, brother of Eshcol, and brother of Aner: and these were confederate with Abram." Calling in the aid of these three brothers, "he armed his trained servants, born in his own house, three hundred and eighteen," and pursued the host of marauders. He overtook, surprised, and destroyed them. "And he brought back all the goods; and also brought again his brother Lot, and his goods, and the women also, and the people."

In courage and energy, Abraham is here seen by no means inferior to those heroes of antiquity, Alexander and Cæsar; but the motives by which he was induced to engage in this military expedition, had no place in the bosoms of those imperial scourges of the world. The fear of God and the love of man ruled in the mind of Abram; and he was prompted in this affair by justice, benevolence, and sacred friendship. The battle was of the LORD, who honoured him to succour the afflicted, and to be the avenger of oppression against ruthless barbarity.

Lot and his family, the captives and their property, being all recovered, together with considerable spoils, Abraham returned in triumph. With exultation, his neighbours came forth to greet the conqueror, and among them is distinguished Melchisedek, a venerable personage, a royal priest. But little is here said of that excellent person, yet that little must not be passed over. "And Melchisedek, king of Salem, brought forth bread and wine," to refresh the weary army. "And he was the priest of the Most High God, and he blessed him, and said, Blessed be Abram of the Most High God, possessor of heaven and earth: and blessed be the Most High God, who hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he gave him tithes of all" the spoils captured from the enemies.

"And the king of Sodom went out to meet him, after his return from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer and the kings that were with him." Filled with gratitude to his deliverer from so merciless a tyranny, and admiring the noble-mindedness of the patriarch, who laid out the recovered property before all, "the king of Sodom said unto Abram, Give me the persons, and take the goods to thyself." With a spirit of generosity worthy of the religion of Abraham, and unparalleled in the records of the heroes of profane antiquity, he refuses to retain a single article. He replies to the proposition of the king of Sodom, in language the most solemn and devout, commanding the admiration of all ages. "I have lift up mine hand unto the LORD, the Most High God, the possessor of heaven and earth, that I will not take any thing that is thine, lest thou shouldst say, I have made Abram rich; save only that which the young men have eaten, and the portion of the men who went with me, Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre; let them take their portion." Ver. 21—24.

The conduct of Abraham in this affair was truly generous; but at the same time it was strictly just; and while he nobly relinquished his own right to an interest in the recovered property, he would not require that his confederates should make the same sacrifice. Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre might still take their share: but possibly, after the example of their friend, they also might forego their claim upon the recovered goods of their neighbours. The king of Sodom led back his people to their city, and Lot accompanying him, continued to sojourn in his land.

The Sodomites continued "wicked, and sinners before the LORD;" and Lot was dwelling among them. On account of their abominations, God, in righteous judgment, resolved utterly to exterminate them from the earth. But he remembered Lot, and revealed his awful purpose to Abraham. The tender affection of the patriarch for his unhappy kinsman, is beautifully illustrated by his conduct on that memorable occasion.

"And the LORD appeared unto Abraham in the plains of Mamre: and he sat in the tent door in the heat of the day; and he lifted up his eyes and looked, and lo, three men stood by him: and when he saw them, he ran to meet them from the tent door, and bowed himself to the ground, and said, My Lord, if now I have found favour in thy sight, pass not away, I pray thee, from thy servant. Let a little water, I pray you, be fetched, and wash your feet, and rest yourselves under the tree: and I will fetch a morsel of bread, and comfort ye your hearts, after that ye shall pass on: for therefore are ye come to your servant. And they said, So do, as thou hast said." Gen. xviii, 1—5.

Genuine hospitality and pious benevolence reigned in the heart of Abraham; and this lovely picture is drawn from the habitual practice of his kindness to the weary traveller, and the unknown stranger. To this the apostle refers, as a worthy example to us, when he exhorts, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." Heb. xiii, 2.

Two of the apparent strangers were angels, and the third was "the angel of the LORD," the Lord of angels, the Son of God. He rewarded the hospitable patriarch, with the renewed promise of a son by his beloved Sarah.

These extraordinary visitors rising to depart, their delighted host accompained them part of the way. "And the LORD said, Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do; seeing that Abraham shall surely become a mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him? For I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment, that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him." Ver. 17—19.

The dreadful purpose of a sin-avenging God being thus communicated to the patriarch, the two celestial messengers "turned their faces from thence, and went towards Sodom: but Abraham stood yet before the Lord." Filled with compassion for his fellow-men, and all the pious sympathies of his soul moved on behalf of his nephew Lot, "Abraham drew near, and said, Wilt thou destroy the righteous with the wicked? Peradventure there be fifty righteous within the city: wilt thou also destroy and not spare the place for the fifty righteous that are therein? That be far from Thee to do after this manner, to destroy the righteous with the wicked; and that the righteous should be as the wicked, that be far from Thee. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Ver. 23—25.

The merciful mediation of Abraham was accepted of the Lord, and he assured the intercessor, that if he found the number proposed, he would spare the whole on their account. The intercession of the holy man was encouraged, and prolonged until the number was reduced to ten. "And the Lord said, I will not destroy it for ten's sake." Ver. 32.

The patriarch dared not to proceed further. Admiring the condescension of the Divine Majesty to sinful "dust and ashes," and penetrated with a consciousness of his own unworthiness, he ceased to plead for a further extension of the forbearance of God. Yet so long as the pious patriarch persevered in his supplication, God in mercy yielded to his request. "And the Lord went his way, as soon as he had left communing with Abraham; and Abraham returned unto his place." Ver. 33.

What encouragement is here afforded to us to plead for sinners in the all-prevailing name of Christ our advocate with the Father. We see that "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much;" for "it came to pass, when God destroyed the cities of the plain, that God remembered Abraham, and sent Lot out of the midst of the overthrow, when he overthrew the cities in which Lot dwelt." Gen. xix, 29.

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. VII.—THE HOLINESS OF GOD.

Licentiousness and vice are the features which characterize the deities of heathen worship, and the accounts that are furnished to us of the course of conduct they pursued, are alike disgusting to reason and destructive of morality. Now every nation in which the light of revelation has not shone, in a greater or less degree is addicted to the adoration of beings such as these, and we shall find that their conceptions of the Ruler of all, having no firm basis to proceed upon, very much resemble their own wickedness and vice, with the addition, however, of greater power and more extensive opportunities of indulging in gross and sensual pleasures. This being the case, the inhabitants of the realms of peace being made to resemble those of the lower creation, it follows as a natural consequence, that those who are striving to become sharers in immortal bliss will feel no need of piety or virtue as preparatives for their future state. It can only be explained on the principle of universal depravity, how men come to form such erroneous ideas of their Maker, who in no age or country has left himself without a witness. And when we reflect on the mistaken notions of so many, it should be with feelings of unaffected gratitude that we endeavour to find out what the sacred Scriptures reveal on this subject, convinced that in them alone we shall be able to understand what the true nature of God's holiness is.

Perhaps it is impossible to furnish an accurate definition of a term so little understood, and so difficult of explanation; and since it will be the business of eternity to address God under the appellation of Holy! it will be well, while we continue here below, to fill our minds with such representations of it as are recorded for our instruction, without striving to reduce it into any given form of words.

I. Holiness is essential to the very nature of God: so that we cannot form the idea of God without including that of perfect holiness. This it is that gives Revealed Religion such an infinite superiority over all the idle imaginations of fallen and untaught men; and the differences of opinion concerning the holiness of God which civilized and Christian people entertain, will be found all to hinge upon the nature of that holiness, but not at all on the fact whether God possesses it in an infinite degree. Let us for a moment contemplate what would be the state of the universe, if in its Ruler there should happen to be the least variableness or shadow of turning. That he wields the sceptre of unbounded power, is clear from the manifestations of it which everywhere abound; and thus we might expect the poor and trembling creatures of earth to be crushed beneath a despotism more horrible than ever has disgraced the annals of the most barbarous nations on the globe. On the holiness of God, and on that alone, our safety depends. Could it be proved that the Judge of all the earth could do otherwise than right, then might the very heavens themselves put on sackcloth, and the inhabitants of the earth mourn and howl, at beholding themselves placed for ever beneath the government of one, whose power could accomplish all that his malevolence might suggest. True it is that infinite benevolence may be traced in each production of the Almighty's hand; and this renders it therefore antecedently probable, that infinite holiness is an attribute of his nature; for since the object of religion is to reduce us to the frame of mind necessary for the full exercise of such benevolence, the manifestation of this benevolence by any one in an unbounded degree, goes very far to prove that the excellencies of religion abound in his heart. It will now therefore be useful to point out, that—

II. Holiness is impressed on all the works of God. By these we are to understand, not merely the material structure of our world, but likewise the systems which he has adopted for its government, and those institutions of which he has been the author. Let us glance briefly at a few.

1. The Creation, in itself presents us with the full assurance that its author was the Holy One of Israel. Now, in order to establish this declaration, I must call attention to the invariable effects of evil dispositions. If we look into the distribution of worldly honour and renown, we shall find in too many cases, that the motive which influenced the mind of the giver was some prejudice in favour of the person on whom the gift is bestowed, and not any peculiar fitness in him to receive such an appointment. And even in the more restricted circles of domestic life, we find that fatal preference of one child to another, which darkened the character of the early patriarchs, and has ever been abhorrent in the sight of God. We find also, that the possession of power is frequently coveted in order to revenge some real or fancied injuries, and that the benefits which result from being endowed with superiority, are but too frequently overbalanced by the dangers it is sure to entail. But how different is the aspect of things under the Divine government. He who could have exerted his unbounded power in torturing his creatures, and causing all their limbs to move with pain, and the actions necessary for the sustenance of life to be accompanied with excruciating anguish, has evidently laboured with the greatest assiduity to produce as large an amount as possible of happiness and contentment. This I apprehend to be a proof of great importance; for though most frequently cited to prove the goodness of the Deity, it will be seen to establish the absence of all malevolent dispositions, and consequently the presence of holiness. I have only space just to quote the words of Jehovah himself. "And God saw every thing that he had made, and behold it was very good."

2. The Moral Law. Whether we view this as the revelation made by God on Sinai, or as the inward monitor implanted in every bosom, it will alike establish our point. There is no requirement of the Decalogue which does not approve itself to the mind as reasonable and good; and when we bear in mind that it has reference to the thoughts as well as the actions of men, and forbids the indulgence of evil desires, we shall feel the full force of the apostle's declaration, "The law is holy, and the commandment holy, just, and good." Rom. vii, 12. But I search not the records of Scripture to tell me that there is in man a monitor, whose admonitions are ever on the side of virtue. I read it in the care-worn countenance and haggard eye of him who has forsaken the paths of virtue, and chosen those of iniquity. I read it in the specious arguments of him who is labouring hard and striving much to quell the tumult and the storm, which the indulgence of vice has occasioned within him. I hear it in the awful exclamations of the dying man, who feels that he will soon be in the presence of his Maker. I charge each man to deny its existence, if he dares; and I forewarn him, that though by much iniquity and many crimes he may have lulled the secret counsellor, so that its admonitions are faint and few, yet he shall feel its sharpest stings, he shall endure its bitterest reproaches, and it shall arise like a gigantic stature in the twilight, besetting his path and filling him with terror. "The wicked are like the troubled sea, whose waters cast up mire and dirt."

3. The Mosaic Economy. The apparently cumbrous and unmeaning ceremonies of the Mosaic ritual, will, on inspection, be found to be well calculated to impress the minds of the Jewish people with the conviction, that He, before whom all things are unclean, must himself be infinite in purity. The peculiar laws concerning cleansing, the absolute necessity that every thing connected with the Tabernacle service should undergo frequent ablutions, and the numerous causes (to us insignificant) which were considered enough to render a man unclean, must have been directed with reference to some greater object than the apparent one. It will be remembered, as an illustration that these requirements were observed, that our Lord ridicules, or rather rebukes the Pharisees, on account of the numerous times they washed their hands; and also, when at the marriage of Cana in Galilee, the large water-pots, which were provided doubtless for the use of the guests, and which were competent to hold about 123 gallons, are said to have been placed there after the manner of the purifying of the Jews. We find nothing disgusting though tedious in the Mosaic ritual; nothing of the impurity and blasphemy which characterized the ceremonies of the heathen world: but all eminently calculated to produce an abhorrence of sin, and a sincere and anxious desire to avoid it on all possible occasions. I conceive this of itself to be a good and decisive argument in favour of its divine origin; for it seems quite absurd to suppose that the Jews were competent of their own wisdom to invent a system so infinitely preferable to that of every surrounding nation.

4. The Christian Dispensation, is the greatest possible display of this attribute of the Divine nature. Its fundamental doctrine, we are well aware, is that of the atonement made for our sins by the death of Jesus Christ; and I should think it impossible for more decisive testimony to be furnished of the abhorrence in which God holds every thing that is sinful. Had it been possible at a less price to secure our forgiveness, we may be sure that the Eternal Father would not have consented to what we have every reason to believe was the greatest sacrifice that could possibly be made. And yet we find that the death of the Saviour was the only terms on which an infinitely holy God could provide redemption for his sinful people. But it is not only in this, but in every doctrine, that the same distinguishing features may be traced. The Holy Spirit is offered to our acceptance, and we are repeatedly urged to pray for his abundant influence, that we may abound in all good works. The fruits of this Spirit are represented in the most inviting descriptions of virtue and benevolence; and it is expressly declared, that without them no man can properly call himself a servant of Christ. The world is represented as sinful, and Christians are commanded to be separate from it; by which we are to understand the habitual pursuance of a course of rectitude and virtue, from the high principle of love to God, which is as much opposed as possible to the time-serving expediency of the mere man of the world. Herein therefore we behold the holiness of God distinctly manifested. B. Z.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XL.

Religion.

Dear Madam,

In considering how I shall best render any advice I may have to offer upon the subject of religion available to you, I perceive that the most eligible method will be to set down in order the chief topics connected with the subject, and to offer you, in a few observations under each, my latest and best sentiments, both theoretic and practical. This I shall endeavour to effect in one continued Letter, upon which I now enter, intending to add to the whole three or four additional Letters upon the chief peculiarities which ought to distinguish the education of females; and with which my advice to you, by letter, upon the subject of Education, will have terminated.

Since the time at which a parent ought to begin to teach religion to her child, and the time at which each separate doctrine ought to be taught, and each precept put into practice, will be different in different children, being regulated by their circumstances, and by their natural and acquired ability, I shall leave the question of time entirely to be decided by the circumstances of your own individual instance.

The first of these lessons is the existence of God. "The most valuable of all our habits of observation," says Paley, "is that of referring all the external phenomena of nature to the Supreme Intelligence. The world thenceforward becomes one temple, and life a continued act of adoration." It is then of the greatest importance that your child should acquire this habit; and you can communicate it. You are, I know, a reader of Dr. Paley's Natural Theology: you understand the argument, and you are familiar with the instances. Your own observation will suggest to you a multitude of others, and will render interesting many a walk into the country, and many a winter evening.

Point out then to your child the nature of the argument for the being of a God, as derived from the design evinced in the works of nature. Explain to him the difference between organized and unorganized matter; that the former consists in a complication of parts, put together with a view to produce a purpose, a valuable use, such as is exhibited in the bodies of all organized beings, and especially of animals; and that the latter consists in the mere existence of matter, without any useful purpose through this adaptation. Of the former, a watch is a proper instance, a stone of the latter. Explain to your child, that specimens of the former nature, as far as they occur among the works of men, can never be referred to any thing short of an intelligent mind as their origin; and that the same origin can alone be assigned for the organized beings which abound in the natural world. Illustrate your argument by the wondrous mechanism exhibited even in his own hand, its adaptation to its office, the increased sensibility given to the ends of the fingers, the defence afforded by the nails, the flexibility produced by the different joints of the fingers, the station of the hand at the end of the arm, the flexure of the arm at the elbow, so convenient for the achievement of innumerable purposes, the position of the hands to work in the same condition as the eyes look and the feet walk. You will not scruple to entrust him for an afternoon to some intelligent and pious surgeon of your acquaintance, and whom you will have desired to explain to him the mechanism of the human skeleton, with a view to the illustration of this argument. But your acquaintance with Paley will enable yourself to do much. The wings of an insect, the legs and feet of animals, and the relation of one part to another in the construction, will afford you a boundless source of profitable, and in the best sense amusing conversation.

It is related by one biographer of the inestimable writer whom I have quoted, that he would often take a bone of a fish or animal which had been picked at the table, into his study, and examine and reflect upon it for the hour together. I mention this to show how abundant the opportunities will be for you to furnish his mind with illustrations of the argument. The results will have a value literally infinite: you will thus strengthen immensely all the truth of the being of a God, in his mind, by enabling him to understand the overwhelming power, both as to number and clearness, of the proofs by which it is attended. In the course of a short space of time you may initiate him into the knowledge of the book to which I have alluded.

The unity of God, the great truth of Judaism and of Christianity, should frequently be a topic of your instructions; and the proofs of which, as derived from the sacred Scriptures, should by you be so frequently repeated, as that he may soon be able to know where to find them in the Scriptures, and apply them to the subject for himself.

It will be proper to explain to him the eternity of the existence of the Supreme Being, which means, that there never was a period when he did not exist, and that there never will be a period when he will not exist.

You will have abundance of opportunity of illustrating the immutability of God, as taught not only in the Scriptures, but by the appearances of nature, which are inflexibly uniform; that is to say, that the same precedent events are ever followed by the same consequents, except in the case of miracles, which your prior explanation as to the immutability of God will enable you more clearly to illustrate.

I am fully of opinion, that much mischief has been produced by wrong statements respecting the omnipresence of the Deity. That the Deity acts and perceives everywhere is most true, and is all that is generally meant by the doctrine of the Divine omnipresence. But the doctrine too often taught amounts to the Pantheism held by some ancient philosophers, which dogma, you are aware, goes to establish the doctrine that every thing is God. Teach your child that God in essence resides in heaven, and that heaven is above him, and that it is so vast a region, as that from whatever quarter of the globe the inhabitants of the earth look up, they look towards it; and that God from heaven, which is his throne, operates and perceives universally; of which capacity of the Creator, your child's own faculty of sight will afford an accurate though a very limited illustration. The writers of Scripture universally inculcate this doctrine, and our blessed Redeemer continually spake of "our Father who is in heaven."

The omniscience of God must be taught as meaning the consciousness of the Infinite Mind of every thing that exists or is done everywhere.

His omnipotence, as the capacity of doing every thing, which does not involve a physical impossibility or a moral impropriety.

His independence, as not being obligated for existence to any being.

His benevolence, as his disposition to communicate the greatest measure of happiness to his creatures of which they are capable. This truth will need all your ability in order to inculcate correctly. You will need clearly to understand yourself, that it is impossible that creatures like mankind can, in the infancy of their being (and such is our present state), be capable of moral happiness, which is the most exalted species of it; that the only method whereby they can be prepared for it is the acquisition of habits, and which necessarily involve the pain and suffering consequent upon acquiring those habits; and that such being the condition of mankind in the present life, all that is suffered by any of them is plainly benevolent, when contemplated with a view to the end. Still you will do well to point out the peculiar instances of happiness already apparent; such as, for instance, the happiness of young children, so evidently provided for them; the happiness of the vast proportion of all the inferior creatures; and the unquestionable preponderance of ease and pleasure in the vast majority of mankind, over those portions of their life which have been spent in suffering. Next to the habit of recognizing the Divine hand in every object, I could desire for your child that he should be taught to recognize the Divine love in every event. You will find in Butler's admirable book, entitled, The Analogy between Natural and Revealed Religion, every consideration stated which tends to the establishment of this inestimable principle. I could wish every mother acquainted with it, and able, after that invaluable method by which a mother alone can teach, to simplify the argument and to teach it to her infant.

The Divine justice must be taught as meaning the dictate of his nature to render to every being the exact desert which his moral conduct may have demanded.

His fidelity, as his inviolable disposition to the performance of every engagement, promise, and covenant.

His mercy, as the quality of his nature which induces him to extricate miserable beings out of every degree of disadvantage (rather than inflicting it), to which their own misconduct may have reduced them.

His wisdom, as his capacity of perceiving the best ends and purposes, and of adopting the best means for their accomplishment.

Death-Bed Testimonies.

COLLECTED BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM BUTTON.

No. X.

REV. ROBERT HALL *,

Thirty-seven years Pastor of the Baptist Church, at Arnsby, Leicestershire. Died March 1791.

SPASMS, or fits of the cramp, attended him for some time before his death. In his last letter to his son-in-law (the late excellent Mr. Isaac James, of Bristol), he says, "In point of health, when my fits are off, I am as well, almost, as I could wish, and as to my state generally, rather happy in my mind.

'The Gospel bears my spirits up;
A faithful and unchanging God,
Lays the foundation of my hope,
In oaths, and promises, and blood.'

This verse is, and long has been, precious to me. I have you all more in remembrance than ever. May the Lord say to each, 'Thou shalt not be forgotten by me.'"

In a letter a few days after to Mr. Evans, of Northampton, he expresses himself thus: "Sometimes I preach with much difficulty, and on the last Lord's day but one, not at all, having a fit upon me from morning till night. I have many that are soon over, but several have of late baffled all means for a long time. The few last have been very different from what they used to be. My head has not been affected, nor my breast in much pain, but I have been very sick, and inclined to swoonings. I have generally been very happy in my mind. Last Lord's day I had a very severe fit, but of four hours' continuance only. They called my son John out of bed. I was happy beyond expression in my mind. It was a night of sorrow deluged with joy. What my dear wife and son feared, that I in a measure longed for. I say in a measure, because though greatly afflicted, yet my comforts were so much superior, that I thought and said, I cared not how long I lived, though I had fits every day, if the Lord continued me his heart-melting, heart-strengthening presence. I had general pain, but I could not forbear saying, Pain was pleasant, and sickness sweet, when the Lord is near. I thought of you, brother Ryland, and others, with great delight, and that if the Lord spared me, I would write a few lines on God's behalf, viz. To request you not to dread any thing but sin. I am sure the Lord can make you most happy, when afflictions are most heavy. He has really done so to me, poor me. And if so, can you distrust? One time (a while ago) those words, 'Fear not, worm Jacob,' &c. were so much to me, that I told the Lord it was enough, I wished, I wanted no more. But last Lord's day night my cup ran over. O take care, dear brother, and never dishonour God as I have done, by slavishly dreading old age, sore diseases, devils, and death. But here it becomes me to stop. I am yet in the body, have an evil heart, and I know not how I may be yet; I therefore almost repent having written what I have. However, I must and will say, if the Lord be with me I will fear no evil. After all, I know not the day of my death; the Lord may spare me to drag on for years. But none of these things move me, so that I may (be when it will) finish my course with joy."

In one of these violent fits of the cramp, about two or three weeks before his death, he and others thinking it would end in his dissolution, he gave very particular directions concerning all the circumstances of his funeral. And he made a new will, with some alterations, much to his own satisfaction, and that of his family, about ten days before his decease.

On the Lord's day wherein he was taken to rest, he appeared very well in the morning, went into the meeting at the usual time, and preached from John iv, 10. He had been on the former part of the verse the preceding Sabbath; "If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith unto thee, Give me to drink, thou wouldst have asked of him." He now considered the latter clause: "He would have given thee LIVING WATER." It was a pleasing circumstance to some, that this subject led him to mention what they had never been told before, viz. that the first text he preached from at Arnsby was, Prov. xxv, 25, "As cold waters to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country." Many thought he spoke that morning with uncommon vigour, beyond what they had remembered for years; and at the close he gave out the hymn, "The fountain of Christ, Lord help us to sing," &c. He ate his dinner as usual, and then lay down for some time (as he had been accustomed to do of late years), and slept so soundly as not to be awakened by Mrs. Hall going into the room. About five he arose, drank his coffee and ate his toast as well, or rather better than usual. At six he retired into the little parlour and stayed nearly half an hour; when he came out again, Mrs. Hall first perceived him to be indisposed, he asked for some camomile tea, being very sick. Just at this time his son and daughter-in-law came in, not knowing of his illness. He seemed to be no worse than he had frequently been before under similar attacks of his disorder. He had given notice at noon, that he should preach in the evening, so that a considerable number of persons were assembled in the meeting, where they engaged in prayer. His wife, son, and daughter, stayed with him. A friend coming in to inquire how he did, he seemed at first not disposed to say much, but wished him good night, when he was going away; but presently, as if suddenly recollecting himself, he called him back, and said, "Friend Looms, fear nothing. Do not be afraid of trouble, trials, nor even death. If the Lord is but with you, you will do." This he said in a very animated manner, and cheerful tone of voice; then wished him good night again, and let him go. Two other of his people then came in and stayed some time. One of them wished him to have medical advice again, as his disorder seemed to be different lately from what it had formerly been. He however signified that he was not inclined to try fresh medicines; "But," added he, "I have not lived so long in the world as to be weary of it; nor am I afraid to die. I do not care whether I live or die." About eight, he wished to go into the parlour again. Mrs. Hall took the candle to go before and light him, and his friends took hold of him as he rose, to lead him along more safely; when he said, "I shall swoon;" and sunk down to the ground, and expired without a groan or a struggle.

Make use of time, if thou lovest eternity: know, yesterday cannot be recalled, to-morrow cannot be be assured; to-day is only thine; which if thou procrastinate, thou losest; which lost, is lost for ever. One to-day, is worth two to-morrows.

Quarles' Enchiridion, chap. xcv, cent. 4.

Let the ground of all thy religious actions be obedience: examine not why it is commanded, but observe it because it is commanded. True obedience neither procrastinates nor questions.

Id, chap. xxix, cent. 4.

TO THE DEITY.

O Thou, the great all-moving cause,
Who in creation's self appears,
Who gave to countless systems laws,
And plac'd them in their glorious spheres;

Great Guardian of our mortal race,
Our first, our best, unchanging friend,
Who fill'st infinity of space,
And hast nor origin nor end;

Inspire us with a sacred awe
At every mention of Thy name,
A sense that Thine and nature's law
Are fix'd immutably the same.

So by the orb of day we'll learn,
So by the lesser lights be taught,
That Thou art wheresoe'er we turn
To every action, word, and thought.

J. J. W.

"THY WILL BE DONE."

Parent of Good, Almighty Power supreme,
Nature's unchanging, universal theme,
To Thee I bow at this appointed hour,
My heart's warm tide of gratitude to pour.
I ask Thee nought, for I have liv'd to see
Thine unask'd bounties shower'd around me free.
Father, I give, with grateful sense imbued,
All Thou requir'st, my warmest gratitude.
Thine omnipresence nature doth reveal;
Thy goodness, Lord, I daily see and feel:
And shall I dare, by self and av'rice taught,
Breathe Thee a prayer with plaint and murmur fraught?
No, while with ceaseless song the universe
Thy vast unchanging bounty shall rehearse,
This be my prayer,— my first, my only one,—
Father of Light and Life, "Thy will be done."

SOLILOQUY ON LIFE.

Oh, Earth! in maiden innocence,
Too early fled thy golden time!
Oh, Earth! Earth! Earth! for man's offence,
Doom'd to dishonour in thy prime!
Of how much glory then bereft;
Yet what a world of bliss was left!

The thorn, harsh emblem of the curse,
Puts forth a paradise of flowers;
Labour, man's punishment, is nurse
To halcyon joys at sunset hours.
Plague, famine, earthquake, want, disease,
Give birth to holiest charities.

And Death himself, with all the woes
That hasten, yet prolong his stroke,
Death brings with every pang repose,
With every sigh unbinds a yoke:
Yea, his cold sweats and moaning strife,
Wring out the bitterness of life.

Religion our Compass in the Voyage of Life.—Religion is our compass; the only instrument for directing and determining our course: and though it will not save the trouble of working the vessel, nor diminish the necessity of vigilance in guarding against rocks and shoals, yet it constantly points to that star, which by ascertaining our course ensures our safety.

WILBERFORCE'S PRACTICAL VIEW OF CHRISTIANITY.

A Practical View of the Prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians in the Higher and Middle Classes in this Country, contrasted with Real Christianity. By W. Wilberforce, Esq., Member of Parliament for the County of York. A new Edition, to which is prefixed the Life of the Author, including a succinct account of the Slave Trade, and its Abolition. 18mo. pp. 316, cloth. London, Wood and Son.

We sincerely rejoice in seeing this valuable work published in this neat manner, and at a price so unusually low, and give it our unqualified recommendation. The "Life" of Mr. Wilberforce we have read with unusual pleasure, and have no doubt of its being prized as an interesting appendage to the volume. Mr. Wilberforce's work embraces most of the grand peculiarities of the gospel, as held by most denominations of Protestant Christians; and it deserves a place in every family library. Mr. Wilson (the present Bishop of Calcutta) in his Essay on Mr. Wilberforce's treatise, gives it the following just character: "The design of the author was to rouse the nation, and especially the higher orders, to a just view of the subject of real Christianity. It is a manly, and yet conciliatory exposure of the false principles and defective practice of professed Christians, accompanied by a powerful exhibition of what true religion is, as it is delineated in the Bible, and displayed in the spirit and temper of sincere Christians. It is a contrast between Christianity lowered, misapprehended, obscured, falsified, by the prevailing doctrine and morals of the day; and Christianity as it came from heaven, as it remains in all its freshness in the Sacred Records, as it is loved and obeyed by those in every age, who, like the primitive Christians, or our Reformers of the sixteenth century, come out from the world, and live unto God by the faith of a crucified Saviour. It is a book of first principles, displaying the Christian religion as it ought to exist in the case of every Christian, and then contrasting this with the low and defective standard of the prevailing religion around us." "Love is stamped on every page."

INTEREST IN THE PERFECTIONS OF DEITY.

Omnipotence is our shield, unerring wisdom our guide, boundless goodness our present joy and future hope, infinite holiness and rectitude the example we should imitate according to our poor capacity, and a light to show us our own unworthiness; infinite majesty inspires us with awe and reverence, and infinite justice with a high sense of the importance of righteousness and obedience; omniscience and omnipresence strike us with terror when we do evil, and fill us with joy when we do well. God's natural and moral government of the world give peace and security to our mind, as it satisfies us that the Divine providence can and always will bring order out of confusion, and make every event conducive to our temporal or eternal welfare.

'Tis foolish in us to muse on vanity, when we have the love of God to think of: to let the mill grind chaff, when there is plenty of corn at hand.—Dr. Manton.

CHAPEL OF HENRY THE SEVENTH, WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

CHAPEL OF HENRY VII, WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

Westminster Abbey and Henry the Seventh's Chapel, are deservedly among the chief attractions of the metropolis to strangers visiting London.

Elegance and art have been so combined in the architecture and ornaments of the latter edifice, that an author of some note a few years ago expressed his sense of its beauty in these terms: "It is the admiration of the universe, such inimitable perfection appears in every part of the whole composure; which looks so far exceeding human excellence, that it appears knit together by the fingers of angels, pursuant to the direction of Omnipotence."

This "wonder of the world," as it may well be styled, is externally adorned with sixteen Gothic towers, beautifully ornamented with admirable ingenuity, and jutting from the building in different angles. It is situated to the east of the Abbey, to which it is so neatly joined, that at a superficial view it appears to be all one building. It is enlightened by a double range of windows, which throw the light into such a happy disposition, as at once to please the eye, and inspire reverence.

Having entered this beautiful sanctuary, the eye of the visitor will naturally look to the lofty ceiling, which is of stone, wrought with such astonishing variety of figures, as cannot be reached by any description. The stalls are of brown wainscot, with Gothic canopies, most beautifully carved, as are the seats, with strange devices, to which nothing in wood is now equal. The pavement is of black and white marble, done at the expense of Dr. Killigrew, once prebendary of the Abbey. The east view from the entrance presents the brass chapel and tomb of the royal founder; and round it, where the east end forms a semicircle, are the chapels of the dukes of Buckingham and Richmond. The side aisles were open to the nave at the east end, on each side the founder's tomb; and at the east end of the south aisle is the royal vault; and of the other, the monuments of the murdered princes. The walls, as well of the nave as of the south aisles, are wrought into the most curious figures imaginable, and contain one hundred and twenty large statues of patriarchs, saints, martyrs, and confessors, placed in niches, under which are angels supporting imperial crowns, besides innumerable small ones, all of them esteemed so curious, that the best masters have travelled from abroad to copy them. The windows, which are fourteen in the upper, and nineteen in the lower range, including the side aisles and portico, were formerly of painted or diapered glass, having in every pane a white rose, the badge of Lancaster, or an 𝕳, the initial letter of the founder's name, and portcullises, the badge of the Beauforts, crowned, of which a few only are now remaining. The roof is flattish, and is supported on arches between the nave and side aisles, which turn upon twelve stately Gothic pillars, curiously adorned with figures, fruitage, and foliage. The length of this chapel within, is ninety-nine feet, the breadth sixty-six, and the height fifty-four.

What is chiefly to be admired here, as well for antiquity as fine workmanship, is the magnificent tomb of Henry VII and Elizabeth his Queen, the last of the house of York who wore the English crown. This tomb stands in the body of the chapel, enclosed in a curious chantry of cast brass, most admirably designed and executed, and ornamented with statues, of which those only of St. George, St. James, St. Bartholomew, and St. Edward, are now remaining. Within it are the effigies of the royal pair, in their robes of state, lying close to one another, on a tomb of black marble, the head whereof is supported by a red dragon, the ensign of Cadwallader, the last king of the Britons, from whom King Henry VII was fond of tracing his descent, and the foot by an angel. There are likewise other devices, alluding to his family and alliances; such as portcullises, signifying his relation to the Beauforts by his mother's side; roses twisted and crowned, in memory of the union of the two royal houses of Lancaster and York; and at each end a crown in a bush, referring to the crown of Richard III found in a hawthorn, near Bosworth Field, where that famous battle was fought for a diadem, which turning in favour of Henry, his impatience was so great to be crowned, that he caused the ceremony to be performed on the spot, with that very crown his competitor had lost. There are six compartments, three on the north, and as many on the south side of its base. The first compartment, on the south side, contains the figures of the Virgin Mary with our Lord in her arms, and that of the archangel St. Michael. The figures in the scales, though now mutilated, were meant for personal representations of moral good and evil; the saint is weighing them in his balance; the good preponderates; but the devil, who is represented by the figure under his feet, is reaching, with one of his clawed feet, at the scale which contains the figure of evil, in order, by the addition of his own force, to render that the heaviest. The first figure in the second compartment is, doubtless, intended for St. John the Baptist, he having a book in his left hand, with an Agnus Dei impressed upon it. The other is the figure of St. John the Evangelist and the figure of the eagle.

"The first figure in the third compartment is intended for St. George; the other figure in the same compartment, from the pig's head visible near him, the frequent symbol by which he is denoted, intended for St. Anthony of Vienna.

"The first figure in the fourth compartment, north side, is meant for Mary Magdalen, supposing to hold the box of ointment. The other figure represents St. Barbara, who was the daughter of a pagan, and dwelt with her father in a certain tower. To this tower adjoined a garden, in which the father had determined to build a bath, with the necessary accommodation of rooms, and therein to make windows to the number of two only. Being to undertake a journey, he left his instructions with the artificers, which his daughter presumed to vary, by directing them, instead of two, to make three. Upon her father's return, he inquired into the reason of this deviation from his orders; and being told, that in allusion to the three persons of the Holy Trinity, his daughter had directed it, he found that she was become a convert to Christianity; and being exasperated thereat, stimulated the emperor to a persecution of the Christians, in which she became a martyr to the faith.

"The first figure in the fifth compartment is intended for St. Christopher, bearing our Saviour upon his shoulder. The other figure in this compartment is thought to be St. Anne.

"In the sixth and last compartment, the first figure is intended for King Edward the Confessor. The other figure is a Benedictine monk."

Piety, Penitence, and Superstition of Henry.

Sir James Mackintosh, in his excellent History of England, gives the following character of Henry the Seventh's Christianity: "His religion, as far as we are informed, never calmed an angry passion, nor withheld him from a profitable wrong. He seems to have shown it chiefly in the superstitious fears which haunted his death-bed, when he made a feeble attempt to make amends for irreparable rapine by restoring what he could no longer enjoy, and struggled to hurry through the formalities of a compromise with the justice of Heaven for his misdeeds."

Henry's "will" appears to have been drawn up by some of the most distinguished prelates of that age, a few days before his death; and the contents of that remarkable document justify the statement of Sir James; and the services which the dying monarch, by the advice of his royal chaplains, commanded to be used for the repose of his soul after death, will serve to exhibit the manners, customs, and superstitions of those times. They have been taken from a very rich volume now in the British Museum, and inserted by Malcolm in his "LONDINUM REDIVIVUM," with his observations.

"The first article binds every monk in the monastery to assist at high mass at the high altar, to pray for the king's prosperity and welfare during his life. Then follows the service, to be pronounced while the world shall last, at high mass, at the high altar, after the king's decease.

"These priests, after the king's decease, addressed the congregation thus: 'Sirs, I exhorte and moeve you specially and devoutly of your charitie to praye for the soule of the most christen Prince, Kyng Henry the 7th, late Kyng of Englonde, founder of thre daily masses, perpetually to be sayed at this altier, whosys body restesth here buried.' At a quarter of an hour before each mass, the great bell of the Abbey was tolled forty strokes. As this altar was intended only for a temporary purpose, it was removed on certain days of ceremony to the south aisle, facing the chapel of St. Benedict.

"On the 12th of February, annually, the hearse for the king, and his altar, were adorned with 100 tapers, each weighing twelve pounds, and nine feet in length; twenty-four almsmen were arranged round it with torches, twenty-four pounds in weight. After those were prepared, the bells began to toll, as for the anniversary of Richard the Second.

"A procession then commenced through the choir to the high altar, formed by the monks, prior, and abbot; the lord chancellor, lord treasurer, chief justice, master of the rolls, chief baron of the exchequer, and five other justices, together with the lord mayor, recorder, and sheriffs of London. The abbot then proceeded to the high altar, and began the mass of requiem, while the monks kneel before it. The officers of state kneeling before the hearse said the psalm De profundis, with the prayers belonging to the office.

"The hearse had four tapers, eleven feet in length, placed on the middle of each side (to burn perpetually), and thirty to be lighted only during the obit, mass, and even song. The sockets were set in crests of roses and portcullises; and the tapers never consumed lower than four feet, when they were replaced.

"We have little reason to wonder at his thus besieging heaven, after perusing the prelude to his will, which he made in March 31st, 1509:—'We saye at this tyme, as sithence the first yeres of discresonne we have been accustomid, theis wordes, Dne Ihu Xe, qui me ex nihilo creasti, fecisti, redemisti, et predestinasti ad hoc quod sum, tu scis quid de me facere vis; fac de me sdm voluntatem tuam cum misericordia[*]. Therefore doe of mee thy will; with grace, pitie, and mercy, most humbly and entirelie I beseeche thee. And thus unto the I bequeth, and into thy most mercifull handes my soule I committe. And howbeite I am a sinful creature, in sinne conceyved, in synne have lyved, knowing perfectlie that of my merites I cannot attaine to the lyfe everlastinge, but onlie by the merits of thy blessed passion, and of thy infinite mercy and grace; nathlesse, my moste mercyful Redeemer, Maker, and Saviour, I trust that, by the speciall grace and mercy of thy moste blessed mother, ever virgin, our ladie St. Mary, in whom, after thee, in this mortall lyfe hathe ever byne my moste singuler truste and confidence: to whom in all my necessities I have made my continuall refuge, and by whome I have hitherto in all my adversities ever hadd my speciall comforte and reliefe; will now in my most extreame neede, of her infinite pitie, take my soule into her handes, and it presente unto her most dere sonne; whereof sweetest ladie of mercie, verie mother and virgin, wel of pitie, and surest refuge of all needfull, most humblie, moste entirelie, and most hartile, I beseech the; and for my comforte in this behalfe, I trust also to the singuler meditacon and praiers of all the holie company of Heaven: that is to saye, angeles, archangeles, patriarks, profits, apostles, evangelistes, masters, confessours, and virgines; and especiallie to mine accustomed avours I calle and erie, St. Michael, St. John Baptist, St. John Evangelist, St. George, St. Anthony, St. Edwarde, St. Vincent, St. Anne, St. Mary Magdalen, and St. Barbara; humblie beseechinge not onlie at the hower of death soe to aide, socore, and defend me, that the aunciente and gostlie ennemye, nor non other evell or dampnable sperete, have no power to envade me, nor with his terribleness to anoy me,' &c."

FUNERAL OF HENRY VII.

Henry gave particular directions for his funeral, charging his executors to avoid "'dampnable pompe, and outrageous superfluities;' a piece of advice little consistent with other parts of his will, which indicate the excessive grandeur of his establishment, and from which we further learn, that the high altar, dedicated to our lady, was to be adorned with the large image of her in his possession; a cross plated, with gold and silver gilt candlesticks; the vestments for the priests officiating were to be of gold tissue; and on solemn feasts was placed a fragment of the real cross, set in gold, and resplendent in jewels, with golden and silver chalices, cruets, candlesticks, embroidered altar cloths, vestments, &c.

"Lest his soul might not rest in peace, although every precaution certainly was taken by him that poor sinner could take, he requested 10,000 masses should be said in the monastery, London, for its repose; 1,500 in honour of the Trinity; 2,500 in honour of the five wounds of the Lord Jesus Christ; 2,500 to the five joys of our Lady; 450 to the nine orders of angels; 150 to the honour of the patriarchs; 600 to the twelve apostles; and 2,300 to the honour of all saints; and all those to be sung in a little month after his decease.

"He directed that a statue of himself kneeling, three feet in height from the knees, should be carved in wood, representing him in armour, with a sword and spurs, and holding the crown of Richard III, won by him at Bosworth Field.

"This figure was to be plated with fine gold, and enamelled with his arms, to be placed on a table of silver-gilt, on the shrine of Edward the Confessor, and dedicated to God and the Virgin.

"Henry died on the 22d of April, and on the 9th of May, 1509, his body was placed in a chariot, covered with black cloth of gold, which was drawn by five spirited horses, whose trappings were of black velvet, adorned with quishions of gold. The effigies of his majesty lay upon the corpse, dressed in his regal habiliments. The carriage had, suspended on it, banners of arms, titles, and pedigrees. A number of prelates preceded the body, who were followed by the deceased king's servants; after it were nine mourners; 600 men bearing torches surrounded the chariot.

[*] O Lord Jesus Christ, who hast created me from nothing, who hast made, redeemed, and predestinated me to what I am, thou knowest what thou wilt do with me, deal with me in mercy according to thy will.

"The procession was met in St. George's Fields by all the priests and clergy of London and its neighbourhood, and at London Bridge by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council, in black. To render this awful scene sublimely grand, the way was lined with children, who held burning tapers; those, with the flashes of great torches, whose red rays darting in every direction upon the glittering objects, and embroidered copes, showing the solemn pace, uplifted eyes, and mournful countenances, must have formed a noble picture. The slow monotonous notes of the chant, mixed with the sonorous tones of the great bells, were not less grateful to the ear. When the body had arrived at St. Paul's, which was superbly illuminated, it was taken from the chariot, and carried to the choir, where it was placed beneath a hearse, arrayed with all the accompaniments of death. A solemn mass and dirge were then sung, and a sermon preached by the Bishop of Rochester. It rested all night in the church. On the following day the procession recommenced in the same manner, except that Sir Edward Howard rode before on a fine charger, clothed with drapery, on which was the king's arms.

"We will now suppose him removed by six lords from his chariot to the hearse prepared for him, formed by nine pillars set full of burning tapers, inclosed by a double railing; view him placed under it, and his effigies on a rich pall of gold close to him; the nine mourners, near them knights bearing banners of saints, and surrounded by officers of arms. The prelates, abbot, prior and convent, and priests, in measured paces silently taking their places; when, breaking through the awful pause, Garter, king at arms, cried with an audible voice, 'For the soul of the noble Prince King Henry the Seventh, late king of this realm.' A deep peal from the organ and choir answers in a chant of placebo and the dirge; the sounds die away, and with them the whole assembly retires."

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. VII.—THE HOLINESS OF GOD.

III. God's manifestations of himself will also be found to establish the doctrine now attempted to be illustrated: but as space will not permit me to refer to all these wondrous displays that are recorded, I must content myself with selecting one, though at the same time it will be convenient to mark some of the passages for the perusal of those who are disposed fully to examine the subject: Exod. xix; Job xl, xlii; Isa. vi; Ezek. i; and the various visions of Daniel, ch. vii. The one which I shall select is from Isaiah, wherein the prophet describes the appearance of the Lord, who gave him his commission to preach to the stiff-necked Israelites. The personages said to surround the throne of God, are the very highest in the scale of created beings, the dominions and principalities of heaven, of whose lofty and exalted nature we know but little, save only, that they are far superior to ourselves: and yet, great and mighty as they are, they stand before the throne of Jehovah, veiling their faces from the beams of uncreated glory, too bright for the seraphim themselves to endure; but they are not mute spectators of the glorious scene, their time is occupied in chanting the praises of their Maker; and the language they employ is of the most fervent and devout description, ascribing to Him that sitteth on the throne the marvellous appellation, "Holy! Holy! Holy!" The effect of these august sounds is commensurate with their greatness, for the posts of the door shake, the ponderous and magnificent pillars of brass tremble as a leaf before the blast of the desert, and the whole temple is involved in that cloud of smoke, wherein God is said to make his pavilion. To which of the deities of Greece and Rome shall we refer for similar accounts of their manifestation? What human mind ever conceived such surpassing splendour? Who does not feel ready to join in the shout of those spotless beings who surround the Almighty's throne?

IV. God's requirements of his servants and people, show his holiness. The revelation which he has written does not consist merely in lofty descriptions, and wondrous manifestations of his greatness: oh! no, it appeals to the heart and life of all who profess to believe in it, and is throughout full of entreaties to cease to do evil, and to learn to do well. I am the more anxious to enforce this on the attention of our readers, as men of the present day are apt to insinuate that Christianity is a cloke for licentiousness. The only effectual reply to this unfounded slander is "to live it down."

The thoughts, which men are disposed to regard as sacred to themselves, come under the scrutiny of the Gospel, and are regarded by him who is to be the future Judge of mankind in the light of actions worthy of reward and punishment. Let therefore those who imagine that there can be no harm in indulging sinful thoughts, provided they never practise them, beware of the wickedness and sorrow they are entailing on themselves. The habit is one of a most pernicious character, and like all other sinful dispositions, when unchecked grows with amazing rapidity. And for their caution I would advise them to remember, that all those actions, the commission of which has excited the horror and amazement of mankind, have originated in that secret recess of thought which is hidden from every human eye. Cleanse then, O God, the thoughts of our heart, by the inspiration of thy Holy Spirit.

Our words also must be regulated with a strict regard to the requirements of Christianity. That religion which breathes nothing but love, is perfectly inconsistent with the slander and detraction that is daily going on in the world. Let it then be impressed on the remembrance of all, that evil-speaking, lying, and slandering, are expressly prohibited; that henceforth they are bound to keep their mouth as it were with a bridle; and that the language of insult, of falsehood, of blasphemy, or folly, is an open violation of His commands with whom we have to do.

Our actions likewise are subjected to the same standard. So that whatever be the scene of life in which we are placed, whatever may be the duties that are exacted of us, we must ever bear in mind our responsibility to a higher tribunal than any which the princes of this world can establish. We have before our eyes a pattern of purity and excellence, a resemblance to which we are required to cultivate. Whatever therefore may be our sphere of action, there let this virtue shine; and while we thus grow in grace and the knowledge of Christ Jesus, we shall be reading to the world a lesson which the scoff of ridicule can neither gainsay nor deny: "That the grace of God which bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching them to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world."

V. The society of heaven, proves the Divine holiness. The dwelling place of God is ever represented as pure, spotless, and holy. The ideas which men form of heaven are altogether imperfect, if they do not make it a fundamental principle, that sin is excluded from its regions for ever. The declarations of Scripture on this point are most explicit, and are so well known to all, that illustration would be unnecessary. What is it, Christian, which cheers thee in thy rugged path, and urges thee to renewed exertions and unceasing diligence? Is it not the anticipation of that glorious day when corruption shall put on incorruption, and mortal be clothed in immortality? Yon fair world which woos thee persuasingly to its coasts, is peopled with a race of beings whose cheeks are never furrowed by anxiety and care, and who have no inward struggles with sin, and strivings with temptation. And dost thou not feel the greatest satisfaction in reflecting, that thy Saviour, who has so long borne with thy infirmities and supported thy fainting virtue, will there appear in his spotless character, and that thou shalt be enabled to do him willing service? Oh! where is the heaven of idolatry? What shall now be said of the licentious paradise of the great prophet of Ishmael's tribe, whose religion bears something like that contrast to the doctrines of the Saviour, which the son of the bondwoman did to the son of the free? All these are filled with licentiousness and folly; but the heaven to which we hasten is an abiding city, where God will reign over his people in righteousness.

VI. The society of hell, illustrates the holiness of God. That place of outer darkness bears a horrible contrast to the scenes above described. There sits, scowling with unsatisfied revenge and boundless cruelty, the prince of darkness, and around him are gathered the wretched spirits of those whom he has deluded and misled. There the murderer thirsts for blood, or groans for ever in remembering the crimes wherewith he stained the theatre of earth: thieves, robbers, adulterers, false witnesses, are mingled there in sad copartnership, and vent their quenchless fury in most awful execrations against the author of their mischief, and their insulted God. Deeply there does the negligent man bewail those false and worthless joys which drew him from the contemplation of religion: and horrible is the experience of the formalist, that it is not the uttering or the speaking of certain words, which constitute the worship of the Almighty. But my heart sickens at the awful scene which imagination places before me, and I draw a veil over its horrible blackness: deducing from it, however, the strongest of all arguments in favour of the holiness of God.

Let a review of all that has been thus exhibited make a deep impression on the hearts of all. Let us be careful how we read with inattention; and let us resolve henceforth to aim at more extensive holiness and piety. Let us choose the Saviour for our guide through the scenes and temptations of life, and while around us we behold the unthinking and the gay, let us remember, that yet a few days, and the grave shall have closed on all the sons of revelry; yet a little while, and the banquetting room shall resound no more with the voice of mirth and laughter, while the solemn words of God himself attest the awful fact, "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord."

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XL.

Religion.

WITH regard to the works of the Creator, it appears to me to be important to teach, that creation, as far as it relates to the existing scene of it, was the organization of pre-existent matter into the various objects which constitute the furniture of the visible universe; that it was suggested in all its varieties by the intellect of the Supreme; that these suggestions were carried into effect through the agency of "the Word, who was in the beginning with God, and was with God, and was God," who gave being to organized forms; and that the Holy Spirit of God endued with life such of them as are gifted with vitality: that the origin of the creation therefore is God; and the agents in it, the Word, who afterwards took our nature, and dwelt in the world, and the Holy Spirit.

Teach your child the true doctrine of the Scriptures respecting the heavens; namely, the first heaven, comprising the atmosphere, "above" which is spread "the firmament of waters;" then the starry heavens; and highest of all the residence of the Deity, the metropolis of the universe, whence angels are commissioned in their ministry, and where innumerable happy beings exult in the vision of God.

It will be important that you should clearly teach the doctrine of the Scriptures respecting the highest orders of intelligence, the gradations into which they are divided, the amazing extent of their attributes, and the grandeur of their employments. Avoid as much as possible all use of pictures, &c. for the illustration of this or of any other topic of Revelation. Thus you will avoid the pernicious mischief of lowering the angelic character from that of glorious beings, rising in the scale of existence from man up towards the Deity, and presiding over occupations which require attributes inconceivable by man in the vast empire of immensity.

Without proper ideas of the angelic orders, the system of Christianity is scarcely intelligible; and the extent of it as a mere system can only be imperfectly comprehended. Without these proper ideas, the system will appear simply as a transaction confined to the present globe; but under their influence it will be seen as having had in view every order of beings throughout the universe; and the church of God, instead of seeming intended merely to instruct and save mankind, will be thenceforth viewed as a supreme manifestation of the immensely variegated wisdom of God to principalities and powers.

With regard to the purposes proposed in creation, it will be proper to teach to your child that they were, the manifestation of the existence and attributes of God to innumerable orders of rational creatures, and to erect an arena upon which the amazing event of the redemption, and the moral constitution derived from it, might be exhibited to every order of being.

With regard to the world in which we live, I could wish you to avoid the common erroneous representations of its minuteness and insignificance, by which means a sceptical sentiment may be induced in his mind, and which may incapacitate him for the perception of those glorious purposes which the Scriptures represent as yet to be accomplished in its regions.

With regard to man, it will be ever proper to speak of him as the Scriptures do, in his threefold composition of body, soul, and spirit; which doctrine corresponds to the latest and best views of the physiologists; and with which all the statements of the Scriptures harmonize. Teach him then to restrict the term body to the material vehicle, the spirit to the animal life, and the soul to the intellectual nature. This threefold composition is taught and recognized in all the varied details of the Holy Scriptures.

You will above all things furnish him from the Scriptures with the various proofs that the soul exists after the body is dead, in a state of consciousness, and capability of pleasure and of pain.

It is highly important that you should thoroughly acquaint him with the great purposes for which man was created; namely, to become prepared by discipline and experience in this life, for the occupations and pleasures designed for him in the life to come.

The doctrine of the Divine providence should, I think, be stated to him as general; as consisting of the administration of those laws by which the universe is regulated, while he should be also taught, that in the instance of every person who pleases God, that person is, through the ministration of angels, placed under a system of minute and constant superintendance.

In reference to fallen spirits, he should be taught, that, under circumstances which are at present unknown, some individuals of perhaps every order of the angelic world, have become sinful, miserable, and malignant; and that as there is an archangel, so there is also a prince of the unhappy portion of angelic intelligences. Teach him, however, that these spirits are demons, who are never represented as tempting to sin, but which occupation is ascribed to Satan only, and who, by the greatness of his faculties, is, as far as the globe is concerned, literally omniscient.

It is of the greatest importance that he should be instructed, that Satan cannot compel, though he may persuade; that by prayer to God for help against his crafts and assaults, in the name of Jesus Christ, it will be bestowed through the influences of the Holy Spirit; and that, next to the guidance of the Holy Spirit, our safety depends upon avoiding all circumstances tending to suggest the thought of sin, and upon repressing the first rise of evil thoughts.

You will have occasion to read with him the account of the introduction of evil through means of the moral probation and apostacy of man. Be careful to read all this and to represent it to your child in its true light. Do not strain the statements of the Scripture upon this or any other topic. The great point to be considered is as often what the Scriptures do not say as what they do. Follow the plain statements of The Book, wherever they may lead you, utterly disregarding all systems of human origin, by whatever good or learned men invented.

You will probably have reason to perceive that our first parents were the victims of the craft and malignity of a superior spirit; that their misery was of such a character, therefore, as admitted of the exercise of mercy towards them; and that the whole event was permitted with a view to the development of new attributes, and the extent of the Divine compassion, which would otherwise have remained for ever unknown.

You will have reason to teach your child, that the curse consisted in the doom to an intenser degree of labour, and bodily death; that every descendant of Adam was fairly tried in his first representatives, and according to the result was equitably constituted a sinner. You will also have occasion to see, that the moral weakness of man results from the varied consequences of his hard labour and mortality, transmitted to the enfeebled constitution of all; that evil circumstances develope the capacity of depravity; and that depravity consists in evil habits.

You will perhaps perceive, that though all men are by nature thus weakened, and could not of themselves obey the will of God, yet that there is a vast diversity of natural disposition among us, one man being naturally disposed, through a vast variety of circumstances, to one sin, and another to another. You will have abundant reason to teach that all men are depraved, though you will not fall into the error of teaching that all are equally depraved; and your whole object in the education of your child will be, that he may avoid becoming so as much as possible.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ABRAHAM.

Abraham's Children.

THE promise of a numerous posterity was repeatedly made to the "father of the faithful," and "Abraham believed on the LORD." But before he was honoured to become a father, he had attained the age of eighty-five, and his beloved wife was only ten years younger than himself.

The first-born son of Abraham was by Hagar, the Egyptian maid-servant of Sarah. Hagar conceived: but being thus favoured, she despised and insulted her indulgent mistress, who, in return, treated her with harshness, and she fled from her presence into the wilderness. The God of Abraham beheld her in mercy. He gave her reproof, directed her to return, and charged her to submit to the will of her mistress, promising her that she should bear a son; and added, "Thou shalt call his name Ishmael; because the LORD hath heard thy affliction." It was also foretold respecting her son Ishmael, "He will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him: and he shall dwell in the presence of his brethren." Gen. xvi, 10, 12.

Abraham inculcated upon Ishmael the truths and ordinances of God: but it seems little regard was paid by him to the "things of the Spirit of God." At the weaning of Isaac, "Abraham made a great feast:" but while the family were rejoicing in Isaac, as the heir of promise, Ishmael turned it into ridicule, scoffing at their pious joy, and sneered at the covenant of mercy. He held Isaac in derision, and his mother appears to have encouraged his persecuting spirit. On this account, they were expelled the house of Abraham, at the suggestion of Sarah. The measure was grievous to the benevolent soul of the patriarch, and he hesitated to comply; but the thing was of the LORD, and he having determined the matter, it was executed under the Divine command.

His mother took him a wife from Egypt; and the promise of God to Abraham was fulfilled in Ishmael. He was honoured with a large family: his sons were "twelve princes according to their nations." The singular prediction delivered to his mother has been remarkably accomplished in his descendants. They were heads of Arab tribes. The people called Ishmaelites, Hagarenes, Nabatheans, Itureans, Saracens, and Wahabees, are the posterity of Ishmael, the son of Abraham. They have been in all ages a fierce and warlike people: the most powerful nations have vainly attempted to bring them into subjection; and they still subsist in Arabia, living monuments of the truth and inspiration of the Christian Scriptures.

Isaac was, in an exalted sense, a child of promise, born when his father was a hundred years old, and his mother ninety. The soul of the patriarch was bound up in the life of his son Isaac, and by the grace of God, he proved worthy of such a father as Abraham. His holy life and excellent character require a distinct consideration.

But besides Ishmael and Isaac, Abraham had several other children. After the death of Sarah, as it is observed by the inspired historian, "Then again Abraham took a wife, and her name was Keturah." By her the patriarch had six sons, of whom, however, the sacred historian gives only very brief notices, nothing being recorded of their characters or habits of life. During his life-time Abraham gave them handsome portions for their comfortable settlement in life, and dismissed them to choose convenient habitations in the world; but the chief part of his property he reserved for his son Isaac, the heir of the Divine promise.

SACRED SEALS, AND MOTTOS OF THE ENGLISH NOBILITY.

Signets, seals, and mottos, have been common from a very high antiquity. Tribal distinctions, it appears, were used in the form of signets and seals, even in the time of the patriarch Jacob: for Judah's signet is mentioned in Gen. xxxviii, 19. The Hebrew word here rendered signet, denotes a ring-seal, with which impressions were made to ascertain property; and from Jeremiah xxii, 24, it seems they were worn on the hand, though it might also be suspended from the neck by a riband, as it is still worn by the Arabs. The bracelets of Judah, appear to have been ornamental bandages worn round the wrists, to which the signet was suspended.

Signets were engraven with names and devices: and hence Moses says, the onyx stones of memorial placed on the shoulders of the ephod worn by the priests, were "graven, as signets are graven, with the names of the children of Israel," Exod. xxxix, 6. The twelve precious gems in the sacred breast-plate for the high-priest, were engraven with the names of the children of Israel, "twelve, according to their names, like the engravings of a signet, every one with his name, according to the twelve tribes." Ver. 14; see ver. 30.

Judah's signet is the earliest mentioned instance of a seal, as being the property of the wearer, known by an appropriate inscription. This was about the year 1730 before the advent of Christ, so that writing and engraving signets have been in existence 3563 years, about 250 years before Moses wrote the book of Genesis: but we cannot penetrate the height of its antiquity, and these arts probably might exist before the deluge.

What inscriptions the signets contained we find intimated in the passages of Scripture referred to. Among the representations of seals collected by Mr. Taylor, is one from the traveller Tavernier, and which is that of the prime minister of some Oriental prince. The seal, in the original, is set on the back of the patent, no man daring to affix his seal on the same side as that on which the king's is placed; and this, in the judgment of Mr. Taylor, gives a correct illustration of the apostle's expression, 2 Tim. ii, 19, "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal (or motto), The Lord knoweth them that are his; and, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." The motto around the seal on the side of the patent enclosed and not visible to us is this inscription, "The Lord knoweth them that are his:" but on the open and exposed side of the patent divine is the counter inscription, to every one conspicuous, "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity."

Oriental seal inscriptions consisted not only of the initials of the owners' names; they contained, especially when they belonged to a person of consequence, a description of his office, residence, &c. And, as a long line of ancestry is reckoned to increase the honour of an individual, this, in the East, is displayed on some of their seals with a parade, which we should call ostentation or affectation. Some of them have additions, which seldom occupy our cypher seals; such as inscriptions, mottos, sentences, apophthegms of moral wisdom, and both political and pious sentiments, which correspond in some measure with the mottos of our coats of arms, but extended to such lengths as custom among us forbids. The mottos of the king of Great Britain, the nobility, and the gentry, are generally short: but some of them contain sentiments of the noblest character, worthy not only of the true patriot, but of the devoted Christian. For the edification of our readers we shall give a selection of the mottos of our nobles, with the dates of their creation.

MRS. H. MORE'S APPEAL TO THE BORDERERS.

"The Borderers," as ingeniously described by Mrs. Hannah More, consist of a large class of undecided professors of religion, who labour to keep on good terms with both the pious and the gay. I was lately very much struck with her judicious appeal to them, in her valuable work, and therefore forward it for the readers of the Christian's Penny Magazine.

Aletheia.

"Be assured, that whatever serves to keep the heart from God, is one and the same spirit of irreligion, whether it appear in the shape of coarse vice, or whether it is softened by the smoothness of decorum, and the blandishments of polished life. We are far from comparing them together, as if they were equally injurious to society, or equally offensive to decency; but we must compare them together as equally drawing away the heart from the worship and the love of God. Courteousness, which is unaccompanied by principle, will stand the most courteous in no stead, with Him who is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart.

"Some of these well-bred persons, who exercise this large and liberal candour towards practical offences, and treat with tenderness certain vices, not thought disreputable by the world, and who even put a favourable construction on things very unjustifiable in the sight of God, lose all their kindness, put no favourable interpretation when sound religion is in question. They are, indeed, too discreet to reprobate it under its own proper name, but the ready appellation of enthusiasm presents itself—is always at hand, to vindicate the hastiest judgment, and the most contemptuous construction.

"But though we think far better things of you whom we are addressing, yet may you not, in this society, be tempted to disavow, or at least to conceal, even the measure of piety you actually have, for fear of exciting that dreaded suspicion of 'being righteous overmuch?' May not this fear, strengthened by this society, keep you back till your pious tendencies, by being suppressed, may gradually come to be extinguished?

"We are ready to acknowledge, and to love, all that is amiable in you; but we must not forget, that the fairest and most brilliant creature, the most engaging manners, and the most accomplished mind, stands in the same need of repentance, forsaking of sin, redemption by the Son of God, and renovation by His Spirit, as the least attractive. The more engaging the manners, and the more interesting the acquirements, the more is it to be lamented, that those very attractions, by your complacency in them, may have stood between you and heaven; may, by your resting in them, have been the cause of your not pressing towards the mark for the prize of your high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

"Bear then in mind, that you may be pleasing to others, while you have an unsanctified heart; that politeness, though it may put on the appearance of humility, is but a poor imitation of that prime grace; that good-breeding, though the beautiful decoration of a pious mind, is but a wretched substitute for the want of it.

"Be assured, however, at the same time, that true religion will in no wise diminish your natural or acquired graces; so far from it, those graces will be more estimable; they will be even more admired, when they are known not to be the best things you have. When you set less value on them yourself, they will be more pleasing to others; who, though they will not estimate them above their worth, will not depreciate them below it.

"We are persuaded that you are too reasonable to expect that Christianity will change its character, or lower its requirements, or make the strait gate wider, or the narrow way broader, or hold out false colours, in order to induce you to embrace it. It is not that easy and superficial thing which some suppose, as requiring little more than a ceremonious attendance on its forms, and a freedom from the gross violation of its commands. This may be nominal, but it is not saving Christianity. It is not that spiritual, yet practical religion, for which the Son of God endured the cross, that he might establish it in the hearts of his followers,—which he is pleading with his Heavenly Father to establish in your heart. He did not suffer that his children might be excused from self-denial; nor that, because he was holy, they might be negligent. He suffered, that 'the women that are at ease might rise up; that the careless daughters might hear his voice, and give ear unto his word.'"

ON THE IMPROVEMENT OF SOCIETY BY THE DIFFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE;

Or, an Illustration of the Advantages which would result from a more general Dissemination of Rational and Scientific Information among all Ranks. Illustrated with Engravings. By Thomas Dick, LL.D. author of the Christian Philosopher, &c. &c. Small 8vo. boards, pp. 544. Edinburgh, Waugh & Innes.

Dr. Dick is extensively known by his admirable and popular works. His "Christian Philosopher," especially, has contributed in no small degree to the "improvement of society by the diffusion of knowledge." Science and religion have found in him an able advocate; and his various treatises are happily adapted to excite in the youthful mind a thirst after that knowledge, which, while it enlarges and ennobles the soul, prepares it for fellowship with God even on earth, and qualifies it for a glorious immortality. Without extending our observations, we shall give a few extracts from this truly interesting volume.

"Every species of rational information has a tendency to produce pleasing emotions. There is a certain gratification in becoming acquainted with objects and operations of which we were formerly ignorant; and that too, altogether independent of the practical tendency of such knowledge, of the advantages we may expect to reap from it, or the sensitive enjoyments with which it may be accompanied. A taste for knowledge, a capacity to acquire it, and a pleasure accompanying its acquisition, form a part of the constitution of every mind. The Creator has implanted in the human mind a principle of curiosity, and annexed a pleasure to its gratification, to excite us to the investigation of the wonders of creation he has presented before us, to lead us to just conceptions of his infinite perfections, and of the relation in which we stand to him as subjects of his government. We all know with what a lively interest most persons peruse novels and romances, where hair-breadth escapes, mysterious incidents, and tales of wonder, are depicted with all the force and beauty of language. But the scenes detailed in such writings produce only a momentary enjoyment. Being retraced as only the fictions of a lively imagination, they pass away like a dream or a vision of the night, leaving the understanding bewildered, and destitute of any solid improvement. In order to improve the intellectual faculties while we gratify the principle of curiosity, it is only requisite that we direct the attention to facts instead of fictions; and when the real scenes of the universe are presented in an interesting aspect, they are calculated to produce emotions of wonder and delight even superior to those excited by the most highly-wrought tales of fiction and romance." P 122, 123.

"In the universe we find all things constructed and arranged on the plan of boundless and universal variety. In the animal kingdom there have been actually ascertained about sixty thousand different species of living creatures. There are about 600 species of mammalia, or animals that suckle their young, most of which are quadrupeds; 4,000 species of birds; 3,000 species of fishes; 700 species of reptiles; and 41,000 species of insects. Besides these, there are about 3,000 species of shell-fish, and perhaps not less than 80,000 or 100,000 species of animalcules, invisible to the naked eye; and new species are daily discovering, in consequence of the zeal and industry of the lovers of natural history. As the system of animated nature has never been thoroughly explored, we might safely reckon the number of species of animals of all kinds, as amounting to at least three hundred thousand!

"Now it is a fact, that, from the elephant to the mite, from the whale to the oyster, and from the eagle to the gnat or the microscopic animalcula, no animal can subsist without nourishment. Every species, too, requires a different kind of food. Some live on grass, some on shrubs, some on flowers, and some on trees. Some feed only on the roots of vegetables, some on the stalk, some on the leaves, some on the fruit, some on the seed, some on the whole plant; some prefer one species of grass, some another. Linnæus has remarked, the cow eats 276 species of plants and rejects 218; the goat eats 449 and rejects 126; the sheep eats 387 and rejects 141; the horse eats 262 and rejects 212; and the hog, more nice in its taste than any of these, eats but 72 plants and rejects all the rest. Yet, such is the unbounded munificence of the Creator, that all these countless myriads of sentient beings are amply provided for and nourished by his bounty." P. 254—257.

THE CATHEDRAL OF NOTRE DAME, PARIS.

RELIGION IN FRANCE.

PERY, though a gross corruption of Christianity, has t noble monuments of its worldly grandeur in every untry in which it prevailed. England contains many ost splendid evidences of the powerful influence which possessed over the public mind, and of the architec- ral skill which it encouraged and rewarded, in the tely cathedrals which adorn our cities.

France, in common with the other countries of rope, possesses many sumptuous edifices, which pro- im the long-continued power and wealth of the mish priesthood. Among its most celebrated temples st be ranked the cathedral of Notre Dame, or Our dy, at Paris, dedicated to the Virgin Mary. It was built originally in the form of a cross; and is said to have been founded by King Childeric III.

Dr. Mosheim, the ecclesiastical historian, remarks concerning this devoted servant of the papacy, "We see, in the annals of the French nation, the following shocking instance of the enormous power that was, at this time, vested in the Roman pontiff. Pepin, who was mayor of the palace to Childeric III, and who, in the exercise of that high office, was possessed, in reality, of the royal authority, not contented with this, aspired to the titles and honours of majesty, and formed the design of dethroning his sovereign. For this purpose, the states of the realm were assembled by Pepin, A. D. 751; and though they were devoted to the interests of this ambitious usurper, they gave it as their opinion, that the bishop of Rome was previously to be consulted, whether the execution of such a purpose was lawful or not. In consequence of this, ambassadors were sent by Pepin to Zachary, the reigning pontiff, with the following question: Whether the divine law did not permit a valiant and warlike people to dethrone a pusillanimous and indolent monarch, who was incapable of discharging any of the functions of royalty; and to substitute in his place one more worthy to rule, and who had already rendered most important services to the state? The situation of Zachary, who stood much in need of the succours of Pepin against the Greeks and Lombards, rendered his answer such as the usurper desired. And when this favourable decision of the Roman oracle was published in France, the unhappy Childeric was stripped of his royalty without the least opposition; and Pepin, without the smallest resistance from any quarter, stepped into the throne of his master and his sovereign. Let the abettors of the papal authority see how they can justify in Christ's pretended vicegerent upon earth, a decision which is so glaringly repugnant to the laws and precepts of the divine Saviour. This decision was solemnly confirmed by Stephen II, the successor of Zachary, who undertook a journey into France, in the year 754, in order to solicit assistance against the Lombards: and who, at the same time, dissolved the obligation of the oath of fidelity and allegiance which Pepin had sworn to Childeric, and violated by his usurpation, in the year 751. And to render his title to the crown as sacred as possible, Stephen anointed and crowned him, with his wife and two sons, for the second time!"

Gibbon states, "Zachary pronounced, that the unfortunate Childeric, a victim of the public safety, should be degraded, shaved, and confined in a monastery for the remainder of his days!"

Childeric's cathedral was taken down, and the present structure was commenced in 1163, in the reign of Louis VII. Pope Alexander III, then a fugitive in France, laid the first stone, Maurice de Sully being then bishop of Paris. Such zeal influenced those who prosecuted the work, that the high altar was consecrated in 1182; and in 1186, near the steps of it, was interred, Geoffry, duke of Brittany, son of Henry II, king of England. Two centuries more, however, elapsed before this cathedral was completed. The nave and west front, with its lofty and massive towers, are supposed to have been completed about the year 1223. The south portal was commenced in 1257, and that on the north not till about the year 1313. Some additions were made as late as the year 1447, by Charles VII.

The west or principal front of Notre Dame cathedral, with its towers and marygold window, is remarkable, not only for its general effect, but for its elegant simplicity, bold character of outline, and its uniformity of design. It may be described as being divided into four compartments, the lowermost having for its centre the principal entrance porch: on each side is a similar one, but smaller. They open with high pointed arches, and form deep recesses, gradually contracting to the doors, which are extremely beautiful, being richly decorated with alto-relievos. Above the door of the middle porch, there are fine sculptures representing the general judgment: within the porch to the left of the spectator, are various subjects from the New Testament, in sculpture, and on the right are figures of the prophets, evangelists, and saints: but the polite monsters of the French Revolution, vented their impious fury against the emblems of religion, so as even to decapitate these beautiful stones! "The Gallery of the Kings," is immediately above the porches: and is so called from its having been adorned with the statues of twenty-eight of the royal benefactors of the cathedral, commencing with Childeric, and closing with Philip Augustus. Infidel rage destroyed them in 1793, leaving not a vestige remaining. Above this gallery is the centre and splendid marygold window, 43 feet in diameter, still retaining some of the richly-stained glass of the thirteenth century. The towers rise about 221 feet above the casement; and the width of the façade is about 138 feet. The extreme exterior length of Notre Dame is about 449 feet, and its greatest width about 162 feet.

Popery, with its usurpations, having oppressed France, in common with every other country in which it prevailed, and its superstitions having insulted reason, infidelity became universal in that populous country, and, other causes concurring, the consequence was the dreadful Revolution. Roman catholicism suffered a total eclipse in France, and infidelity, in every hideous form, became the fashion of the day. "It may be observed, however, that the clergy hastened their own destruction, by their avarice and imprudent selfishness. It was their obstinacy, together with that of the nobles and magistrates, that ultimately compelled the king to convoke the states-general in 1789, where the democratic party being equal in number, and superior in popular influence to both the clergy and the nobles, carried every thing their own way, and soon annihilated king, nobles, and clergy." The Bible being almost altogether unknown to the nation, scarcely any one understood genuine Christianity.

"Under the republican government, religion, as a national establishment, was formally abolished; the wealth and landed property of the clergy were seized and sold; and even the scanty pittance, allowed them by the state in lieu of their former princely revenue, was withdrawn; and the enthusiasm of infidelity, for a time, persecuted religion in France with all the bitterness and all the cruelty that was ever exercised by the most intolerant fanaticism. In the mystery of Providence, the persecuting catholic clergy were doomed to suffer all those woes which their predecessors had inflicted upon the French Protestants and their brethren the Jansenists in former reigns, and to drink deep in the cup of judgment. Infidelity throned in power, wielded the sword of vengeance with dreadful efficacy against the Romish priests, who were butchered by hundreds. At Nantz no less than 360 priests were shot, and 460 drowned in the Loire: 292 priests were massacred during the bloody days of the 10th of August and 2d of September 1792; and 1,135 priests were guillotined under the government of the National Convention, from the 20th of September 1792, till the end of 1795; besides vast numbers who perished in different ways throughout France, as the infidel republicans hunted them like wild beasts up and down the country. The number of emigrant clergy till the end of 1795, amounted to 28,724, and many more emigrated afterwards.

"Scriptural religion had been persecuted and destroyed by the priesthood; and nothing better than the corrupt and superstitious ceremonies of popery being known to the people, the infuriated infidel rulers determined on the extermination of these, as Christianity. In order to obliterate every trace of Christianity, and every sense of religion, the decemvirs, as Robespierre, Carnot, and their colleagues, were called, abolished the old calendar, and employed men of science to make a new one. By this, each month was divided into three decades of ten days each, the Christian Sabbath was abolished, and the tenth day of every decade was fixed as a day of rest; evidently intending by this new political institution, to supersede the worship and ceremonies of that religion which they now wished to eradicate. But reflecting how prone the multitude are to superstition, they consecrated Reason as an object of worship: a festival was celebrated in honour of her in the cathedral, where she was personated by a woman, Madame Desmoulines, who was afterwards guillotined."

Most of our readers, it is probable, are unacquainted with the outrageous and shameless impiety, which attended the installation of this new divinity; and as it is without a parallel or precedent in the annals of mankind, we shall give a short account of the ceremonies observed on that occasion.

"The section of the Sans Culottes, declared at the bar of the Convention, Nov. 10, 1793, that they would no longer have priests among them, and that they required the total suppression of all salaries paid to the ministers of religious worship. The petition was followed by a numerous procession, which filed off in the hall, accompanied by national music. Surrounded by them, appeared a young woman of the finest figure, arrayed in robes of liberty, and seated in a chair, ornamented with leaves in festoons. She was placed opposite the president, and Chaumette said, 'Fanaticism has abandoned the place of truth: squint-eyed, it could not bear the brilliant light. The people of Paris have taken possession of the temple, which they have regenerated: the Gothic arches, which till this day resounded with lies, now echo with the accents of truth: you see we have not taken for our festivals inanimate idols; it is a chef d'œuvre of nature, whom we have arrayed in the habit of liberty: its sacred form has inflamed all hearts. The public has but one cry, No more altars, no more priests, no other God but the God of nature. We, their magistrates, we accompany them from the temple of truth to the temple of the laws, to celebrate a new liberty, and to request that the ci-devant church of NOTRE DAME, be changed into a temple consecrated to Reason and Truth.' This proposal being converted into a motion, was immediately decreed; and the Convention afterwards decided, that the citizens of Paris, on this day, continued to deserve well of their country. The goddess then seated herself by the side of the president, who gave her a fraternal kiss. The secretaries presented themselves to share the same favour; every one was eager to kiss the new divinity, whom so many salutations did not in the least disconcert. During the ceremony, the orphans of the country, pupils of Leonard Bourdon (one of the members), sung a hymn to Reason, composed by Citizen Moline. The national music played Gosset's Hymn to Liberty. The Convention then mixed with the people, to celebrate the feast of Reason in her new temple. A grand festival was accordingly held in the church of Notre Dame, in honour of this deity. In the middle of the church was erected a mount, and on it a very plain temple, the façade of which bore the following inscription, 'A la Philosophie.' The busts of the most celebrated philosophers were placed before the gate of this temple. The torch of Truth was on the summit of the mount, upon the altar of Reason, spreading light. The Convention and all the constituted authorities assisted at the ceremony. Two rows of young girls dressed in white, each wearing a crown of oak leaves, crossed before the altar of Reason, at the sound of republican music; each of the girls inclined before the torch, and ascended the summit of the mount. Liberty then came out of the temple of Philosophy, towards a throne made of turf, to receive the homage of the republicans of both sexes, who sang a hymn in her praise, extending their arms at the same time towards her. Liberty ascended afterwards, to return to the temple, and in re-entering it, she turned about, casting a look of benevolence upon her friends: when she got in, every one expressed with enthusiasm the sensations which the goddess excited in them, by songs of joy; and they swore, never, never, to cease to be faithful to her!"

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ABRAHAM.

Abraham Offering Isaac.

ISAAC, the child of promise, like his antitype Jesus, "grew in wisdom and in stature, and in favour with God and man." He was the delight of his aged parents; obedient, affectionate, and truly religious. He had attained to man's estate, and the mind of his venerable father was busily employed in contriving means and forming plans for his future welfare in the world. While Abraham thus beheld him with fond delight, as the father of many nations, as he through whom all the families of the earth were to be blessed, it was announced to him that he must be immediately slain.

"It came to pass after these things, that God did tempt Abraham." Gen. xxii, 1. God did not lay a snare for him, to draw him into sin; but called him to an especial trial of his faith. Many signal proofs of unlimited confidence in the faithfulness of God, and of cheerful obedience to his revealed will, had Abraham already given: but he was at length called to a far more difficult test of his principles. Isaac, the long-promised seed of Abraham, the son of his old age, the declared head of a new race, and of an innumerable posterity, the appointed fountain of unspeakable blessings to the world, and the dear object of extraordinary and merited affection,—this very Isaac is, by the LORD, commanded to be taken to a distant mountain, and there to be offered as a burnt sacrifice, and slain by the hands of his own father!

"And he said, Take now thy son, thine only son, Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of." Ver. 2. Every word is terrible, and the whole seems sufficient to chill the blood of the father in instant death.

We wonder that Abraham did not imagine this command to be a delusive dream; and that some malignant spirit had suggested such an inhuman and monstrous idea. "Who but Abraham would not have expostulated with God? What, doth the God of mercies now begin to delight in blood? Is it possible that murder should become piety? Or if thou wilt needs take pleasure in a human sacrifice, is there none but Isaac fit for the altar, none but Abraham to offer him? Shall these hands destroy mine own child? Can I not be faithful unless I be unnatural? or if I must needs be the monster of all parents, will not Ishmael be accepted? O God, where is thy mercy, where is thy justice? Hast thou given me but one only son, and must I now slay him? Why didst thou give him to me? Why didst thou promise me a blessing in him? What will the heathen say, when they shall hear of this infamous massacre? How can thy name and my profession escape perpetual blasphemy? With what face shall I look upon my wife Sarah, whose son I have murdered? How will she entertain the murderer of Isaac? Who will believe that I did this from thee? Shall not all the world abhor this deed, and say, There goes the man that cut the throat of his own son? Yet if he were an ungracious or rebellious child, his deserts might give some colour to this violence: but to lay hands on so dear, so dutiful, so hopeful a son, is incapable of all pretences. But grant that thou, who art the God of nature, mayest either alter or neglect it, what shall be said to the truth of thy promises? Can thy justice admit contradiction? Can thy decrees be changeable? Can these two stand together, 'Isaac shall live to be the father of many nations;' and 'Isaac shall now die by the hand of his father?' When Isaac is once gone, where is my seed, where is my blessing? O God, if thy commands and purposes be capable of alteration, alter the bloody sentence, and let thy first word stand!

"These would have been the thoughts of a weak heart: but God knew that he spake to Abraham; and Abraham knew that he had to do with God, even Jehovah. Faith had taught him not to argue, but to obey. In holy willingness he forgets nature, or despises her. He is sure that what God commands is good, that what he promises is infallible; therefore he is freed from care as to the means, and trusts to the end."—Bishop Hall.

Without communicating his intention to Sarah, "Abraham rose up early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son, and clave the wood for the burnt offering, and rose up, and went unto the place of which God had told him." Ver. 3. Three whole days they must travel to the place of execution, and still must Isaac be before his eyes, appearing to his imagination as bleeding upon the fatal pile! The peculiar time of a trial makes no small addition to its severity, and Abraham must have felt it; yet had he repented, he had ample time to return.

Having arrived at the mountain foot, "Abraham said unto his young men, Abide ye here with the ass; and I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and come again unto you. And Abraham took the wood of the burnt offering, and laid it upon Isaac his son; and he took the fire in his hand, and a knife; and they went both of them together." Ver. 5, 6. Doubtless they conversed upon the merciful appointment of sacrifices, and upon their typical design as the emblematical means of reconciliation and communion with God. But no consecrated victim appears, and Isaac knows not his father's reason for omitting to take it. At this distressing crisis, "Isaac spake unto Abraham his father, and said, My father:" this address was natural and melting, and Abraham could not fail to be deeply affected with it. He might have said, as he probably thought, "Call me not thy father, who am now about to be thy murderer." But he allows him to proceed with his intelligent inquiry: "Behold the fire and the wood: but where is the lamb for a burnt offering?" The father of the faithful is still fearful to reveal the whole affair to his son. He knows the strength of his own faith to act: but he knows not fully the power of Isaac to be resigned. "And Abraham said, My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt offering." The patriarch gives an ambiguous answer, but which contains a remarkable prophecy. The Holy Spirit by his mouth seems to predict the "Lamb of God," which his mercy has provided, as a sacrifice to take away the sin of the world.

At length they arrive at the sacred place. The Divine command is plainly revealed to Isaac; and, after solemn prayer to the God of their covenant mercies, he yields in faith to the will of his father.

The inspiring Spirit has drawn a veil over the preliminary arrangements for the fatal act, and we are spared the pain of viewing the extraordinary scene. The altar is reared, the fuel is laid in order, and the young man bound is laid upon the prepared wood. All things being thus ready, again calling upon God and looking up to heaven, "Abraham stretched forth his hand, and took the knife to slay his son," his beloved Isaac, the heir of a world of promises. Enough is done! The mind was settled in its purpose. The sacrifice is virtually offered. God intended the trial only, not the actual shedding of blood. The eye of Omniscience had observed every step of these holy men, and scrutinized every motion of the patriarch's soul. He graciously interposes. "And the angel of the LORD called unto him out of heaven, and said, Abraham, Abraham, lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him: for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing that thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me." Ver. 11, 12.

The voice of God, always inspiring to Abraham, was never so welcome, never so seasonable, never so sweet as now. The joyful transports of both father and son must have been overwhelming. With adoring gratitude, they bless the Father of mercies, and embrace each other in this more than resurrection from the dead. God provided himself a lamb, as Abraham had said: for behind him he saw "a ram caught in a thicket by his horns: and Abraham went and took the ram, and offered him for a burnt offering in the stead of his son;" and never was a sacrifice presented to the LORD by hearts more enlarged with thanksgiving, admiration, and love.

The memorable occasion called for a new name to the place, to the honour of God, and for the encouragement of all true believers to the end of the world; and the LORD having appeared in this extremity, and provided so marvellously for Abraham, he called the name of that place Jehovah-jireh, signifying, "The LORD will provide." Again the LORD renewed his covenant with his servant, and condescended to confirm the gracious promise with his awful oath! Thus blessed and honoured of the Most High, the father and son returned to the servants, and hastened home with the liveliest satisfaction, unreservedly consecrated to God.

But the grand design of this extraordinary transaction must not pass unnoticed. It was intended to instruct Abraham and Isaac in the mysterious plan of human redemption, as well as to exhibit to all ages a worthy example of obedient faith. It has been thought probable, that Abraham had been imploring from God some brighter discoveries of the method of redemption, when God called him to this act of obedience as an answer to his prayer.

To the Jews our Saviour said, "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day: and he saw it, and was glad." John viii, 56. The day of his crucifixion was eminently the day of Christ; but when did Abraham behold this day, unless in Isaac's sacrifice? And how could he behold it, unless he understood its purport? Our Lord assures us that Abraham not only saw it, but that he likewise rejoiced to see it. Now he might have seen it without understanding what it meant; but he could not have rejoiced to see it, unless he had been acquainted with its nature.

As typical of the redemption of Christ, it must be observed, "By faith Abraham when he was tried, offered up his only begotten son." Heb. xi, 17. And "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." John iii, 16.

Isaac carried the wood for his own sacrifice; and Christ bore the cross on which he was crucified for our sins. Isaac, without a murmur, yielded to the will of his father, in obedience to God; Christ could say in truth, "Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father." John xi, 17, 18. Moriah was the mountain on which Isaac was offered; and on that mountain was situated the hill of Calvary, the place on which Christ gave himself a ransom for a lost world.

Depending upon the Holy Spirit of God, let us cherish the divine principles by which the venerable patriarch and his pious son Isaac were influenced: then shall we be prompt to make every required sacrifice, in obedience to the command of our covenant God; at the same time remembering, that "they who are of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham." Gal. iii, 9; and shall sit down with him in the kingdom of heaven.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XL.

Religion.

In reference to the doctrines respecting the Lord Jesus Christ, which are to Revelation what the sun is in the firmament, you will find the necessity of acquiring and communicating accurate opinions.

Your child must be taught, that he is not the Father, but that he was with the Father, and that he was God; that the Father loved him from before the foundation of the world, and with a degree of esteem beyond that with which he regarded any or all beings.

Point out to him the glory of the person of Christ, derived from the names given to him, the attributes ascribed to him, the actions attributed to him, and the worship demanded by him.

Spare no pains to teach also the perfect identity of the nature assumed by the Redeemer with the nature of those whom he came to redeem, which, though fallen, he sanctified in taking, and preserved sanctified, and presented as such to God, in himself, by the aid of the Holy Spirit, as the new Adam, in whom, through his obedience, the whole human race stand redeemed.

In the instructions delivered by the Redeemer, you will have a boundless theme. In the things he taught, in the manner of his preaching, you will find abundance of subjects, which you must thoroughly inculcate into the mind of your offspring.

It will be ever needful for you to illustrate the perfect holiness in all respects of the Redeemer, without which doctrine his intended atonement must have been an utter failure.

The incomparable work entitled Archbishop Newcome's Observations on our Lord's Conduct as a Public Instructor, will furnish you with all the information upon these topics, distributed under the chief particulars of which they consist.

Coincidently with all the prior topics, and with all that follow, you will ever most clearly state to him the doctrine of the atonement for the sins of the world, offered through the sufferings of the Redeemer; and that it is solely through this means that the favour of God is enjoyed by any individual of the human race.

The miracles of Christ will often come under your notice, in which you will often take occasion to point out their unquestionable reality, and the proof thus afforded that the instructions taught by our Redeemer were agreeable to the will of God.

In this respect the final and most splendid miracle of all, namely, the resurrection of himself by our Lord from the dead, will occupy its due place in your representations. Make your son familiar with all the evidences and with all the circumstances of this event. You will find great assistance to this attempt from the admirable book of West on the Resurrection of our Saviour.

The doctrine of justification you will explain to be, the acquittal of a penitent person through means of his faith or reliance in the Gospel, of which the atonement and intercession of Christ are the cardinal truths.

The doctrines respecting the Holy Spirit occupy the next place in the enumeration. You will carefully represent to your son, that the Holy Spirit is not a mere influence, but that he is a person, and that he is God. Exhibit his agency in the Old and New Testament, not merely as the means whereby life was given to animate beings, and the human nature of Christ was upheld and assisted; but as also the one only channel of all Divine favours, whether ordinary or extraordinary. Let your child then be taught to expect all good through this one medium only.

Repentance will be readily explained as such a perception of the nature and consequences of sin, as produces the desire and effort to forsake it.

Love, as the infusion of sentiments of benevolence towards all beings; towards the ever-blessed Creator, and towards all beings as his creatures.

Coincidently with all the preceding, I entreat you to have a perpetual regard to the inculcation of the duties of universal morality. Explain these thoroughly: be yourself first assured that these are the great end of all religion; and that the religious character of every man is in the Divine view estimated by his acquirement of these.

From the beginning then establish a habit of reverence in your child's mind towards his Creator, and towards every thing related to him; his name, his word, his house, his day, his ministers.

Inculcate humility as the sentiment natural and becoming, upon views of our immense disparity in all respects to the Creator.

Resignation, as the tranquillity resulting from a perfect confidence in all His conduct.

Inculcate the observance of the Lord's day as consisting in a cheerful, rational obedience in attending upon public worship, moral and religious improvement, and rest from worldly engagements.

Inculcate obedience to every order of magistrates, as being of divine appointment, since they promote the welfare of society.

Inculcate the abhorrence of cruelty to man or animals, as injury done to the creatures of God.

Inculcate purity of mind, as essential to peace of conscience.

Inculcate honesty, universal honesty, to the exclusion of all idleness, prodigality, fraud, and gaming.

Inculcate the habit of truth, or of taking and communicating right apprehensions at all times and upon all subjects.

Inculcate the utmost kindness when your child is speaking of others.

Inculcate contentment with his station in life, as the appointment of God, who best knows by what circumstances an individual can be trained for future happiness.

With regard to the external means of grace, ever represent to him that the grand means of religious instruction is the perusal of the Scriptures, with an inquisitive mind, and a desire to acquire direction of conduct and consolation of hope. Habituate him to expect great benefit from the explanations of the word of God, which he will hear from the appointed ministers.

Thoroughly establish in his mind the conviction, that no good descends from God to man except in answer to prayer; that God will give, if man prays; and that God ceases to give, if we cease to ask.

I now proceed to give you a series of observations, not so much connected with each other, as with the general topics of the Letter.

1. In the first place, it will be advantageous for you to make use of some manual of instruction in your religious education of your child. You will not find any that are better adapted during the first year or two than Dr. Watts's Catechisms for Children, which you may cause your child at a proper age to commit to memory.

2. Allow me strenuously to advise, that you use every means to be derived from every source for gaining correct apprehensions on all the varied topics of religion; otherwise you cannot teach them, and incorrect notions are the source of proportionable mischief, generally of unhappiness, and often of the more palpable forms of sin.

3. I hope that the public preaching upon which you attend is of the kind calculated to promote your own personal improvement; comprehensive, plain, ample, and perfectly scriptural. This will be one of the most valuable means of grace to yourself and to your offspring, and will enable you daily to correct your own opinions, and to inculcate truth upon his mind.

4. For this purpose I advise you to make yourself familiar with one Commentary upon the Old, and one upon the New Testament. This can only be done by frequent use of it. I recommend Dr. Adam Clarke or Matthew Henry for the former, and Dr. Doddridge for the latter. Train your child to an habitual acquaintance with these books; you will then take every human means to secure that he shall rightly understand the Scriptures.

5. Be most careful what kind of religious books you have in your house. It was said by a great writer many years ago, that half the books in the world were not worth reading: I have no hesitation in saying, that the effect of nine-tenths of the religious books now extant is decidedly bad. In any other branch of knowledge, mankind are solicitous to read the best books; but in religion, too many persons read every thing recommended to them, or that accidentally comes in their way. Hence their notions are inaccurate, false, defective; their minds unhappy, and their true duties neglected. Would that men would but exercise the same discretion as to the selection of the sources of religious knowledge, as they do with regard to science and literature in general, consisting both of books and teachers!

"I AM FEARFULLY AND WONDERFULLY MADE."

Observers the most careless, with little knowledge of anatomy, are frequently struck with astonishment at the wonderful formation of the human frame. But men of piety, scientifically acquainted with that mysterious mechanism, have cherished the rational piety of the devout Psalmist, and adopted his language.

"O Lord, I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: marvellous are thy works, and that my soul knoweth right well. My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them. How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God! how great is the sum of them!"

Dr. Paley, in his "Natural Theology," has done much to exhibit the illustrations of the infinite wisdom of God in the mysterious mechanism of the human body. Galen, the most celebrated physician of the second century, is said to have been converted from Atheism by a contemplation of the human frame: and indeed no machine, however complicated and extensive, will bear a comparison with this mystery of nature. Nor could the most skilful engineer, after the most careful study of anatomy, suggest the least improvement in any respect contributing to its greater perfection.

But if the perishable body be so wonderful in its formation, how much more so must be that immortal spirit by which it is inhabited! The capacious understanding, the powerful will, the retentive memory, the judicial conscience, and various affections! Who can fully describe, or even comprehend, himself? Who can compute the worth of his never-dying soul? And who can estimate the preciousness of that provision of sovereign mercy, by which it has been redeemed, and led to anticipate salvation and eternal glory by the mediation, suretyship, and death of the incarnate Son of God? By faith in the immutable promises of the Eternal, which are all "yea and amen in Christ Jesus," the pious servant of God, surveying the wonders of his nature and the sad catastrophe of death, he anticipates a glorious resurrection, and a world of immortal bliss. Inspired by the gospel of his salvation, he can say —

> "When ev'n at last the solemn hour shall come,
> And wing my mystic flight to future worlds,
> I cheerful will obey. There with new powers,
> Will rising wonders sing. I cannot go
> Where universal love not smiles around,
> Sustaining all yon orbs, and all their suns,
> From seeming evil still educing good,
> And better thence again, and better still,
> In infinite progression. But I lose
> Myself in Him, in Light Ineffable!
> Come, then, expressive Silence, muse His praise,
> Who died, and rose, and reigns, th' Incarnate God."

Wonders of the Human Frame.

Dr. Dick, in his "Improvement of Society by the Diffusion of Knowledge," makes the following observations on the wonders of the human frame.

"In the human body there are 245 bones, each of them having forty distinct scopes or intentions; and 446 muscles, each having ten several intentions; so that the system of bones and muscles alone includes above 14,200 varieties, or different intentions and adaptations. But besides the bones and muscles, there are hundreds of tendons and ligaments, for the purpose of connecting them together; hundreds of nerves ramified over the whole body, to convey sensation to all its parts; thousands of arteries to convey the blood to the remotest extremities, and thousands of veins to bring it back to the heart; thousands of lacteal and lymphatic vessels to absorb nutriment from the food; thousands of glands to secrete humours from the blood, and of emunctories to throw them off from the system; and, besides many other parts of this variegated system, and functions with which we are unacquainted, there are more than sixteen hundred millions of membraneous cells or vesicles connected with the lungs, more than two hundred thousand millions of pores in the skin through which the perspiration is incessantly flowing, and above a thousand millions of scales, which, according to Leuwenhoeck, Baker, and others, compose the cuticle or outward covering of the body. We have also to take into the account the compound organs of life, the numerous parts of which they consist, and the diversified functions they perform; such as the brain, with its infinite number of fibres and numerous functions; the heart, with its auricles and ventricles; the stomach, with its juices and muscular coats; the liver, with its lobes and glands; the spleen, with its infinity of cells and membranes; the pancreas, with its juice and numerous glands; the kidneys, with their fine capillary tubes; the intestines, with all their turnings and convolutions; the organs of sense, with their multifarious connections; the mesentery, the gall-bladder, the ureters, the pylorus, the duodenum, the blood, the bile, the lymph, the saliva, the chyle, the hair, the nails, and numerous other parts and substances, every one of which has diversified functions to perform. We have also to take into consideration the number of ideas included in the arrangement and connection of all these parts, and in the manner in which they are compacted into one system of small dimensions, so as to afford free scope for all the intended functions. If, then, for the sake of a rude calculation, we were to suppose, in addition to the 14,200 adaptations stated above, that there are 10,000 veins great and small, 10,000 arteries, 10,000 nerves*, 1,000 ligaments, 4,000 lacteals and lymphatics, 100,000 glands, 1,600,000,000 vesicles in the lungs, 1,000,000,000 scales, and 200,000,000,000 of pores, the amount would be 202,600,149,200 different parts and adaptations in the human body; and if all the other species were supposed to be differently organized, and to consist of a similar number of parts, this number multiplied by 300,000, the supposed number of species, the product would amount to 60,780,044,760,000,000, or above sixty thousand billions — the number of distinct ideas, conceptions, or contrivances, in relation to the animal world — a number of which we can have no precise conception, and which, to limited minds like ours, seems to approximate to something like infinity; but it may tend to convey a rude idea of the endless multiplicity of conceptions which pervade the Eternal Mind."

---

* The amazing extent of the ramifications of the veins and nerves may be judged of from this circumstance, that neither the point of the smallest needle, nor the infinitely finer lance of a gnat, can pierce any part without drawing blood and causing an uneasy sensation, consequently without wounding, by so small a puncture, both a nerve and a vein; and therefore the number of these vessels here assumed may be considered as far below the truth.

FROM A FATHER TO HIS SON,

ON HIS BEING ARTICLED TO A SURGEON.

O youth! on whom are fix'd the anxious eyes
Of friends on earth, and spirits in the skies[*]:
Nor these alone, benevolent and kind,
Suggesting the rich culture of thy mind,
By frequent inspiration pure and wise,
To sanctify thy soul, and bid it rise
By faith, and hope, and love, and every grace,
To seek with them in heaven a resting-place.

But enemies malignant will conspire,
T' inflame thy breast with their unhallow'd fire;
To turn thy feet astray, corrupt thy ways,
And stamp dishonour on thy early days.

Be watchful, sober, — to be sing'lar dare
In Christian virtue's path, — for light as air
Are all objections to the laws of truth,
By which the "King of glory" governs youth,
Who seek his favour, as in every age
It has been sought, by PATRIOT, SAINT, and SAGE.

Make God thy friend: familiar with his Word,
In daily prayers acknowledge Him thy Lord:
Constant both morn and eve impress thy heart
With sense of obligation, and the part
To which thy duty calls: — be active, then,
That thy own conscience may approve, and men
Of worth and honour cannot disapprove,
For lovely virtue must command their love.

Act thus: and whether few or many years
Shall be thy portion in this vale of tears,
Thy father will have joy in thee his son,
While here on earth, and near th' eternal throne.

PLAIN ESSAYS ON IMPORTANT RELIGIOUS SUBJECTS.

By Thomas Wood, of Jewin Street Chapel, London. 18mo. cloth, pp. 216. London, Book Society.

"Systematic divinity" has always been prized by those who have made much progress in religious knowledge. It may be abused, we readily admit, and occasion a Christian to measure the Word of God by his narrow and imperfect platform of doctrine: but no abuse can possibly furnish a valid argument against a formulary of divine truth; because by the same mode of reasoning we might be compelled to abandon even the necessary blessings of providence. Few, especially members of the Church of England, will feel objection to a platform of Christian doctrine, as that would be opposing every Confession of Faith, the "Creed," and Catechisms. Brief and comprehensive outlines of scriptural truth are exceedingly valuable, especially to young person[illegible] and we give our cordial recommendation of Mr. Woo[illegible] Essays, as peculiarly suitable for inquirers after divi[illegible] doctrine, and as presents for villages and the poor. W[illegible] consider them worthy of a place with the standa[illegible] "Essays" of the late judicious and excellent Commentator, Mr. Scott.

CONFUSION OF THE POPISH CLERGY ON T[illegible] INVENTION OF PRINTING.

Superstition and priestcraft dread the light of divine truth; and scarcely any thing in history will afford a more striking illustration of this than the alarm and confusion of the Popish Clergy on the wonderful invention of Printing. The first Latin Bible was printed in 1450, and thus laid open to the people. Complaints were carried to the pope, as Bishop Kennet states, in these terms: — "That his Holiness could not be ignorant what effects the invention of printing had produced; for men now began to call in question the present faith and tenets of the church, and to examine how far religion had departed from its primitive institution. What was particularly to be lamented, they had exhorted the laity even to read the Scriptures, and to pray in their vulgar tongue. That if these things were suffered, the common people might at last believe that there was not so much need of the clergy; for if men were once persuaded they could make their own way to God, and that prayers in their ordinary language might pierce heaven as well as those in Latin; how much would the authority of the Mass fall? and how prejudicial might this prove to all ecclesiastical orders?"

SYRIAN COLLEGE AT COTYM, IN TRAVANCORE.

SYRIAN CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS.

INDIA presents immense and populous regions for the operations of Christian benevolence; and since the entrance of the Baptist Missionaries, in 1793, on that field of labour, incalculable good has already been done, and preparations for infinitely more by the different denominations of British Christians.

Our engraving representing the Syrian College at Cotym, in Travancore (for which we are indebted to the kindness of the Church Missionary Society), renders necessary an account of the Syrian Christians, for whose benefit it was erected, principally by the exertions of Col. Monro, late British resident in the court of the Rannea, or Queen, to whom the province nominally belongs.

Lord William Bentinck, Governor of Madras, in 1806, was desirous of procuring accurate information concerning the "First Introduction of Christianity into India—of the arrival of the different sects who have been, or may be in existence,—of their general history, and of the persecutions to which they may have been exposed,—of their success in making proselytes,—of their church establishment, and of the source from which they are maintained," &c. For this purpose an order in council was issued to Dr. Kerr, senior chaplain of Fort St. George; and Dr. Buchanan was commissioned from the government of Bengal for a similar purpose. The very interesting reports of these two clergymen, will be found by our readers in the Evangelical Magazine for 1807, p. 473—486.

The following account was drawn up by a distinguished literary gentleman of the India House, for the Gentleman's Magazine.

"The most ancient body of Christians in India is the primitive Church of MALAY ALA, or SYRIAN CHRISTIANS of the APOSTLE THOMAS. The tomb of this apostle, at Malinpoor on the coast of Malabar, has been, according to various accounts, as much venerated in the East, from the first dawn of Christianity, as that of St. Peter in the West; and many interesting particulars of the Christian church founded by St. Thomas in India, are still preserved there.

"The accounts of his arrival on the Peninsula, which are generally credited, state, that after he had established Christianity in Arabia Felix, and in the island of Socotra, he came to India, A. D. 51, and landed at Cranganore on the Malabar coast, which was then the residence of a powerful sovereign. In that neighbourhood he found a colony of Jews (a circumstance which corroborates the claim of the black Jews to high autiquity), and to them he preached the Gospel, converting and baptizing several of them. The seed thus sown he continued to cultivate successfully; so that the Christian religion spread into the town of Cranganore, to Paroor, a city of the interior, and to Quilon, then a considerable city on the coast, as well as into many of the small states of that part of India. Both Jews and Brahmins are stated to have embraced Christianity, and united in church fellowship, adopting the language of Syria in their public worship. Having first given to the congregations thus formed, rules of fellowship, and a form of church government, the apostle proceeded to Maliapoor, then a great and flourishing city, the residence of a sovereign prince, and the resort of Hindoo pilgrims, who came from all parts of India to worship at the numerous and splendid temples which were within its walls. St. Thomas nevertheless preached the Gospel in this city openly, and the king became a convert to the Christian faith, and was baptized; after which the apostle, in the further prosecution of his ministerial labours, exposed himself to the fury of the heathen populace, by whom he was stoned to death on a mount near to the city, which still retains the name of St. Thomas's Mount.

"This mount, as well as the ancient city or town, to which also the Christian inhabitants have given the name of St. Thomé, are now, and have been for several centuries, places of pilgrimage and annual resort of Christians, who come from all parts of India, the interior of Armenia, and Syria, crowding to the town, and covering the mount, in order that they may kiss the spot where the apostle suffered martyrdom; there also depositing their offerings, and praying over the place of his sepulture, which they are represented as holding in such high veneration, that they carry away with them small portions of the red earth, and, conceiving it to possess miraculous properties, administer it with great solemnity to the sick and dying.

"The yet unpublished history of the Syrian Christians, from the age of the apostle, would be one of high interest. They suffered persecution from heathen rulers during the three first centuries. Early in the fourth century, they obtained aid from Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, who is represented as having come to their succour, and appointed a bishop to rule over and protect them.

"In the year 345, Mar Thomas assumed charge of them, under the authority of Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, and introduced amongst them several bishops and priests, as also 'many Christian men, women, and children, from foreign countries.' This man, Thomas Cana, or Mar Thomas, was an Armenian merchant, in creed an Arian, who first came to India with commercial views only; but being a virtuous and upright man, and having amassed great wealth, he obtained the friendship of the kings of Cranganore and Cochin, at the same time enjoying the veneration and respect of the Christians of St. Thomas; for whom he is stated to have built many churches, to have established seminaries for the education of their clergy, and to have founded a town called Maha Devapatam, in the neighbourhood of the city of Cranganore, wherein he planted the foreign colony of Christians he had imported.

"He also, assisted by Syrian teachers, introduced the Syro-Chaldeac ritual, and successfully exerted his influence with the native princes to obtain for the Christians on the Malabar coast exclusive privileges; such as independence of the native judges, except in criminal cases, and a rank in the country equal to nobility, by which they were placed on a level with the superior castes. These privileges were ostensibly granted to the Christians, in consideration of their virtues, and they were enjoyed uninterruptedly through several succeeding centuries, having been confirmed by formal grants in different and now unknown languages, engraven on tablets composed of a mixed metal. The inscription on the plate supposed to contain the oldest grant, is in the nail-headed or Persepolitan character. Another is in a character which has no affinity with any existing language in Hindostan. These tablets were lost during several centuries, and were recovered a few years since by the exertions of Colonel Macaulay, the British resident in Travancore, to the great joy of the Syrian churches; by whom they were deposited, and are still preserved in the Syrian college, which has been erected at Cattayam.

"In settling the ecclesiastical constitution of the Syrian churches, it was determined that the right to rule over them should vest in those families only out of which the apostle had himself ordained priests. The offices of bishop, archdeacon, and priest, were accordingly, for many years, confined to these families, and persons were chosen from them who were recognized as the natural judges in all civil and ecclesiastical causes, and as having authority over all temporal as well as ecclesiastical affairs.

"In the ninth century the Syrian Christians were much depressed, and sought the aid of the Nestorian patriarch, who commissioned two ecclesiastics of that church, Mar Saul and Mar Ambrose, to proceed to Malabar, and rule over them. These prelates, on their arrival at Quilon, were received by the Christians with great thankfulness. By their presence they soon commanded the respect of the native princes, who allowed them to make converts, and to erect churches wherever they pleased; for which also they obtained endowments from the noble and wealthy part of the community. From the Hindoo princes they moreover obtained the formal renewal of ancient privileges by grants, which were engraven, as those of higher antiquity had been, on plates of metal. These grants are still preserved, and are in the languages of Malabar, of Canara, of Bisnagur, and in Tamul.

"The Syrian or Nestorian bishops, Mar Saul and Mar Ambrose, are still held in high veneration by the Syrian Christians, who mention them in their prayers, and dedicate churches to their memory.

"Between the ninth and fourteenth centuries these Christians are described as having attained to their highest state of external respectability, if not of purity. They were enlightened by the instructions of a succession of able teachers from Syria, who spread the blessings of the Gospel with zeal, integrity, and honour; receiving such only to their communion as could approach with unblemished character; and rejecting all and every one who could not appear with hands undefiled, and with minds thoroughly convinced of the abomination of heathen worship. All false miracles were then rejected, and the Christians were distinguished by intelligence and decency of manners, which recommended them to the native princes, by whom their teachers were invested with the first offices under the government. At length they entirely shook off the yoke of the Hindoo princes, and elected a chief or king of their own religion, raising one Baliarte to the throne, who assumed the title of 'King of the Christians of St. Thomas:' but this state of independence did not long continue. The regal power, through default of succession, passed to the rajah of Cochin, and that chief, while he professedly respected their rights, persecuted them through hatred of their religion.

"In this state the Portuguese found them; encompassed on all sides by enemies, and bowed under the yoke of the Hindoo princes. The account which the Portuguese gave of them was, that they 'were in a state of decadence, and amounted to about 200,000 Christians, the wreck of an unfortunate people who called themselves Christians of St. Thomas, and after the example of their ancestors, performed pilgrimages every year to the place where the apostle consummated his martyrdom; whose history and miracles, extracted from their annals, had been composed into a species of canticles translated into the language of the country, and sung by the inhabitants of the fishery (the Manaar pearl fishery), and of the coast of Malabar.'

"Their subsequent history is a good deal interwoven with that of the Roman Catholics in India, and will be here very briefly adverted to, as much information upon it is contained in the general histories of the Portuguese nation, and of the Church of Rome.

"It may suffice to observe, that when the Syrian Christians placed themselves under the direction of the Portuguese missionaries, and, as the latter assert, 'voluntarily requested that they might be adopted as good and faithful subjects of the king of Portugal,' they amounted to 1,500 Christian churches under the Syrian patriarch, retaining their martial character, and associating with the higher castes of Hindoos, who deemed themselves honoured by the association. On the part of the Syrian Churches it is stated, that they proposed their union with the Western church, 'having full confidence in its piety and truth, and no knowledge of its corruptions'—that in particular the sacraments of confirmation, of extreme unction, of auricular confession, and the worship of images, were unknown to them; that the title of 'Mother of God' was, when they heard it, disgusting to them, and that when her image was first presented to them, they rejected it with indignation, exclaiming, 'We are Christians, and not idolaters.' To induce the Syrians to conform to the idolatry of the Roman Catholic church, the missionaries resorted first to artifice and then to force. They founded colleges and schools for youth, whom they proposed to instruct in the rites of the Latin church, still employing the Syrian language, and it is believed that their schools did some service; but these measures not effecting their main object, which appears to have been the establishment of the pope's supremacy, together with the erroneous tenets, and particularly the idolatry of his religion *, the missionaries resorted to the inquisition about the middle of the sixteenth century. Division, contention, and confusion were the natural consequences of this step: in which state the churches continued till the year 1599, when a fresh attempt was made to effect a compromise between the Latin and Syrian Christians, at a conference called the synod of Udiamper, a town in the neighbourhood of Cochin. Here the parties met; but the Roman Catholic missionaries, the Jesuits, had bribed the civil power, which was in the hands of the Cochin Rajah, so effectually as to destroy the freedom of discussion, and eventually to obtain the means of subjecting the Syrian bishops to persecution, for their faithful adherence to the truth. Two of these confessors, Mar Symeon and Mar Ignatius, were embarked on board of Portuguese vessels for Lisbon, where they were treated as heretics, and never more heard of in India. In this state of depression and suffering under popish intolerance, the Syrian Christians continued more than sixty years, until the capture of Quilon by the Dutch in 1661. By that event the power of the Portuguese was destroyed, and the Christians of St. Thomas restored to liberty. In 1665 the Jesuits quitted India. From their expulsion to the year 1815, the Syrian churches continued a separate branch of the Indian community; although divided into sects, and impaired in energy and purity of doctrine, by their unhappy connection with the Roman missionaries.

"In 1815, on the demise of their patriarchs, they obtained the aid of the Company's government, exerted through Colonel Macaulay, the Company's resident in Travancore, who having recovered for them their ancient grants and evidences of nobility, assisted them to found a college at Cattayam for the education of a clergy, and of the Syrian youth generally. Colonel Macaulay effected several other arrangements for the general improvement of their condition. A considerable grant of land was obtained for the college, together with a donation of 20,000 Rupees from the rannee of Travancore, and three English missionaries were attached to the college at the instance of the resident."

RELIGION IN FRANCE.

FRANCE, in thus overthrowing the intolerable usurpations and degrading superstitions of popery, plunged into all the extravagance, frenzy, and impurity of the grossest infidelity. There was, however, a method observed in all the prevailing madness; and the decemviral faction confirmed their influence over the minds of the populace, by making them fanatics in devotion to their newly-created divinity. Atheism was now publicly preached! This monstrous doctrine had hitherto been confined to the writings of a few speculative philosophers; and although it is a mournful fact, that many, if not most of the ancient philosophers, neither believed in the creation of the world, nor in a future state of rewards and punishments, and that some of them were even determined sceptics, yet they never ventured to make these principles the source and rule of popular belief. They held it to be absolutely necessary for the well-being of society, that the vulgar should believe in the existence of a Deity, or of many gods, and a state of future rewards and punishments, and durst not trust Atheism in the hands of the populace, but carefully confined it within the precincts of philosophy. The ingenious and sceptical Bayle, the father of modern infidels, was the first of the tribe who dared openly to throw off the mask, and boldly avow and defend the innocency of Atheism, that it was not destructive of the well-being of society, nor necessarily followed by a depravation of morals; and endeavoured to produce instances of whole nations living in a state of savagism and atheism, and yet living, as he pretended, virtuously and innocently, without either law or religion: and lest it should be urged, that although Atheism might be consistent with a state of savagism, yet that it would not be tolerable in a state of civilization, but must be built upon its ruins; he, in order to meet this objection, very gravely maintains that civil society is not absolutely necessary for the preservation or well-being of mankind. That arch-infidel Rousseau artfully improved upon the paradox of his predecessor Bayle, and ventured boldly to assert that civil society was injurious to the happiness of man; that savagism was a state of supreme felicity; and that the naked savage of New Zealand, or the cannibal of the American woods, who roamed at large, and indulged without restraint and without remorse in the gratification of his ferocious and brutal propensities, was the only being that deserved the name of man; and that human nature appeared in all its true, majestic, and pristine dignity, only on the banks of the Oronooko or the Amazons, in the wilds of

---

* "They professed to have found the remains of St. Thomas the apostle and martyr; and a skull and bones, called his, were kept and worshipped in a church at Goa, dedicated to the blessed virgin, mother of God. One friar Emanuel is reported to have dug up these remains at the command of Don John, King of Portugal."

Paraguay or Canada. Bayle's paradoxical assertion of the innocency of Atheism, has been satisfactorily disproved in France, by a long and wide train of evils that flowed from the inculcation of Atheism as the subject of popular belief; and a pretty large number of French theorists, who stupidly believed in the virtues of savages, received the strongest possible confutation of their doctrine, in being devoured by these majestic beings!

Robespierre, Carnot, and their associates, went boldly to work in cutting down the carved work of all religious belief and moral practice, by teaching that death is an eternal sleep! "The dying," said a member of the Convention to that assembly, "are thus no longer frightened." A professor was named by Chaumette, to instruct the children in the mysteries of Atheism. He abolished all forms of religious worship, demolished the churches, and caused the following inscription to be displayed in the public burying-places—"Death is only an eternal sleep!" In the Convention, Gobet archbishop of Paris, the rector of Vaugirard, and several other priests, with a Protestant minister, and Julian of Tholouse, a member of the Convention, abjured the Christian religion; and for this abjuration they received applauses and the fraternal kiss. A priest from Melun stated, that there is no true religion but that of nature, and that all the mummery with which they have hitherto been amused is only old wives' fables, and he was heard with loud applause. In a deputation from the commune of Sens to the Convention, the spokesman declared, that henceforth human victims will no longer be slaughtered in the name of any imaginary god. "The sole figure of the Almighty," said Couthon, "is in the picture of nature." Akin to this blasphemy is the assertion of De la Metherie, that the highest and most perfect form of crystallization is that which is vulgarly called God!

The Convention decreed in 1793, that all the churches and temples of different religious worship, which are known to be in Paris, should be instantly shut up, and that "every person requiring the opening of a church or temple, should be put under arrest as a suspected person." The bulk of the clergy, however, "refused to abjure their tenets, and were accordingly unmercifully persecuted—were butchered wherever found—hunted as wild beasts, and frequently roasted alive, or drowned in hundreds together, without either accusation or trial!"

After the death of the sanguinary Robespierre, and the overthrow of the Terrorists, the Moderes granted a toleration to all forms of worship, the churches were again restored to their accustomed uses, and the Catholics obtained a respite from those sufferings which they had endured from the Atheistical Jacobins. Under the government of the Directory, however, they were again exposed to persecution. A new infidel sect had arisen in France, under the name of Theophilanthropists, or lovers of God and man. Assuming reason as their sole guide in matters of religion, a principle which they held in common with Deists of every class, and the Socinian part of the Unitarians, they professed belief in the existence, perfections, and providence of God, and the doctrine of a future state, pretending to found their moral system upon the basis of love to God and good-will to men. La Reveilliere Lepaux was the apostle of these Deists; and his principles, according to Mr. Belsham, the chief leader of the English Unitarians, differed in nothing from his own, except in denying the resurrection of a dead man. Lepaux was a member of the Directory, and he employed the greater part of his time in composing sermons for the Theophilanthropists, in hunting out priests, whether they were nonjurant or consitutional, in persecuting Catholics, botanizing in the national garden, and making, altering, and re-altering constitutions for the Cisalpine, Roman, Luccan, Helvetian, and Dutch republics. Under the reign of this merciful Theophilanthropist, the churches were again taken from the priests, and converted into places of amusement or municipal festivity.

Such was the miserable condition of the Roman Catholic religion in France, until the revolution of Nov. 18, 1799, by Buonaparte, broke the power of the Terrorist Jacobins, and emancipated the priesthood from the persecution of the Theophilanthropist director, Lepaux. An arrete of the consuls not only put an end to the proscription, but annulled every condemning decree of the Directory, setting at liberty those who were imprisoned, and recalling those who had been exiled by its terrible sentence. All the administrations that had been active in this persecution of the priests were immediately broken, and the churches were restored to their former uses. The Catholic clergy promised forbearance and toleration, and they procured a translation of the Bishop of Llandaff's Apology for the Bible, in answer to Paine's Age of Reason, to circulate as an antidote to infidelity, promising at the same time an ecclesiastical reform.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ABRAHAM.

The Death of Sarah.

Delighted in contemplating the matured virtues and the extraordinary piety of Isaac, Abraham enjoyed several years tranquillity in the bosom of his happy family. But the patriarch confessed himself "a stranger and pilgrim upon earth." The monitory voice to the prophet, "All flesh is grass," was now painfully addressed to the venerable "father of the faithful." That surpassing beauty on which conjugal affection had doated, and which foreign princes had coveted, becomes wrinkled with age, deformed by disease, and loathsome in death! "And Sarah was a hundred and seven and twenty years old: and Sarah died in Kirjath-arba; the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan." Gen. xxiii, 1, 2.

After a union of nearly a hundred years with such a wife, we should naturally expect to hear that "Abraham came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her," ver. 2. But this man of God "sorrowed not as others who have no hope." His renewed mind had been devoted to spiritual things; to anticipate the bliss of his ancestor Enoch; to seek "a better country, that is a heavenly;—he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." Heb. xi, 10, 16. To that blest place, Abraham doubted not but the spirit of his long-loved Sarah was received; and that the period could not be distant, when his own disimprisoned soul would repose in the same everlasting mansions. Abraham soon dries up his tears to fulfil imperative duties. A sepulchre must be prepared; but Abraham has not a foot of ground actually his own. He is necessitated to make application to the princes of the land. According to the custom of the age, the patriarch rendered them due honours in soliciting the favour. "And Abraham stood up from before his dead, and spake unto the sons of Heth, saying, I am a stranger and a sojourner with you: give me a possession of a burying-place with you, that I may bury my dead out of my sight." Ver. 3, 4.

The lords of the country entertained a high respect for this distinguished servant of God: for while his numerous retinue was calculated to excite their jealousy and fear, his piety, integrity, and courtesy had gained their unsuspecting confidence, and they were at once ready to gratify him. "And the children of Heth answered Abraham, saying unto him, Hear us, my lord; thou art a mighty prince among us: in the choice of our sepulchres bury thy dead; none of us shall withhold from thee his sepulchre, but that thou mayest bury thy dead." Ver. 5, 6.

The cave of Machpelah in the field of Ephron was the spot desired; and the mourning patriarch requested it in purchase for the amount of its value. "And Ephron the Hittite answered Abraham in the audience of the children of Heth, saying, Nay, my lord, hear me: the field give I thee, and the cave that is therein, I give it thee: in the presence of the sons of my people give I it to thee: bury thy dead." Ver. 11.

Abraham acknowledged the sympathizing kindness and the delicate politeness of the liberal proprietor of the land: but with a generous independence of mind he insists on knowing the value of the estate, and on paying its estimated price. Ephron at length yielded to his demand, "saying unto him, My lord, hearken unto me: the land is worth four hundred shekels of silver: what is that betwixt me and thee? bury therefore thy dead. And Abraham hearkened unto Ephron: and Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver, which he had named, in the audience of the sons of Heth, four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant." Ver. 15, 16.

The whole detail of this affair is admirably instructive, as it presents to us a genuine picture of the beautiful simplicity of ancient manners. Here is the first notice of sacred repositories for the dead, and the most ancient money transaction of which we read. It is evident that a circulating medium was then common in the East; and as the shekel was about half a crown, the price paid by Abraham was about fifty pounds of our money.

Having secured the purchase of Machpelah, Abraham discharged the last melancholy duties to the mortal remains of a faithful and beloved wife. He bewailed her loss in a manner which marked his sincere veneration for her memory; he looked forward to a reunion in the world of bliss eternal, and anticipated the ineffable satisfaction of a glorious resurrection, in the immediate presence of God, who was his "exceeding great reward."

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XL.

Religion.

(Concluded from p. 381.)

6. Beware how you allow a servant, or, if the tutor comes to your house, even the tutor, to speak to your child on the subject of religion. Strictly prohibit it, and let yourself and your minister be the only teachers. Nurses and servants especially often talk to a child about religion to the same ill effect as they do upon other subjects above their attainments.

7. Let all your instructions in religion be systematic. Take up the topics in the order in which I have enumerated them: teach each one of them thoroughly, then proceed to the next. Be assured, that if ever you are to do your child any good in this respect, it must be by a course of instruction.

8. Never teach any thing in religion which you do not quite understand yourself: never overstate. Immense mischief is done by these means. If you are at a loss, apply to the minister, whom I have supposed to be throughout permitted to be your instructor.

9. Be most careful not to convey that there is any thing meritorious or remarkable in your child being religious. How many a wretched child have I beheld, restrained and awkward and hypocritical, and becoming rapidly imbecile, from being made an object of such particular attention! Ever act and feel towards him and yourself, that to be pious and well instructed towards God is no merit, though ignorance and irreligion would be the greatest disgrace. I have often feared that the parade one sometimes sees about such matters is but one subtle form of pride, conceit, and vanity. Would the persons in question look, and act, and talk as they do, if they were alone, or in an uninhabited island. Now change their circumstances, and see the change in them. The man or woman who is sullen, or inactive, or ill-tempered when alone or merely with their family, become wonderfully excited and devout when a stranger or a neighbour comes in. What is all this but display, and mere selfishness in one of its grossest forms. Hence when these persons come into affliction, or into the hour of death, you will find them devoid of all hope, or, as I have seen to my amazement, even totally indifferent to the whole subject. Their religion lived in publicity alone.

10. Avoid by all means talking upon the subject of religion as a family conversation. How disgraceful is such a scene! Each one has his opinion; and while one is talking, another is thinking what he shall say when he can next get an opportunity to speak; and many a phrase that has struck them in sermons they have heard, is introduced, under the temptation to appear eloquent or profound. Roused in conversation upon religious subjects, the mind, like a chariot wheel, glows by action, and soon sets on fire; and it is endless to think upon the false notions propagated through such means. Religious conversation should only be conducted between friends, who are nearly equals in age, circumstances, and attainments. I am persuaded that multitudes of people talk upon the subject from the mere love of excitement, indolence, the want of something to do, and often from mere ambition and display.

11. Be exceedingly careful that you make morality the grand desideratum and effect of all religious knowledge. Without morality there may be theological knowledge, but there is no religion. The grand effect of all knowledge on all topics is conduct. Often explain the nature, and the principles, and the modifications of virtue. Make superior moral conduct of mind and heart and external action the alone standard of religious attainment. I do not object to your pointing out instances to the contrary to your child, and expressing your just pity, and even contempt of them. Inspire him with the conviction, that the more he knows the better he must act.

12. Be most careful never to praise or to reprove him in the use of any words or associations derived from the subject of religion. Many parents when they are pleased, and especially displeased with their children, express their approbation or their spleen in the terms of scripture, or by dilating upon the motives of religion. In the latter instance, their knowledge of the subject serves no other purpose than to enable them more thoroughly to irritate and abuse.

13. I strongly advise you to be most careful into what associations of a religious nature you enter, and especially into which of them you introduce your child. Be assured that all extraordinary means, manners, and sensations, are transitory in their existence and their effects. They are transitory in their existence: in a short time the movers of the scheme get tired, and are off after something new. They are transitory in their influence: in religion, as in every thing else, the law of excitement is, that the collapse shall be proportionable; and the glow of the mind, like all kinds of fire, which burns most steadily and temperately, does most good and lasts the longest.

14. Let me remind you, that all beneficial effects of religion must be derived from thorough and comprehensive knowledge. Accordingly, do all you can to have your child soundly and thoroughly instructed on the subject. To select one instance out of many: we are commanded in the Scriptures to love our Creator; but the mere command to love him will not produce the affection. Our love of an object can only be proportioned to our knowledge of the object. Hence I scruple not to assert, that the ampler and more correct our knowledge of the Creator is rendered, the higher and more intense will be our love. The same remark may be applied to every topic of revelation. Knowledge is the instrument whereby the affections are to be excited. It is only through our perceptions of an object that esteem for it is enkindled in our mind; if we do not perceive it, we do not love it; and if we have defective views of it, our regard will be proportionably deficient.

15. Let it be a test of a genuine doctrine of Revelation, that it tends to endear and exalt the character of our blessed Creator in the minds of his creatures. Hence then let us not only attribute creation to Him and providence, but the inspiration of the Scriptures, the gift of the Saviour, and the help of the Holy Spirit. "All things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ.

16. If you take proper views of religion, or of any of its topics, you will assuredly take such as are calculated to cheer and console you, and by your own tranquil cheerfulness and serenity, you will afford a very strong and convincing argument of its excellence.

17. Lastly, let the views you inculcate of death be scriptural, and then, though solemn, they will not be revolting. Represent to him, that death is indeed the proof of our degradation; but that through that degradation we derive the Saviour, and that through him we regain a glorified body, and a far higher exaltation of our nature, than that from which it had previously descended. Let it also be gathered from your observations, that the mode or time of death are at the disposal of that gracious and wise Being, and that were it to occur at any other time and in any other mode, it would be less adapted to the moral purposes intended in the particular instance, which are always wise and benevolent. Be careful to adhere to the representation of the Scriptures, that the spirit upon departure is gathered into the invisible world, and that the perfection of human nature is reserved for the resurrection. Exercise a sound discernment as to the statements of the Scriptures on these topics, lest you apply to the state which transpires immediately upon death, those representations which apply alone to the time when the faithful shall have their "perfect consummation and bliss" in the kingdom of Christ and of God.

Nor will it be an unprofitable lesson, finally, to remind him, that the purposes intended by the Creator, though benevolent, yet often involve the adoption of means, and a slowness of providence which is opposed to human impatience; but which is nevertheless the best calculated upon the whole to secure the grand object of the Divine procedure, namely, the greatest portion of happiness of his creatures during the greatest duration.— I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

CLERICUS.

If thou desire not to be too poor, desire not to be too rich: he is rich, not that possesses much, but that covets no more: and he is poor, not that enjoys little, but that wants too much. The contented mind wants nothing which it hath not: the covetous mind wants, not only what it hath not, but likewise what it hath.

Quarles' Enchiridion, cent. 2, chap. xvii.

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE SERIES OF ESSAYS.

THE character of God, when rightly understood, cannot fail to strike the mind as one of infinitely surpassing loveliness; and though I am quite conscious that the task which I assigned to myself, of illustrating that character, has fallen far short even of human excellence, yet I entertain the hope that some few at least have gained information, and been able to correct wrong notions or improve right ones. In reviewing, therefore, the subjects which have passed under consideration, I am desirous to deduce from the whole some lessons of practical importance. We are connected with the Deity by ties of a most awful and at the same time pleasing nature. Every moment of existence is passed in his presence, and we are bound at all times to keep him in remembrance. The hum of business, the society of friends, the enjoyment of lawful pleasures, the exercise of devotion, are alike scenes and circumstances in which it is our duty to act as though impressed by the belief that an All-seeing Eye is fixed upon us. Such considerations are by no means calculated to spread gloom or melancholy over our actions, but the reverse; for he who is striving to please his Maker, should derive comfort from the reflection that he is watching every struggle on the side of virtue, and waiting to bestow all needful supplies of strength. Impressed by these recollections, let us proceed to inquire what are the dispositions of mind with which God requires that we should contemplate him.

1. LOVE. Love is a compound principle, and is composed of different dispositions, according to the different natures of the beings towards whom it is exercised. The love which the husband bears to the wife, or the parent to the child, of course differs materially from that love which we bear to the Deity. It will be well therefore to point out the distinction. The different circumstances in which we are placed with regard to our fellow-creatures, does in fact render the nature of the love we bear to them in some degree various. I should say, that to make up that frame of mind which we call Love to God, it is necessary to behold him with admiration, complacency, gratitude, benevolence, confidence. Now these are also dispositions requisite for the contemplation of a superior under any circumstances. The indigent man, who looks up to a kind and benignant benefactor, will be found to have a portion of each of these views, requisite to describe the emotion which he feels. But not so when equals are the subjects of our regard. We may then dipense with gratitude and confidence, since there will be nothing to be grateful about, and since the situation in life of each of the parties renders confidence unnecessary. Though these remarks are far from making the subject plain, they will show that we must look up to God with similar feelings, though in a much higher degree, to those with which the poor and needy regard their benefactors. God is in truth the great Benefactor of the human race; and when we remember the unchangeableness of his nature, and the superior claims he has on our worship and obedience, to what any creature can have upon his fellow-creature, whatever his situation may be, we shall, I think, be in possession of the sentiments requisite for rendering the present remarks useful and intelligible.

Having stated what dispositions compose love to God, I proceed to point out the reasons which exist for contemplating him with them. 1. Admiration. Surely no man can review the glorious attributes ascribed to our Heavenly Father, without exclaiming, "Who is a God like unto thee?" The more we know of the dispensations of the Almighty, and the reasons upon which they are founded, the more shall we be lost in admiration at the boundless goodness and wisdom which they display. We are by nature apt to admire excellence to which we cannot attain; and well therefore may we employ this inclination when the wonders which the hand of our Almighty Parent has wrought are the subject of our contemplation. 2. Complacency. By this we are to understand, pleasure or joy. Now, though it is not possible for man in a state of alienation to feel any emotion of joy in reflecting on the nature of one whom he must ever view as bound to punish sin, yet real love to God includes obedience to his commands; and since the most pleasing of his commands direct the eye of faith to behold a Saviour and Redeemer in Christ the Lord, it cannot fail to excite in the minds of those who obey indescribable emotions of pleasure. "Rejoice in the Lord alway." 3. Gratitude. Let us look around, and contemplate the unnumbered mercies that we are every day receiving at the hand of God; let us remember that every temporal blessing we enjoy, nay the very breath we draw, is bestowed upon us by him; let us picture also to our imagination the gloom of that endless night from which we are redeemed, and the glories of that eternal state to which we are invited; let us revert to the sorrows that the Saviour underwent to accomplish for us so desirable an object; and then I am sure we shall feel the immensity of our obligations, and the loud calls which are made upon us to "bless the Lord, and forget not all his benefits." 4. Benevolence. Right apprehensions of the Deity are exceedingly well calculated to produce in our hearts universal benevolence. They lead us to contemplate the whole human species as one family, and God as the Father of them all; and thus we are induced to feel towards each particular member of this large assembly, anxiety for his welfare, and to indulge the pleasing hope that we, who endure together the sorrows of life, and submit to the present obscure and incomprehensible workings of providence, shall meet again in a brighter world, where sorrow shall cease and universal love smile all around. 5. Confidence. From the Christian dispensation we undoubtedly derive the strongest inducements to place implicit confidence in its Author; for when we contemplate the unwearied assiduity with which he has laboured for our good, and the inconceivable exertions he has made to produce happiness in the highest possible degree, we cannot fail to be convinced, that in his hands we are perfectly safe. Neither is it Revelation alone that teaches this great doctrine. Who is he that does not verily believe, when he beholds the setting sun, that yet a few hours and it shall again appear, "coming forth as a bridegroom out of his chamber?" Who is he that does not feel the fullest confidence, that the bright days of summer shall smile upon the earth, that the fields shall stand thick with corn, and that nature shall again assume its smiling aspect, even though the whole face of the earth seems gloomy and forsaken, the trees are leafless, the rivers are stagnant, and the flakes of snow seem determined to mantle every green and blooming prospect with their fleecy covering? Why then should we doubt that all things will be made to work together for our good, if we will but keep his commandments? For though thou sayest thou canst not see him — his dispensations are inscrutable and thou art unable to comprehend them, — yet judgment is before him; he sees further than you can, and he knows that the end of his work will be right; therefore do thou put thy trust in him.

Such is a brief view of those various dispositions and emotions of mind, the union of which may be considered to produce that Love which our Heavenly Father requires of us.

JUDGE HALE HONOURING THE SABBATH.

Mr. Editor,

The excellent spirit in which the following Letter is written, induces me to forward it to you: it is from Judge Hale, Lord Chief Justice of England, to his children, on the serious observance of the Lord's day (commonly called Sunday), when he was on the circuit, which well deserves the attention of the Readers of the Christian's Penny Magazine.

"I am now come well to ———, from whence I intend to write to you on the observance of the Lord's day: and this I do for these reasons; 1st. Because it has pleased God to cast my lot so, that I am to rest at this place on that day, and the consideration therefore of that duty is proper for me and you; namely, the work fit for that day. 2dly. Because I have, by long and sound experience, found that the due observance of that day, and the duties of it, have been of singular comfort and advantage to me; and I doubt not but it will prove so to you. God Almighty is the Lord of our time, and he it is that lends it us, and it is but just that we should consecrate this part of that time to him; for I have found by a strict and diligent observation, that a due observance of the duties of this day has ever had joined to it a blessing on the rest of my time; and the week that hath been so begun hath been blessed and prosperous to me on every hand. On the other side, when I have been negligent of the duties of this day, the rest of the week has been unsuccessful and unhappy to my own secular employment; so that I could easily make an estimate of my successes the week following, by the manner of my passing this day; and this I do not write lightly or inconsiderately, but upon a long and sound observation and experience."

Such is the advice of this excellent man to his children. O how few feel as this learned man felt when he said, "God Almighty is the Lord of our time, and he it is that lends it us." How few, I say, think "it just that we should consecrate this part of our time to him." But Judge Hale knew by experience, that the due regard of the Sabbath was a reflection to which he could look back with pleasure, and that the utter disregard thereof would leave behind it a reflection not the most agreeable. Reader, look on the one side and on the other, and then ask yourself the solemn question, "What will it profit me if I should gain the whole world, and lose my own soul?" Let me tell you, Reader, that now is the time to study that point; and if you do not do so, sooner or later you will regret it. What if you should gain the courtesy of the king, and lose the favour of the King of kings. The king's favour endureth but for a while, the pleasure of this world is but for a season; but the pleasure of the King of kings endureth for ever and ever. O let me entreat you to turn from the way of death and destruction, and, ere it is too late, beg of Him who gave his only begotten Son as a propitiation for the sins of the whole world pardon for all the mispent Sabbaths that have passed over your head, and power to walk in Him who is "the way, the truth, and the life," the remainder of your days, through Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour.

Family prayer is profitable for a fourfold evil; the wrongs of men, the reign of sin, the rage of Satan, the displeasure of God: it is profitable for a fourfold good; personal, domestic, political, and ecclesiastical.

CHRISTIAN MUSINGS.

JESUS, THE WAY, THE TRUTH, AND THE LIFE.

JOHN XIV, 6.

I am the Way, says our blessed Saviour; for since his sacrifice, the bar that prevented man's approach to God is taken away: it is now a highway for man — it is God's highway. Religion is not a mere speculation, it is an action; it is a life of action. Try it. Believing in Jesus, try God's promises. Appealing in his name, thou wilt find he is a prayer hearing and answering God.

I am the Truth, our Lord also asserts. When Christ came, all heaven, all hell, all earth, could point to him and say, "That is THE Truth!" Truth is the representation of the mind of God. God is the mind — Jesus the word by which it is made known. God is the substance — Jesus the light that reflects it. God is the unknown — Jesus the great revealer of God: he is the knowledge and wisdom of God. God is the great living fountain — Christ is the stream continually flowing from it, diffusing its waters all around. If we wish to know what God is, we must look to Jesus, who is the express image and great revealer of God.

The Life. Yes, Jesus is life, essential life! Look at man — look at the world — and what do we see? In the midst of life we are in death! All things around us dying and decaying and changing. This is the appointed end of all things. Life here is the condition of dying rather than of living: but in Christ a life will be ours, which neither disease nor temptation nor death can ever touch. It is a life which feeds on God. The life that is in the Godhead is manifested in Jesus. It is the life of God: a glorious life, whose powers and faculties shall be of vast comprehension, capable of vastness of thought and feeling, that shall be able to contain the revealed fulness of God! — a fulness of love which no unkindness will ever disturb, a fulness of joy which no sorrow can ever alloy, a fulness of stability subject to no change or dissolution, a fulness of glory, a fulness of all that can make the redeemed soul happy, without liability either to diminution or to falling away!

The radiant truth! the unutterable truth which Jesus has expressed! — that before unapproachable place, which God Almighty fills with all the effluence of his own essence, and with all the blessedness which Deity diffuses around, every one of you who trust in Jesus shall be there! — this is the truth of truths! It cannot be estimated but by the dimensions of the unmeasurable love of God. Yes: each believer in Jesus shall be taken from this scene of sorrow, from this dark and desolate world, to his presence where there is the fulness of joy. Oh! would you estimate the love of God, then see it in the love of Jesus. Oh! consider the love of Jesus, try its extent, consider its dimensions, and you see the extent and know the dimensions of the pity and the love of God! E. I.

God is Alpha and Omega in the great world; endeavour to make him so in the little world: make him thy evening epilogue and thy morning prologue: practise to make him thy last thought at night when thou sleepest, and thy first in the morning when thou awakest: so shall thy fancy be sanctified in the night, and thy understanding rectified in the day; so shall thy rest be peaceful, thy labours prosperous, thy life pious, and thy death glorious.

SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF SUNDAY TRADING.

A Public Meeting of the above Society, of which the Bishop of London is patron, was held on Friday, the 29th of November, at the London Coffee House, Ludgate Hill, Lord Henley in the chair.

The Right Hon. Chairman in a forcible manner drew the attention of the Meeting to the utter inefficiency of the present laws for preventing a desecration of the Sabbath, to the urgent necessity for their amendment, and to the probability of their speedy alteration and improvement.

Apsley Pellatt, Esq. one of the Secretaries, then read an interesting Report, in which the efforts made by the Society were detailed, and the encouragements to perseverance were adverted to. The Report referred, amongst other things, to the indifference and opposition manifested on this important subject, as matter for regret; and to the success of Sir A. Agnew in his bill for transferring the election of corporate officers from Sunday to Monday, and to the pledge given by Lord Althorp to support such a measure as the Committee contemplate, as grounds for congratulation and encouragement.

The Meeting was addressed by J. Labouchere, Esq.; J. Conder, Esq.; R. J. Chambers, Esq. of Marlborough Street Police Office; Rev. H. Smith; Rev. G. Mutter; D. Wire, Esq.; a gentleman from Antigua; J. E. Saunders, Esq. &c. &c.; and Resolutions were unanimously adopted, pledging the Committees to renewed exertions, and recommending the formation of local associations and the presentation of petitions to Parliament.

EPITAPH.

On a Monument in the Church of St. Bartholomew Exchange.

Near this spot are interred the dear Remains of ANTHONY RICHARDSON BACON, only child
of Anthony Bacon, Esq. who departed this life
May 26th, 1770,
aged 12 years;
whom neither the fervour of parental piety,
nor a profusion of friendly tears,
nor all the powers of well-adapted medicine,
nor every effort of the tenderest affection,
could rescue from the hands of death.

Reader! contemplate and adore:
nor dare to cavil at the ways of Providence.
This happy object of a Saviour's love thus young was ripe for glory!

ON JOHN AND JESUS.

John was the morning star that did forerun
The long-wish'd rising of our glorious Sun:
The first word that John's preaching lips express'd
Was this, Repent; our Saviour's first was, Bless'd.
John makes th' incision; Jesus makes it sound:
Jesus ne'er cures where John ne'er made a wound.

ENTRANCE TO HAMPTON COURT PALACE.

Hampton Court Palace, Cardinal Wolsey, and Henry VIII, are inseparably connected in a most eventful period of English history.

Cardinal Wolsey built this palace, which, with some modern enlargments, is the most magnificent, and said to be the most capacious of all the royal palaces in England. Originally there was a manor-house near this spot, when the cardinal procured a lease of the estate from the Knights Hospitallers. Corresponding with his ambition and pride, Wolsey employed a portion of his ill-gotten wealth in raising a structure more polished in character, and more splendid in arrangement, than had at any period previously adorned this country. The interior was so capacious, that it was said to have been provided with 280 silk beds for visitors of superior rank!

Wolsey, in 1526, presented this most sumptuous palace to his royal master, Henry VIII; and for two centuries it was the favourite residence of our British sovereigns. Edward VI was born here, Oct. 12, 1537. Here Catherine Howard was openly showed as queen. Catherine Parr was married here to Henry, and proclaimed queen, July 12, 1540. Philip and Mary kept their Christmas at Hampton Court with great solemnity in 1558, the great hall of the palace being illuminated with 1,000 lamps. Queen Elizabeth frequently resided here; and in this palace the celebrated conference was held before James I, in 1603, between the Presbyterians and Episcopalians, and which led to the present "authorized version of the Bible." Charles I, Charles II, James II, William and Mary, George I, and George II, more or less resided at Hampton Court.

The west front is the usual entrance: after passing through the archway of the portal is found the entrance-court, a quadrangle whose dimensions are 162 feet 2 inches, by 141 feet 7 inches. Through a groined archway, finely ornamented, there is a passage to the middle quadrangle, 133 feet 6 inches by 91 feet 10 inches. The turrets are ornamented with busts of the Cæsars. On the left side is the great hall. On the front of the third story is a splendid and curious clock, by Tompion: on the south side is a stone colonnade of 14 columns, leading to the great staircase. The third great quadrangle, or fountain court, consists chiefly of buildings constructed by Sir Christopher Wren, under William III. A fountain ornaments the area, which is 117 feet 3 inches by 100 feet 7 inches. On the north is the queen's staircase, the ceiling of which was painted by Vick. Here are Charles II, and his queen, with the Duke of Buckingham, representing Science in the character of Mercury, while Envy is struck down by naked boys.

THE CHAPEL, situated on the north of the Fountain Court, forms the south side of a small quadrangle. On the outer wall, at each side of the door, are the arms of Henry VIII impaled with Seymour; and the initials H. I. united by a true-lover's knot. The interior of the chapel was fitted up by Queen Anne, adorned with winged angels having musical instruments: the altar-piece is Grecian, with Corinthian columns.

THE GRAND FRONT of Hampton Court Palace on the east was begun 1690, and completed 1694, after the designs of Sir Christopher Wren. This grand elevation is 330 feet in extent, chiefly of brick, but the decorations of stone. The southern front extends 328 feet, of a less embellished character. On the entablature, sustained by four columns, is inscribed GULIELMUS ET MARIA, R. R. E. On a parapet, are placed four statues of Flora, Ceres, Diana, and Pomona.

THE PAINTED GALLERY, and KING'S STAIRCASE, contain numerous rich paintings, especially from subjects of the Roman and Grecian Mythology.

STATE APARTMENTS. The Guard Chamber contains arms for 1,000 men variously placed: many portraits of naval commanders are here seen: over the fireplace is represented Vespasian's amphitheatre at Rome, and opposite is George, prince of Denmark. The King's First Presence Chamber. The Second Presence Chamber. The Audience Chamber. The Drawing Room. The State Bedchamber. The King's Dressing Room. The King's Writing Closet. Queen Mary's Closet. The Queen's State Bedchamber. All these apartments contain many splendid paintings, and rich tapestry, with various sumptuous furniture. In the State Bedchamber is a clock that will go a whole year without winding up!

THE CARTOON GALLERY is most celebrated as containing the Cartoons, the latest and most esteemed works of the "prince of painters," the renowned Raffaelle. They were executed by desire of Pope Leo X, about the year 1510, and represent—

1. The Miraculous Draught of Fishes. Luke v.
2. The Charge to Peter. John xxi.
3. Peter and John healing the Cripple. Acts iii
4. The Death of Ananias. Acts v.
5. Elymas the Sorcerer struck blind. Acts xiii.
6. Paul and Barnabas at Lystra. Acts xiv.
7. Paul Preaching at Athens. Acts xvii.

THE BEAUTY ROOM contains the portraits of Queen Mary, consort of William III, and eight of her distinguished ladies.

THE PLEASURE GARDENS are very extensive and beautiful; and here is a celebrated Vine, which is believed to surpass every one in Europe. It was planted in 1769, and the stem is about thirteen inches in girth: in one season it has produced 2,272 bunches of grapes, weighing 18 cwt.! The Maze, or Wilderness, is a labyrinth, in which some visitors are greatly amused. The whole park and grounds are about three miles in circumference, and are situated about fourteen miles from London.

To an intelligent and devout Christian, one of the most interesting circumstances connected with this royal palace, is the famous "Hampton Conference," to which a reference has been made; but to which, in connection with the new Translation of the Scriptures resulting from that conference, we purpose again calling the attention of the readers of the Christian's Penny Magazine.

A biographical notice of Wolsey, which we had intended should follow this account of Hampton Court Palace, must be postponed till our next Number.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ABRAHAM.

Abraham's Care for the Conjugal Happiness of Isaac.

THE death of his beloved mother, deeply affected the tender heart of Isaac, who, at the period of that event, was thirty-seven years of age. Residing under the consecrated roof of his revered father, he cherished his principles, and walked in his holy footsteps, by faith in the promises of their covenant God.

Abraham contemplated the character of Isaac, the heir of the Divine promises, with heartfelt satisfaction; and his elevated piety was a sure indication of his being blessed and destined for a blessing. Bereaved of his faithful and long-endeared partner, Abraham turned his heart to the son of their affection, anxious to secure his conjugal felicity, before his own removal to his eternal rest. He desired to see him blessed with such a wife, as should be worthy of the excellent son of Sarah, and presiding over an increasing and happy family.

His circumstances among the Hittites were extremely unfavourable to the accomplishment of his wishes. The Canaanitish lords, though polite and courteous to Abraham, had not embraced his religion. They were still degenerating, evidently neglecters of divine worship, and enemies to the true God. Their daughters, though elegant in form and beautiful in features, having been trained in the ceremonies of idolatry, and alienated from spiritual religion like their fathers, might be a snare to Isaac, injurious to his peace of mind, if not the instruments of his eternal ruin. He dreaded an alliance with them for his son; and, after prayer for the Divine direction, he formed a plan for his escape from the tempting danger. He remembered his brother Nahor, who had remained at Haran in Mesopotamia. He had heard of the increase of his family; and, as his brother had been converted from idolatry by his ministry, Abraham had reason to believe that his children were instructed in the doctrine and fear of the Lord.

The holy patriarch called his faithful steward, gave him a commission to make a journey to the house of Nahor, and thence, as he would be directed by an angel of God, to take a suitable wife for his son Isaac. The pious servant executed the important trust committed to him, and succeeded, according to the desire of Abraham, in obtaining the excellent Rebekah. The instructive narrative of this affair belongs more especially to the history of Isaac, in which they shall be further considered. In the mean time, we cannot but observe how little Abraham esteemed the wealth of the Hittite princes, as a portion for their daughters, while they were destitute of the fear of God, and of those principles of religion, which sanctify, and enrich, and ennoble the mind. He well knew the deep corruption of human nature, and the power of female charms; and eminent as was his intelligent piety, Abraham considered his devout son Isaac in far greater danger of being perverted from the ways of sacred truth by the influence of an idolatrous wife, than a woman of Canaan would be likely to be converted to the love and service of the true God, by means of a believing husband. The judgment and conduct of Abraham in this particular, are seriously admonitory, and afford to us, both parents and children, one of the most instructive lessons in the whole of his improving history.

Though sins are found in praying families, yet much is prevented, somewhat is reformed, and all is bewailed.—P. Goodwin.

RELIGION IN FRANCE.

Buonaparte, though equally irreligious with the Atheistical Jacobins, displayed incomparably more policy, and employed the church establishment as a defence of his sovereign power. Perceiving that the Anarchists had failed in their attempt to eradicate all religious belief, and that a great part of the nation was still attached to the Catholic church, and that those clergy who had sacrificed their temporal interests to their religious principles were generally revered, he determined on making the whole of the priesthood his friends, by formally re-establishing the Romish church. For that purpose, a Concordat was entered into between Pope Pius VII and the First Consul; by which it was provided, that the Catholic religion should be that of the state; that the nominal prelates of France should give up their sees, as required by the pope, in order to receive them at the hands of the new government; that the nomination of all vacant sees should be in the first consul, and that of parish priests in the bishops; that the bishops and clergy should, before they entered upon their functions, swear fidelity to the existing government, and engage to discover any designs against the state that came to their knowledge; and, as nearly all the ecclesiastical property had been alienated during the revolution, it was ordained that it should remain in the hands of those who had obtained it, but that the state should provide for the maintenance of the clergy; and that all the rights and prerogatives which the former French monarchs possessed, should be confirmed to the supreme ruler of the French nation. Among other articles of the Concordat, the following enactments were made: "that no bull, brief, or other proclamation of the court of Rome, should be effectual in France without the consent of the government; that no nuncio or legate should be permitted to exercise his functions in France without the consent of the government, or in a way which may derogate from the privileges of the Gallican church. The national council, or diocesan synod, might be held without the consent of government. Disturbances on account of religion to be under the cognizance of that council."

Before the revolution there were, in France, 19 archbishoprics, 118 bishoprics, 257 commanderies of the order of Malta, 16 heads of religious orders, 556 nunneries, 1,356 monasteries, 700 convents of Cordeliers, 1,240 priories, 15,000 chapels having chaplains, 679 chapters, 1,477 convents of all orders, and 40,000 parishes. The number of religious persons, of all orders, has been variously estimated; but the general opinion is, that the total number of male religious amounted to 130,000, and the female religious about 82,000. There is also great difference of opinion as to the amount of income of the clergy before the revolution. M. Necker calculated it at 5,687,000*l.* sterling; of which the cures of parishes had 1,859,375*l.* sterling.

Buonaparte's re-establishment of the hierarchy divided France into ten archbishoprics, with an allowance of 15,000 livres, or 625*l.* each; and fifty bishoprics, with salaries of 10,000 livres, or 416*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*

Napoleon, in thus re-establishing the papal hierarchy, had an imperial diadem in contemplation, and a near prospect of having his temples anointed with the holy consecrating oil, miraculously conveyed to Clovis at his baptism, and as miraculously preserved ever since at Rheims. He was crowned Emperor of the French, Dec. 2, 1804, by the pope in person, in Notre Dame. In order therefore to make the hierarchy the pillar of his throne, and the clergy subservient to his will, and thus form an alliance between the religious creed which they were to inculcate and the sentiments of the people towards the imperial dignity, a Catechism was published, the joint production of himself and his time-serving clergy, as a manual of political and religious belief. This Catechism was sanctioned by the pope's bull, and prefaced by the archbishop of Paris, who enjoined all the clergy of his diocese to use this work alone in the instruction of their flocks. While the pontiff is called by his legate, in the preface to the bull, "Our most holy Lord Pope Pius VII," Buonaparte is styled by the archbishop "The modern Constantine," and "The Protector of the true Religion." Napoleon, in return for such an honourable appellation, and as a faithful son of the church, confirmed the whole, adding the edge of the civil sword to the spiritual, by his authoritative mandate to his minister of religion to see to the execution of the decree. This Catechism was compiled principally from one drawn up by the famous Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, with additions suited to political circumstances, and including all the peculiar doctrines which Protestants regard as antichristian—transubstantiation, the worship of saints and angels by prayer to them, an inherent power in the church to make new commandments or dispense with the old, the immaculate conception of the blessed Virgin, her holy nativity, her divine maternity, perfect obedience, and glorious assumption into heaven, the exclusive privilege of keeping the keys of the kingdom of heaven, which can be entered by none who are not in the pale of the Roman catholic church, &c.

Buonaparte, however, reaped but little advantage from his system of church government, principally from the sternness and irritability of his temper, which could not persist long in apparent veneration for a power of his own creating, but exposed the new prelates to contempt and neglect. The more conscientious of the clergy kept aloof from his court: they could not brook his contemptuous treatment of the Holy Father, whom he kept as a kind of state prisoner, after having brought him all the way from Rome to Paris, to place the imperial diadem on his head: and the pope himself felt indignant at being made a mere tool to serve the purposes of the ambition of Napoleon. Though stript of all his temporalities, he still asserted his high dignity, and spurned at being made a passive instrument in the hands of the very man whom he had crowned; and therefore sternly refused to ordain such as Buonaparte had nominated to the vacant sees; and the bishops, on the other hand, though willing enough to flatter him, and to offer blasphemous thanksgivings for the success of his arms, yet would not support him in opposition to the pope, or act in defiance of the catholic church; and the Gallican church, consequently, remained in a comparatively disorganized state during the whole reign of the Emperor Napoleon.

The mighty emperor falling in 1814, the pope was set at liberty in the revolution; and Louis XVIII, being a most devoted catholic, adopted measures to re-establish the ancient ecclesiastical regime. He added also 5,000,000 of livres, to improve the salaries of the catholic clergy. But the reign of popery in France had been broken: the long disuse of the Romish worship by the present and rising generation, left their minds void of veneration for popery or its rites. Now, as before the Revolution, all the pomp of the catholic worship may be exhibited, and all its forms may prevail, while the mass of the population, who pay some external regard to them, are infidels at heart: and it seems impossible that so acute, intelligent, and scientific a people as the French are, can swallow down the absurdities of doctrine which the Catechism contains, or cordially approve the ceremonies of its worship. The general effect seems to be a disposition to establish a double doctrine—a sys- tem of infidelity for the initiated; with a contemptuous indulgence, and even active encouragement of superstition among the vulgar; similar to that which prevailed among the philosophers of Greece and Rome before the promulgation of Christianity.

Serious impediments to the advancement of evangelical Protestant religion still continued in France, and rather increased under the government of the bigoted Charles X, who became the dupe of the priests and the Jesuits. Popish intolerance became every day more oppressive, and Charles was counselled to set at nought the rights of the people, till they rose against his government as a united nation, determining to humble the intolerant priesthood, and rid themselves of a despotic king. This they accomplished in three days, after much bloodshed, July 27, 28, 29, 1830. The duke of Orleans, now Philip I, was called to the throne, and a new order of things arose, to the admiration of every Protestant nation. The article of the French charter, which declared the "Roman catholic and apostolic religion to be the religion of the state," was abolished, and in its stead the following was adopted: "The ministers of the catholic, apostolic, and Roman religion, professed by the majority of Frenchmen, together with those of other Christian doctrines, shall be supported at the public expense."

Popery has thus received a decisive blow in France, and the field has been opened for the diffusion of pure Christianity, as taught in the Holy Scriptures.

(To be continued.)

SYRIAN CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS.

"The Syrian Christians now exist under three denominations.

"First. The Syrian Churches, of which there are fifty-seven in Quilon and the neighbouring districts, comprehending a Christian population of 70,000 persons, who are governed by a metropolitan, and retain a comparatively pure doctrine, although its professors are in general in low condition.

"Second. The Syro-Roman Churches, who had adopted the Roman ritual with its corruptions, but still perform their worship in the Syrian language. These are in number ninety-seven churches, with a population of about 96,000; viz. fifty-two churches, with a population of about 49,000, under the archbishop of Cranganore; thirty-eight churches, with a population of 40,000, under the vicar apostolic of Verapoli; and seven churches, with a population of about 7,000, under the bishop of Cochin and Quilon.

"Third. The Latin Churches, which have fully conformed to the church of Rome, and use a ritual in the Latin language. These are in number forty churches, with a population of about 54,000; viz. twenty-one churches, with a population of about 29,000, under the vicar apostolic of Verapoli; and nineteen churches, with a population of about 35,000, under the bishop of Cochin and Quilon. In addition to these churches, and dependent on them, there are numerous chapels of ease scattered over the country, in many instances four to each principal church.

"The Syrian churches keep quite distinct from the Latin churches, and do not intermix with them.

"Such of these churches (and they are numerous) as are within the Company's territory, have enjoyed not only that general protection for persons and property, which is common to all classes of natives; but many grants or loans of money, and grants of land for the erection of churches and for cemeteries, have been made to them. A volume might be filled with the details of these grants. The claims of the Christians for protection against Mahomedans and Hindoos, are also not unfrequent. The following is a somewhat remarkable instance. In one of the villages within the territories of the Ex-Paishwa, lately transferred to the Bombay presidency, there appears to have been a body of these native Christians, who, immediately on the establishment of the British power in the district, applied to the magistrate to relieve them from the disagreeable obligation of drawing the Hindoo idol's car on his festival day. The Hindoos put in a formal answer to the claim of exemption, pleading that the practice had continued for more than eighty years, which amounted to custom beyond the memory of man to the contrary. The cause was duly, and it may be presumed ably, argued by native vakeels, before the British magistrate; who decided, that no custom, of however long continuance, could justify a practice so monstrous, as that of compelling Christians to draw the car of an idol. The decision was final: whether it gave universal satisfaction, the record does not state."

Creed of the Syrian Christians of St. Thomas.

To this interesting account by Mr. Fisher, we add the Creed of the Syrian Christians, "being a written communication from the Metropolitan to the Resident of Travancore," and given in the "Report" by Dr. Kerr.

"In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost: We, the Christians, believers in the religion of Jesus Christ, subject to the jurisdiction of Mar Ignatius, patriarch of Antioch, being loyal Jacobians[*], hold the following Creed: —

"We believe in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, Three Persons in one God, neither confounding the persons nor dividing the substance, One in Three, and Three in One.

"The Father generator, the Son generated, and the Holy Ghost proceeding.

"None is before nor after other in majesty, honour, might, and power; coequal, unity in trinity, and trinity in unity.

"We do not believe, with Arius and Eunonimus, that there are three different and separate substances.

"We do not believe, as Sabellius believes, by confusion of substance.

"We do not believe, as Macedonius said, that the Holy Ghost is less than the Father and Son.

"We do not believe, as Mawney and Marcianus said, that the body of Christ was sent down from heaven.

"We do not believe, as Julianus said, that Christ was only man.

"We do not hold, as Nestorius, the doctrine of two natures and two substances in the Messiah.

"We do not believe, as the Chalcedonians said, that there are two natures in the Messiah.

"But we believe, by the doctrine of the Trinity, that the Son is coequal with the Father, without beginning or end: that, in the appointed time, through the disposition of the Father and the Holy Ghost, without disjoining from the right side of the Father, he appeared on earth for the salvation of mankind: that he was incarnate, God and man: so that, in the union of the divine and human nature, there was one nature and one substance. So we believe."

[*] Eastern Christians, who renounce the communion of the Greek church, and differ from it both in doctrine and worship, may be comprehended under two distinct classes. To the former belong the Monophysites, or Jacobites, so called from Jacob Albardai, who declare it as their opinion, that in the Saviour of the world there is only one nature; while the latter comprehends the followers of Nestorius, frequently called Chaldeans, from the country where they principally reside, and who declare that there are two distinct persons, or natures, in the Son of God.

The Church Missionary Society has paid considerable attention to the Syrian Christians, especially in the revival and advancement of learning amongst them. The establishment of a college at Cotym is an important object in this respect, as by it a supply and succession of faithful pastors may be raised up, not only for their own churches, but to spread the gospel to the heathen. The Committee of the Church Missionary Society, in their Report for 1831, state,—"The experience of each succeeding year recommends the principle on which this Mission has been undertaken and conducted; and although it may be long before the ulterior objects of the Society are attained, there is reasonable ground for the conviction, that in attempting, under the Divine blessing, the renovation of that ancient church, the foundation has been laid of permanent and extensive good to the Heathen population with which it has been surrounded. Let but the Syrian church in Travancore be restored to the pure faith of Christ, and she will become a faithful witness for God among those who dishonour and disobey him, and a light to guide many of those who are now in darkness into the way of life and peace."

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XLI.

Upon those points in which the Education of Females ought to be different from that of Males.

Dear Madam,

I AM about to conclude my advice to you upon Education by letter, in four additional Letters devoted to the topic now named.

It has generally been believed, that the education of females ought to be essentially distinct from that of boys; and though the difference is undoubtedly estimated at less now than it used to be, still it is even now supposed to be considerable.

For my part, I cannot see any reason why the physical, moral, intellectual, and religious education of the two sexes should not be in all respects the same, except in those branches of the intellectual part only, which are directed towards the pursuit of some particular profession. It would not, for instance, be requisite or advisable in general circumstances, that the sister of a boy who is to be educated for a learned profession, should learn Latin and Greek along with her brother; but in every other general branch of education, there ought to be no difference.

I see no reason why a girl should not bowl a hoop and be amused in the open air as well as a boy. There are abundant reasons, which I cannot particularize, which require that every female should possess the most vigorous, healthy, and active frame of body, and all the moral habits and moral knowledge, and all the abstract intellectual culture, and certainly all the religious knowledge, which is allotted to a son in the same family. Ought the education, in the proper sense, of the mother of the future generation to be less accurate and comprehensive than that of the father? Since the character of the offspring is dependent far more upon her than upon him, ought it not to be at least equal?

But with regard to the physical education, it has too long been imagined, that the compression of her form from birth to womanhood, by barbarous swathings, is essential to elegance of shape; and hence has arisen the disinclination to exercise, and even the physical incapacity of it. It has also been imagined, that were the physical education of girls to be the same with that of boys, they would acquire a roughness inconsistent with the approved notions of female delicacy and beauty. The preventive appears to me to be obvious. Let the entire fourfold system of education be begun and carried on at once, and let each branch be attended to in its own due proportion, and the influence of each will best aid that of every other, and the united effect will be proper and even beautiful.

True feminine delicacy does not consist in imbecility and helplessness; but of all women, those who have been bred up as if it did, are the least lovely. Health is beauty; and the desire of Bishop Ken for his daughter speaks a volume of directions:—

"But, oh! be thine a frame with health,
The truest beauty, blest."

Beauty, dignity, grace, elegance, are all natural, or they never exist. Nor can they ever be acquired: where they exist they are never aimed at; where they do not, all imitation of them is affectation, and all affectation is worse than downright ugliness.

I could wish then that a female from her earliest dawn be left utterly to nature as to her form and as to her manners, and every means adopted to render her healthy, full grown, and robust. The vigour of her health, the strength of her mind, the natural unaffected bearing of her manners, constitute general loveliness, compared with which, the timid, invalided, and helpless girl of a fashionable boarding school is an object of the deepest commiseration.

With regard to the moral cultivation of the female mind, no question surely can exist, whether an identity of system should be pursued in both cases.

In the intellectual branch, it appears to me that the same rules are generally applicable; namely, that she should be educated with a view to the station which she is likely to fill in after-life, that station being inferred from that occupied by her parents.

Yet how many instances may we observe, in which the folly and vanity of the parents utterly destroy the prospects of their children in this respect! Perhaps they have set their mind upon educating their eldest or other daughter at a fashionable boarding-school. There, conscious of the inferiority of her family to that of the girls around her, she becomes chagrined, or else degenerates into a sycophant, or becomes contemptuous. Still she is sent thither by the silly parents under the idea, that the more they educate her, the higher will her station be hereafter. She will marry all the better for it; and whatever they may endure in making up the expenses, they will find all repaid when some wealthy suitor, attracted by mere excellence, as is sure to be the case, selects the girl, not indeed already living in a mansion, but so accomplished and clever, transplants her to his own. At all events, the father thinks it is education makes the man or woman, and therefore he will do all he can to educate his children, as he calls it, and then he need do no more: they are sure to find their level; they will then make their way; or at the least the child so expensively finished will be able to instruct her other sisters; as if any child could, or would, or ought to be set to be the governess of her sisters! What is the result? The girl goes home, and brings several glaring pieces of embroidery, a portfolio full of drawings, a prize for her French exercises, and she can play the Battle of Prague or Handel's Hallelujah Chorus, and she can dance several quadrilles; she has also learned to dress and to talk affectedly.

Accordingly, many a pitying neighbour smiles at the transformation, and the simplicity of a neighbouring villager enables him to predict the result. The young men of their acquaintance are dazzled and confounded, to the infinite satisfaction of the father and mother, at the manners of their daughter: but any sensible young man, who expects to get his own living, knows better than to choose her for a wife. Generally some wondering farmer's son is attracted by her charms, and actually half dies in love for her: at length he ventures to disclose his passion: he is then either indignantly refused, or if he or a tradesman of similar taste should succeed, then is there no need of a conjurer's sagacity to foresee the result.

In this case, the girl and her parents are actuated by the love of his wealth or likelihood to do well; but his wife, helpless, ignorant of all that can tend to his happiness, expensive and affected, secretly reflects on the sacrifice she has made, learns to think of her husband with a benevolent pity, discloses to her intimate friend that he is really a good kind of man, though not the most elegant and informed in the world, whom she loves quite well enough to make very comfortable! Not unfrequently the comfort spoken of comes to, the ruin and poverty of all parties. If not, then in their own family, you may see in the bedizened girls and the affectation of the mother, continued through life, the genuine effects of the system. Not unfrequently do the grossest quarrels ensue, when the wife is sure to remind her husband of her superiority, and what a sacrifice it was for a girl of her education to marry him. Very often, however, there is no wondering clown or bewildered tradesman at hand, and the young lady passes her days in single blessedness, like "the cowslip growing upon the rock, alone, and mildly smiling," and retaining notions of her superiority throughout her existence; or more probably turning shrew, and despising her neighbours and hating the human race; and not unfrequently compelled by the mutation of circumstances to accept some situation, whose duties cause her acquired notions to constitute the perpetual source of chagrin.

These are the ill effects of the disproportion of female education to prospects and circumstances in one instance, and in one walk of human life; but the consequences are similar under every variety. The differences between the various grades of society are so little, as to occasion that, even in the very highest and the very lowest, the qualities in the female essential to domestic happiness must be nearly the same.—I am, dear Madam, yours, &c. CLERICUS.

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE SERIES OF ESSAYS.

II. REVERENCE. The love which has already been described, will be found to be quite consistent with that reverential feeling, so necessary to be entertained towards God, and the reasons for which I will now endeavour to explain.

1. Because he is the source of all existence. From the throne of his High Majesty, he contemplates the children of men; and, behold! they are as grasshoppers in his sight. A word from him is of sufficient power to call into existence every variety of human life; and every possible organization of matter. On what side soever we turn our eyes, subjects present themselves to convince us of the all-prevailing energy of Him whose wondrous works in the creation are thus described in Holy Writ: "He spake, and it was done." All that we see around us proclaims, that while infinite benevolence has induced the Creator to make his dwelling-place with the children of men, yet that he has been willing to show that infinite power is necessary to form a place wherein the operations of Deity shall be seen. Seest thou that little insect? Mark the elaborate care and skill with which each tiny portion of its fabric is adjusted, and how marvellously every part of the body is qualified to perform the office which its Creator has designed it for. Look again at that huge animal, the lash of whose tail causes commotions in the mighty waters—no less wisdom and power is displayed in its formation. Cast thy eyes over the blooming landscape before thee, and as thou admirest the green verdure of that carpet which is spread over the earth, and the graceful and blooming aspect of the trees, and the still and gentle meandering of the stream, and the joyous carol of the birds, and the lowing of the oxen, and the bleating of the sheep; think of Him who is the Author of them all: and (if thou canst) contemplate the wondrous mechanism which is contained in the earth, to produce effects which would strike man dumb with reverence for their Maker, if it were not for the repetition of them which everywhere abounds, and which, while it does in fact more elevate the Almighty, still makes men regardless and unconcerned.

2. But there is a method whereby I think we may gain still more abundant reasons for reverence; and that is, by removing our attention from the general view of the subject, and fixing it upon the particular; or, in other words, by regarding God as our Creator. There is at all times a great degree of reverence felt to be due to those who have rightful authority over us, and still more so when that authority is derived from some nearness of connection existing between the parties. We look, or at least ought to look, with reverence to our parents; and when we remember that the express command of God enforces this duty, we shall be prepared for the argument adopted by the apostle, that if such reverence was due to our earthly parents, who like ourselves were liable to err, who were interested in the mode of conduct pursued towards them, and who for a short time only exercised this authority; we should much rather be in subject to the great Father of all, who only could claim absolute dominion over us. Let therefore the poorest and the meanest; those whom rank has not elevated to notice among their fellow-men, and for whom fortune has not spread a bed of roses; rejoice in the cheering announcement, which bids them regard the God of heaven as their Father, and let each one for himself apply to his own heart the pleasing intelligence, and look up to heaven with the eye of faith, exclaiming, "Doubtless thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us."

3. There is also another character in which we are bound to view God, and the effect of which upon the mind of every reflecting man must be to produce sentiments of the deepest reverence. A day is yet to come, and (if the records of prophecy may be relied on) at no distant period, when the unnumbered tribes of earth shall stand in one vast assemblage before the judgment-seat of Christ. Undisguised by the distinction which rank has conferred upon him, and unconcealed because of the obscurity and lowness of his station, shall each man appear at that tribunal. Can we then view with feelings of unconcern the character of Him who is to decide our future destiny, and fix us for ever in realms of never-fading joy, or in regions where no gleam of hope can come? Were it our lot on earth to be placed in similar circumstances with our fellow-creature, we should feel deeply interested in knowing what his disposition would most likely be towards us. Shall we then be less anxious concerning that which is incalculably more important? Children of men, are ye not deceiving yourselves? Are ye not acting a part quite inconsistent with the wisdom and foresight ye are apt to manifest in worldly things? Are ye unmoved at the idea of appearing naked and alone, at the bar of one who knows every secret of your heart, and will not fail to unravel that which you thought too securely concealed for any power to comprehend? Fear ye not me? saith the Lord. Will ye not tremble at my coming? Let not, however, the Christian be dismayed at such announcements: to him they have no terror. What though the Lord shall come, and all his holy angels with him; and what if the earth shall be destroyed, and every vestige of human greatness crumble into nothingness: what though the blast of the archangel's trumpet shall awake the sleeping myriads whose bones lie mouldering in the tomb! Is there in this more than we expect? Have not all the promises of the gospel reference to this? And can we think that the word of Jesus shall be broken, or a declaration that has proceeded from his mouth fail of effect? He has promised to protect his saints, and therefore, though you cannot fail to view him with reverence in his high character as Judge of quick and dead; yet forget not that he is the Saviour, and has now gone into heaven, to prepare for you a mansion that shall never be moved.

III. Resignation. It cannot be doubted that this is most difficult to practise, since we are often placed in circumstances of a trying and most distressful nature. It is hard to see our friends drop one by one into the grave, our fortunes decay, our hopes wither, and our health decline; and yet believe that infinite mercy superintends it all. But so in truth it is: the trials of this life must be borne; murmuring does not remove them: and since he who believes them to be the work of God is best able to bear up under them, let each one of us resolve to adopt this wisest course whenever we are oppressed or afflicted. But it must be borne in mind that resignation means more than submission: it means more than restraining complaints, for that may be forced upon us by the consideration of their uselessness; and it remains only for me therefore to describe the constituent parts of this most excellent disposition.

1. We must feel assured of the wisdom of our Governor. Our bounded view sees only a little way, and we imagine that many of the sorrows of life might be spared. But never let it be forgotten, that God knows the end from the beginning: that no circumstances can mislead, no difficulties be too great for his overruling providence. Left to our own direction, we should adopt many a foolish plan, and pursue many a hurtful course of conduct; but under his protection we are safe. Let then experience of the past afford a firm basis for resignation in the future. The history of those who have gone before us has shown (imperfectly indeed), that the hand which guided them through this weary pilgrimage, acted upon principles and from motives of the most exalted nature, and therefore, that since He fainteth not, neither is weary, the same may be believed of our own condition. The future world, to which we are hastening, will remove all our doubts upon the subject.

2. Let us confide in his paternal care. The ruler of the universe is not indifferent to the welfare of the meanest of his subjects, but feels for each an affection, far exceeding that which earthly parents bear towards their children. Oh! I am sure we overlook these declarations of scripture, and too often view God rather in a repulsive than an attractive character. But this is not just; this is not acting with becoming confidence in one who has left no means untried to convince us of his tenderness. Henceforth, therefore, let us go forth into the scenes of life in humble trust and confidence in him: let us feel assured, that under all circumstances his eye is fixed upon us; and let us banish for ever the unwarrantable fear, that he can have any purpose concerning us inconsistent with his character of Father. And till we can believe that a parent can calmly sit down, contemplate the future misery of his child, and adopt methods of reducing him to hopeless wretchedness, and yet be called a loving parent: let us cast from us as unworthy of being entertained for one moment any suspicion, that our heavenly Father is unmindful of our welfare, and careless of our sufferings.

3. Let us believe in his power. The unhappy worldling can never accuse God for his distress, seeing that God has never said that happiness shall be our lot on earth. But he has bid us anticipate a future state where unmixed joy shall reign for ever. View, therefore, this world as a state of probation; all the circumstances of which are intended by the Almighty to render us more qualified for that future service which he designs that we shall render to him. Instead therefore of grieving at distress, let us view it as a fresh testimony of the brightness of our future crown; and though even an inspired apostle could not deny, that now, no trouble seems joyous but grievous, yet he felt himself bound to declare, that every thing we had to endure was working out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

Thus have I drawn my subject to a close, under the perfect conviction, that Universal Resignation to the will of God is the greatest and most desirable of objects. And acting on this principle, it shall yet be the lot of each to meet their Christian friends in an eternal world of joy and peace. And oh! how far would it exceed my most sanguine expectations, if in those realms of glory I should meet with one, whom my feeble efforts had induced to say, "This God is my God for ever and ever, he shall be my guide unto death." Amen.

Death-Bed Testimonies.

COLLECTED BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM BUTTON.

No. XI.

REV. WILLIAM ROMAINE,

Rector of St. Ann's, Blackfriars, London. Died July 26th, 1795, aged 81.

On Friday, June 5th, 1795, calling on an intimate friend, as soon as seated, he said, without any introduction, "Set thine house in order, for thou shalt die, and not live." His friend asked him if had any particular meaning in reciting this Scripture. He said, "No; but these words are much impressed on my mind, and they are a proper admonition to us all." He slept that night at the house of Mr. W———, at Balaam Hill. At six o'clock next morning he came down to breakfast, presided as usual in family devotion, and prayed earnestly, that "God would fit them for, and support them in all the trials of that day, which might be many." After breakfast, being about to return to London to prepare for the service of the next day, he was suddenly taken ill, but not so much indisposed as to prevent his immediate return to town. On his way, he conversed very profitably, and with pleasure and energy, on the approach of death, and the near prospect of eternity, and said, "Oh! how animating is the view I now have of death, and the hope which is laid up for me in heaven, full of glory and immortality."

As soon as taken ill, though sensible it was for death, there was that sweet reliance upon the promise and truth of God, the necessity of which he had so often inculcated. Hence arose that remarkable patience, that not one fretful or murmuring word ever escaped his lips. His only companion was his Hebrew Psalter, which lay ever before him, and out of which he frequently read a verse or two, not being able to attend to more. The nature of his disorder was such that he could speak but little; and being asked if he would see some company, he replied, "I need no better company than I enjoy." At various times he was asked how he was: "As well as I can be on this side heaven," was his general answer. Once he replied to the same question, "As well as possible while in this vile body, which plagues and torments me." A few days after his seizure, he said to those about him, "You are taking much pains to prop up this feeble body: I thank you for it, but it will not do now." At another time, when in one of his lowest frames, being asked if God was with him; he replied, "Yes, he is indeed, and he is MY God." To another friend he observed, respecting the weakness of his body, "It is all mercy, all mercy." A person calling upon business, he took the opportunity of saying, he hoped he was better, and happy in his views. "Yes," replied he, "upon that point I have no doubt, for I have much of the presence of Jesus with me." To a brother in the ministry, who came to see him in his journey through London, he said, "I do not repent of one word that I have ever printed or preached on faith in Jesus, for I now feel the blessed comforts of that precious doctrine." Another time he said, "I have been in deep waters, but I have enjoyed much comfort." After having been from home, upon his return, Mr. Goode visited him, and found him a little revived; to whom he said, "I have lain long in the arms of death, and if recovering, it is very slowly; but this is but a poor dying life at best; however, I am in His hands who will do the best for me," and added with peculiar energy, "I am sure of that: I have lived to experience all I have spoken, and all I have written, and I bless God for it." To another friend he said, "I have the peace of God in my conscience, and the love of God in my heart; and that, you know, is sound experience." And again, "I knew the doctrines I preached to be truth, and now I experience them to be blessings." He had been accustomed to say in health, "I desire to die with the language of the publican on my lips, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.'" In this his desire was fulfilled; for to an acquaintance he said, "I thank you for coming to see a saved sinner." When he again left town, his strength rapidly decayed; but now, as his outward man perished, his inward man was renewed day by day. A friend admiring his patience in his weak state, quoted that scripture, "My soul is as a weaned child." He replied, "A child is sometimes cross when weaning," to which Mrs. Romaine said, "Yes, but when weaned it is quiet;" thereby intimating he had fully proved he was a weaned child.

A few mornings before his death, he read in family worship the chapter which records Hezekiah's sickness, and said, "Now I should have none of this weakness and languishing if I had no sin; but God be thanked for hope in death, yea, for life in death."

On the 23d of July, as he was at breakfast, he said, "It is now sixty years since God opened my mouth to publish the everlasting sufficiency and eternal glory of the salvation of Christ Jesus; and it has now pleased him to shut my mouth, that my heart might feel and experience what my mouth has so often spoken."

The next day, after being helped down stairs, he said, "O how good is God! what a good night he has favoured me with! O what a blessed prospect I now see before me;" requesting, as he had often done, that prayer without ceasing might be made for him, that his faith and patience might not fail. Mrs. R. coming in, said, "I hope, my dear, you now find God your support, and his promises of life in Christ Jesus your comfort." "Yes," he replied, "now, when my heart, my flesh, and strength fail, my God is the strength of my heart and my portion for ever." He then spoke to her in language expressive of the most tender affection, and thanking her for all her care of him, said, "Come, my love, that I may bless you. The Lord be with you, a covenant God for ever, to save and bless you." He spoke with the same tenderness and affection to his son. The lady of the house on hearing this said, "Have you not a blessing for me, Sir?" "Yes," said he, "I have, I pray God to bless you," and so he said to every one that came to him. The night following, he was rather restless, and in the morning was not able to come down stairs. His friend returned from town about three o'clock, and went up to ask him how he did; he answered, "Very well, I am glad to see you." He then shook hands with him, and said, "Are you going to town again?" "No," replied his friend, "I am come to pray to God to bless you now with the comforts of his sweet salvation, and to give you the blessed possession and enjoyment of life everlasting." Upon which he cried out with solemnity, earnestness, and delight, "Amen! Amen! Amen!"

About an hour before he died, his friend and host went up to him, and said, "I hope, Sir, you now find the salvation of Jesus Christ precious to you." He replied, "Yes, yes, yes; he is precious to my soul." "More precious than rubies," said his friend. "Yes, yes, yes; all that can be desired is not to be compared to him." "Now," added his friend, "He is the chiefest of ten thousand." "Yes, yes; A TREE OF LIFE."

The last words he was heard to utter were "HOLY, HOLY, HOLY, BLESSED JESUS, TO THEE BE ENDLESS PRAISE!"

Unable any longer to articulate, he continued in the exercise of devotion; for his lips were seen to move, and his hands were so clasped, as to indicate that his soul was in communion with God; and a little before one o'clock, on the Lord's day morning, July 26th, he fell asleep in Jesus, and entered into that eternal rest which remains for the people of God.

FRIENDSHIP.

What is Friendship? a fair flower, that grew
In Eden's garden, of the richest hue;
It flourish'd there till Satan enter'd in,
When its chief beauty was despoil'd by sin;
Thus blighted, thus defac'd, it then became
O'errun with weeds that soon assum'd its name;
No more on earth perfection it attains,
But at full growth arrives on heavenly plains,
And (though too seldom found in earthly fields)
Where'er it grows, it still a fragrance yields.

INTERIOR OF GUILDHALL, LONDON.

DON being the metropolis of the most powerful ire on earth, and the greatest mart of trade in the ld, must needs have public offices corresponding its political importance, and the magnitude of its business. Some of these, particularly the BANK ENGLAND, and the TOWER, have already been debed to the readers of the Christian's Penny Maga-, with notices of their connection with the preserva- or promotion of religion.

UILDHALL, the hall of the corporation, so called n the old Saxon word guildscip, signifying corporation, is appropriated to the chief public offices of the city of London. Here the large public meetings of the city are held, the lord mayor chosen, and the members for the representation of the city in parliament. Before the erection of this building, the Court Hall, or Bury, as it was called, was held in Alderman-bury, so denominated from the place of meeting of the city senators, or aldermen. Guildhall was commenced in the year 1411, and completed in 1432, erected partly by voluntary contributions, and partly by sums raised for pardons of offenders, and by fines. Guildhall was so injured by the Great Fire of London in 1666, that it was necessary to rebuild it, and the whole was completed in three years.

Besides the Hall, there are included in this building, the Chamberlain's Office, the Court of King's Bench, in which the Lord Mayor's Court, and Sessions of the Peace of the City, are held, a Court of Common Pleas, a Court of Exchequer, and a court called the Common Council Chamber, for the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Councilmen.

The principal Hall is 153 feet long, 48 feet broad, and 55 feet in height, adorned with splendid marble monuments in honour of Mr. Beckford, the Earl of Chatham, Lord Viscount Nelson, and the late Mr. Pitt. Besides these, and the gorgeous grotesque figures of GOG and MAGOG, there are portraits of our judges, who frequently tried causes under this roof. "I may direct the reader's attention," says Pennant, in his "History of London," to twelve of that order of peculiar merit: these are the portraits of the able and virtuous SIR MATTHEW HALE, and his eleven contemporary judges, who, after the dreadful fire of 1666, regulated the building of the city of London, by such wise rules, as to prevent the endless vexations and law suits which might ensue, and been little less chargeable than the fire itself had been. This was principally owing to Sir Mathew Hale, who conducted the business, and sat with his brethren in Clifford's Inn, to compose all differences between landlord and tenant."

CELEBRATED FEASTS IN GUILDHALL.

Scarcely any subject has occasioned so much conversation, in connection with Guildhall, as the sumptuous Feasts: a few observations on this topic may be made edifying even to Christian readers: two especially, which will excite considerable interest, one relating to that of the last popish archbishop of Canterbury; and the other, that which was given to the Allied Sovereigns and the Prince Regent, in 1814.

Pennant informs us, "The first time that this hall was used on festive occasions, was by Sir John Shaw, goldsmith, knighted in the field of Bosworth. After building the essentials of good kitchens and other offices, in the year 1500, he gave here the Mayor's feast, which before had usually been done in Grocers' Hall. They at length grew to such excess, that, in the time of Philip and Mary, a sumptuary law was made to restrain the expenses both of provisions and liveries."

From the same author we learn, that in the enthronization feast of archbishop Warham, in March, 1504, the first course was preceded by "a warner, conveyed upon a rounde boorde of viii panes, with viii towres embattled and made with flowres, standynge on every towre a bedil in his habite, with his staffe: and in the same boorde, first the kyng syttinge in his parliament, with his lordes about hym in their robes, and Saint Wylliam, lyke an archbishop, syttinge on the ryght hand of the kyng; then the chaunceler of Oxforde, with other doctors about hym, presented the said Lord Wylliam, kneelyng, in a doctor's habite, unto the kyng, with his commend of vertue and cunnynge, &c. &c. And on the third boorde of the same warner, the Holy Ghoste appeared with bryght beames proceedyng from hym of the gyftes of grace towarde the sayde lorde of the feaste."

On Saturday, June the 18th, 1814, Alexander, Emperor of Russia, Frederick, King of Prussia, George IV, then Prince Regent of England, with about twenty other royal personages, and many of the great Generals of different nations who had signalized themselves in overthrowing the Emperor Napoleon, and terminating the dreadful war in Europe, were entertained by the Corporation of London in Guildhall. How far this sumptuous entertainment might be the means of cementing the hearts of these great sovereigns in cordial friendship, which they now professed, or of securing the patronage of Alexander and Frederick for the Bible Societies in Russia and Prussia, it may not be possible to ascertain; but under the influence of the pious Prince Galitzin, a Bible Society had been formed at Petersburgh in 1813, which received the generous support of Alexander after his return to his capital; and the national Prussian Bible Society was instituted under royal patronage, after the return of Frederick.

Lord Mayor's feasts are proverbial for indisposing those who partake of them for business as well as devotion: but it appears the Royal Visitors were present, on the day preceding their dining at Guildhall, at the Annual Meeting of the Charity Children at St. Paul's Cathedral; and on the day following, Sunday, June 19, the Emperor and his sister privately attended a Meeting of Friends (the Quakers) in St. Martin's Lane!

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICE OF CARDINAL WOLSEY.

THOMAS WOLSEY was the son of a butcher at Ipswich, born in 1471, and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. He was a youth of great parts; and, making considerable proficiency in learning, he became tutor to the sons of Grey, marquis of Dorset, who gave him the rectory of Lymington, in Hampshire, and opened the way for him at court. Prompted by ambition, he sought and obtained promotion and favour under Henry VII, who sent him on an embassy to the emperor, and, on his return, made him dean of Lincoln. Henry VIII gave him the living of Torrington, in Devonshire; and afterwards appointed him register of the garter and canon of Windsor. He next obtained the deanery of York; and attending the king to Tournay in France, in 1513, was made bishop of that city. Honours fell upon him in a degree equal to his ambition. "He was rapacious," says Sir James Mackintosh; "but it was in order to be prodigal in his household, in his dress, in his retinue, in his palaces, and, it must be added, in justice to him, in the magnificence of his literary and religious foundations. The circumstances of his time were propitious to his passion of acquiring money. The pope, the emperor, the kings of France and Spain, desirous of his sovereign's alliance, outbade each other at the sales of a minister's influence; which change of circumstances, and inconsistency of connection, rendered, during that period, more frequent than in most other times. His preferment was too enormous and too rapid to be forgiven by an envious world."

In 1514 he was advanced to the bishopric of Lincoln; and the same year he was made archbishop of York. In 1515 he succeeded archbishop Warham in the office of lord chancellor: the king obtained for him the same year a cardinalship; and, in 1519, he was made the pope's legate in England, with the extraordinary power of suspending the laws and canons of the church. He made every possible effort to obtain the triple crown of his holiness the pope; and was near succeeding, but for the preponderating influence of the emperor, Charles V.

Wolsey's "passion for shows and festivities—not an uncommon infirmity in men intoxicated by sudden wealth—perhaps served him with a master, whose ruling folly long seemed to be of the same harmless and ridiculous nature. He encouraged and cultivated the learning of his age; and his conversations with Henry, on the doctrines of their great master Aquinas, are represented as one of his means of pleasing a monarch so various in his capricious tastes. He was considered as learned; his manners had acquired the polish of the society to which he was raised; his elocution was fluent and agreeable; his air and gesture were not without dignity. He was careful, as well as magnificent, in apparel. As he was chiefly occupied in enriching and aggrandizing himself, or in displaying his wealth — objects which are to be promoted either by foreign connections or by favour at court — it is impossible to determine what share of the merit or demerit of internal legislation ought to be allotted to him."

The cardinal's influence and income were prodigious. Mackintosh says, "In the league against the emperor (in 1527), under the auspices of the pope, and thence called 'Most Clement,' and 'Most Holy,' Henry VIII was declared 'Protector of the holy league;' with an estate in Naples of 30,000 crowns a-year for himself, and of 10,000 crowns a-year to the cardinal. The bribes were afterwards increased to much larger sums." As his revenues were immense, Wolsey's pride and ostentation were carried to the greatest height: for he had five hundred servants: among whom were nine or ten lords, fifteen knights, and forty esquires.

Wolsey's administration continued, seemingly with unabated sway, till 1527; when that ambitious minister, who delighted as much in displaying as in exercising power, became at last unpopular from the haughtiness of his measures: though the principles of his government had given just alarm; as, from 1516 to 1523, no parliament had been assembled, and money was raised by forced loans and pretended benevolences.

Wolsey, being employed by Henry to obtain a divorce from his queen Catherine, was found to have been carrying on a secret correspondence with the papal court, to prolong the discussion of the question, in the decision of which the emperor, Charles V, was so deeply interested. "The emperor did not fail to communicate to his aunt, the queen of England, the intrigues carried on at Rome; and her remaining friends at court conveyed the intelligence from her to the king."

The attorney-general, Oct. 9, 1529, commenced a prosecution against him for carrying on an illicit and clandestine correspondence with the court of the pope, and procuring bulls from Rome without licence from the king. On the 17th of the same month the great seal was taken from him; and Dec. 1, 1529, the lords, with Sir Thomas More, the new chancellor, at their head, presented an address to the king, enumerating various articles of accusation against the tottering cardinal; and praying he might no more have any power, jurisdiction, or authority, within the realm. Thomas Cromwell, his grateful servant, in the Commons, defended the cardinal from the charge of treason. But Wolsey confessed his offence against the statute of premunire; and the court pronounced their sentence, "that he was out of the protection of the law; that his lands, goods, and chattels, were forfeited; and that his person was at the mercy of the king." The cardinal, with his vast possessions, fell by this sentence into the king's hands. Henry sent some presents and kind messages to his discarded minister; and suffered him to remain at Esher, in Surrey, a country-house of his bishopric of Winchester. Here, however, the king left him without provisions for his table, or furniture for his apartments. In February, 1530, Wolsey was pardoned, and restored to his see of Winchester, and to the abbey of St. Alban's; with a grant of 6,000*l*., and of all other rents not parcel of the archbishopric of York. Even that great diocese was afterwards restored. He arrived at Cawood Castle in September 1530, where he employed himself in magnificent preparations for his installation on the archiepiscopal throne: but at that moment his final ruin seems resolved on, and the earl of Northumberland was chosen to apprehend him for high treason. He was carried first to Lord Shrewsbury's castle at Sheffield, where he was compelled by his distempers to rest, and afterwards to the abbey of Leicester. He breathed his last at that place, Nov. 30, 1530, aged 59 years. The dying words of this wretched man were most memorable, and highly instructive to all classes of hypocritical professors of religion — "If I had served God as diligently as I have done the king, he would not have given me over in my grey hairs. This is the just reward that I must receive for the pains I have taken to do him service, not regarding my service to God!"

RELIGION IN FRANCE.

PROTESTANTISM in France was baptized in rivers of blood: and its churches in the southern parts of the kingdom, where it principally flourished, declined after the dreadful persecution which arose on the revocation of the "Irrevocable Edict of Nantz." See an account of those atrocious papal cruelties in the Christian's Penny Magazine, vol. ii, p. 187, 203.

Popery being favoured by Louis XVIII, at his restoration and the fall of Napoleon, persecution was partially renewed against the remaining Protestants, especially at Nismes, where dreadful outrages were committed, with some bloodshed. Still there appeared scarcely any efforts made to extend the saving knowledge of the gospel of Christ in that great country, till after the London Missionary Society sent deputations to visit and excite the Protestant churches in France. Dr. Bogue was requested by that Society to write an "Essay on the New Testament," proving the divinity of Christianity. This excellent work was translated into French, and circulated with some good effects; and at length, in 1818, a Protestant Bible Society was formed at Paris, which has now many auxiliaries: and many thousand Bibles have been circulated. A Religious Tract Society has also been formed in France, which has succeeded in forming depôts in many parts. "The Asiatic Society" in Paris have materially co-operated with the British and Foreign Bible Society in London, by their learned labours in editing versions of the New Testament in the Oriental languages, for circulation in Turkey and the East.

Prison Discipline and Reform Societies have also been adopted from England with some success. A "Society for Elementary Instruction," was formed at Paris in 1815, on the system of the British and Foreign School Society, which has several years ago numbered almost 2,000 schools; and the society are endeavouring to extend the benefits of education, by means of Sunday schools, especially in the south of France. In 1821, a society was formed at Paris for the promotion of "Christian Morals, Peace, and Knowledge," of which the Duke of Rochefoucauld Liancourt was President, and in 1822, an "Evangelical Missionary Society" was instituted, the Count Verhueil, Peer of France, President.

France, since the revolution of 1830, and the separation of the Roman Catholic religion from the state, has presented a new scene for the contemplation of Protestants. But by this policy it is not to be supposed, that the new king and government became religious. "Christianity," says an intelligent observer near the centre of authority, "had not more enemies in France under the old government, than it has under the new. With us, Christianity is always blended with catholicism, and catholicism with the priests by whom it is taught. But as the priests are generally opposed to the new order of things, and as they boldly avow their opposition, it follows, the liberals, who form the more enlightened part of the nation, conceive a hatred for every kind of religion, and become infidels, as a consequence of their political system. They consider the gospel of God our Saviour as responsible for all the faults committed by some intriguing and ambitious priests."

Several missionaries have been sent forth by the friends of the gospel from the "Society of Missions" in France, to labour in South Africa; and many new religious publications have been issued by the few leading Christian patriots, for the spiritual benefit of their country. An English Protestant minister at Paris, wrote a short time ago, "Since the revolution, we have opened several chapels, several schools, and have also commenced several meetings in different quarters of Paris. After having filled a place of worship, near the Boulevard des Italiens, the most fashionable part of Paris, we have rented a large hall on the Boulevards. Every sabbath morning, we have here a most respectable, steady, and serious auditory. Many Protestants of the first rank in society, who very seldom attend on public worship, are constant in their attendance here; and many Catholics are delighted with the means afforded them of informing and edifying themselves. Of each class, not a few have felt and evinced the power of the truth of the gospel of Christ applied to the conscience and the heart by the Holy Ghost. A Sunday school is formed here, and the children are taught by ladies and gentlemen, who are resolved for the diffusion of the gospel. The friends who attend at this chapel subscribe towards the general expense of the chapel and schools, about 300*l.* per annum. This is the beginning of the voluntary support of the gospel ministry by the French, who are accustomed to look to the government to do every thing.

"Our great anxiety at this moment is, for the Fauxbourg du Temple; a quarter peopled by poor workmen and their needy families, living in the grossest ignorance. After the revolution, we began worship in a small room. The hearers soon overflowed: their children accompanied them, and were presented for instruction; their numbers and their interest rapidly and regularly increased. We were obliged to change and enlarge our plans and accommodations, to establish Sunday schools, day schools, evening schools; and at this hour more than 600 scholars of both sexes, and of all ages, are inscribed on our registers, and receive instruction, or are promised admission. God has provided us with Christian masters and mistresses: they open and close the exercise of each school with prayer, and teach the scholars both to read and understand the Scriptures. The interest, intelligence, and progress of the scholars and hearers, are very cheering. The municipal authorities already appreciate our efforts, and offer us every facility and protection, from the usefulness of our religion. Other efforts are in progress; among which are the translation of valuable works of doctrinal and practical divinity; aiding pious young men in their academical studies; promoting the circulation of Bibles and tracts: the establishment of Scripture readers: and the opening of chapels for Protestant worship, and the faithful preaching of the Word of God. These efforts are independent of those of the Bible Society, the Continental Society, Tract and School Societies, and other public institutions. Besides, a plan is in progress for placing a public library in every one of the 40,000 communes, or parishes, into which the kingdom of France is divided."

THE FRENCH PROTESTANTS.

"The Reformed Church of France," is that to which it is most natural to look for vigorous efforts to evangelize the nation. This, according to a statistical account made up in 1828, consisted of 85 consistorial churches: which, at the rate assigned by law, of 6,000 souls for each church, gives us an aggregate of 510,000. It has besides 11 oratories, which appear to be smaller communities than those which would warrant the formation of a consistorial church. Probably the whole body of Protestants in France, under this denomination, may amount to 1,000,000 of persons! Among these there were at the above period 438 edifices for public worship, 305 pastors, 451 Bible Societies and Associations, 124 Misionary Societies, 59 Tract Societies and Depositories. Such a great variety of scriptural means and ministers, must, under the Divine blessing, be effectual in producing an amount of benefit incalculable both for time and eternity!

ROMAN CATHOLIC CLERGY IN FRANCE.

It is calculated that there are at present in France, 36,185 priests, who regularly officiate, including those who do not receive pay from the treasury. Of these 2,849 are curates, 22,244 are temporary curates, 5,301 are vicars, 1,462 regular priests, 873 almoners of colleges and hospitals. Of the religious, there are 106 female congregations, possessing 1,721 establishments, which contain 11,752 sisters, who relieve about 69,000 sick persons, and instruct 63,000 poor children gratuitously! Surely the time is not far distant, when instead of Romish superstition and idolatry, all the operations of these thousands of agents shall be guided by the Holy Scriptures.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT AND THE AFRICAN PRINCE.

ALEXANDER, during his march into Africa, came to a people dwelling in peaceful huts, who knew neither war nor conquest. Gold being offered to him, he refused it, saying, that his sole object was to learn the manners and customs of the inhabitants. "Stay with us," says the chief, "as long as it pleaseth thee." During his stay with the African chief, two of his subjects brought before him a case for judgment. The dispute was, the one had bought of the other a piece of ground, which, after the purchase, was found to contain a treasure, for which he felt himself bound to pay. The other refused to receive any thing; stating, that, when he sold the ground, he sold it with all the advantages apparent or concealed which it might be found to afford. Said the chief, looking at the one, "You have a son;" and to the other, "You have a daughter. Let them be married, and the treasure be given them as dowry." Alexander was astonished. "And what," said the chief, "would have been the decision in your country?" "We should have dismissed the parties," said Alexander, "and seized the treasure for the king's use." "And does the sun shine on your country?" said the chief; "Does the rain fall there? Are there any cattle there which feed upon herbs and green grass?" "Certainly," said Alexander. "Ah!" said the chief, "it is for the sake of those innocent cattle that the Great Being permits the sun to shine, the rain to fall, and the grass to grow, in your country."

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XLII.

Upon those points in which the Education of Females ought to be different from that of Males.

Dear Madam,

In my last I drew the consequences of an improper system: allow me now to delineate what I consider to be the correct, and to describe its results.

I will suppose then the question asked, How is the intellectual education of a female to be properly conducted? I answer, Let all the various powers and faculties of her mind be educed and strengthened, and her understanding be informed on all those practical and useful branches of knowledge which she will need as the wife and mistress of a family. All this will not interfere with the acquisition of the proper degree of those accomplishments already recommended in previous Letters. But the mischief consists in substituting accomplishments for education. Except to the truly pitiable woman of fashion, of how little real use will these accomplishments be in after-life?

Is it not highly probable that she will forget her music, her drawing, her French, &c. quite as quick at least as she learnt them? But in such an instance, when these are gone there is nothing left. It would be right indeed that the tastes induced by these acquisitions should remain; nor is it needful that when a girl enters into the cares and business of life, that she should entirely discontinue the practice of her accomplishments. But wo be to the man whose wife has nothing besides these, except the false and pernicious notions respecting wedlock acquired from novels and romances, or the romantic incidents of human life.

On the contrary it appears to me, that the intellectual education of a female ought to be peculiarly conducted with a view to the formation of a sound judgment, or what I would rather call common sense; a knowledge of what is proper under every circumstance, the acquiring the modes whereby the common transactions of human life are conducted. Hence she should engage equally with her brother in those studies which give acuteness to the powers of judgment, and exercise the mind in taking correct apprehensions of the real nature of all things. Her education should also be peculiarly calculated to impart true views of human life, and of its great end. She should ever be taught to consider, that it is the end of existence to be happy, and to make others happy. She should be taught to know in what happiness consists, and from what it is derived; and that the grand duty of woman is to conduce to the happiness of her husband and children, as it is his to protect and to secure hers.

Hence it is of the first importance that she should be trained to habits of economy in all things, to have as few wants as possible, to help herself always when it is practicable, to become acquainted with the various departments in which the management of a family consists, to know how to save by mending and making for herself and for her children, to know how at least to superintend all, even the most common procedures of the household.

All this is perfectly compatible with intelligence, information, loveliness, and health. At the same time, unnecessary expenditure is prevented, and those orderly arrangements proceed, upon which the comfort of a family is dependent. Every wise and good man learns to esteem the value of such a wife; and the love, induced perhaps by other considerations, is not (to say nothing more) lessened by perceiving the universal value of his choice. Nor is all this domestic excellence inconsistent with respect: it does indeed conduce to it. On the contrary, the woman who feels that she is inferior in the knowledge of the procedures of a household to her own servants, and also knows that her husband daily discovers it, can never, if she has any good sense left, respect herself, or expect to gain the respect of her husband.

After all, in the vast majority of instances, the happiness of a household is dependent upon the mistress; and her ability to render it happy is in strict proportion to her knowledge of domestic arrangements. This may not be needed in the professed lady of fashion, whose whole existence is occupied by fatigue and excitement, excitement and fatigue, display, indolence, dissipation, and extravagance. No one with any common sense would say, that she or her husband, even if resembling her in habits, are happy. But throughout the families of the empire, the happiness of individuals and the welfare of the next generation, must be dependent from the sources and circumstances which I have previously specified.

To reduce general rules to particulars, I should advise, that girls should be taught to aim at a noble simplicity of dress and manners, should be taught to estimate accomplishments as secondary, and the acquisition of useful knowledge and good habits and good sense and knowledge of the world, as first.

This can only be done by either conducting their education at home, by the aid of visiting governesses, and in which case all the benefits attributed in a former Letter to a public education are lost, or by placing them in the care of some conductress of a seminary possessing the requisite views and habits.

That such are to be found, I will not take upon myself to deny; yet I cannot help expressing my opinion, that even under the most favourable circumstances, there is not that attention to the education in the principles of morals and in the practices of domestic life which are requisite. I could wish some one would supply the first defect by a book, and the second by setting up a seminary in which the latter should be taught. It was part of the education of our great-grandmothers to go to a pastry school, or to learn cookery by some other means.

I cannot pretend to say how such a thing might be managed now, yet I doubt not but that if the ability to superintend and inspect such matters could be now communicated to the minds of girls as part of their education, their future husbands would never regret that in this respect their education had approximated in some degree at least to that of their ancestors.

I am the more confident in these sentiments, when I find them agreeing with those of King Lemuel, "which his mother taught him," who, in describing a good wife, says,—

"She will do him good and not evil, all the days of her life.

"She seeketh wool and flax, and worketh diligently with her hands.

"She girdeth her loins with strength, and strengtheneth her arms.

"She layeth her hand to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff.

"She maketh herself coverings of tapestry, her clothing is of silk and purple.

"She openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness.

"She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness."

Well may the writer say of such a female, "her price is far above rubies." Many daughters have done excellently, but she has excelled them all!

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

Clericus.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ABRAHAM.

The Death of Abraham.

Abraham lived after the marriage of Isaac about thirty-seven years. Of this period, however, we have but few particulars recorded, the whole being contained in a few verses. Having seen his beloved Isaac blessed with a pious wife, agreeably to his wishes, Abraham entered again into the honourable state of marriage. In this union, God gave him an addition to his family of six sons. Of their characters nothing is recorded; yet we may be certain that he taught them "the way of the Lord;" and during his life-time, as he found the infirmities of age increasing, Abraham made suitable provision for them, and sent them away to settle in a distant part of the country; that the peaceful temper of Isaac might not be disturbed, by the ambition or avarice of his brothers.

Abraham, at length, draws near the close of his mortal days. Even "the friend of God" must die! "Then Abraham gave up the ghost, and died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years;—and these are the days of the years of Abraham's life which he lived, a hundred threescore and fifteen years." Gen. xxv, 7, 8.

The pious patriarch doubtless terminated his pilgrimage in a temper and manner corresponding to his character as "father of believers." Passing "through the valley of the shadow of death, he feared no evil; the Lord was with him, his rod and staff comforted him." Psal. xxiii, 4.

> "His God sustain'd him in the final hour,
> His final hour brought glory to his God."

We have seen that Abraham's son Ishmael, in early years, was a mocker of religion and a persecutor of Isaac: but he appears to have become reconciled to his brother, during the life of their father, and that both were present at the patriarch's decease. They received the last benediction of their dying parent, while he breathed out his willing spirit into the hands of his covenant God. "And his sons Isaac and Ishmael buried him in the cave of Machpelah, in the field of Ephron the son of Zohar the Hittite, which is before Mamre; the field which Abraham purchased of the sons of Heth: there was Abraham buried, and Sarah his wife." Gen xxv, 9, 10.

Thus died Abraham, "the father of believers," leaving behind him a character singularly honoured by God, and worthily celebrated by men. His life was much shorter than that of his ancestors, but far more connected with important events: chequered with unusual trials, but divinely blessed with extraordinary favours: distinguished by the most brilliant virtues that ever adorned the sons of men; but not altogether free from the infirmities of a fallen nature. Abraham received the blessing of free justification by faith, while an uncircumcised heathen; and though his obedience to the will of God was more eminently exemplary than that of any of his descendants, it is clearly evident, that his salvation was not merited by his good works, but was enjoyed only by sovereign grace, through faith in the all-sufficient righteousness of a Divine Redeemer.

Both by our Lord and his apostles, Abraham is repeatedly commended to us as a worthy pattern of vigorous faith and patient resignation, in running the Christian race; and the contemplation of none of the pious fathers, or prophets of God, is better calculated to instruct and encourage us, in "pressing towards the mark for the prize of our high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

Abraham's name has been highly honoured among all the nations of the East. Their mythological traditions abound with allusions to the events of his life; and not only the Jews, but the Magians, Sabians, Indians, and Mohammedans, have claimed him as the great patriarch and founder of their systems of religion. Alexander Severus the Roman emperor, who knew nothing of Abraham but what was related of him by the Christians and Jews, conceived so high an opinion of him as to enrol him with Jesus Christ among the number of his gods!

THE FIRST FEMALE MARTYR IN ENGLAND.

Popery in its genuine character is illustrated in the bitter sufferings of thousands of the martyrs for Christ. Pretended infallibility in its decisions, and cruel intolerance in its policy, towards those differing from it, mark the Roman Catholic church in every age. Dr. Southey, in his "Book of the Church," though that beautifully written volume is exceedingly defective as a record of religious history in Britain, contains some remarkable exhibitions of the spirit and practice of the Romish hierarchy, of which we select the following paragraph, containing a notice of the sufferings of Joan Boughton, whom he calls "The first female martyr in England."

Bishop Pecock had offended his haughty colleague, by professing some opinions similar to those published by Wycliffe and his followers, and therefore "as he was required, at Paul's Cross, in the presence of twenty thousand people, at the archbishop's feet, he committed himself as a penitent sinner to the correction of the church and his lord of Canterbury." "It remains now to state, what were the tender mercies of the Romish church to this eminent man (the most learned of his age and country), who had thus humbly and thoroughly submitted to its authority. That his enemies in that church insulted him with a malice which was at once venomous and grovelling, is only what may always be expected from mean and malignant minds; but the treatment which he received can only be imputed to the inimitable spirit of the papal tyranny and its agents. He was sent to Thorney Abbey, there to be confined in a secret closed chamber, out of which he was not allowed to go. The person, who made his bed and his fire, was the only one who might enter and speak to him, without the abbot's leave, and in his presence. He was to have neither pen, ink, nor paper, and to be allowed no books, except a mass book, a psalter, a legendary, and a Bible. For the first quarter, he was to have no better fare than the common rations of the convent; afterwards, the pittance of the sick or aged brother, with such further indulgence as his health might require, for which, the prior was allowed eleven pounds. In this dismal imprisonment Pecock died. But carefully as his writings were sought for and destroyed, some of them remained to preserve his memory, and bear witness to his learning, his moderation, and his worth.

If such was the severity which the Romish church exercised towards the ablest of its defenders, what were those persons to expect who detested its doctrines, when they fell into the hands of its inhuman ministers? The civil wars, which in all other respects were so frightful to humanity, had the good effect of affording them a respite: in Fuller's beautiful words, "the very storm was their shelter." But when the struggle ceased, the business of persecution was resumed, and Henry VII, while he asserted his authority over the clergy, found it consistent with his policy to employ them rather than his nobles in state affairs, and suffered them to proceed against the Lollards with the utmost rigour. Among the victims whom they brought to the stake, was a woman of some quality, Joan Boughton by name, the first female martyr in England. She was more than eighty years of age, and held in such reverence for her virtues, that during the night after her martyrdom, her ashes were collected, to be preserved as relics for pious and affectionate remembrance. Her daughter, the Lady Young, suffered afterwards the same cruel death, with equal constancy. At Amersham, when William Tylsworth was burnt, his only daughter, as being suspected of heresy, was compelled not only to witness his death, but with her own hands to set fire to him! By such barbarities did the Romish church provoke the indignation of God and man. That it should have made one real convert by such means is impossible; though it compelled many to abjuration. In that case, the miserable wretches whom it admitted to its mercy, were made to bear a faggot in public, while they witnessed the martyrdom of those who had more constancy than themselves. They were fastened to the stake by the neck with towels, and their hands held fast, while they were marked on the cheek with a hot iron; after which, they were for life to wear a faggot, worked or painted on the left sleeve; and if they ventured to lay aside this badge, which if they were in humble life consigned them to want as well as infamy, they were sent to the flames without remission; so that it became a saying, Put it off and be burnt; keep it on and be starved. Bishop Nix, of Norwich, one of the most infamous for his activity in this persecution, used to call the persons whom he suspected of heretical opinions, "men savouring of the frying pan;" with such levity did these monsters regard the sufferings which they inflicted! A correspondent of Erasmus wrote to him, that the price of wood was considerably advanced about London, in consequence of the quantity required for the frequent executions in Smithfield. The statement is one of those hyperboles, which in the familiarity of letter writing, are understood as they are meant, and convey no more than the truth.

MY SCRAP BOOK.

LEAF XV.

"The Bee that wanders, and sips from every flower, disposes what she has gathered into her cells."—SENECA.

Anecdote of the Duke of Saxony.

HENRY Duke of Saxony, a cruel and debauched prince, dreamed that the tutelar angel of the country appeared to him with an angry countenance, and reproached him in these words, "Ill-fated wretch! The Almighty, unwilling to cut thee off in the fulness of thine iniquity, hath sent me to give thee warning." Upon this, he showed him a scroll, in which was written "AFTER SIX." The duke awoke trembling, and much alarmed. He was convinced the vision was from God, and thought it certainly predicted his end. Six days, six weeks, six months, were spent in penitence and serious preparation for death: but these having elapsed, he concluded that six years must have been the period intended, and under this impression he effected a thorough reformation in his life and government. At the end of six years, he was elected emperor of Germany.

Worth of the Bible.

Afflictions teach us the worth of our Bibles. The Bible is too often but an insipid book before afflictions bring us to feel the want of it, and then how many comforting passages do we find, which lay neglected and unknown before. I recollect an instance in the history of some who fled from this country to that then wild desert, America. Among many other hardships, they were in such straits for bread, that the very crusts of their former tables in England, would have been a dainty to them. Necessity drove the women and children to the sea-side to look for a ship, expected to bring them provisions: but no ship for many weeks appeared: however, they saw in the sand vast quantities of shell-fish, since called clams, a kind of mussel. Hunger compelled them to taste, and at length they fed almost wholly on them, and, to their own astonishment, were as cheerful, fat, and lusty, as they had been in England, with their fill of the best provisions. A worthy man, one day, after they had all dined on clams, without bread, returned thanks to God for causing them to "suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand," a passage in Deuteronomy, till then unobserved by the company, but which ever after endeared the writings of Moses to them.—Robt. Robinson.

Death-bed Repentance.

All the precepts of the gospel direct to holy living; but I do not know any directions in all the Scriptures that peculiarly concern holy dying. This is a matter which I doubt has not been considered as it ought to be, for otherwise people could never lay so much stress upon what is never once mentioned in all the Scripture. I do not mean by this to deny that God will pardon those who at any time of their lives do truly repent and turn to him: but there is great reason to fear that most of that which goes under the name of death-bed repentance, does not proceed from a true change in the soul, but is only a sorrow in a manner forced upon people, from the necessity of their present circumstances.—Dr. Willis, dean of Lincoln, 1709.

Estimate of Human Life.

"So teach us to number our days."—What is the total amount of human life? What is the sum of this account of days of nothingness, and days of reality; of days of prosperity, and days of affliction; of days of languor, and days of delight; of days devoted to the world, and days devoted to religion? My brethren, it is God, it is God alone, who holds "our times in his hand:" he alone can make an accurate calculation of them. It is not impossible, however, to ascertain what shall be, in respect of time, the temporal destination of those that hear me this day. Let me suppose that the present solemnity has drawn together an assembly of 1,800 persons. I divide them into six classes.

1.	From 10 to 20 years old	530
2.	—— 20 to 30	440
3.	—— 30 to 40	345
4.	—— 40 to 50	255
5.	—— 50 to 60	160
6.	—— 60 and upward	70
		1,800

According to the most exact calculation, 60 of my present hearers must, before the beginning of another year, be numbered with the dead.

In 10 years, of the 1,800 will remain	1,270
In 20	830
In 30	480
In 40	230
In 50, only	70

Thus you see, my brethren, in what a perpetual flux the human race is. The world is a vast theatre, of which every one appears his moment upon the stage, and in a moment disappears. Every successive instant presents different scenery, a new decoration. I represent these vicissitudes to myself under the emblem of what is felt by a man who is employed in turning over the pages of history. He pores over his book, he beholds on this leaf one people, one king: he turns it, and lo! other laws, other maxims, other actors, which have no relation to that which preceded. — Saurin.

American Anecdote.

Mr. W. a merchant in Boston, agreeably to his usual liberality, sent a present of chocolate, sugar, &c. to the Rev. Dr. Byles, with a note desiring his acceptance of it, as a comment upon Gal. vi, 6, "Let him that is taught in the word, communicate unto him that teacheth, in all good things." The Doctor, who was then confined by indisposition, returned his compliments to Mr. W., thanked him for his excellent Family Expositor, and wished Mr. W. to give him a practical exposition of Matth. xxv, 36, "I was sick, and ye visited me."

"YOUNG MEN'S SOCIETIES."

Mr. Editor,—You are aware, that not a few of the readers of the Christian's Penny Magazine, are composed of young persons, who, it is hoped, derive much benefit and religious advantage from its pages.

Several young men would feel obliged, if they could be informed through the medium of your excellent periodical, where applicants may apply who wish to become members of the above associations, several of which have recently been established in London?

Yours much obliged,
Crito.

"Young Men," and "Young Women," constitute the hope and glory of the church and nation. For their benefit we have particularly laboured; and with pleasure, in a future number, we intend to give some account of the "London Young Men's Society;" which, with discreet management, may be the means of infinite benefit to those for whom it is designed. A society of this kind was formed among the Young Men of the Rev. J. A. James's congregation, Birmingham, about twenty years ago, from which the most precious fruits have arisen. We should be obliged by some particulars respecting their plans and proceedings up to the present period.—Editor.

THE ALTAR.

A broken altar, Lord, thy servant rears,
Made of a heart, and cemented with tears;
Whose parts are as thy hand did frame,
No workman's tool hath touch'd the same;
A heart alone
Is such a stone,
As nothing but
Thy power doth cut;
Wherefore each part
Of my hard heart
Meets in this frame
To praise thy name;
That if I chance to hold my peace,
These stones to praise thee may not cease.
O let this blessed sacrifice be mine,
And sanctify this altar to be thine!

AMERICAN COTTAGER,

Or, Conscience and the Lord's Supper, by the Rev. Calvin Colton, A. M. 32mo. cloth, pp. 104. London, James Paul.

American religion in the newly-formed settlements of the Western States, is most graphically exhibited in this beautiful little narrative. Log-houses and log-churches are here described by the pen of an intelligent, pious, and devoted labourer in that Home Missionary field; and we believe that every reader will be thankful for our recommendation of this elegant and touching delineation of piety among the new settlers of America. We purpose to enrich our pages with some of its affecting details.

SONGS OF A PILGRIM;

Short Poems on Sacred Subjects. By John Cox. 24mo. Cloth. pp. 192. Nisbet, London.

Christians of maturity in scriptural knowledge and experience will esteem this volume a little treasure. It contains nearly eighty poems on the most important subjects; many of which contain considerable poetic merit, but especially the riches of evangelical truth. The following may be regarded as a good specimen of the whole.

Anxious Care dismissed from the Heart.

"Be careful for nothing," &c. — Phil. iv, 6, 7.

Farewell, farewell, corroding care,
My God commands, and we will part;
His promise doth my spirit cheer,
And rolls the burden from my heart.

Perplex'd my anxious spirit rov'd
Through paths and days that ne'er may come;
Like Noah's dove I ever prov'd,
Such troublous waves could yield no home.

In vain my careful soul did plan
From morning's dawn till evening's shade;
Still ending where I first began,
Still by my counsellors betray'd.

Till thus a kind adviser spoke —
"Haste to the throne in trouble's day;
Then shall thy fears dissolve, like smoke
Blown by the breath of heav'n away.

"There let thy woes and fears be spread,
There with thy large requests attend;
Then shall thy faith lift up its head,
Thy song shall rise, thy sorrows end;

"And heavenly peace thy soul shall keep;
Peace flowing through a Saviour's blood,
Shall make obedience free and sweet,
Shall keep thy heart reclin'd on God!"

Conscience is a certain middle thing between God and man.

A good conscience, is one that speaks peace with God's allowance.

PAUL AND BARNABAS AT LYSTRA.

MIRACLES have always been the means of demonstrating the divine mission of the inspired servants of God. Moses, the founder of the ceremonial dispensation of mercy to the nation of Israel, and Christ and his apostles, the founders of the evangelical economy for all the nations of mankind, wrought miracles in proof of their heavenly commission. Familiarity with the inspired records renders it unnecessary to enumerate for the readers of the Christian's Penny Magazine the wonderful works of God, by his inspired messengers; the present observations, therefore, are limited to the apostolic visit to Lystra, in Lycaonia of Asia Minor, as recorded Acts xiv.

Idolatry of the most absurd, ridiculous, and demoralizing character, was practised by the refined Greeks and Romans. Jupiter was regarded as the supreme divinity, or father of the gods, among both those refined divisions of the ancient world. Mercury was esteemed the god of eloquence, and the messenger of the other deities; and it was a common notion, that all the divinities were confined to some particular place or country; but that on some occasions they condescended to visit mortals, and converse with them on great affairs. According to this theology, they believed that Mercury usually accompanied Jupiter on these expeditions; and, agreeably to these notions, when the people of Lystra beheld the miracle performed on the helpless cripple, they immediately expressed their astonishment. Luke says, "And when the people saw what Paul had done, they lifted up their voices, saying in the speech of Lycaonia, The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. And they called Barnabas, Jupiter; and Paul, Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker."

Instantly Paul and Barnabas were metamorphosed, in the imagination of these superstitious citizens, into Jupiter and Mercury, whom they supposed to be inseparable companions. Barnabas seems to have been the tallest and most elegant figure; and they concluded therefore, that he must be the father of the gods, whom they were accustomed to represent as an old man, of robust make and of majestic aspect. Paul, whose "bodily presence was weak," according to his own testimony, yet being but a young man, of sprightly manners, whose public talents and rhetoric were most distinguished, they were persuaded could be no other than Mercury, the eloquent interpreter of the gods. This persuasion might the more easily prevail in the minds of the people of Lystra, from the well-known fable of Jupiter and Mercury having descended from heaven in human shape, and being entertained by Lycaon, from whom the people of this province were called Lycaonians.

Honoured as they thus imagined themselves to be by a visit from Jupiter and Mercury, having witnessed the miracle of benevolence in the healing of the cripple; the citizens of Lystra, to render due honour to these illustrious personages for their condescension, determined on celebrating a public and solemn sacrifice, and decked themselves and the victims designed for the offering. "Then the priest of Jupiter, which was before their city, brought oxen and garlands unto the gates, and would have done sacrifice with the people."

Jupiter, it seems, they worshipped as the chosen guardian of their city; and a temple erected to his honour stood a little way out of the town. The superstitious or crafty priest immediately entered into the enthusiasm of the people, and brought victims and chaplets of flowers, according to the rites of their worship. With this preparation they proceeded towards the lodgings of these holy men of God, to offer the sumptuous sacrifice, all wearing garlands, both the people and the victims. Such proceedings shocked the holy minds of these devoted servants of Christ; and, as the sacred historian remarks, "When the apostles, Barnabas and Paul, heard these things, they rent their clothes, and ran in among the people, crying out, and saying, Sirs, why do ye these things? We also are men of like passions with you, and preach unto you that ye should turn from these vanities unto the living God, which made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein: who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways. Nevertheless he left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness. And with these sayings scarce restrained they the people, that they had not done sacrifice unto them."

Every reader will observe the wise adaptation of the address of these messengers from God to the deluded and superstitious pagans. They derive their arguments from no higher source than natural religion, and insist only upon the plain and obvious topics of creation and providence: for the works of creation are a certain demonstration of the being of God—the living God, who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein. In times past he suffered all nations, except the house of Israel, to walk in their own ways, without having given to them any particular revelation of himself and of his holy will, like that which he had made to his chosen people. Still his general providence afforded to all ample proofs of his power and goodness; as they declared, he left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness. These arguments are plain to the meanest capacity. He who is the Creator and Preserver of us and all things, the author and giver of all the good we enjoy, must be the only proper and the most worthy object of our worship. Superstition however had so inflamed and transported the minds of the heathen, that with these sayings scarce restrained they the people, that they had not done sacrifice unto them.

Paul and Barnabas would not, however, be satisfied to reason with the people on the grounds of natural religion: they preached to them the gospel of Christ for their salvation. Disciples were found at Lystra: and though malignant Jews succeeded in prevailing on the fickle multitude to stone their chief benefactor, and brutally drag him out of the city for dead, the Holy Spirit had blessed the good seed of the gospel already sown, and we read that Paul and Barnabas returned again to Lystra, confirming the souls of the disciples, exhorting them to continue in the faith.

The engraving at the head of this article, representing the intended sacrifice to Paul and Barnabas, is from one of the celebrated cartoons of Raffaelle, purchased by King Charles I, and deposited in the palace at Hampton Court, of which they are esteemed the richest treasures.

MINON ROBINSON, THE AGED GREENWICH PENSIONER.

British sailors are entitled to the respect of the nation: for their self-denying labours have preserved our shores, and kept us in the secure possession of our peaceful homes. Many of them, it is true, exhibit a character and habits, in which truly devout Christians cannot by any means delight: but probably the churches of Christ and individual believers are in a high degree culpable, in having neglected to seek and promote their spiritual welfare, by affording them more abundantly the means of grace, and calling their attention to the gospel of their salvation.

British sailors, however, are not all reprobates; much has been effected for this class of our worthy countrymen, in making provision for their spiritual edification; under the Divine blessing, many have been made "new creatures in Christ Jesus," and they have become "living epistles of Christ, known and read of all men."

Greenwich Hospital, that grand national monument of benevolence, has been not the least means of their eternal good: for besides their personal comforts, which are so amply secured, and the religious instruction imparted by the chaplains in that noble institution, there are several chapels in the town, in which the gospel is faithfully preached by the Baptist, Independent, and Wesleyan ministers, and many of the "pensioners" attend those places of worship on the Lord's day evenings, not a few of them being members of the several chapels.

Among these devout men, one of the most distinguished was Minon Robinson, who died Dec. 4, 1833, aged 92 years, after an illness of only a few days. He was a member of the Independent church, under the pastoral care of the Rev. H. B. Jeula, Greenwich, and highly esteemed by his minister and Christian friends. Temperance and godliness might be seen beaming in his cheerful countenance; and his regularity at the house of God, and devotional appearance when engaged in the service of the sanctuary, have been witnessed with pleasure by the writer of this notice; and they commanded the respect and love of all that knew him. Though so far advanced in life, his faculties seemed unimpaired and vigorous, even to the last; his bodily activity indicated little more than half the years which had passed over his head; and in many respects he appeared the most remarkable man in the whole establishment, which includes 2,700 pensioners.

Sir Jahleel Brenton, the excellent and pious Lieutenant Governor of Greenwich Hospital, took great notice of Minon Robinson; and sometimes, we understand, sent for him to enjoy his religious conversation. Sir Jahleel, we are informed, visited the venerable mariner, when he heard of his illness, desiring that every thing possible might be done for his comfort, and was delighted to witness his holy resignation to the will of his covenant God, and his triumph in hope of eternal glory by Christ Jesus. His character was held in deserved respect by his fellow-pensioners; and it is trusted that his death has served to lead some of them to seek an interest in God our Saviour!

"There is no adversity, no disappointment in life, that does not leave behind it some serious, useful moral."

"There is no idea which so directly tends to civilize the human mind, making all men act towards each other as brothers, as any belief, however uncertain, in a state of future existence."

JOURNAL OF TRAVELS IN SOUTH AFRICA,

Among the Hottentots and other Tribes, in the Years 1812, 1813, and 1814, by John Campbell, Minister of Kingsland Chapel, London. Abridged by the Author. London. Tract Society. 18mo. Cloth. pp. 228.

Mr. Campbell's details, on his return from his missionary travels, afforded the most lively delight to crowded congregations in every part of Great Britain. His volume, containing the journal of his travels, was read also with deep interest, as it exhibits the triumphs of Christianity among some of the most degraded of human beings — the native tribes of southern Africa. This abridgment we regard as a most valuable and interesting volume; which will form an admirable present for the young, peculiarly so for those who are collectors for missionary societies, or contributors to promote their evangelical operations.

There are few little volumes better calculated to promote the genuine improvement of the young — promoting an enlarged benevolence of heart towards the miserable heathen, and gratitude for our civilized British and Christian mercies — than this of Mr. Campbell's Journal.

ANECDOTES. CHRISTIAN GRACES.

18mo. Cloth. pp. 208. Religious Tract Society.

"Example is more powerful than precept," is a maxim which is finely illustrated in this valuable volume. Many bright examples, exhibiting the Christian graces, we have constantly before us in our favoured country: but in this choice collection of Anecdotes, we behold a most instructive mirror, reflecting the excellences of many of the saints of God, in a most striking manner. We give an example, illustrative of Luke xiv, 26: — "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children," &c.

"A martyr was asked, whether he did not love his wife and children, who stood weeping by him? — 'Love them!' said he: 'Yes, if all the world were gold, and at my disposal, I would give it all for the satisfaction of living with them, though it were in a prison: yet, in comparison with Christ, I love them not!'"

VISIT TO AN ARMENIAN PASTOR.

The chief at Jelton having given me a letter to the minister of Masra, a small village in the neighbourhood of Mount Lebanon, I alighted at his door. He was not at home, but his wife received me in the kindest manner, and pressed me to wait her husband's return, and rest myself after my fatigue. She was a fine woman, in the flower of her youth, and conducted the detail of her family affairs in the midst of three or four little children, whom she endeavoured to quiet by turns. Meanwhile the good man arrived from his farm, and seemed to vie with his wife in attentions to his guest. In compliance, however, with the restraints which oriental manners impose on women, she soon withdrew, and gave up her whole attention to the concerns of her family. At the hour for evening vespers, the people assembled in the open air, where prayers were offered up as much in the spirit of true piety, and consequently in a manner equally acceptable to the Deity, as if we had been seated under the gilded ceiling of the most sumptuous temple. The fall of night brought home several flocks of cattle, which constituted the whole wealth of this honest ecclesiastic; and while his wife and himself fed them by hand, and received their warm caresses, the simplicity of the patriarchal life was seen in its most genuine colours. As the customs of the East do not permit strangers to sleep under the same roof with the women, visitors are always lodged under the porch, or in apartments which have no communication with the principal part of the house. At my desire, my bed was laid in a raised corner under the porch, and my host reposed at my side; for, according to the manners of the mountaineers, the master of a family is both the keeper and the guardian of his guests, a rule of hospitality which I always found most religiously observed. As soon as it was day, I attended my host to the celebration of mass, and resumed my journey, notwithstanding the most pressing invitations to prolong my visit.

De Page's Travels.

"True piety is lovely wherever seen: it irresistibly throws interest and dignity around the most humble and obscure; and when it beams brightly in the noble and the brave, it imparts a double lustre to all their honours and their fame."

LINES ON THE TERMINATION OF THE YEAR.

A fleeting year with all its circling months,
Once more is lost in the expansive rush
Of that vast flood, Eternity, whose tide
Has onward roll'd its full, resistless stream,
Since the first morning of creation dawn'd;
And still will forward haste, till time shall cease,
And this mortality shall be no more.
So speaks the mandate of th' Eternal God!
'Tis past! and seemeth now its realty but a dream,
And its truest semblance is the moon ray,
Fitfully beaming through th' umbrageous grove,
Or streaming lucid on the peaceful lake.
'Tis gone! gone as the tropic whirlwind's blast,
When furious in wrath it sweeps the plain;
Or rending from its base some towering crag,
Adown the steep it falls precipitate,
And distant groves re-echo back the peal.
'Tis fled! fled as the vision of a summer dream,
When solar languor steals upon the soul,
And flit the fairy forms in graceful dance;
The eager mind dispels the fantasy,
And wakes to prove the shadow of the bliss.
'Tis past! and in its travellings have fallen
The great, the mighty, potentates and crowns,
And never shall oblivion veil its fame,
Or memory forget its bright renown,
While Time shall spare the chronicles of earth,
Or hold its records sacred from its spoil:
For great has been the lustre of its scenes,
And glorious the annals of its deeds:
And while each year revolving to the view
Opens fate's dark predestination,
Scenes of to-morrow dawn at morning's break,
And evening's shades proclaim the present past.
The misty future, veil'd from mortal eye,
Ere long shall beam upon the anxious view,
And memory retrace prophetic thought.
Thus as successive years shall onward fleet,
And Time shall haste it to its destined end,
Our frames must swell the myriad hosts of dead,
And the heart's throbbing at the painful truth,
Counts its pulsations but that throb the less.
